MARIO BAVA

ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

TIM LUCAS

Introduction by MARTIN SCORSESE

Foreword by RICCARDO FREDA

ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

MARIO BAVA

ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

TIM LUCAS

Introduction by MARTIN SCORSESE
Foreword by RICCARDO FREDA

VIDEO WATCHDOG · CINCINNATI OHIO

MARIO BAVA
ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

By Tim Lucas

Book Design: Donna Lucas

Mask Emblem: Charlie Largent

Research Assistance: John Bender, Stephen R. Bissette, Peter Blumenstock, Daniela Catelli, Lorenzo Codelli, Christopher Sven Dietrich, Kit J. Gavin, Uwe Huber, Steve Jarvis, Alan Jones, Bill Kelley, Robert Monell, Marc Morris, and Alan Y. Upchurch.

Digital Restoration: Donna Lucas, Charlie Largent, Simonida Perica Uth, and Matthew Bradshaw.

Endpapers: A Hadean panorama from Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World.

First Edition: July 2007

ISBN 0-9633756-1-X

Copyright © 2007 Tim Lucas

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying or recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system without permission in writing from the publisher.

All photos and illustrations in this volume are copyrighted by their respective owners, corporate and individual, and are reproduced herein in the spirit of publicity.

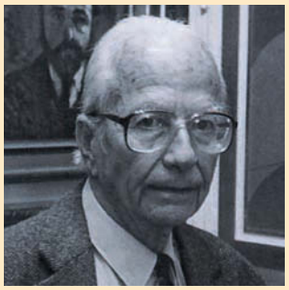
Video Watchdog
PO Box 5283
Cincinnati, OH 45205-0283
www.videowatchdog.com

Printed in China

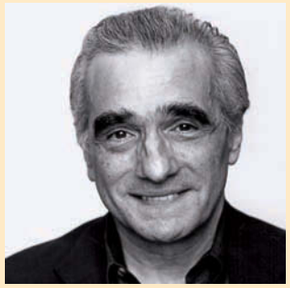
Per Mario e la sua famiglia

And in memory of my Bava squad:

Alan Y. Upchurch
Carlos Sylva
Bill Kelley
Mark Upchurch
Christopher Sven Dietrich



MARIO BAVA



ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

"The Italian cinema produces masterpieces because it has few resources."
—Rene Clair

JAVUTICH (Arturo Dominici) stands by as the undead Princess Asa absorbs the youth of her twin descendant Katia (Barbara Steele) in LA MASCHERA DEL DEMONIO.

CONT

FOREWORD 11
By Riccardo Freda

INTRODUCTION 13
By Martin Scorsese

PROLOGUE 15
Notes on the Text 33

FATHER AND SON
Eugenio Bava—The Invisible Man of Italian Cinema 37
Figlio d'Arte 47

CAMERAMAN
Proverbs and Propaganda 65
Triumph and Apocalypse 81
Tragedies and Comedies 93
Melodrama, Myth, and History 119

MORE THAN A CAMERAMAN

I vampiri 171 The Devil's Commandment
Le fatiche di Ercole 191 Hercules
La morte viene dallo spazio 213 The Day the Sky Exploded
Ercole e la regina di Lidia 225 Hercules Unchained

Back with Freda and Reeves 241

Nel segno di Roma 242 Sign of the Gladiator
Agi Murad il diavolo bianco 243 The White Warrior
Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei 250 The Last Days of Pompeii
Caltiki il mostro immortale 253 Caltiki the Immortal Monster
La battaglia di Maratona 267 The Battle of Marathon

MONSTERS AND HEROES

La maschera del demonio 281 Black Sunday
Morgan il pirata 329 Morgan the Pirate
Ester e il re 335 Esther and the King

Giants, Vikings, and Thieves 347

I giganti della Tessaglia 348 The Giants of Thessaly
L'ultimo dei vichinghi 350 Last of the Vikings
Il ladro di Bagdad 353 The Thief of Baghdad
Le meraviglie di Aladino 361 The Wonders of Aladdin

Thrice the Might! 373

Maciste contro il vampiro 374 Goliath and the Vampires
Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan 378 Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World
Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide 381 Hercules and the Captive Women
Ercole al centro della terra 389 Hercules in the Haunted World
La sfida dei giganti 410 Hercules the Avenger
Il gladiatore invincibile 413 The Invincible Gladiator
Gli invasori 417 Erik the Conqueror

Vacation in the Arena 433

Maciste all'Inferno 434 The Witch's Curse
I Normanni 437 Conquest of the Normans
I sette gladiatori 438 Gladiators 7
Le sette spade del vendicatore 440 Seventh Sword

E N T S

Love and Death

La ragazza che sapeva troppo 447 Evil Eye
Perseo l'invincibile 473 The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules
I tre volti della paura 481 Black Sabbath
Roma contro Roma 513 War of the Zombies
La frusta e il corpo 517 The Whip and the Body
Sei donne per l'assassino 541 Blood and Black Lace

Men of Steel, Men of Stone 569

Ercole l'invincibile 570 Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness
Maciste e la regina di Samar 572 Hercules Against the Moon Men
Il castello dei morti vivi 575 Castle of the Living Dead

New Frontiers

La strada per Fort Alamo 581 The Road to Fort Alamo
Minnesota Clay 593 Minnesota Clay
Terrore nello spazio 599 Planet of the Vampires
Ringo del Nebraska 633 Savage Gringo
I coltelli del vendicatore 643 Knives of the Avenger

Operation: Pop

Operazione paura 663 Kill, Baby . . . Kill!
Le spie vengono dal semifreddo 689 Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs
Nude . . . si muore 711 The Young, The Evil and the Savage
Diabolik 721 Danger: Diabolik
Il pistolero segnato da Dio 757 "A Gunfighter Sent by God"
Odissea—Le avventure di Ulisse 763 The Adventures of Ulysses
Il rosso segno della follia 777 Hatchet for the Honeymoon
Quantre volte . . . quella notte 795 Four Times That Night
5 bambole per la luna d'agosto 809 5 Dolls for an August Moon
Roy Colt e Winchester Jack 827 Roy Colt & Winchester Jack
I futuribili 842 "The People of Tomorrow"

Hellbound

Ecologia del delitto 847 Twitch of the Death Nerve
Gli orrori del Castello di Norimberga 871 Baron Blood
Lisa e il diavolo 895 Lisa and the Devil
La casa dell'esorcismo 925 The House of Exorcism
Cani arrabbiati 941 Rabid Dogs • Kidnapped

Gods and Demons

Mosè 961 Moses the Lawgiver
Schock 975 Beyond the Door II
La Venere d'Ille 1001 "The Venus of Ille"
Inferno 1009 Inferno

Last Days

Last Projects 1023
Mario Bava Lives 1035

Appendices 1043

Indices 1097

Foreword

By Riccardo Freda

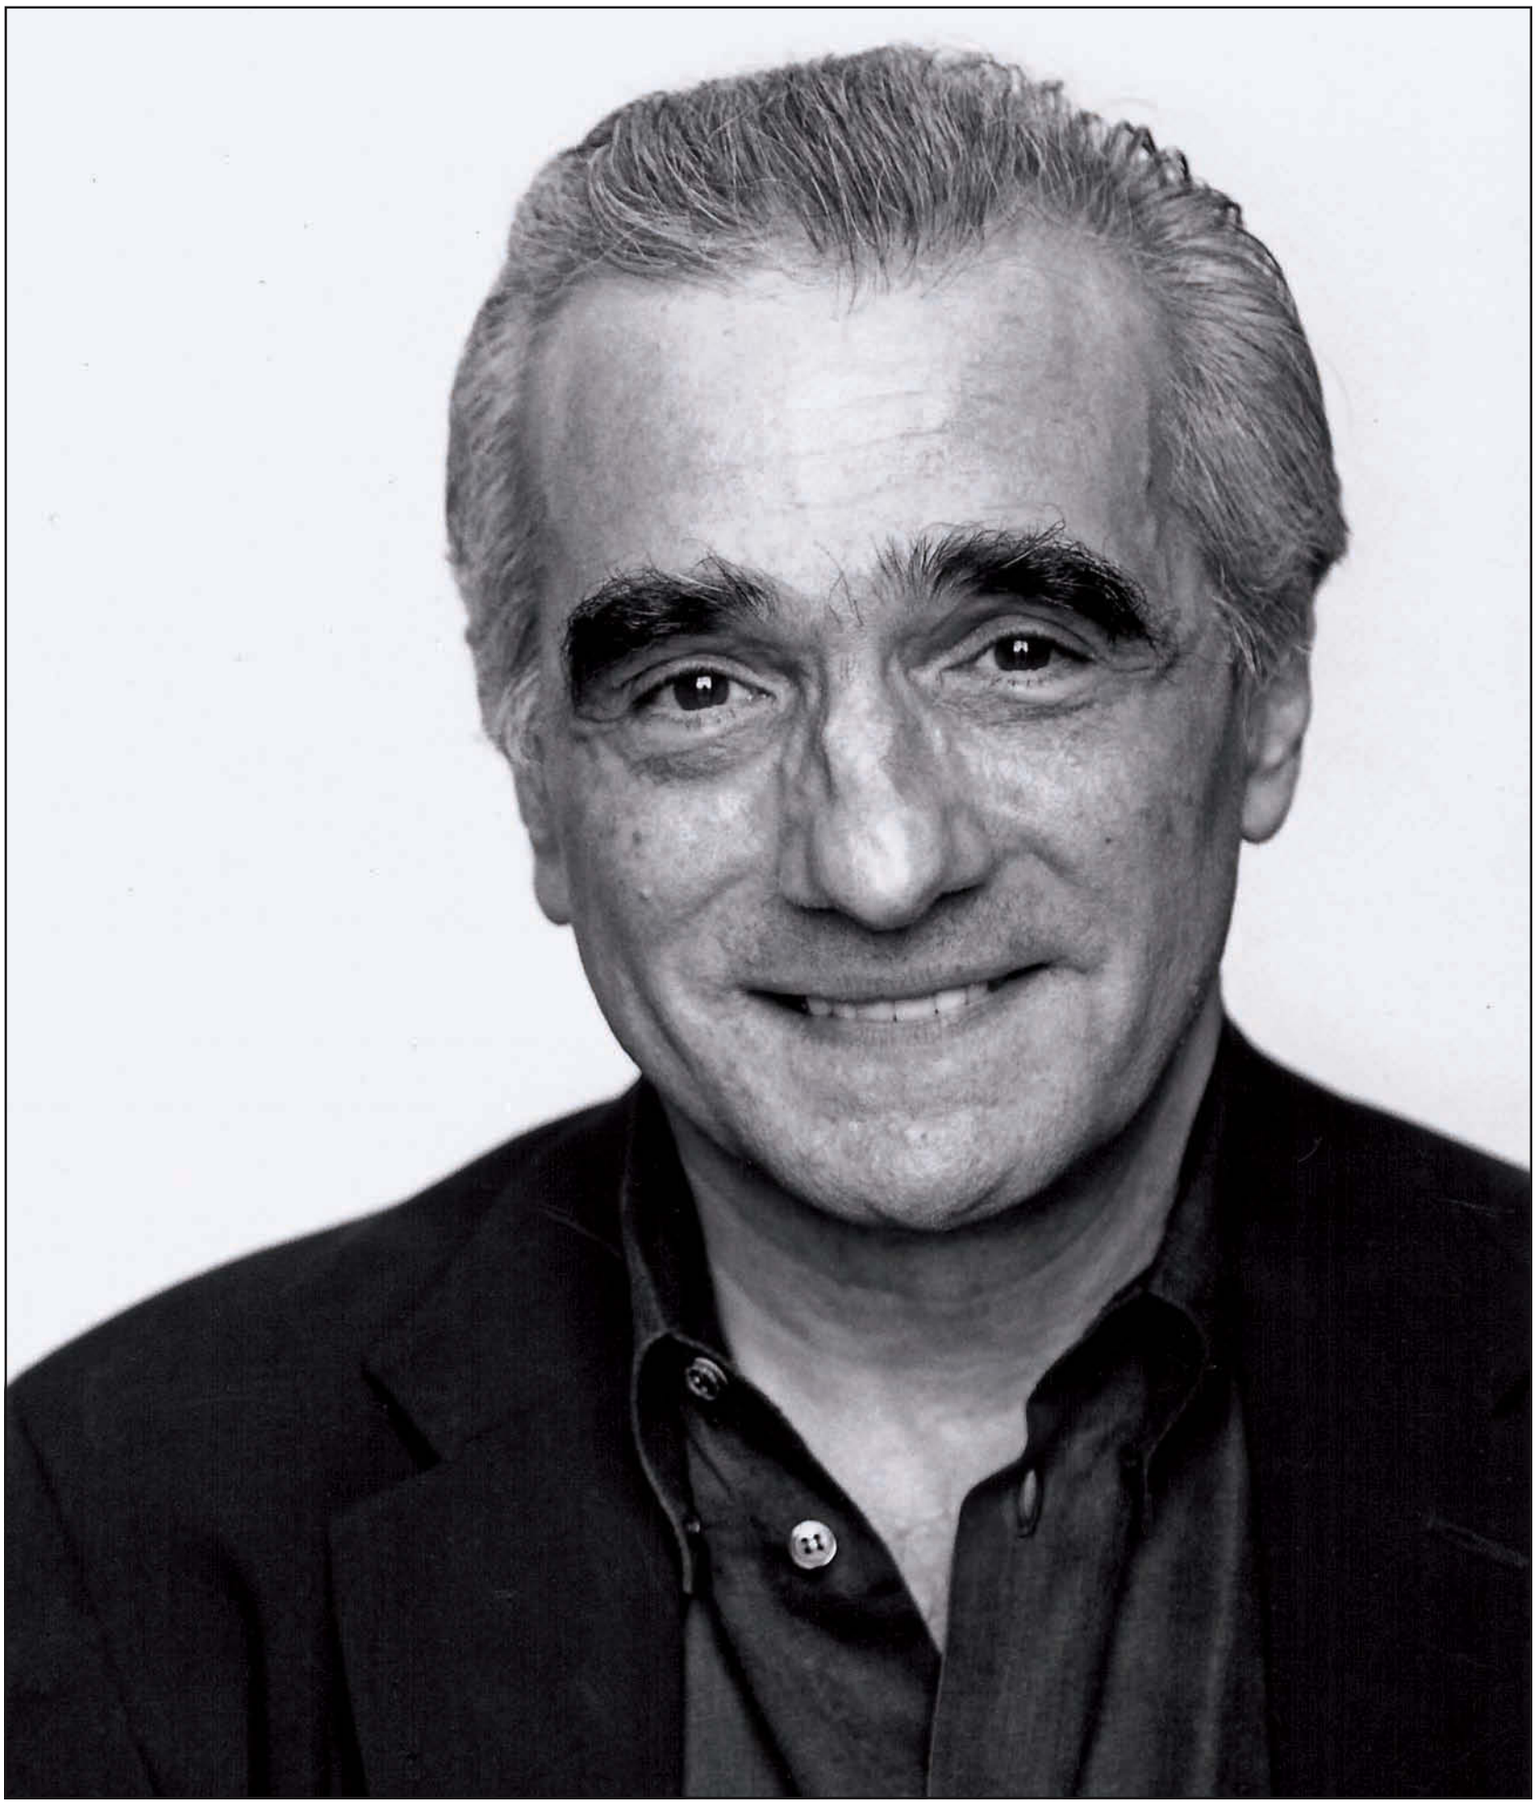
MY RELATIONSHIP with Mario Bava was divided equally between our personal and professional lives. Apart from working together on our films, Mario and I were also close friends. I am proud to say that he shared his dreams with me, as well as his memories.

I once accompanied him to his house to see the works of his father, an accomplished wax sculptor who specialized in making the likenesses of Saints, molding their faces and bodies out of wax and cloaking them in sacred vestments for the adoration of the devout. Perhaps his father's extraordinary talent showed Mario the way to his own artistic inclinations. His father was also a very talented inventor, from whom Mario inherited a predilection for the gadgets used in the making of motion pictures. Like him, I was also enamored of the field of trick photography and this quickly became a foundation for our friendship.

Bava became truly legendary for his trick photography and his ability was showcased in countless productions. Our debut as a team was I vampiri, a great success in which, for the first time on the screen, Bava triumphed in making a character grow old before the eyes of the audience without resorting to cutaways or dissolves. Caltiki il mostro immortale/Caltiki the Immortal Monster followed in 1959, which should be considered his first true venture as a director, as I abandoned the film for the last two weeks of production after arguing with the producers. After Caltiki, of course, Mario became a highly successful director in his own right and gradually, we lost touch with one another.

In any case, it must be said that Bava was, in effect, the true maker of many films, because his contributions qualified him to replace other directors of renown on several occasions—Pietro Francisci for Le fatiche di Ercole/Hercules (1958), Jacques Tourneur for La battaglia di Maratona/The Giant of Marathon (1959), etc. But it seems he cared little about this and, to be perfectly candid, he might have contentedly spent his entire life in the shadows had I not boasted about him and helped promote this important personality to the rank of director.

He was a simple man, always smiling, loving laughter and a good round of bazzica scopa—a card game to which he regularly challenged his fellow crew-members. And he very rarely lost his temper, a truly rare quality in this neurotic business of making movies.



We made a lot of movies together, and on some of these his name does not even appear, such as Spartaco/The Sins of Rome (1953), for which he shot all of the scenes at the arena in Verona.

In summation, all I can say is this: the technical problem did not exist that Mario Bava could not solve with the greatest of ease. He displayed this remarkable ability in several short films which, I fear, are now lost—for instance, the one called L'orecchio (1946), which he made with the famous Italian actor Aldo Fabrizi. Here, with little means at his disposal, Bava managed to create special effects wholly comparable to those seen twenty years later in Fantastic Voyage (1966).

I am very pleased to have the opportunity to contribute these words, and to pay Mr. Lucas my respects for remembering a great cinéaste and a dear friend.

Rome, Italy
February 19, 1984

INTRODUCTION

By Martin Scorsese

IF YOU ASKED ME to tell you the plot of any given Mario Bava film, I don't think I could. I take it back—I probably could now, after having read Tim Lucas' exhaustive, perceptive biography. But if this book didn't exist, I would find it difficult. Why? Because the films are simply too entrancing.

Different directors have different strengths. Some, like De Mille or Hitchcock or Wyler, are great storytellers. Bava was not a great storyteller, but he didn't have to be and he wasn't trying to be. He was good—very good—at something else. He used light, shadow, color, sound (on- and off-screen), movement and texture to lead his viewers down uncharted paths into a kind of collective dream. Critics often compare movie-watching to dreaming but, in Bava's case, the comparison actually means something. When we dream, we're often swept into indescribable situations, without time for deliberation or reflection. We're left in states of bliss or terror, or both at the same time. When we wake up, we realize that we've been riding these emotional states like surfers riding a wave.

This is how I experience Bava's best films. Many directors try to capture a dream-like state, but they often make the mistake of signalling the audience, and the mood is spoiled—you realize that the tone has changed, as if there were a title on the screen announcing, "Now it's going to be like a dream." But, invariably, Mario Bava gets it right. He places his viewers and his characters in an oddly disquieting state where they're compelled to keep moving forward—even though they don't know precisely why, or where they're going. The atmosphere itself becomes the principal character, a living organism with a mind and will of its own. Bava was a master craftsman, and he knew how to create a mood, where every sound, every movement of the camera, and every object was weighted with mystery and unease.

I've kept going back to Bava's films throughout the years, and the ones I love never disappoint me: Black Sunday, Blood and Black Lace, the "Wurdulak" section of Black Sabbath, Lisa and the Devil. I can't count the number of times I've seen Kill, Baby . . . Kill! and, every time, it casts the same spell. It's a genuinely hypnotic piece of filmmaking, and it goes into a deeply unsettling direction that many filmmakers with bigger budgets and far greater resources have tried for and few have managed to sustain, or even find.

At this point, I want to add that the strangely discordant American titles of some Bava pictures only add to their dream-like disorientation. When Kill, Baby . . . Kill! came out here, the title led me to expect '60s Bond sub-genre guys in shades riding around in convertibles and models in bikinis—pretty much anything but a 19th century gothic tale set in a Transylvanian castle.

Among the many virtues of this fine book is the fact that it offers us a multi-faceted portrait of a modest man who was an artist in spite of himself, working in the least reputable film genres—horror, slasher movies, sword and sandal epics, science fiction, sex comedies, Westerns. We have to keep resisting the idea of official film history, a stately procession of "important works" that leaves some of the most exciting films and filmmakers tucked away in the shadows. Bava's career—like Sam Fuller's, Edgar G. Ulmer's, or Raoul Walsh's—demonstrates the liberating side of working without prestige or significance hovering over your head. The more disreputable the genre and the lower the budget, the less there is at stake and the freer you are to experiment and explore new territories. Especially when you're as talented and resourceful as Bava was.

Tim Lucas has devoted himself to getting the word out about Bava's greatness, to making sure his films are preserved and available on tape and DVD. This book is the pinnacle of his efforts. It deserves a place on the bookshelves of all serious film lovers.

New York City, NY
April 30, 2003

PROLOGUE

"Any magazine-cover hack can spread paint around wildly and call it a nightmare or a Witches Sabbath or a portrait of the devil, but only a great painter can make such a thing really scare or ring true."
—H. P. Lovecraft, "Pickman's Model"

IN HIS LATER years, Italian film director Mario Bava was fond of recounting an episode from his childhood which, he speculated, had played a critical role in determining his later approach to life and career.

Bava was what the Italians call a "figlio d'arte": a child of the Arts. His father—whose real name was Francesco (though he was called Eugenio)—was an accomplished sculptor, renowned throughout his hometown of Sanremo for carving beautiful, life-like statues of the Saints from a fleshy resin. Eugenio was equally involved with science and technology at the dawn of the 20th century, using his knowledge of sculpture to develop new and innovative ways of lighting still photography; he later adapted these same methods to the fledgling art of cinematography. Eugenio must have seemed like a magician to his young son—tall and mysterious, crafting human bodies out of shapeless materials, recreating entire vistas of nature in miniature on table tops, gifted with the ability to find the miraculous in the mundane.

Naturally, there came a time when the child determined to create something that would impress his father, as his father's creations had so often impressed him. One day, when Mario (then called Nino) was about 3 or 4 years old, presumably after many secret attempts, he drew a picture that he considered good enough to present to his father. Proudly, he signed the drawing "MARIO BAVA" in large printed letters and took it down the hall to his father's workshop.

When the child placed his creation on his father's desk, Eugenio Bava looked at the paper, frowned . . . and smacked the boy's face.

"Papà!" Mario cried. "Why did you do that?"

"Who do you think you are—Michelangelo?" his father shouted. "Only Michelangelo created art worthy of a signature! And you, who created this—who are you? You are nobody!"

◀ MARIO BAVA consults his shooting script on the set of LA RAGAZZA CHE SAPEVA TROPPO in 1962.

Eugenio wasn't a cruel or sadistic man; he was simply enacting a popular Italian wisdom of the time: "If you want someone to remember what you say, slap them when you say it." Nevertheless, it was a traumatic episode for Mario, never forgotten by the child and much impressed upon the man and the artist he became.

Mario's relationship with his father was always difficult, as relationships between similar people often are, and the son held onto his determination to someday impress his father with his independence. As the ironies of fate would have it, Mario discovered that his own personal path followed the arc of his father's own footsteps. Like his father, he initially aspired to become an artist, and like his father, he was ultimately seduced by the motion picture business, which had become the family business. He initially worked as his father's apprentice in the optical effects department of the Istituto Nazionale LUCE (1932-39), later becoming one of Italy's leading cinematographers (1939-60), and eventually, a film director (1960-78). All of these things and more Eugenio had also been, though he stubbornly resisted identification with his work and died virtually unknown. Mario likewise never achieved great celebrity during his lifetime, not because his work went unrecognized but because he was uncomfortable in the limelight. After all, he was nobody.

Like his father, Mario considered any form of self-promotion to be vulgar. He worked his wonders from the vantage where he was least likely to be observed: behind the camera. He photographed several of Italy's most popular and important films of the 1950s, helping to cultivate the screen personas of such international stars as Gina Lollobrigida, Aldo Fabrizi and Steve Reeves. When fortune rewarded his hard work and dependable talent by promoting him to the rank of director, Mario took refuge in the shadows of a genre that most filmmakers of that time did not often deign to include on their résumés, and which was distinctly unpopular in his own country: the horror film.

While Bava's choice of genre certainly contributed to his neglect by the critical mainstream, it was not wholly responsible. Bava himself was the first to belittle his endeavors. According to his son Lamberto (who served as his assistant director from 1965 to 1978), Mario often commenced the shooting of a new film by calling for everyone's attention and announcing, "Now we are going to make a movie . . . and when we finish, we'll all have much to be ashamed of!" Unlike his colleagues, who made proud claims for their movies that the unreeled evidence did not always support, Bava actively shunned the prospect of his own discovery. He dismissed his films as "bullshit," saying that they made him "feel like throwing up"; he would roll his eyes whenever anyone attempted to discuss them seriously. In his twenty-year directorial career, he made only two television appearances and granted only a half-dozen print interviews, most of which were self-deprecating to the point of self-sabotage. He responded to interviewers' questions with quizzical remarks that carried an undertone of "Haven't you anything better to do than talk to me?"

By diverting serious attention from his work, Bava was spared the embarrassment of admitting that he had been secretly expressing himself through it all along. Knowing nothing about the man he was, and given no clues as to what Bava might express about himself, his life or his beliefs if he were so inclined, neither the press nor his audience had any clues to the contrary. Consequently, Bava attained the reputation of a masterful stylist whose films were bereft of soul and substance.

But the insiders of the Italian film industry knew better. Throughout the 1960s and '70s—the fecund period in which he directed all of his movies—Mario Bava was regarded by his peers as a Maestro, and he was often approached by other directors in desperate need of his expertise. "[Mario] was endowed with an extraordinary technical ability, and took great pleasure in confronting and solving the most difficult technical problems," his friend and mentor Riccardo Freda recalled in his autobiography, Divoratori di celluloide. "I remember—when film wasn't as sensitive as it is today—that he once shot a sunset scene with the characters in close-up, going far beyond what were considered the limitations of the film stock. A master of trick photography, he could solve any problem, however difficult."

The word "legendary" may sound excessive for such a retiring and humble personality, but witness Vincente Minnelli's Two Weeks in Another Town (1962)—a melodrama documenting a troubled American production being filmed at Cinecittà—which features an heroically resourceful cameraman named "Mario." Of course, Mario is a common Italian name, as good as any for this peripheral character, but Minnelli's film is overflowing with inside jokes and a sophisticated knowledge of the Italian film industry. It was also made well after Bava had saved many an American director's "Hollywood on the Tiber" excursion—Robert Z. Leonard, Raoul Walsh, Jacques Tourneur, Andre de Toth, and Arthur Lubin, were only a few of the filmmakers who had reason to thank him. Bava never sought credit for such favors. After all, who was he to take credit? To sign his name?

Mario Bava never aspired to become a film director, or so he claimed. As he once said, "I've been in the film business for so long . . . I know everything and everybody, so how could I possibly take this absurd circus seriously?" He was essentially pushed into the director's chair by other directors, notably Riccardo Freda—who abandoned two horror films (I vampiri, 1957 and Caltiki il mostro immortale/Caltiki the Immortal Monster, 1959) that Bava happened to be photographing, leaving them in his capable hands to finish. It was after salvaging another abandoned picture, Jacques Tourneur's La battaglia di Maratona/The Giant of Marathon (1959), that executive producer Lionello "Nello" Santi rewarded Bava with an offer to direct any film of his own choosing.

A devotée of Russian literature, Bava chose Nikolai Gogol's ghost story "Viy" as his model and made La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday (1960), a film that actually has little in common with its credited source. It became a tremendous international success. Audiences were thrilled and terrified by this, one of the last great black-and-white horror pictures, and overnight—as a result of her dual role as the virtuous Princess Katia and her resurrected vampire ancestor, Princess Asa—Barbara Steele earned international regard as the first (and possibly still reigning) Queen of Horror.

As sometimes happens when things go too well, the overreaching success of La maschera del demonio cast a pall over Bava's subsequent efforts. The film's admirers were not pleased when its elegant monochromatic photography, classical storytelling, and Gothic atmosphere were followed by a chain of increasingly brutal, deliriously colorful horror films, including I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath (1963), La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body (1963), and Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace (1964). These inventive, fiercely modernist films—now recognized by many as Bava's most accomplished work—were perceived at the time as a betrayal of his gift for gothic horror. Furthermore, the frankly adult bent of these films was met with disapproval from American distributors, who retaliated by deleting footage, reshuffling the order of the remaining scenes, and rewriting their dialogue in the dubbing studio. These amendments too did nothing to advance Bava's career.

After a healthy half-decade spent largely under the beating wing of American International Pictures, Bava drifted into low-budget obscurity. His only subsequent major-budget production came in 1968, an adaptation of the popular Italian fumetti (comic book) Diabolik for producer Dino De Laurentiis; it proved a moderate success and a personal turning point. Bava learned from this production that the higher financial stakes of big-budget filmmaking took all of the fun, spontaneity and invention out of his profession. Once his job was completed, he withdrew—despite a lucrative offer for more work from De Laurentiis—back into the subterranean strata of exploitation filmmaking, where creative picture-makers could still function more or less as they pleased without interference from the front office.

FRENCH grande affiche for CALTIKI IL MOSTRO IMMORTALE, art by Georges Allard, utilizing elements from original Italian poster artist Valcarenghi.

As the 1960s became the '70s, Bava's films became more personal, challenging and difficult to see. One of these, Lisa and the Devil (1973)—possibly his most personal and certainly his most oblique film—failed to attract any buyers at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival and remained on the shelf for two years. Bava was ultimately recruited to reconfigure his masterpiece into a common Exorcist rip-off. Being compelled to paint a mustache on his Mona Lisa drove Bava to the breaking point, and he rebelled against his producer, Alfredo Leone, refusing to shoot certain scenes. Leone eventually took over as director, supervising the final edit and releasing the end result as The House of Exorcism (1975)—whose title appears on a theater marquee in Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977) as one of the signs heralding the end of civilization.

In the meantime, Bava tackled the most unusual and technically restricting film of his career—Cani arrabbiati/Rabid Dogs (1975)—a crime thriller shot in real time and staged almost entirely inside a moving car. Alas, his bad luck held true to form: two days shy of its completion, the film's principal investor died, and his assets—including the film's rough cut, which was being assembled as the picture was shot in sequence—were impounded. Bava's only wholly realistic film, Cani arrabbiati could have had a revitalizing effect on his career had it been completed as planned. But the film remained under official lock and key until fifteen years after Bava's death, at which point it was finished by unrelated hands, scored with demos of the music intended for it, and released directly to DVD. Rabid Dogs was hailed as one of Bava's most remarkable films—the only title in his filmography to take place wholly outside a fantastic context—but far too late for Bava himself to benefit from its recognition.

The downward spiral of Bava's professional life led to his increasing cynicism about the business of making motion pictures. He spent his last years remaining true to his nature: working anonymously on other people's projects. Bava provided uncredited trick photography to television commercials and the works of some younger filmmakers, developed feature projects that he knew might not be entrusted to him because of his advancing years, granted a couple of increasingly bitter interviews, and co-directed La Venere d'Ille (1978), an hour-long movie for television, with his son, Lamberto. Even this 16 mm swan song had to wait two years, until after Bava's death, for its premiere broadcast.

On April 25, 1980, less than a month after a medical check-up that found him in perfect health, Mario Bava suffered a fatal heart attack while sleeping. His obituary in the May 14, 1980 edition of the American trade newspaper Variety is a testament to how well he had covered his tracks throughout his lifetime. It said that he had spent twenty years before becoming a director as a mere camera operator rather than as one of Italy's leading cinematographers; and it credited him with a handful of film titles in English, all crude transliterations of their original Italian titles, the necrologist not bothering to research the original names of their releases in America and Great Britain. Variety's careless research at least helped to spare Bava's memory the indignity of recalling that his last three completed features—all original productions—had been marketed in America as rip-offs: Last House Part II, The House of Exorcism and Beyond the Door II.

Bava's friends and acquaintances allow that his merry personality also had a dark side and yet—more than a quarter century after his death—they continue to speak of him with the sort of reverence more appropriate to a man of the cloth than a director of horror films. When I spoke to actor Cameron Mitchell, the star of three Bava films, he insisted on preceding our interview with this disarming tribute:

> "I did the first film of my life with John Ford, the man considered by many to be America's finest director, and it was an emotional experience I'll never forget. I was scared to death of him. It has been my pleasure to work with Orson Welles, and I also knew Fellini and Bergman quite well. It's true that I never worked with Bergman, but I met him in Stockholm (where I was making a picture) at Svensk Filmindustri, and we had quite a few lunches together. He reminded me of Elia Kazan, whom I'd worked for in A Streetcar Named Desire and Man on a Tightrope. Raoul Walsh, Sam Fuller . . . I mention the names of these men because I honestly feel that Mario Bava was perhaps the best and most underrated filmmaker of them all. I don't think any one of them could really compare with Bava."

Mitchell's obviously sincere estimation begs the question, "If Mario Bava was such a great talent, why did he never transcend the horror genre?"

It's a reasonable query, considering the number of actors and directors who have used horror as a point of entry into the business, only to deny it later like personal information of the sort that could only interest a blackmailer. The most commercial of all film genres, horror has often proved to be the smart choice for talented, albeit unproven filmmakers intent on making a low-budget, high-profit stepping stone to "bigger things"—e.g., Francis Ford Coppola's Dementia 13 (1963), Alan Rudolph's Barn of the Naked Dead (1973), and Oliver Stone's Seizure (1975), to name a few. When the genre is used as a short cut into the business, it is somehow understandable, if never forgivable. But if the tide is reversed, and an established director turns to horror at the summit of his career, the backlash can be devastating. Look no further than the example of British director Michael Powell, who all but destroyed his seemingly unimpeachable career as one of England's most respected filmmakers by turning his attention to the dark and sordid subject matter of Peeping Tom (1960)—a remarkable film, incidentally, whose stock has risen considerably in the decades since.

In time, after the Powell debacle, it became possible for filmmakers like David Cronenberg (The Fly, 1986) and David Lynch (Blue Velvet, 1987) to build respectable mainstream careers on the same bizarre, thematic concerns which inspired their exploitation-level debuts. The "baby boomer" generation that grew up on horror movies, comic books and science fiction paperbacks is now Hollywood's ruling class, and most of the Top Ten grossing films in history have some connection to the horror or science fiction genre. The prejudice against these films still persists among the public and the Hollywood establishment alike, but the money they generate in clanking tumult is respected by one and all.

Mario Bava dared to specialize in horror at a time when it wasn't fashionable—indeed, when it was barely possible in his own country. Why? Because the genre was his conviction and his compulsion. In the horror film, Bava found the ideal palette for the emotions he was most driven to express.

In the first print interview Bava ever granted, "the Hitchcock of Cinecittà" was asked by Alfredo Castelli and Tito Monego of the Italian magazine Horror why he had selected the genre as his specialty. "I don't know why," Bava confessed, but eager to explore the possibilities, he continued: "Terror fascinates and attracts me, but for no particular reason. Perhaps it's a question of psychology . . . to make a film of this kind helps me to overcome my own fears. The lights, the technicians, and the actors help to defuse an atmosphere that, in real life, would be enough to make me die of fright."

Fear—an emotion distinct from horror, which is analogous to revulsion—was Bava's primary interest. ("Do you know what the most frightening thing in the world is?" asks Michael Powell's Peeping Tom. "It's fear.") And what better forum for the creative purgings of a man who didn't like to be seen, than a genre that causes its audience to avert their eyes? Horror was also, very importantly, a genre in which the initial production costs were so low that Bava could expect and receive complete artistic control—a latitude almost impossible for a director to attain while working in any other film genre.

SPANISH poster art for GLI INVASORI.

SPANISH poster for IL ROSSO SEGNO DELLA FOLLIA, art by Francisco Fernandez Zarza Jano.

In some ways, Bava's work shows him to be a throwback to zoetropic pioneers like Etienne-Gaspard Robert (1763-1837), who, in the late 18th century, adopted the name "Robertson"—thus initiating a long history of European horror specialists hiding behind Anglo pseudonyms. Robertson delighted in projecting animated images of demons and skeletons on the walls and cobwebs of actual Parisian crypts. Like Robertson, Mario Bava was neither a traditional nor conventional storyteller, but rather a mediumistic conductor, an orchestrator of macabre atmospheres. He was a fundamentally inarticulate artist who spoke his heart by transposing text into image, circumstance into design, and emotion into color. It was his particular innovation to detail his obsessions not only with interplays of light and shadow, as the German Expressionists had done, but with shocking exclamations of hue. It was his special genius to jolt audiences with visual shocks of great chromatic and compositional beauty, confounding their impulse to look away or hide their eyes. He made Evil appear glamorous and seductive; he juxtaposed scenes of animal violence with allusions to mankind's highest spiritual conceits; he dared to eroticize the very moment of death. When Bava's camera zooms into the carnal remains of a murdered woman, his Madonna lighting always sees through the horror of violence to the Angel in the wreckage.

Bava was, at once, the last great gothic horror director and the genre's first truly modern practitioner. Films like La frusta e il corpo and Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill! (1966, which Phil Hardy described as "one of [Bava's]—and therefore one of the genre's—best pictures" [1]) are examples of progressive, psychological dramas transposed to a Gothic milieu to accentuate their sense of dislocation, while Sei donne per l'assassino and Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve (1971) provide precise blueprints for the "body count" subgenre that would dominate the horror genre throughout the remaining years of the 20th century, from Friday the 13th (1980) to I Still Know What You Did Last Summer (1998), and well into the next.

Bava's films reflect a preoccupation with fear, superstition and death so pervasive that it spills over even into the unlikely terrain of his science fiction, Western, and mythological films. This morbidity is occasionally offset by a mood of playfulness, wherein the darkness becomes all the more awful in its unexpected stance as a game, a friend, or the laughter of a child who happens to be dead. Unlike his British contemporary Terence Fisher, whose horror films concerned themselves with the classic broadstrokes of theological Good and Evil, Bava's brushstrokes were more interior and individual—"spiritual" rather than "religious." The specifics of his work are in fact so intimate, like those of the similarly enigmatic American director Tod Browning, they wield the arcane force of a creative catharsis.

Before Bava photographed and co-directed I vampiri in 1956, no horror film tradition existed in Italy. Nevertheless, something in Bava's character allowed him to see sunny Italy as a natural setting for ghost stories. Rome is, after all, an enormous ruin where every street corner harbors some antiquity more widely known among the dead than among the living. Just as David Cronenberg has suggested that his film The Brood (1979) could be read as "his" Kramer vs. Kramer (1978) for the way it explores the horrific subconscious effects of divorce, a film like Bava's Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon (1970) bears a similar relationship to such mainstream Italian fare as Pietro Germi's Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce Italian Style (1961). Bava's ability to express previously unexpressed moods and atmospheres on film may suggest him as a poet, but his ability to express at once the dark side of himself and his country confirms him as an artist of more than cult-level significance.

The horror, fantasy, and science fiction film genres were founded to depict stories and concepts that cannot be seen or experienced in our day-to-day lives. But as the years have passed, the horror genre has moved away from its roots as an abstract and expressionistic art form. And, as the motion picture industry has evolved from a fantasy factory into the richest of all commercial businesses, the horror film has become—like all forms of cinema—increasingly realistic. By looking at the horror films produced by Universal Pictures between 1931 and 1941, a gradual movement away from expressionism, toward realism, can already be discerned. Reality was further enhanced by the first successes of Britain's Hammer Films in the mid-1950s, with the addition of color and graphic and/or clinical violence. Hammer's gifted resident cinematographer, Jack Asher, made occasional impressionistic experiments with color photography (see The Man Who Could Cheat Death, 1959), but never quite spilled over into the exciting, garish excesses of style flaunted by Jack Cardiff in the dark fantasies he photographed for Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, Black Narcissus (1947) and The Red Shoes (1948).

What Mario Bava brought to the evolution of the horror film was exactly this brand of chromatic daring, combined with an Italian eye for detail and florid exaggeration and an underlying sense of irony. It was not the ugly things in his films that frightened audiences; instead, Bava unnerved them with instances of beauty, poetry, symmetry, inverted imagery, metaphysics, mysticism, and above all, color. Color of abnormal intensity. Color that drew the eye to places it would not normally wish to linger. Color that shouted or whispered warnings. Color that did not belong—that, in a realistic setting, could not possibly be there, thus intimating the presence of the supernatural. Bava's films had the uncanny atmosphere of waking dreams, in which the imagery of the conscious could unexpectedly be eclipsed by glimpses of the subconscious or unconscious. In many ways, Bava's work was the perfect cinematic equivalent of the prose of his favorite author, H. P. Lovecraft (1890-1937), where narrative was slippery at best, buried behind a baroque, harlequin-colored wash of false literary references, invented histories, and otherworldly atmosphere.

Few genres are as dependent on narrative logic as the horror film, which carries the responsibility of making the unbelievable believable—or, at least, plausible. Because they concede to emotion—or even to aesthetic reasoning—before logic, Bava's films are sometimes described as weakly scripted. It is my argument that Bava—who was described to me by many of his colleagues as an essentially intuitive artist who found it difficult to verbally communicate his goals, needs or achievements—was working toward something new, something analogous in film to what musical contemporaries like Miles Davis and John Coltrane were simultaneously doing in the world of jazz. That is, breaking away from the traditional strictures of melody and rhythm to explore the possibilities of mood, invention and atmosphere. This is not to place Bava's work in the same category as jazz, but we will see that his working methods often relied on spontaneity and the spirit of improvisation, also essential to jazz. But, just as jazz could not exist without a traditional musical foundation from which to improvise, it would have been impossible for Bava to proceed along these experimental lines without his thorough grounding in all the laws and sciences of cinema.

However improvisational, oblique, and mood-driven Bava's films may be, they are also frequently classical and romantic in character and cadence. Martin Scorsese has described Bava, perceptively, despite his modernistic tendencies, as a 19th century director. Rather than jazz, a more correct musical correlative to Bava's work might be rhapsody; the pacing of his films is rhapsodic, their tenor is rhapsodic, the ripe overstatement of his visual sense is rhapsodic . . . but his rhapsodizing is always accompanied by shadings of irony, serious or comic, usually cast by the spectre of Death as it stands in eternal reproach of Bava's—or possibly Rome's—essentially romantic character.

1 Phil Hardy, The Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Horror (London, UK: Aurum Press, 1985, rev. 1993), 183.

PRINCESS KATIA (Barbara Steele) places her trust in the valiant young doctor Andrej Gorobec (John Richardson) in this lovely Italian fotobusta from LA MASCHERA DEL DEMONIO.

What Bava was doing is also comparable to the changes that were simultaneously taking place in the work of his fellow countrymen Michelangelo Antonioni and Federico Fellini, as they took steps beyond their neorealistic films of the 1950s toward their less rigorously structured masterpieces of the early 1960s. Bava's "neorealistic" phase could be construed as the traditional gothic horror styles apparent in both I vampiri and La maschera del demonio. As the 1960s progressed, his work too became more interior and existential, more interested in exploring the subconscious, or the unconscious, than the conscious; it was not the actor's emotion or even narrative motivation that interested Bava most, but the correct color or mise en scène to bring the underlying truth of a moment to the surface—truth that could be more readily felt than explained.

To achieve this, Bava exercised strict control over his uses of color and framing. According to film director Joe Dante (who has had opportunity to examine 35 and 16 mm elements of Bava's films, first-hand), Bava favored the use of 1.85:1 hard-matting as early as his directorial debut La maschera del demonio, although the word "SuperPanoramico" (Italian hyperbole for the 1.85:1 widescreen format, as opposed to anamorphic scope) does not appear in connection in the theatrical advertising for Bava's films until Terrore nello spazio in 1965. The widest of the standard non-anamorphic gauges, 1.85:1 was analogous in shape to a painter's canvas and, of all the available screen ratios, a 1.85 hard-matte was the least vulnerable to mishandling by projectionists, as it was impossible to overmatte or undermatte. It is true that Bava's films were habitually cropped, or pan-and-scanned, when 16 mm prints were prepared for television. As Dante explains, "It's rare that hard-matted films were released that way in 16 mm, as most TV stations hated the 'black lines' on top and bottom. And there are, indeed, cropped 16 mm prints of Blood and Black Lace that were intended for TV use, but all were in Eastman Color. The letterbox 16s are all IB-Technicolor and were made earlier for non-theatrical situations like the Army, Navy and rental markets."[2] Bava's precise attention to framing is further underscored by his reputation as the first member of the Italian filmmaking community to employ storyboarding as part of his process; he began doing this early in his career as a cameraman.

Color, on the other hand, was much trickier to control. Forced to work economically, Bava typically shot his color films on affordable Eastmancolor stock, but aware of its tendency to fade over time, he insisted on striking his prints in Technicolor from the time Technicolor Roma began accepting outside film stocks for development in the mid-1950s. He was able to keep an eye on this process in Italy, but once his films were sold to other countries, the matters of print duplication and color process were left in the hands of his foreign distributors. Only since Bava's original Technicolor work has become available on DVD has his audience been able to realize how much of their meaning and impact was formerly lost due to cheap, maladroit processing. For example, when Bava's films were released in the United States by American International Pictures, the prints were struck in Pathé Color, which bled them of the potency given them by Technicolor's various three-strip and dye processing, turning his richly confectionery images to a flat paste. With this mishandling factored in, it's no wonder that critics looked to the storylines for satisfaction and found them clichéd or otherwise wanting.

We must remember that Bava was bringing this level of care and attention to a body of work that was conceived and executed for perhaps two weeks of theatrical play at best, without any awareness of a future shelf life beyond that of late night television, where the movies would be butchered and subjected to commercial interruption.

Bava's directorial debut, La maschera del demonio, was released in 1960, before anything resembling a serious critical appreciation of the horror cinema had come into being. Audiences, young and young adult, delighted in its inventive fusion of the classic Universal and recent Hammer brands of terror, the way it blended graphic horror with expressionism and chiaroscuro, but there was no literature at the time capable of articulating exactly what it had accomplished. The premiere issue of the intelligent French journal Midi-Minuit Fantastique was still two years away, and the American alternative, Famous Monsters of Filmland, was so focused on American product that Black Sunday somehow failed to receive timely coverage in its pages, at a time when every other new AIP release was guaranteed at least a three-page spread. What critical attention the film did receive tended to be naïve, jocular and ultimately dismissive. For example, while acknowledging the film's visual sophistication (and sweeping it under the rug before the first comma in the first paragraph), "Tube."'s review in the American industry journal Variety likened Black Sunday to "a grade school imitation of Poe," and flaunted the writer's ignorance by remarking that Steele "bears a strong resemblance to Jackie Kennedy and manages to be attractive in both parts [of her dual role], which may not have been the original intention."[3]

Bava's films received some of their earliest, appreciative attention in Midi-Minuit Fantastique (founded May – June 1962), in reviews written by Michel Caen and Jérome Caulandre, and in Great Britain's Monthly Film Bulletin, where initially callous and condescending notices by anonymous reviewers were succeeded by attentive and appreciative notices by Tom Milne and Raymond Durgnat. Bava's critical reception in English-speaking countries (including Britain) was complicated by the fact that the films were almost always altered for foreign markets, without the director's consent or approval. Therefore, while French critics wrote enthusiastically about La ragazza che sapeva troppo/The Girl Who Knew Too Much (1963) or La frusta e il corpo, American and English reviews greeted their haphazard recuts with lofty derision. They might have felt the same way whether the films had been recut or not because, after the great success of La maschera del demonio, Bava's films became more resolutely visual and personal, less driven by narrative. The results were considered exhilarating in the homeland of the nouvelle roman and the nouvelle vague, but in America, where horror films were traditionally juvenile entertainment, Bava's phantasmagorical and resolutely adult horror films were an uncategorical anomaly.

In the first major book-length survey of the horror genre, An Illustrated History of the Horror Film (published 1967), author Carlos Clarens cited Bava as proof that "if bad directors usually end up as photographers, the reverse of this axiom is just as valid and true."[4] Clarens' viewpoint stood as the accepted wisdom for some time, but in the decades since those words were written, there has been a welcome, widespread reappraisal of Bava's abilities as an artist and entertainer.

Today, audiences are bombarded daily, hourly, with bravura displays of visual style in everything from features to television commercials to music videos. Stylish visuals have become so commonplace that they often cease to have any impact on viewers at all; we have been conditioned to respond only to what is absolutely new, and we become jaded to those nascent thrills as early as the second pass. Consequently, it is hard to explain to anyone who didn't live through the 1950s and '60s what it was like to discover Bava's work in its own time, the way it stood out from the pack of its contemporaries.

2 Joe Dante, email to the author, July 30, 2005.

3 Tube., "Black Sunday" review, Variety, February 9, 1960.

4 Carlos Clarens, An Illustrated History of the Horror Film (New York NY: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967), 158.

Film historian Paul M. Jensen explains, "Back in the 1960s, when mainstream films were visually limited and emphasized dialogue, there was always a wonderful sense of discovery to find something as thoroughly visual (in its photography and also in its emphasis on visual storytelling) as a Bava film. And it was so much more gratifying that these discoveries were mine; that I could go to the drive-in and never know what work of imagination and quality I might discover unheralded. The critical establishment paid no attention to these films, and seemed quite blind to their visual virtues. I feel sorry for the present younger viewers who have no such chance to discover visuals on their own. In this era when visual style (or, at least, visual imagination and flamboyance) is all over the place—is inescapable and taken for granted—the only room for discovery now is the occasional film with a reserved, even static approach. It's almost a relief to find a new film that does not use visual style extensively." [5]

As Jensen indicates, Bava's work was considered outstanding—by the early few who recognized it—because it was informed by an aesthetic that nourished the eye as well as the imagination. It's one thing to think back to a horror movie scene that scared you, once upon a time; it is far more disconcerting to reflect on an instance of beauty, especially a moment of inexplicable beauty, over too soon to be analyzed and properly filed away, and encountered in a context where such intimacies and epiphanies were not expected. Moments like these become part of us.

Director Tim Burton agrees: "The films I like—and Bava is probably Number 1 this way—tell a story through images and give [the viewer] a feeling . . . a mixture of eroticism, of sex, of horror and starkness of image, which, to me, is more real than what most people would consider 'realistic' films. Somehow it all bypasses your mind and goes right inside of you . . . There's something about things that can't be simply and quickly identified, that are powerful, [maybe] the most meaningful things of all . . . Bava had a design sense that went beyond design and into your soul. I've seen Black Sunday I don't know how many times, but if you asked me what the story was [about], I couldn't tell you. That's what I love about Bava: I can't remember one single story!" [6]

They are, however, there. As this book will show, Bava's stories were often rooted in the best of classic and pulp literature, and his films, however insistently visual, reflect a degree of narrative sophistication that was more progressive and unusual than most horror devotées were equipped to appreciate at the time. Nevertheless, Bava's name quickly evolved into a brand-name among the cognoscenti, one that could always be trusted to deliver a certain number of indelible images. A significant promise, this, in an era when most filmmakers withheld their disappointing monsters for no more than a brief glimpse in the final reel.

Bava's fuller recognition by American critics did not begin to occur until his young admirers grew up and began to form the critical "anti-establishment" as members of the underground press in the late 1960s and early 1970s. In the pages of the irregular American film journal Castle of Frankenstein, Joe Dante (later an imaginative film director in his own right) not only championed Bava's work in a series of capsule reviews, but adopted Bava's name as adjectival shorthand to describe horror movies that took a particularly colorful, poetical or surrealistic approach to raising gooseflesh. (1968's The Name of the Game Is Kill, he noted, had moments of "Bava-like brilliance.") In a moment of particularly memorable critical audacity, Dante also took the bold step of exclaiming that Twitch of the Death Nerve had "maybe the greatest [ending] since Citizen Kane!" [7]

"Before people knew what cult movies were, [Bava's films] were cult movies," Dante relates. "It was never organized enough to really be called a cult, but in the '60s, there was a dedicated following of college students, high school students . . . that followed this particular kind of film. Drive-ins were the only place to see these pictures if you lived in the Midwest, because they never played the hard-tops except in the main cities. It was very tough to find them, and when one of them played, you had to be there, because your weren't going to see it again, maybe ever! I made it my business to track down every obscure European horror film that I could, so that I could write it up, so there would be some record of it, because there wasn't much record in those days." [8]

In May 1971, the French magazine L'Ecran Fantastique published a mimeographed booklet entitled Mario Bava, which was the first attempt to compile a list of Bava's myriad credits as a director and director of photography. In 1973, also in France, the first truly significant essay about Bava's work as a director appeared in Jean-Marie Sabatier's book Les Classiques du Cinema Fantastique. "With its extreme complexity," wrote Sabatier, "the works of Bava confound analysis. It would be a mistake to consider him, as a director, on the same level as [Terence] Fisher or even [Tod] Browning. Though he has worked in every film genre, the cinema of Bava has also transcended every genre. He is also unique in that he is completely dedicated to horror cinema. If Bava isn't the greatest [director of horror films], he is unquestionably the most personal—and perhaps the only genius." [9] This perceptive essay, which also was the first account of Bava's career to argue that La maschera del demonio was not as significant as his works in color, has not to date appeared in English.

Two years later, America picked up the gauntlet with "Mario Bava: The Illusion of Reality," a critical essay by Alain J. Silver and James Ursini, which first appeared in Mark Frank's fan publication Photon. Though unaware of Bava's dual career in special effects and trick photography, Silver and Ursini offered an impressive exploration of Bava's recurring themes of perception. When I first read the Silver/Ursini article in 1975, I was in the earliest stages of my own research for this book, which at the time was intended to be nothing more than a feature article for the magazine Cinefantastique.

Those of us who were familiar with Bava's work knew that, in his own quiet way, he was becoming one of the most original, influential, and widely-imitated of horror directors. This phenomenon was immediate and can be traced to other Italian films released well before La maschera del demonio's exportation, as early as L'amante del vampiro/The Playgirls and the Vampire (1960) and as late as Luigi Batzella's Nuda per Satana/Nude for Satan (1974). These films, like La maschera . . . (and indeed I vampiri before it), depicted modern day characters falling in love with alluring faces encountered amid the brushstrokes of ancient paintings, or age-old vampires falling in love with the modern day reincarnations of loves lost to the mists of time. In the pre-credits sequence of Renato Polselli's Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror (1965), the evil Crimson Executioner is punished for his crimes by being buried alive in a blade-lined coffin, complete with a glass window over his face, which—as in the Bava film—is later shattered during a bat attack.

There are countless other examples, which will be discussed in due course, but by far the most significant is the Devil in Federico Fellini's short film Toby Dammit, included in the omnibus Edgar Allan Poe film Histoires Extraordinaires/Spirits of the Dead (1967), who was plainly modelled on the spectral Melissa Graps character from Bava's Operazione paura. Fellini himself

5 Paul M. Jensen, email to the author, September 2000.

6 Tim Burton, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre, 2000.

7 Joe Dante, (unsigned review), Castle of Frankenstein 20, 46.

8 Joe Dante, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

9 Jean-Marie Sabatier, Les Classiques du Cinéma Fantastique (Paris, France: Balland, 1973), 59.

GERMAN A1 poster for I VAMPIRI. The uncredited art combines photographic elements as well as original Italian poster art by Arnaldo Putzu.

had suggested to his producers that Bava direct his segment, and his screenwriter, Bernardino Zapponi, was a personal friend of Bava's as well as an admirer, so the short's primary authors were fully conscious of their debt. When Italian horror again became fashionable, it was due to the success of the giallo thrillers of Dario Argento, whose debut L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage (1970) re-energized a dormant genre which Bava had first crystallized with La ragazza che sapeva troppo and Sei donne per l'assassino. As a young film critic for the leftist newspaper Paese Sera, Argento had been galvanized by his early exposure to these films.

Another Italian director who freely admitted his debt to Bava's oeuvre was Aristide Massaccesi (1936-99), better known as "Joe D'Amato," who cut his teeth in the film business working as a camera assistant to both Eugenio and Mario Bava. When the former cameraman directed his first film, a slice of Italian gothic called La morte sorride all'assassino/Death Smiles on the Murderer (1973), he was fully conscious of working in a cinematic milieu which Bava had introduced.

"I wanted La morte sorride . . . to appear drenched in the atmosphere of the Victorian era," Massaccesi told interviewer Peter Blumenstock. "Romanticism was the main subject I wanted to create, not just because it suited the genre perfectly, but also because I felt a lot like that back then . . . It was the only one of my films which I have signed with my real name, mainly because it is my most personal work and the one that means the most to me in my entire career. Mario Bava's work inspired me a great deal on this project."

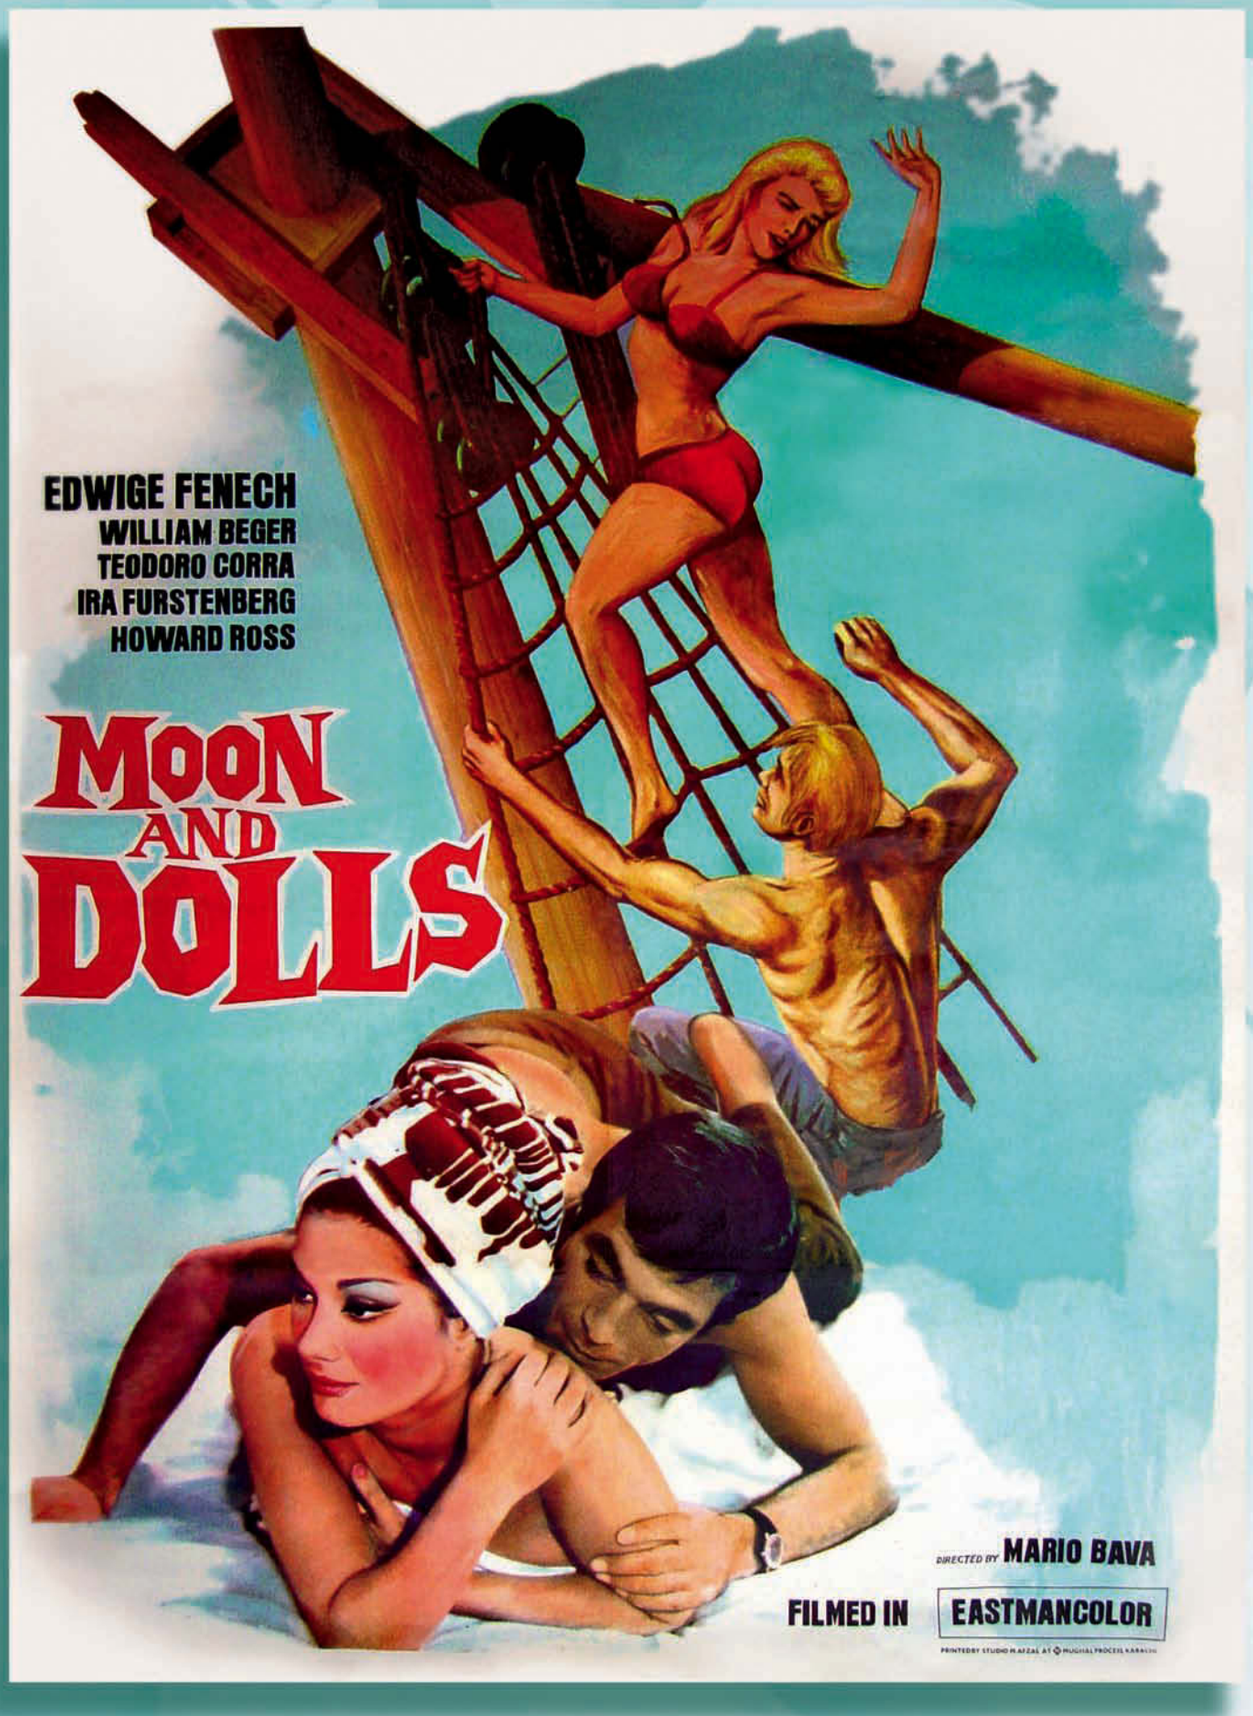
Bava's influence quickly expanded beyond the local to become international. His work had a distinct impact on horror cinema produced in various Latin countries, including Mexico (Rafael Baledón's La Maldición de la Llorona/The Curse of the Crying Woman, 1961), Brazil (José Mojica Marins' A Meia-Noite Leverei Sua Alma/At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul, 1964) and Spain (where images from Bava's films are frequently quoted in the films of actor/director Paul Naschy, who admits in his autobiography Memoirs of a Wolfman that he took his young bride to see La maschera del demonio on their honeymoon).

In America, Bava scored a major admirer in his fellow American International director, Roger Corman. "Mario Bava, to me, was one of the greatest practitioners of Gothic horror films," Corman told an interviewer for the SKY TV documentary Mario Bava Operazione Paura in 2004. "He made many kinds of films, but I think his finest work was in the Gothic tradition. I never met him but our thinking was along the same path. We both tried to do good work on low budgets; we both succeeded, I hope, in different ways. I think I learned from him much to do with camera work—for example, with picking angles to make a small and confining set look bigger. I was particularly impressed, and probably influenced, by his work in chiaroscuro, his use of deep focus, hard light, and hard dark. He also had a unique personal style and I learned a great deal from that. If he was influenced by me, as some have suggested, it was possibly more conceptually than technically, because technically he was brilliant. I think Bava was a brilliant artist—a true artist—and his work was universal; it reflected a European sensibility, but also resonated with the American audience."

Corman was so impressed by Black Sunday that he cast Barbara Steele in his next Poe picture, Pit and the Pendulum (1961), and Bava's garish color experiments were studiously recreated in the opening montage of The Raven (1963). Likewise, the mob execution which opens The Haunted Palace (1963), and the ensuing plot of the reincarnation of the evil Joseph Kerwin (Vincent Price) masquerading as his own descendant, mirror aspects of Black Sunday. Another episode from the film was remade in Corman's The Masque of the Red Death (1964), as Jane Asher looks upon the dormant form of Vincent Price reposing in a coffin as though asleep . . . briefly looks away . . . and then looks again to see his eyes wide open, devilishly mocking her entrapment. As Bava's horror films grew more metaphysical in the mid-1960s, Corman's work became more psychedelic, and both directors gravitated to flirtations with pop culture and other genres in the late '60s and early '70s.

By the mid 1970s, Castle of Frankenstein magazine was defunct. Joe Dante relocated from the East coast to Los Angeles, where he got a job in the trailer department of Corman's fledgling distribution company, New World Pictures. It was there that Dante and fellow editor Allan Arkush talked Corman into allowing them to direct a joint first feature, Hollywood Boulevard (1975), a picture that would cost so little to make, they reasoned, it couldn't fail to make money. Though ostensibly a satire of the New World film factory, the picture's final act contains a surprising (indeed, jarring) number of Bavian visual touches: saturated gel lighting, fog, a menacing assassin, vicious murders.

"It was a comedy, but I figured it might be my last chance to make a movie at all, so I inserted this long hommage to Mario Bava," Dante confesses in the documentary Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre. "I couldn't let anything from me go without some acknowledgment of the fact that Mario Bava was one of my favorite filmmakers." Thus, Bava's once-unique approach to the horror genre began to be emulated by a second generation of filmmakers.



In July 1976, London's National Film Theatre presented a lengthy retrospective devoted to "12 Masters of the Italian Cinema." Of the directors saluted by this exhibition, Federico Fellini, Michelangelo Antonioni, Luchino Visconti, Roberto Rosellini, Vittorio De Sica, Pier Paolo Pasolini, and Bernardo Bertolucci had already been the subjects of books or monographs written in English; others, like Pietro Germi and Elio Petri, had been solidly represented by scholarly exegeses in film journals. Of the NFT's dozen maestri, only Mario Bava was unfamiliar to the majority of attendants, but it was yet another sign that recognition was in the cards for Bava, whether he wished it or not.

Back in Italy, the popular thrillers of Dario Argento began to move away from lucidly cruel and photogenic gialli toward matters of magic, which Argento and his cameramen summoned forth by emulating Bava's past experiments with saturated gel lighting in the supernatural films Suspiria (1977) and Inferno (1980, on which Bava himself worked as an uncredited special effects designer and second unit director). During this period, French director Jean Rollin paid his own hommage to the film released in Paris as La Masque du Démon by photographing Brigitte Lahaie flanked by a pair of menacing dogs in Les Raisins de la Mort/The Grapes of Death (1978).

It was not until 1980—the year of Bava's death—that he exerted his greatest and most lasting influence, when the "body count" subgenre that Bava had founded with Sei donne per l'assassino and Ecologia del delitto was revisited in Sean Cunningham's Friday the 13th (1980). Independently produced for only $500,000 (in itself, more than Bava had ever spent on a picture, even those with name stars attached), Cunningham sold the picture to Paramount for an advance of $1,500,000; the distributor then lavished $3,000,000 on publicity and advertising and raked in total gross receipts of an estimated $35–40,000,000. Friday the 13th had none of Bava's visual technique, but it was essentially a witless, Americanized, carbon-copy of the movie released in America as Twitch of the Death Nerve. As Cunningham himself now readily admits, "Certainly anybody who was making horror films in the '80s owed an awful lot to Mario Bava." [10] Friday the 13th became a prime franchise title for Paramount Pictures, continuing through nine sequels and a spin-off television series to date.

In the early 1980s, videocassette players and recorders became luxuries that most anyone could afford. Those of us who had been fans of Bava's films since the 1960s, not knowing when (if ever) we might see our favorites again, could finally record them from local television broadcasts, edit out the commercials, 10 Sean Cunningham, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

TURKISH poster art for 5 BAMBOLE PER LA LUNA D'AGOSTO.

THE HAUNTED WORLD OF MARIO BAVA

October 8-10 1993

Hosted by Joe Dante

A child's frozen hand appears at the window ... an unconscious woman is violated next to a rotting skeleton ... a sadist returns from the grave to torture his doomed lover ... To enter the world of Italian horror and suspense master Mario Bava is to step silently through a mausoleum filled with beautiful corpses. Bava is often praised as one of the cinema's great stylists -- and his talent for exquisite cinematography and production design allowed him to commit some of the most atrocious acts of violence ever filmed. But beyond his stylistic gifts, Bava (who died in 1980) achieved a chilling poetry all his own, a lyricism that links him to Cocteau, Buñuel and the other great poets of the surreal and bizarre.

Born in San Remo in 1914, Bava "grew up in the midst of film, among picture frames, miniature models, and heaps of hyposulphite"; his father Eugenio was cinematographer on the silent classic QUO VADIS. By the early '40s, the younger Bava was photographing films for Pabst and Rossellini. Bava was nearly 50 years old before he directed his first full feature, BLACK SUNDAY, a worldwide success that quickly established him as the premiere horror director of the 1960s.

Sadly, the mutilation depicted in Bava's films was often less than the mutilation of the films themselves: poorly dubbed, re-edited with or without the director's consent, and released with obscure or misleading titles. This series features many rare prints unavailable in the U.S. for decades, including the L.A. premiere of the full-length LISA AND THE DEVIL. Director Joe Dante (GREMLINS, THE HOWLING) will host the weekend in-person, discussing Bava's influence on his own work and talking with Bava's colleagues and co-stars. Program compiled by Dennis Bartok, Joe Dante and Alan Upchurch.

ONE OF A KIND lobby display advertising the first Mario Bava retrospective held in Los Angeles, sponsored by the American Cinematheque and held at the Director's Guild of America Theater in 1993.

and watch them to our heart's content. I can remember some fans voicing concern at the time, that Bava's mysterious works might not stand up to closer scrutiny, that they couldn't possibly live up to our memory of the moment when they first took us by surprise . . . but Bava's films turned out to be even better than we remembered them. The sudden access which his growing number of admirers were granted to these once-elusive documents made their further study irresistible. Inevitably, the first book devoted to Bava's films appeared a short time later, when Pascal Martinet's Mario Bava was published in France in January 1984.

The VCR brought about other cultural changes which could not have been anticipated by the movie mainstream. By the 1990s, most film buffs had managed to collect copies—on Beta, VHS or LaserDisc—of nearly every movie classic they might ever want to see. As a result, there was a conspicuous drop in attendance at theatrical retrospectives devoted to such revered filmmakers as John Ford, Orson Welles and Alfred Hitchcock. Alternative masters were suddenly desperately needed. Thanks to a collection of 35 mm and 16 mm prints independently assembled by Alan Upchurch, Carlos Sylva, and Joe Dante, Mario Bava suddenly became a major draw on the retrospective circuit, attracting the very fans who had discovered his work on video and never had the experience of seeing it on the big screen.

Made possible largely through the efforts of Upchurch and Sylva, three Mario Bava retrospectives were presented in the United States in 1993—in San Francisco, New York and Los Angeles. The San Francisco program, held at the Roxie Cinema, was well-attended, as was an exhaustive and ambitious series unreeled at Manhattan's Film Forum over a two-week period. The American Cinematheque's three-day retrospective in Los Angeles—hosted by Joe Dante, myself, and several stars of Bava's films—sold-out well in advance, and sizeable throngs hoping to buy tickets at the door were turned away from most screenings, prompting a second retrospective in August 1996. In 1998, the British Film Institute organized a near-definitive, month-long Bava retrospective, showing nearly all of the films he directed.

In 1994, the second book devoted to Bava's work appeared in France: a collection of scholarly essays by various contributors, published by the Cinématheque Française Musée du Cinéma under the editorship of Jean-Louis Leutrat. The following year, the first Italian book on the subject was published in Milan, written by Alberto Pezzotta. Both books, like Pascal Martinet's of a decade earlier, were simply titled Mario Bava.

In October 1998, a German company called Lucertola Media obtained the rights to a rough assembly of Bava's unfinished 1975 crime picture Cani arrabbiati, entitled Rabid Dogs, and released it on a new compact video disc format called DVD. Limited to two modest pressings, it was the first movie to be released exclusively in the DVD format. Then, in December 2000, Image Entertainment (in collaboration with producer Alfredo Leone) launched "The Mario Bava Collection" on VHS and DVD, with each release in the latter format extensively annotated and with an audio commentary for Black Sunday by this author. The series sold so well, and scored so well with reviewers, that other companies followed suit—notably VCI Home Entertainment with their lavish DVD editions of The Whip and the Body and Blood and Black Lace, which also featured my commentaries.

In May 2002, the American Cinematheque hosted a second Bava retrospective that included the world premiere of Kidnapped, a controversial recut of Bava's unfinished Cani arrabbiati, produced by Alfredo Leone and completed by Lamberto Bava. In the subsequent year, a package of thirteen Bava films owned by Leone's company International Media became available for 35 mm bookings across the country, and major 2003 Bava retrospectives were held in Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and New York. In July 2006, Korea joined the now-long list of countries hosting Bava retrospectives.

As exhaustive as these Bava festivals may seem, even the month-long BFI program told less than half of the truth about Mario Bava. He was much more than "the supreme visual poet of the Italian Gothic cinema," as David Bell once eloquently described him.[11] Indeed, if it could be said of any individual, Bava was the postwar Italian cinema—at least for a period spanning three decades (1945-75). Just as assuredly as Hitchcock defined the thriller, Chaplin the silent comedy, Ford the American Western, the record shows that Bava was present at the defining moment of not one, but each of Italy's native postwar genres: the neorealist and opera films of the 1940s, the pepla[12] ("sword and sandal") and baroque horror films of the 1950s and, in the '60s, the Spaghetti Western, the comic Western and, most definitively, the giallo—that violent, decorous, and peculiarly Italian breed of murder mystery. If any man can be described as a seminal filmmaker, that man is Mario Bava.

Furthermore, no appreciation of Bava published to date has adequately come to terms with the fact of his twenty-year reign as one of Italy's leading cameramen, or pondered how the first half of his career may have influenced the second half. (Bava disliked the terms "cinematographer" and "director of photography," which he considered pretentious, so this book will observe his preference.) In fact, Bava's work as a cameraman included as many, if not more, popular successes than did his later years as a director. Nevertheless, in most reference books, Mario Bava's life and career begin with La maschera del demonio. This book corrects that error, telling the complete story of Bava's career for the first time.

As I discovered in the midst of my research—and subsequently made known through various articles, DVD liner notes, and audio commentaries—Bava not only directed and photographed his films; he also created their special visual effects. He never took credit for this work; not because he didn't like to draw attention to himself, but because he believed that explaining how special effects were done (or that they were even present) was antithetical to their purpose. He often served as his own matte painter and maquette builder, and he was capable of staging the most miraculous scenes using common ingredients that could be found in any kitchen. On a couple of his films, he was given so little in the way of sets that he was forced to rely on his mastery of atmosphere and trick photography to camouflage what had not been placed at his disposal. This furthers Bava's range of responsibility into the realm of art direction. Interviews and stills also support the fact that Bava took a direct hand in decorating his sets before filming them—by adding cobwebs to crypts, rotting meat to skeletons, whatever was needed.

Thus, at a time when cinema technology was exploding—introducing light-sensitive film stocks, faster lenses, expensive cranes, and so forth—Bava worked as a modern day antiquarian, making films largely by hand, incorporating into them his talents for painting, sculpture, and trick photography, as well as the naïve techniques of silent filmmaking he had learned as a young observer in his father's home studio. It was not uncommon for Bava to close down production for a few days, in order to work at home on a glass matte painting that would transform a plain hillside into an ivy-laced temple in ancient Rome.

Adding to my frustrations and exhilarations as the author of this book was my discovery that Bava's filmography does not end with the movies he directed and photographed. Whenever he wasn't otherwise engaged, Bava was ready and willing to add pick-up shots, lend technical advice, or amplify the production values of a friend's impoverished production with his trick photography—all of which he did in the name of friendship, and for the opportunity to solve new problems, which allowed him to learn more about his craft. This work is almost always uncredited, but to an eye trained to recognize his brushstrokes, it is often as good as a signature. Many are the times I've caught a glimpse of Bava's handiwork flaring unexpectedly from the margins of some otherwise excruciating pictures, signed by hacks who had the good fortune to eat alongside him in the Cinecittà commissary.

11 David Bell, "Mario Bava" entry, The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural (New York NY: Viking, 1986), 24.

12 "Pepla" is the plural form of peplum, a term coined for the genre by French critics, in reference to the short pleated garments worn by the heroes of these films.

Director, lighting cameraman, special effects genius, editor, miniature set designer, compiler of library music, his wardrobe person's wardrobe designer, his art director's adviser on matters of décor, guilty of making impish cameo appearances onscreen, Mario Bava was the last of a dying breed: a complete filmmaker.

The story of Bava's life, which must begin with the story of his father Eugenio (one of the most important and least-known pioneers of Italian cinema), covers the entire history of motion pictures from their earliest days as a parlor trick, through their evolution from entertainment into an art form, and their eventual proliferation into the biggest of big businesses. When B cinema became A cinema, the special circumstances that allowed a talent such as Bava to exist faded away. Bava's own mortality coincided with this sea change in the world of movies, but not before he passed the baton to the next generation. His son Lamberto screened his directorial debut, Macabro (1980), for his father only a short time before his death. Lamberto has since gone on to become one of the most commercially successful Italian directors of his generation, with the popular Demoni and Fantaghirò series to his credit. Today, Lamberto's son Fabrizio (or Roy, as he prefers to be called) is one of Italy's most in-demand assistant directors, having recently followed in his father's footsteps as the assistant to Dario Argento on Il cartaio/The Card Player (2004). Mario Bava's story is thus only part of a larger story of the Italian cinema, now entering its fourth generation and second century.

The writing of this book—a family chronicle as much as a biography—has been a nearly lifelong dream and occupation; I don't know what it's like to be an adult and not be working on it. At the time I began, there was almost nothing available in English in the way of hard facts, other than reviews and a very incomplete filmography published in Film Dope. Like any work of biography, this book is a synthesis of verifiable truth, subjective truths shared with me by the participants in Bava's life and work, and my own intimations of the truth, which I assembled as best I could by tracing and tying together the threads that sometimes invisibly connect seemingly unrelated relationships and moments in history. I have labelled these throughout the following text to the best of my ability.

If I had to point to any single moment or image in Bava's work that motivated me to undertake this project, it would be the first time—late at night—when I saw the words "Directed by Mario Bava" on a television screen. With Bava, I had the same experience as when I first encountered the films of F. W. Murnau, Jean Cocteau, Georges Franju and Max Ophüls. Their unusual names immediately struck my young, provincial mind as being incantatory, pregnant with magic and mystery. I didn't have to see their work to know, intuitively, that each of them was destined to become an important acquaintance. In time, as I discovered the work associated with those fabulous names, it never disappointed my expectations.

My fascination with Bava was cemented by the scene in Operazione paura where Giacomo Rossi-Stuart pursues a strange figure through a series of rooms that repeats over and over, each time a little faster, finally apprehends him, and finds himself face-to-face with . . . himself. In many ways, this Borgesian image was prophetic of my experience in writing this book, because as I learned more and more about the man who devised that chilling scene—which broke all the rules of the horror genre, not to mention those of time and space—the more I found myself apprehending an elusive phantom who turned out to be a man very much like the one I became: middle-class, apolitical, ironic; a worrier and a skeptic; a homebody uncomfortable with travel; a compulsive sketcher and reader with a particular fondness for Russian literature and pulp fiction, whose bookish life was nevertheless overridden by his love/hate affair with the cinema. Bava worked in Cinecittà; I work in Cincinnati—which, like Rome, is a river town built on seven hills. While working on this book, I discovered that my late father's Christian name, though everyone called him Frank, was actually Marion—the English form of Mario. My wife's grandparents were named Frank and Emma; Mario's parents were named Francesco and Emma. While I find this wealth of eerie correlations curious, I don't take them too seriously, except as a means of identifying with my subject, which has brought me closer to an understanding of him.

Mario Bava knew my name and was aware of my intentions toward him. I wrote to him twice in the late 1970s, mostly to thank him for his films, but also to inform him of my plan to write a book about them. I received no reply but, some years later when I addressed my condolences to his family upon hearing of his death, a hand-written reply came to me from the man who was his son, assistant and best friend.

"I know why he did not write back to you," Lamberto Bava explained. "He did not like to talk about his professional activities. Looking through my father's drawers, I found your letters, which he kept with the important papers he preserved."

I replied to Lamberto that this was the finest personal memory he could have given me of his father, who once told an interviewer "I throw out all the letters I receive."

Despite this oltre tomba endorsement, the writing and preparation of this book has been a long and arduous task that I often despaired of ever finishing. I began writing this book by hand, then graduated to typewriting, and then essentially started all over again when I stepped up to a Wang word processor in 1985, and later to a series of personal computers. All the while this work was in progress, I began my careers as a magazine editor and novelist, work that helped to keep food on the table while the Bava book continued its slow and fitful gestation. The obstacles were never-ending: the unavailability of many films, my own inability to speak Italian (had I known how long this project would take me, I would have learned), Bava's reluctance to speak about his work, the devastating setback of his early death, a unanimous lack of interest among New York publishers, a lack of deadline, mental exhaustion—all of these elements and more (not least of all the demanding monthly schedule of my magazine, Video Watchdog) were stacked against its completion. Also, a great deal of the material contained in this book is rooted in primary research; I dug it out of the rock myself, so to speak.

However, as the years passed, this book and I seemed to be moving with great certainty toward a point in time that was suddenly available and receptive to it. Many of the conveniences we take for granted today did not exist at the time of this book's conception. I saw several of Bava's films for the first time on commercial television stations, looking away from the hideously cropped picture half the time to scribble down notes, names, or plot details. A surprise broadcast of Evil Eye on a Dayton station one Saturday afternoon back in 1976 led me to prevail upon a friend to drive me to and from his apartment, some 20 minutes south of Dayton, so that I could see it—a round trip of about 60 miles. (As Joe Dante mentioned earlier, we didn't know if there would ever be another chance.) The electronic innovations over the years have been blessing after blessing to this project, from the VCR to the multi-standard VCR (which made it possible for me to screen dozens of films and variants unavailable to the average consumer), from LaserDisc to DVD, and most importantly, the home computer and the accessories that make desktop publishing and video frame-grabbing a reality.

ITALIAN due-foglia poster for FOUR TIMES THAT NIGHT, art by Nano.

JAPANESE photo-collage poster for OPERAZIONE PAURA.

I didn't intend for the writing of this book to take so long, but it appears to have taken exactly as long as it needed to take. Seeing all of Bava's films took long enough, but in order to write this book, I also had to research subjects of direct or peripheral relevance to Bava's story: the silent cinema of Italy and France, World Wars I and II, the Italian cinema in general, Russian literature and contemporary science fiction, opera, painting, the sciences of cinematography and trick photography, and the Italian language itself. Certain things which also had to occur before this book could exist are now in the past, further setting the stage for its publication: the retrospectives, the home video releases of the key films, the restoration and availability of Rabid Dogs, the teasers provided by the liner notes I wrote and the audio commentaries I recorded for the DVD releases of Image Entertainment, VCI Home Entertainment, Anchor Bay Entertainment and Dark Sky Films. These preliminaries have made people more aware of Bava's work, and ready to absorb the information contained in this book. Had I completed this book as recently as five years ago, what I have learned in the meantime would cause me to disown that work today.

In the least fruitful period of this book's long gestation, a time when I despaired that this project might never be completed, I had a dream—one of my life's most vivid. I had followed a series of clues until I found my way onto a set where Mario Bava was directing a new film. I couldn't see him, because he was giving his directions from the shadows. I waited on the sidelines for him to emerge, but he wouldn't come out; it was as though he knew I was there, taking notes for my book. Finally, exasperated, I worked up the courage to cross the studio floor and enter into those shadows myself, to ask some of the questions that were driving me crazy at that particular time.

"M-Maestro," I stammered, "forgive this intrusion, but there is something I must ask you . . . How did you feel when you learned that Fellini had used the little girl from Operazione paura in his film Toby Dammit?"

The presence in the darkness stopped adjusting his camera and looked at me under an arched eyebrow. Then Bava spoke to me:

"Why should I discuss with you what I would not discuss with Fellini?"

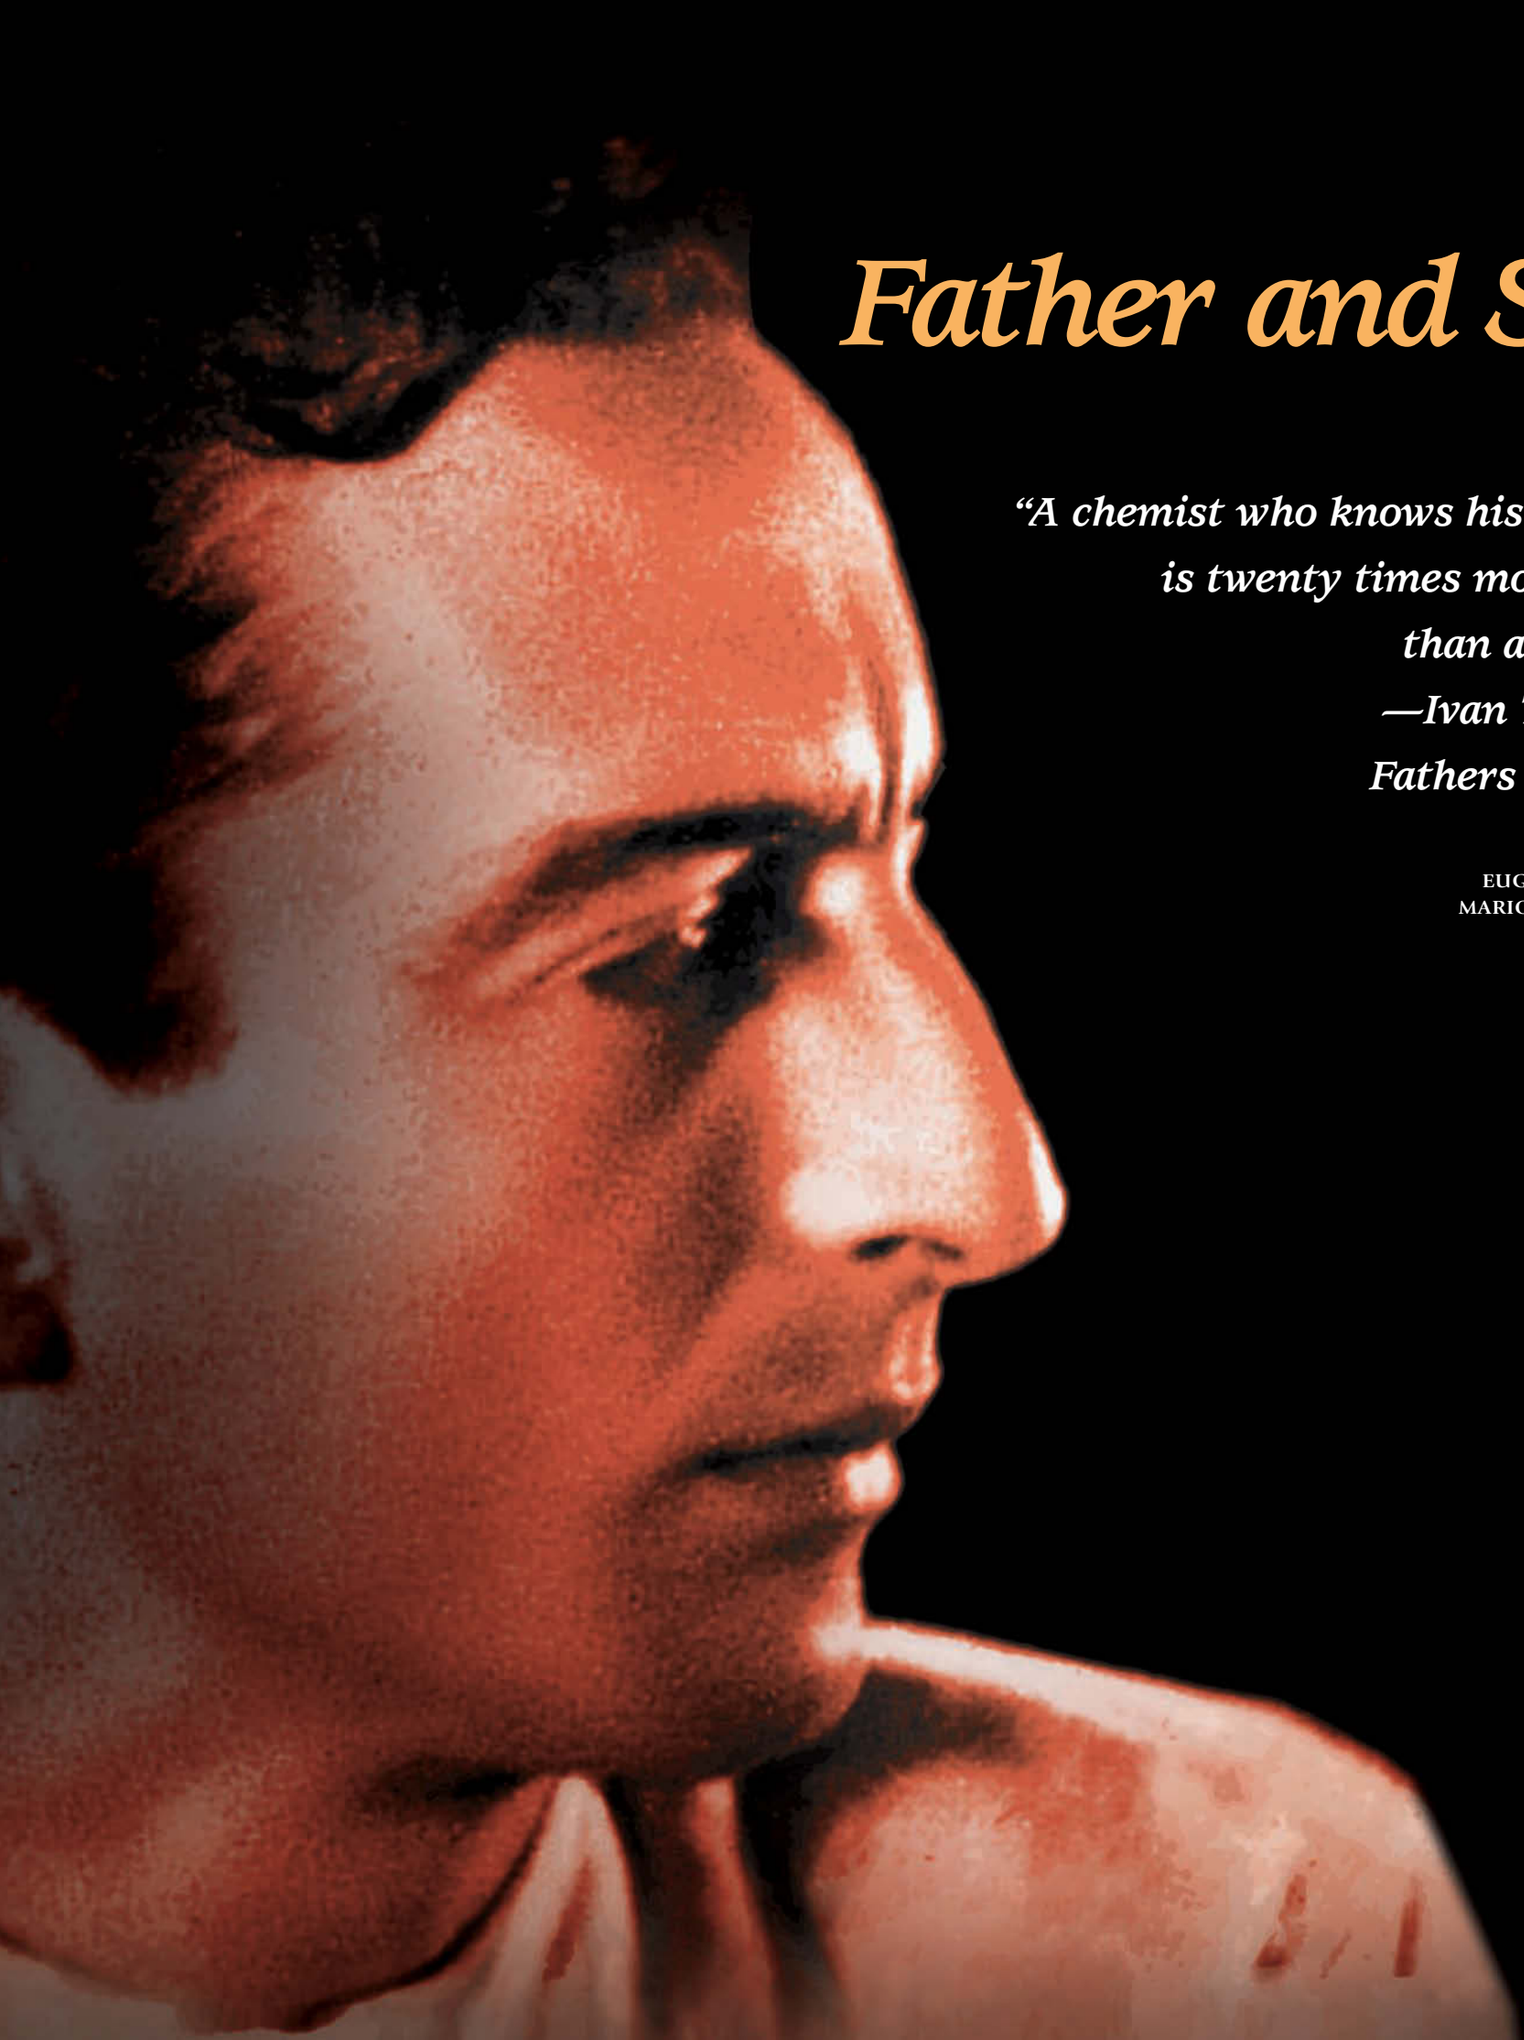
The sheer force of that question woke me up instantly.

At a later date, I shared this anecdote with Lamberto Bava, who exploded with laughter and told me that I must have made genuine contact with Mario. It is apparently very close to what Mario would have said. "Maybe a little nicer," he supposed.

To have felt myself in unconscious or subconscious contact with my subject was probably no more than a delusion on my part, necessary to getting through this process. But, thanks to the testimonies and confidences shared with me over the years—the decades!—by Bava's family members, friends and colleagues, I was sometimes able to intuit—in the places where their comments coincided—a three-dimensional presence whom I could address as Mario. I don't claim that his spirit inhabits this book, but . . . On occasion, as I'm sure has happened with other biographers, I have been nudged by a small voice, a nasal murmur emanating from somewhere between my conscience and intuition, which has pointed me in unsuspected directions where I was able to locate the answers to daunting questions, or helped me to connect the dots of a mystery into a constellation of common sense.

The time has come to share this distillation of what I have learned through my communion with my subject over the last thirty years. Though this book may appear formidable in size and scope (not to mention weight!), I don't intend it to be "the final word" on Mario Bava and his films. Its success cannot be measured by how many doors it closes, only by how many doors it opens.

Now let us run through those doors together and apprehend this elusive artisan who shunned the limelight, preferring to work unobserved amid all the colors of the dark.



Notes on the Text

Film Titles: The complex histories of Mario Bava's films have worked against the simplicity of this text. In books written in English for English-speaking readers, the use of English language film titles is the logical standard. However, in the case of Bava's filmography, the English versions of his films are often bastardized works that do not represent these works as they were seen in Italy. Therefore, I have opted to use the original Italian titles when discussing Bava's original versions, and to use the English titles only when specifically referring to those alternate versions—which play their own part in this epic story. Films undertaken as American productions—Esther and the King, Four Times That Night, Baron Blood, Lisa and the Devil and The House of Exorcism—are the only exceptions to this rule. Because the Italian titles may be unfamiliar to many of my readers, I have opted to combine the Italian and English titles of Bava's films, separated by a slash (e.g., La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday), in all the mentions preceding the chapter devoted to that film; in the subsequent chapters, the references will be made only to the Italian or English title, depending on whichever version is under discussion, because the dual presentation seems overcompensatory in the wake of an in-depth discussion. Non-Bava titles are presented in the dual title format throughout, or until the point when both titles have been presented so often as to no longer be necessary.

Credits: Full credits sidebars are provided only for those films which Mario Bava directed or co-directed. I have made every effort to include as many international release titles, distributors, release dates, and running times as possible, but these should not be taken as complete or definitive accounts of where each film was distributed. As far as running times are concerned, some of these reflect my own timings of material, rounded off to the nearest minute, while others are based on published listings. When I have found references to running times of films as released in, say, West Germany that are as much as 10 minutes longer than their original Italian lengths, I have presumed these are erroneous and have either adjusted or omitted them as seemed appropriate. In the case of British releases, I have included available running times in minutes and seconds, as this extra measure of information seems necessary in light of censorship cuts inflicted on Bava's work at the time of their initial release in Great Britain.

Currency: This book contains numerous references to motion picture budgets and boxoffice earnings in lire (plural form of lira), the Italian currency during Mario Bava's lifetime. Italy followed suit with the European continent's conversion to the standard currency of the Euro on February 28, 2002. To ensure the better understanding of these figures among my non-Italian readers, I have presented sums of lira, wherever pertinent, in tandem with their equivalent in US dollars. These equivalents, necessarily based on the closing rate of exchange, do not take inflation or other fluctuations of the exchange rate into account. Therefore, while these monetary translations do not accurately reflect the value of these sums at the time, they can offer a rough idea of how much money is being discussed.

Father and Son

"A chemist who knows his business is twenty times more useful than any poet."
—Ivan Turgenev, Fathers and Sons

EUGENIO BAVA, 1908
MARIO BAVA, circa 1934

EUGENIO BAVA, 1908.

Eugenio Bava

The Invisible Man of Italian Cinema

TODAY, SANREMO is the Atlantic City of Italy, a popular beach and gambling resort in the northwestern province of Imperia, nestled between the Maritime Alps and the Riviera di Ponente, the sandy coastal fringe where the boot of Italy is kissed by the Ligurian Sea.

The Sanremo in which Mario Bava's story begins (not "San Remo," as it is listed in most English sources) was quite a different place. In the late 19th century, Imperia was known as Liguria, and the Italian Riviera did not yet exist as such. It was not until the year that Bava's father was born—1886—that Sanremo enjoyed its first surge of popularity, thanks to a prolonged visit by King Friedrich II of Germany. At the time, Sanremo was a small, picturesque hamlet marked by tightly clustered 13th century houses and steep, narrow, labyrinthine streets of dirt and cobblestone. In daylight, one could appreciate the rich fecundity of the land, whose mountainous shelter from the winter winds ensured the early flourishing of flowers and vegetables; but at night, one could see something in its huddled architecture that evoked the more interior worlds of folklore and superstition. Sometimes at night, a mist would sweep in from the sea and roll low in the streets till morning. Photographs from the period very much recall the village of Karmingen in Bava's Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill! (1966).

Mario's father was born Francesco Eugenio Bava in Sanremo on March 31, 1886, to Giovanni "Nino" Bava and his wife Caterina. He was the couple's third child and first son, following two elder sisters, Mariuccia and Manin. As a child, he was called either Eugenio or "Chechin," an affectionate nickname for Francesco; his Christian name was so seldom used that it was given again to the last of the couple's three remaining children, who was preceded by Luigi (called "Gigin," who grew up to become the director of the Sanremo Telegraph Office) [1] and Luisa. The family lived with Caterina's widowed mother, who shared her same name, and was called by everyone "Nonna [Granny] Caterina."

Mario's grandfather Nino was a sculptor and a sculptor's son. The family hailed from a village near Genoa, between Piedmonte and Liguria, and its sculptors had been responsible for carving all of the church altars in the vicinity. Nino was regarded as a very righteous man, the heart of his family. A family portrait shows him seated with patriarchal centrality, his arms warmly encircling his two sons; he looks young and handsome, with curly dark hair, a mustache and a diamond-shaped stud of beard beneath his lower lip. Tragically, he died of pneumonia—still incurable at the time—only ten years after this photo was taken, circa 1900–01.

When he lost his father, Chechin (that is, Eugenio) was only 15 years old, and his grief was so intense that family friends speculated that he might soon follow his father to the grave, if he didn't learn to marshal his emotions. Gradually, time eased the acuity of his pain, and he and his family got on with their lives. The early loss of their father may have made the Bava family wary of a God who giveth and taketh away, because except for Nonna Caterina, they were not particularly religious, unusual for a working-class Italian family of this era. Eugenio, in particular, learned to place his faith in the transcendence of art and the practicality of science.

Eugenio "was a Basque like Raphael and dressed in the avant garde fashion of his era," according to his son Mario. "He was an 'artiste,' the prototype of the Bohemian artist. He was an artist, sculptor, chemist, electrician, and inventor. He spent years studying perpetual motion." [2] In another of his interviews, Mario went so far as to include "medium" on his father's résumé of abilities. Lamberto Bava laughs at the idea and suggests that, when his father said this, he may have been recalling a curious episode from Eugenio's early days in Sanremo: "A cousin of my grandfather, a slightly crazy member of the wealthy family Parodis, committed suicide in Sanremo. She threw herself off a cliff into the sea. Her body was never recovered, and for this reason, my grandfather attended a seance. The psychic—a woman unknown to my grandfather—told the gathering that the body would be found in Tolone, France—quite a distance from Sanremo, where she had killed herself. Everyone laughed, saying, 'Right! She's a sailboat!' But, about one month later, that is exactly where she was found! This was the only example in our family history (my grandfather, my father and me) in which our search for the supernatural turned up anything positive or verifiable."

PATERNAL family photograph, circa 1900. Left to right: Mario Bava's aunt Maruccia, grandmother Caterina, father Francesco Eugenio, grandfather Giovanni ("Nino"), uncle Luigi ("Gigin"), great grandmother ("Nonna") Caterina, and aunt Manin.

Eugenio Bava matured into a dark, thin man with a hawklike brow and piercing eyes, which he complemented with a mustache much like the one worn by his late father. He not only barbered himself like his father; he also followed his absent footsteps into the family business, becoming a sculptor in his own right. He took over the operation of his father's shop, which was run out of the home he continued to share with his family, including Nonna Caterina (who apparently survived her daughter). Eugenio's sculptures and pottery attracted local attention, and one of his regular customers suggested that he might profit by compiling a catalog of his wares. To illustrate the catalog, Eugenio bought a camera and quickly became obsessed with the untapped potentials of photography. This was during the age of flash-powder, which had the unfortunate result of flattening the ornate surface detail that distinguished Eugenio's efforts. As a result, Eugenio devoted himself to the study of artificial lighting—with open oven doors, candles, mirrors, and screens—to offset the details of his handiwork to the most complimentary effect.

Eugenio held the conviction—uncommon today, to say the least—that artistic talent was a blessing from God and should be used only in the service of God, or in the service of one's fellow man, and never for personal glorification—hence, his abomination of signed works. To place one's own name before, or on an equal footing with, the work itself, he considered a form of sacrilege.

One night—in a year variously pinpointed by his son as 1904, 1906 and 1908, and by his grandson as 1905—Sanremo's proximity to the Cote d'Azur resulted in an episode that would forever alter the course of the Bava family's history. It was midnight when Eugenio was roused from his slumber by a frantic knocking on the door of his workshop. The desperate visitor was a representative of the French film company, Pathé Frères—founded in 1896, and at that time the world's largest producer of motion pictures—who was in desperate need of a sculptor for an emergency job. Eugenio's local reputation had literally brought the movies to his doorstep.

Mario Bava told the story thusly: "One night, [my father] was rudely awakened—'Who is it?' 'Le Pathé Cinema!' I don't think filmmaking was any better organized then than it is today; it has always been chaotic. In the middle of the night, Pathé realized that the tomb in which they were planning to shoot the following morning lacked a door. That's right, it all started in a tomb! Anyway, my father—on the move—carved them a door, and from that day forward, he was preoccupied with the cinema." [3]

Some detail may be lost in the translation, but Lamberto Bava insists that—according to the story as it has been passed down from generation to generation within his family—Eugenio was actually summoned to carve the stone frame of a fireplace, not the entrance to a tomb. It may seem a moot point, but knowing the truth is the only means we have of speculating which Pathé Frères short might have heralded the moment when la famiglia Bava entered the cinema. The name of the short was never recorded, but we can safely narrow down the identity of the director in charge to two, because the Pathé shorts produced during this period were usually the work of only two directors: Ferdinand Zecca and Segundo de Chomón.

Ferdinand Zecca (1864–1947) directed most of Pathé Frères' output between 1901–10, during which time he pioneered the crime melodrama with Histoire d'un Crime ("Story of a Crime," 1901), and directed the first celluloid adaptations of Quo Vadis? ("Where Are You Going?" 1901) and L'Homme Invisible ("The Invisible Man," 1909). While later generations have criticized Zecca for plagiarizing the trick photographic techniques and ideas innovated by the French cinemagician Georges Méliès (1861–1938), he tended to relegate such spectacle to the backgrounds of his scenarios, reserving it for comic effect; Zecca was not, in the strictest sense, a fantasist. While Méliès faded into unjust obscurity, Zecca's commercial applications of his genius turned a magic act into a world-class business, making Pathé Frères the first true empire of the cinema. In 1910, Zecca's business acumen was rewarded when Charles Pathé appointed him general manager of the company.

But it is doubtful that Zecca required Eugenio's services because it is unlikely that Eugenio opened his workshop while still in his teens; the true date of this occasion was probably closer to 1906–08. In this event, it is much more likely that Eugenio found himself in the employ of Segundo de Chomón—and this would indeed have been the kind of encounter to make sparks fly in his imagination.

Born in Tereul, Spain, on October 18, 1871, de Chomón—a descendant of a noble French family (de Chaumont)—first came to Zecca's attention with his animated live action short El Hotel Electrico ("The Electric Hotel," 1905), a fantasy about a fully mechanized hotel of the future, which had been produced for Hispanofilm, a Pathé-owned Spanish company. At Zecca's invitation, de Chomón had relocated to Paris in 1907, whereupon he directed numerous imaginative shorts for Pathé Frères, including La Maison Hanteé ("The Haunted House," 1907), Voyage à la Planete Jupiter ("Voyage to the Planet Jupiter," 1907), and La Cuisine Magnétique ("The Magnetic Meal," 1908).

It makes better sense that Segundo de Chomón presided over Eugenio's first encounter with the cinema for several reasons. First of all, the odds are in his favor: de Chomón directed more Pathé shorts during this period than Zecca, who was becoming increasingly involved with the business end of the fledgling film industry. Secondly, as a direct result of his experiences that night, Eugenio became obsessed with trick photography, and "the Spanish Méliès" was exactly the kind of filmmaker who could have instilled a life-long love of special effects in a young man of artistic temperament. Finally, this meeting makes sense because it would establish a working relationship between Bava and de Chomón, who, as we will see, would work together again on even more significant projects. This meeting would give them a basis for those future collaborations.

As a solitary workman with an interest in photography, Eugenio must have found very seductive the sense of camaraderie as a group of artists and technicians assembled at the location at daybreak and set to work with a common sense of purpose. Knowing his ideas about art without ego, he may have also been favorably impressed by the spectacle of a group of anonymous craftsmen working as a unit, the individual replaced by the crew. It's easy to understand what would have endeared the magic of movies to Eugenio, but what did he do to endear himself to them? Did he

THE FICINI-CARPITA FAMILY, circa 1904. Back row: Anita, Ida, Pierre, Gino, Adele, Emma (the future mother of Mario Bava). Center: mother Pellegrina, father Tonino. Front: Alfredo, Carlo.

1 Elena Bava, Mario's older sister, remembers her Uncle Gigin's office: "He was the director of the Telegraph Office in Sanremo, and it was a very busy office! Not only because of the vacationers, but also because there were many celebrities who came to spend their declining years in Sanremo. One of these was the last Shah of Persia! Then there were the English, who came in groups, sent there for cures by their physicians: 'Only Sanremo can cure you!' We little kids, recognizing the English from their language and their clothes, cried, 'Run! The English are coming!' Then times changed, and the English didn't come any more. When the Shah of Persia died, one of his servants (who spoke Italian pretty well) came to us and said, 'Don't worry if you see one of his windows open and lit by a lamp; that's the Shah's bedroom. This way, his soul might find its way back to his room.'" simply fulfill the task he was called upon to do? Did he offer the cameraman some useful lighting suggestions, based on his own past experimentation with still photography? Whatever transpired that night between midnight and sunrise, one thing is certain: Eugenio's life was forever changed.

2 Giuseppe Lippi and Lorenzo Codelli, Fant'italia (Trieste, Italy: XIV Festival Internazionale del Film di Fantascienza, 1976), 152–54.

3 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

"My father rapidly developed into a most formidable cameraman," Mario Bava summarized. "We are indebted to him for some of the loveliest images of the Italian silent cinema."[4]

Indeed. In the course of his extraordinary career, Eugenio Bava would produce the first animated films made in Italy; he would become the first Italian specialist in trick photography; he would photograph the first feature film to receive a significant international release; he would supervise all the work produced by the leading Italian special effects house over a period of thirty years; and he would invent several basic cinematographic devices. Yet, despite these impressive (and, in some cases, fundamental) accomplishments, Eugenio remains one of the most obscure figures of the Italian cinema, owing to his fiercely held conviction that art was meant to enrich the world, not the reputation of the artist. As Lamberto Bava says, "It's not easy to identify his contribution, but you can feel it."

Eugenio did not abandon his work as a sculptor, but his professional life was abruptly divided by his newfound passion for the art and science of cinematography. He obtained a motion picture camera and began to experiment. His first results were a farce, with the image accelerating and slowing down unexpectedly, as a result of irregular hand-cranking. Over time, he found that by quietly humming certain pieces of music, it helped to regulate his hand-cranking of the camera and produce more even results. The song "Giovinezza!" (a Fascist anthem prior to the second World War) he found ideal for cranking 35 mm, while Verdi's "La marcia reale" from Aida was perfect for 16 mm.

In 1908, at the responsible age of 21, Eugenio married Emma Ficini-Carpita, the daughter of Tonino and Pellegrina Ficini-Carpita. A surviving family photo indicates that Emma was perhaps the middle-born of eight children, a brood including three sisters and four brothers. Her parents must have had a happy marriage, as their children varied greatly in age; in this photo, there are two adult daughters, two toddlers and the full range between. Emma looked very much like her mother—a placid, moon-faced girl—and, unlike her nonchurchgoing husband, was a very devout Catholic.

EUGENIO BAVA proudly poses with his fellow founders of San Remo Film, 1908.

"She had a really sweet, down-to-earth character," Lamberto Bava recalls. "Her manners were simple yet elegant. Everyone called her a saint for putting up with her husband's strange attitudes. She had a great sense of humor and she loved putting on funny clothes to amuse her grandchildren. She was very similar in character to my father." Lamberto's sister (Mario's daughter) Elena also has fond memories of visiting her grandmother as a child, because she was always dressing up in costumes and putting on impromptu plays to entertain her.

Within the first year of his marriage to Emma, Eugenio Bava made a proud announcement—though not the sort of announcement commonly expected of newlyweds. Though no record of this work exists, Eugenio must have continued to work on assorted Pathé Frères shorts, because he had befriended several local artists and technicians who, like him, worked periodically for Pathé Frères—men whose talents went to waste when the company had nothing local in production. Indeed, product was so scarce that most of the theaters in and around Sanremo were closed more often than they were open. Seeing that this need for product was a proverbial window of opportunity, Eugenio and his friends founded a new production company—San Remo Film—to provide their city's empty screens with homegrown miracles. As Lamberto Bava notes, "This was the period of La Belle Epoque, when you could make a movie about a nice landscape in a picture frame."

EMMA FICINI-CARPITA, circa 1908, showing a remarkable likeness to her mother.

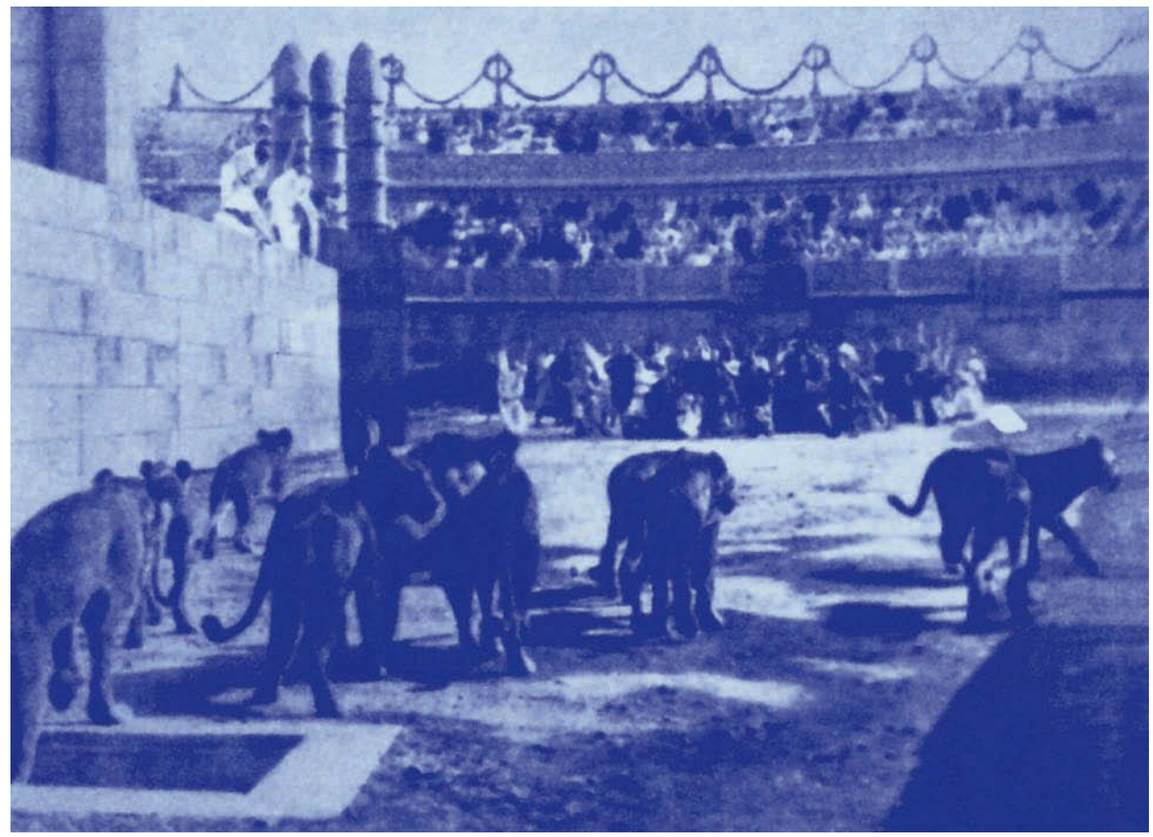
Eugenio and his partners posed together for a commemorative photograph, presumably to announce or celebrate the completion of a project entitled Maggio—mese dei fiori ("May—Month of Flowers"), which sounds very much like a landscape picture. Considering the entrepreneurial pride on display in the photograph, it may well have been their first production.

By all published accounts, San Remo Film's outstanding production was a special effects extravaganza entitled Terremoto fatale ("Fatal Earthquake"), made in the wake of a devastating earthquake in Messina, Sicily, in 1908 that claimed 70,000 lives. The first disaster movie, and arguably the first Italian horror movie, Terremoto fatale dared to visualize the unthinkable: What if the Messina quake had occurred in Rome? The film showcased a variety of special effects techniques that Eugenio may have learned by observing Segundo de Chomón at work—augmented with his own gifts for sculpture, scale modelling, and photography. Since the film was not shot in Rome, we may assume that even the location of the film was an illusion—an example that his son Mario would follow fifty years later in I vampiri (1957), where scenes shot in an ordinary Roman courtyard appeared to unfold on the streets of Montmartre. At a time when audiences could still be frightened and disoriented by images of trains rolling into close-up and guns being fired at the camera, Eugenio Bava served up a veritable apocalypse—staged with scale models and detailed tabletop miniatures.

Eugenio personally travelled with the San Remo shorts, exhibiting them up and down the coastal area. Unfortunately, nothing produced by San Remo Film has survived—thanks to the volatility of nitrate stock, the combined ravages of two World Wars, and Eugenio's own disregard for memorabilia. But from what is known about them, we can assume that the San Remo shorts reflected Eugenio's unique abilities as an artist, sculptor and photographer, and served as a showcase for all that he had learned about the principles of cinematic illusion.



On October 9, 1911, Eugenio and Emma Bava had their first child: a daughter named Elena. Her arrival coincided with the end of an era, and the beginning of a new one, as San Remo Film was eclipsed by greater adventures in the cinema.

It isn't known how successful San Remo Film ultimately became. However, by 1912, the works of this small company must have become very well-known and respected by the Italian film community at large. We know this because, in 1912, Francesco Eugenio Bava (he went by his full name at this time) was entrusted with the job of photographing one of the earliest feature films made anywhere in the world, and certainly the most ambitious filmic statement Italy had attempted to date.

The film was Enrico Guazzoni's Quo vadis?, based on the 1895 novel by Henryk Sienkiewicz and released in 1913. Sienkiewicz' worldwide best-seller had already been filmed thrice (twice in 1901, once in 1908), but these earlier efforts were essentially short films capturing various highlights of the novel on film. Guazzoni had previously made La Gerusalemme liberata/The Crusaders (1911), which was considered ambitious at the time for running 1,000 meters (approximately 43 minutes), and is considered by some references to be the first feature film. Quo vadis?, on the other hand, was produced for the then-astronomical figure of 48 million lire (about $30,000 in today's currency), and it was the first Italian film that dared to be truly epic in scope, opulence, and literal length, running 2,250 meters (approximately 97 minutes).

To fill the screen with unparalleled bounty, horses were borrowed from the Army, gladiators were recruited from the proletariat, and trained lions were rented from a Roman circus. What areas of the screen could not be filled literally, were filled suggestively by the 26-year-old Bava's mastery of trick photography.

Though severely limited by the primitive state of cinematographic technology, Eugenio's photography in Quo vadis? is immediately remarkable for its mobility. His pioneering uses of composition in depth help to create illusions of sets and distances where there are none, and his fondness for implying scope of spectacle with lateral camera movements is particularly fascinating when compared to his son's innovative widescreen compositions within the epic genre forty years later. The film's unimaginably costly appearance is almost entirely due to Eugenio's familiarity with tricks of perspective; the seemingly mile-long grandstands on view during the film's arena scenes were actually miniatures, and the burning of Rome was conjured with smoke pots and scale models of columned structures carved by hand. Quo vadis? may appear static by today's standards—how could it not?—but Eugenio's favorite accolade came when the film was praised by the renowned sculptor Pierre-Auguste Rodin as a masterpiece.

LIONS multiplied on the set of QUO VADIS? by the camera wizardry of Eugenio Bava, 1912.

4 Ibid.

The famous sequence of Christians being fed to the lions for Nero's pleasure is of particular importance, as it illustrates the means by which Eugenio most likely rose so quickly to the top of his profession. The scene showcases the earliest known use of one of Eugenio's own inventions, the camera truca, which made it possible to create "in-the-camera" matte shots decades before the invention of the optical printer. The crude camera attachment worked by partially obscuring sections of the exposed frame with pre-cut cards; after the shot was completed, the film was automatically rewound to its starting point, at which point the frame was protected by a complementary set of cut-outs. In this manner, Eugenio was able to create the illusion of hungry lions pacing within inches of cowering Christian extras. In fact, the production had rented only one lion from a local circus; by using the same method, Eugenio was able to photographically clone this single animal into a den of twenty. With typical selflessness, Eugenio regarded this invention as his gift to the profession, and willingly built camera truca for other cameramen in need without thinking to patent the device.

Quo vadis? was a tremendous, world-wide success. Its vast scope, pageantry and technical daring placed Italy in the vanguard of motion picture entertainment—which is perhaps hard to imagine today, considering that most Italian films are still made without direct-sound recording. It became the first international phenomenon of the cinema. In Great Britain, it was the subject of a command performance for King George V. It premiered in America at Broadway's Astor Theater, a special occasion for which ticket prices jumped from 15 cents to a staggering $1.50.

CABIRIA: Bartolomeo Pagano as Maciste.

The resounding commercial victory of Guazzoni's film caused a thunder of approval that was soon after stolen by a film of stark technical superiority, Giovanni Pastrone's Cabiria (1914), produced by Italia Film of Turin. Directed by Pastrone under the pseudonym "Piero Fosco"—ample proof that the Anglo-Saxon market had yet to prove itself on the silver screen—Cabiria set standards for Italy's cinematic identity which in some ways remain to be transcended ninety years later.

It was here that the peplum or "sword and sandal" epic was truly born, a genre whose rebirth would be engineered in great part by Mario Bava in the 1950s; a decorative melodrama, as intrinsically Italian in nature as the Western later became to America, built upon the romantic Roman concept of a muscular Everyman shouldering the burden of a falling empire. It was in this archetypal role that Pastrone cast barrel-chested Bartolomeo Pagano (1878–1947), a former dock worker from Genoa. Pagano had been discovered some years earlier by Vincenzo Leone—an actor–director who signed his films "Roberto Roberti," best remembered today as the father of filmmaker Sergio Leone—and he was subsequently cast in Ambrosio Film's Gli ultimi giorni di Pompeii ("The Last Days of Pompeii," 1908). Pagano's screen debut in this 21-minute "selected scenes" featurette had done nothing for his career, but painted black for the epic Cabiria, he found overnight stardom, becoming synonymous with his character, the Nubian slave Maciste.

Maciste's career appended a grand total of twenty-four sequels to Cabiria until 1926, when the post-war decrease in Italian film production had no choice but to claim stars of even his magnitude. However, even as late as the 1960s, the name of Maciste remained so legendary that it was revived for more than twenty other pepla, which engaged the (now Caucasian) hero in battles with everyone from Genghis Khan to Zorro to the Man in the Moon. The Maciste name had no boxoffice identification abroad, however, and was subsequently changed in the dubbing process to any number of generic strongman names like "Samson" or "Goliath." Without the example of Maciste, the Italian Cinema renaissance in the 1950s—spearheaded by Pietro Francisci's Le fatiche di Ercole/Hercules (1958), photographed by Mario Bava—might never have happened.

The credited cameraman of Cabiria—acclaimed for introducing the screen's first tracking shot, laying the earliest dolly tracks, and riding the first of all camera cranes—was none other than Segundo de Chomón, formerly of Pathé Frères. After a series of ambitious Jules Verne adaptations established him as one of the company's outstanding talents, de Chomón left in 1910 to form his own production company in Spain. The venture proved unsuccessful, however, and in 1912, de Chomón was lured to work as a cameraman in Italy.

Perhaps because they had befriended each other in the course of working together for Pathé Frères, but certainly due to the credentials he had acquired from the illusions he had created for Terremoto fatale, Eugenio Bava was invited to work with de Chomón in the preparation of Cabiria's special effects. These included the film's early, extraordinary sequence of the eruption of Mt. Etna—a sequence that looks remarkably like certain effects shots in Mario Bava's Terrore nello spazio/ Planet of the Vampires (1965, on which Eugenio also worked)—and the burning of a Roman armada at Syracuse. Film scholar David A. Cook describes these sequences as "the best special effects to appear on the screen for the next twenty years,"[5] and they remain remarkable, especially in some of their less obvious applications. For instance, some shots of collapsing sets during the Mt. Etna sequence were rendered more frightening by double exposing the footage with shots of licking flames and rising smoke, filmed against black backdrops. For the shots of the raging volcano itself, Eugenio built a scale model on the set, to allow the flames and smoke it belched forth to retain a semblance of their proper size and detail onscreen; however, what really sold the shot was the optical insertion of numerous live extras (including a herd of sheep!) into the effect, shown fleeing the eruption by running down a sloping road winding around the volcano to its base.

CABIRIA (clockwise): the eruption of Mt. Etna, the angelic procession finale, two nightmare images, and the flaming armada. ▶

VARIOUS POSTERS dating from the film's original release.

There are several ways this effect could have been achieved, any one of which would have been extraordinarily innovative in 1913. The first (and most obvious) is double exposure; that is, by filming the miniature with the lower right corner of the frame unexposed, and then rewinding the film, protectively covering the exposed portion with a black mask, exposing the unexposed area, and filming through that aperture the live action at a distance appropriate to scale—in other words, the camera truca. But the evidence of the effect itself makes this explanation impossible, because smoke pots placed on the side of the slope with the actors send smoke up into the air, where it passes over the face of the volcano—an impossibility with the hard edges of matte effects. The other obvious explanation would be that the miniature was reflected on a sheet of mirrored glass, placed at a 45° angle in front of the camera, with the silvering on the lower right corner scraped away to provide an area of see-through glass, through which the live portion could be filmed at the same time on-set. Again, the hard edges of the scraped mirror would cut off the rising smoke once it reached a certain height, making this also an unacceptable explanation—besides, this method was still roughly fifteen years away from being coined, when Eugen Schüfftan, the Polish-born cinematographer of Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1926), intuited how to insert live actors into miniature sets by studying the effects shots in Cabiria. (Thus, the scraped mirror approach came to be known as "the Schüfftan process.") Frame-by-frame study of the sequence indicates that the volcano (which one would assume to be the reflected component, as it was the miniature) was shot head-on, through a sheet of angled glass in front of the camera, with a deliberately darkened area at the lower right side, where the live component of fleeing actors and animals (staged off-camera to the left) was reflected with the help of bright lighting. This would seem to be the only means by which the smoke could pass from the live area over the face of the miniature without matte-line interference. The illusion is further "sold" by the foregrounding of a sculpted miniature stone wall that masks the ramp on which the extras and livestock were actually walking.

Naturally, Eugenio Bava's name did not appear on prints of Cabiria—neither did Segundo de Chomón's—and over the years, when the film's special effects were mentioned, they were assumed to be solely the work of de Chomón, whose name was synonymous with screen trickery. But de Chomón's special effects were usually rooted in the principles of stop-motion animation: he relished making inanimate objects move of their own accord, appear and disappear; he was not a sculptor, a mathematician, or a chemist, as Bava was. There is also a noticeable division of lighting styles between the main scenes of the picture and its special effects sequences, the latter being much moodier and atmospheric, lending force to the theory that Eugenio Bava staged and photographed these inserts himself as a separate unit.

It was not in Eugenio's character to demand credit or attention for his inventions, but given the angled glass explanation of the shot, one could argue that the so-called "Schüfftan process" might never have come about without Eugenio's trail-blazing example—which actually offers a simpler, more elegant solution to the problem of inserting live actors into miniature sets. Schüfftan's claiming of this approach as his own seems to have grated on Mario Bava, who offers it oblique comment in Operazione paura, in which an orphaned woman named Monika Schüfftan (Erika Blanc) returns to her childhood home, where she discovers that she is not a child of the Schüfftans after all, but in fact the abandoned daughter of the Baroness in whose villa they once worked as servants.

The more experience he gained as a motion picture cameraman, the more Eugenio was bothered by the guesswork that was necessarily involved in the framing process. Thus, according to Lamberto Bava, he invented what is popularly known today as the Reflex camera system. As always, Eugenio paid no heed to patenting this wonderful new invention—which, for the first time, allowed cameramen to view, through an internal system of small spinning mirrors, the exact image being captured on their film stock (thereby taking all of the guesswork out of the framing process, and making deliberate camera compositions possible)—and was happy to build replicas for other cameramen. As Eugenio's descendants bemoan to this day, someone else eventually did patent a very similar invention—two decades later—and today it is part and parcel of every motion picture camera built. Had Eugenio been more inclined to sign his name to his own inventions, he could have become independently wealthy from this single patent.

Cabiria was released in Rome on April 18, 1914. When it premiered at the Knickerbocker Theater in New York City, it was seen by D. W. Griffith, who was then preparing a film called The Mother and the Law. Pastrone's film so affected Griffith that he reconceived his project as a single thread of a more elaborate motion picture epic spanning four different periods of history, which would attain international glory when it was released in 1916 as Intolerance.

5 David A. Cook, A History of Narrative Film (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1981), 56–57.

YOUNG MARIO "Nino" Bava and family pet, photographed by Eugenio Bava circa 1920.

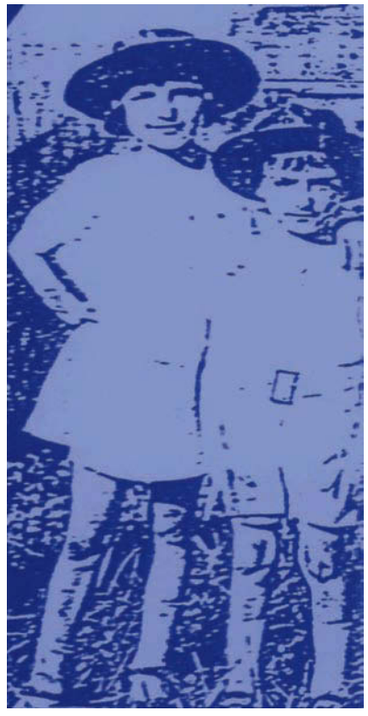
Figlio d'arte

ON JUNE 28, 1914, Europe was shaken when Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria and his wife were assassinated in Sarajevo by a Bosnian nationalist, in retaliation for his participation in military maneuvers in Bosnia-Hercegovina. The ensuing tumult rapidly escalated into the first global conflict, beginning with Germany's declaration of war against France and Russia on July 30, 1914. It was on that very day—which marked the beginning of the conflict that would escalate into World War I—that Emma Bava gave birth to her second child, a son named Mario. [1]

Mario's older sister Elena, then only 3 years old, remembers the day vividly: "The delivery was expected to be very difficult. The physician, Dr. Cotta, asked for an oxygen tank—but we lived in the beautiful region of San Martino, not in downtown Sanremo! So my father jumped on his bicycle and took a shortcut, pedaling through the sea front—a non-thoroughfare area! It was a real scene à la Chiapucci [referring to a famous Italian cyclist]—and my father was the winner! He managed to outdistance the policeman who was furiously pursuing him . . .



"In the meantime, around my mother's bed, we were all very worried. The only person who was peaceful and serene was—right!—her, the sick one! That day was the feast of the Madonna di Pompei, and Mamma told us afterwards (very secretively) that in the moment of her greatest pain, she saw the Madonna standing at the foot of her bed and she became serene. The Madonna smiled at her and, nodding her head gently, told her that everything would be all right very soon . . .

"To divert me, my younger aunt took me out for a stroll. We were walking up and down Sanremo and we arrived at St. Stefano's Church, and went inside. We found the church in absolute silence; it was the moment of the supplication of the Madonna. My aunt whispered to me, 'Why don't you ask the Madonna for Mamma's recovery?' Thus, with all the force in my little lungs, in the absolute silence of the church, I cried out, 'Madonna, fai guarire Mammina!' [Madonna, please let my little mother be well!] After a moment of silence, I answered myself even louder, with a long 'Si!' [Yes!] All the people in the church turned their heads, smiling and very moved. And Mammina was healed!"

The newborn was named Mario in honor of the Virgin Mother whose presence seemed so closely linked to the circumstances of his birth. Yes: the future cinematographer was named after a vision. Like his sister before him, Mario was baptized as an infant at the parish of Santa Maria degli Angeli in Sanremo. For the first twenty years of his life, Mario was called Nino—the affectionate form of Giovanni—after his late paternal grandfather, whom his father Eugenio continued to mourn. Giovanni was considered to be Mario's second name, but it was not entered on his birth certificate.

Now with two small children to feed, and a beautiful home in the San Martino district to keep up, Eugenio needed to maintain steady employment. Evidently, while Eugenio was working on Cabiria in Turin, his work came to the attention of Arturo Ambrosio, the mogul behind Ambrosio Film, also of Turin. Established in 1906, Ambrosio Film was known as a place that encouraged—indeed, which had been founded upon—technical ingenuity. A former optics dealer, Ambrosio had produced the first newsreel footage filmed in Italy, and he had also built the world's first glass-roofed studio, allowing his productions to utilize natural lighting, and also to dodge Turin's undependable climate, which was subject to fogs, rain and heavy mists. Ambrosio Film was also the first major studio to introduce artificial lighting, thanks to cameraman Carlo Montuori's exasperated decision to move the street lamps indoors.

ELENA and her little brother Nino—the best of friends.

Some months after he had gone back to Sanremo, Eugenio received a communication from Ambrosio, inviting him to relocate to Turin and work exclusively for his company. His daughter Elena recalls that he accepted the offer "with great satisfaction," and that the family celebrated by taking some days of holiday in Ceva, Piedmonte (Northern Italy), before packing their motorcar for a new life in a new city. According to Lamberto Bava, Mario often remarked that his earliest memory was of seeing the snow capping the long walls along the roads as his family drove to Turin.

The Bavas rented an apartment on Via Ormea, which they made their home for the next four years. Across the street from their apartment was an elementary school run by nuns, which Elena attended, as did Mario once he came of age. Also nearby was the Parco del Valentino, where the two siblings often played—always dressed alike, like twins, in sun hats and white, short-legged apparel. One summer, the Bava children went with their mother on holiday to Ormea while their father stayed in Turin to work. A postcard, which Eugenio sent to his children, survives. Inscribed in Eugenio's crabbed handwriting, it reads "Bacioni da Papà. Saluti a tutti." ("Kisses from Papa. Greetings to all.") Next to his message, he drew a charming portrait of his children at play in the Parco del Valentino, sharing a swing in their matching outfits, as the family dog romps in the background. "We were very happy to get it," Elena remembers.

One of Eugenio's first projects for Ambrosio was Cenere/Ashes (1916), co-directed by Febo Mari and Arturo Ambrosio Jr., which has retained a special place in the history of cinema for preserving the only filmed performance by the legendary stage actress, Eleonora Duse (1858–1924). He was chosen to photograph Cenere by a personal friend, the poet Gabriele D'Annunzio, who was also Duse's lover and the author of Cabiria's purplish intertitles. He performed the same chore for Cenere.

Based on a novel by Grazia Deledda, Cenere is the melodramatic story of Rosalita, a young Sardinian woman who gives birth to a son out of wedlock, is financially unable to care for him, and turns him over to his mill-working father to raise. When the son reaches prosperous manhood, he seeks out his mother and finds her a pitiful outcast. Shattered by the revelation of his illegitimacy, he rejects his mother, and then reconsiders . . .

but she dies of melancholy before the sign of his acceptance arrives.

Although she was cast as a haggard peasant woman, considerable steps had to be taken to depict La Duse—who was making her screen debut at age 60—as flatteringly as possible. According to her biographer Bertita Harding, Duse's wardrobe had been "stripped to the barest essentials [by the war years] so that . . . she was forced to borrow the required finery for her [screen] test. Almost 60, her tired body and timeworn face did not photograph well, but it was thought that heavy makeup might cover the ravages of age."[2] In fact, Duse played the early scenes of her character's youth dodgily, by wearing dolorous veils and averting her face from the direct scrutiny of the camera.

After seeing the finished film, Duse criticized her performance in an equally melodramatic letter to producer Arturo Ambrosio: "My mistake, and that of many others, lay in employing 'theatrical' techniques, despite every effort to avoid them. Here is something quite, quite fresh, a penetrating form of visual poetry, an untried exponent of the human soul. Alas, I am too old for it!" Her letter concluded with a plea to Ambrosio, that he destroy all existing prints of the film—a vain and selfish request with which he wisely refused to comply.

Cenere was recently restored to a length of 60 minutes in a joint preservation between Cineteca del Friuli and George Eastman House, but the version in general circulation is less than half that length. Despite its brevity, the sophistication of Eugenio's cinematography remains impressive; it appears to have been filmed magically, without any of the technical obstacles that typically beset silent films. In an age when movies were still being filmed in flat, natural light, Eugenio devised a virtual blueprint for chiaroscuro photography, making extensive use of sculptured lighting and dramatic shadowplay.

The film's most remarkable shot occurs after Rosalita has delivered her son to the mill: as the mill turns, the stationary camera suddenly moves apace with the grinding wheel, dollying to the right and continuing past meticulously composed workers until it reaches a rectangle of light, streaming in through an off-camera door. The silhouette of the child moves into the light, hands held high as he proclaims, "I am the son of Rosalita!" In another striking image, the child is shown poised in a window, below which the shadows of his mother's reaching arms lower out of sight as she abandons him, receding from view.

Eugenio continued to work for Ambrosio Film through 1920, but Italian film production records have not preserved the titles of the films on which he worked between 1916–18. What is known about this period is that Eugenio remained industrious and inventive, as witnessed by his son's earliest memories of him.

"My memory of my father is that he was a character like Gyro Gearloose, the friend of Donald Duck," Mario reminisced during his 1974 appearance on the television program L'ospite dalle due. "You opened a drawer [in his studio] and lying inside you found a body sculpted in LEGENDARY stage actress Eleonora Duse in an 1898 lithograph, and as Rosalita in CENERE.

1 This is according to the birthdate inscribed on Bava's own burial site. His birthdate has been incorrectly reported as July 31 in every article or book written about him, an error accepted as fact and perpetuated from the germinal statistics first presented in Henri Guieysse, et al., "Mario Bava," L'Ecran Fantastique Fiche C.E.R.C. 34, May 1971, 3–12. and "101 Mario Bava," Film Dope 3, August 1973, 11–13.

2 Bertita Harding, Age Cannot Wither: The Story of Duse and D'Annunzio (Philadelphia PA: Lippincott, 1947), 220–21.

wax . . . in a cupboard, there was a lathe . . . in another place, a ball. He was always inventing—filmic relief, color tinting, explosions—it was normal in my house to find cyanide in the drawers. He used it for tinting, things like that. Being there, seeing those things, I learned—and this disease [of cinema] slowly got in my blood. It's a real disease, actually . . . For example," he elaborated, pointing to the boom microphone hovering above him, "I see light shining on a microphone like this, and automatically, I begin to think, 'This could be a cinematic trick shot—it could be a skyscraper, if shot in a certain way . . .' The brain is always thinking of something new."

As Mario elaborated in his Fant'italia interview: "I grew up among picture frames, miniature models and piles of hyposulfate. I grew up in the midst of film. When I was 3 years old, I used to play with pieces of potassium cyanide, which I loved for its rubescent color. I used to alternate long lines of it with white grains of hyposulfate. It never occurred to my father that I might have poisoned myself. I knew it was poisonous, that I should refrain from licking my fingers while handling it. Cyanide and hyposulfate were mixed to make a chemical fondue. I kept my eye on the film while my father drenched a piece of cotton-wool in cyanide and rubbed the emulsion in the kitchen sink, taking care not to get any drops in his salad. The roots of my love/hate relationship with special effects goes back to that time and those experiences."

Mario's mention of a "love/hate" relationship to special effects may also tacitly acknowledge his conflicted feelings toward his father. As is obvious from his early memories of his father's "Aladdin's cave," he felt a great and early attraction—a simpatico—to his father's tools and trade, but Eugenio was also away from home for much of the time, working, associating with famous people, building a career for himself in order to support his family. There is a family legend that Eugenio once went out, ostensibly to get some tobacco, and did not return for three weeks. While he was away, he sent drawings and affectionate notes to his children, which they gratefully received, but when he returned, Eugenio was often more remote than his correspondence. He sequestered himself in his workshop, was very self-absorbed in his experiments, and easily annoyed by household distractions. In short, little Nino's presence in the workshop was tolerated, and sometimes necessary when Emma was not available to mind him, but it was not encouraged.

Asked to characterize their father–son relationship, Lamberto Bava candidly attests: "It was a strict relationship, and since Eugenio worked in the cinema, there was not much time for family. He was never at home, and it was not until later—when they worked together—that they established a relationship. It was a different time, a time when fathers paid almost no attention to their children until they grew up and could communicate with them on an adult level."

Mario's desire to please his father never waned. When he became a director in 1960, the year in which Eugenio retired, Mario kept his father busy with sculpting and effects consultation jobs on his movies. The best years of their relationship were the years of shared goals and professional equality.

FRONT AND BACK of a hand-drawn postcard sent by Eugenio Bava to his children during his travels.

In 1919, Eugenio is known to have photographed and provided special effects for two melodramas signed by Ambrosio director Achille Consalvi: Champagne caprige and the two-part L'amante della luna (literally "The Moon Lover," referring to a hero fond of taking nightly walks in the moonlight). Night photography was seldom attempted at the time, and it would be fascinating to see L'amante della luna, if only to discover how Eugenio Bava coped with this technical problem.

Mario Bava could remember his father laboring on "a small model with a forest and a lake . . . I recall that he poured the water for the river himself, and that, one day, a maid spilled some and he made a big stink about it." [3]

Mario's sister Elena has vivid memories of the premiere screening: "It was the first film shot by my father [that I remember seeing]; it was not only shot by him, but also sewn, basted, etc. I was 7 years old, more or less, and I remember that I was seated in the front row of the first screening, proud to say, 'This film was made by my Papà!' I remember particularly the beginning: pitch-black, a long row of cypresses fully lit by a wonderful, shining moon! At a certain point appeared on the screen the sleek shape of an old, bearded man, elegantly dressed. His head was raised toward the moon, and his gait was solemn—he was the Moon Lover! After a long, silent walk, the old man abruptly stopped. In a nearby villa, strange noises could be heard! The scene changed, and we were transported to a dimly lit room. The window was open, and there was a young woman—Lidia Quaranta, the protagonist—sleeping. After a short while, two male silhouettes appeared at the window and, after a brief hesitation, they rushed inside, lifted the girl, and covering her mouth with a hand, they dragged her away!

"Sound didn't exist yet, but we, the audience, took care of that! Everybody stood up, shocked by the tragic scene! They shouted, "Leave her alone! Leave her be, you ruffians!" (Those were innocent days—it was the infancy of the cinema!) The audience stayed riveted throughout the third act, in which the criminals were arrested and the heroine was rescued. When the movie was over, there were honors for Papà, for the actress, and for those who had collaborated with him."

Of the family's years in Turin, Elena Bava has particularly fond memories of the holidays when Eugenio would take his children sight-seeing. "We especially liked the Museo Eglizio [Egyptian Museum], which is now regarded as one of the best and richest museums of its kind in Europe. We saw the beautiful churches, the historical sites, always under the guidance of our father, who was trying to enrich us culturally. Sometimes at night, during the week, we went to the Maffei, a café-chantant—a very beautiful theater. I remember that my brother was very interested in everything, except for the dancers, who came on stage dancing in unison. Mario would turn around backwards on his chair, with his back to the stage, and say, 'When those idiots go away, call me!' He had no way of knowing how many more like this he would have to endure in his long career—and without a chair to turn around in!"

One suspects that little Nino may have turned his back to the dancing girls not because they bored him, but because he did not wish anyone to observe how shaken he was by their beauty. Throughout his life, Mario adored women—this much is obvious from the way he photographed them, which did more than capture them: it exalted them. Nino was a sensitive child and, much as his father had to do following the death of his own father, part of his growing up was learning to marshal his violent emotions.

His sister Elena tells two stories that illustrate what a considerate and loving child he was, which also shed light on some of the other interpersonal dynamics within the family. "Mario was extremely tender-hearted and sensitive," she considers. "He suffered because my aunts weren't affectionate toward my mother. My aunts once threw a party and invited all of their relatives, including Mario—but not our mother! When this party in the country ended, Mario put a pastry in his pocket to bring home as a gift to our mother, but on the way, he realized that the pastry, which was filled with cream, had been squashed in his pocket. He started to cry, when our Uncle Mimmo happened by and saw him. He gave Mario the money to buy two pastries—one for Mammina and another for himself!

"On another occasion," she continues, "I was preparing for my Holy Communion and Mario wanted to make me a present. He saw a nice little Madonna in a shop and the price was 20 lire [about a penny]. He asked our miserly Aunt Mariuccia, 'Could you lend me the money?' She told him that he would have to earn it first, by taking a candle and catching some snails. 'For every twenty snails, I will give you one lira,' she said. He had to do this at night, when the snails came out. He finally caught enough and went to buy the little Madonna. Running back home, he fell down and the Madonna broke! Poor thing! Luckily, at that very moment, our Uncle Carlo happened to pass by, and he gave his little nephew the money to buy another one. That was my brother—much better than me!"

In 1920, Eugenio photographed F. G. Viancini and Arturo Ambrosio Jr.'s La farfalla della morte ("The Butterfly of Death"), though surviving production records credit him as "Fernando Bava." This intriguingly titled film marked his last work for Ambrosio.

In the latter months of that year, Do-Re-Mi Film offered Eugenio a monthly wage of 20,000 lire [$12.50] to supervise a series of films about Galaor—a muscular hero, played by Alfredo Boccolini, conceived as competition for the Maciste of Bartolomeo Pagano. Eugenio would photograph the films, design special effects for them, write their scenarios, and—according to his family—also direct them. But first, he had to uproot his brood once again and relocate . . . to Rome.

The titles of the first Galaor films have not been preserved, but L'ultima avventura di Galaor ("The Last Adventure of Galaor"), written and photographed by Eugenio Bava, was released in 1921. The direction, however, was credited not to Eugenio, but to Mario Restivo. The film was also known in some territories as L'ultima impresa di Galaor ("The Final Deed of Galaor"), and it was reissued in 1923 as Galaor tra i leoni ("Galaor Among the Lions"). Naturally, it wasn't Galaor's final adventure . . . but considering the failing fortunes of the Italian cinema in the postwar years, there was every reason why some might harbor such an expectation.

"After we were in Rome for six months, the big crisis of our cinema came, which was to last nine years, until 1930," Mario Bava remembered. [4] During this period, the Italian cinema was eclipsed as the leading producer of feature films by America and Germany, which were exporting the first important films of such directors as D. W. Griffith (now considered "the father of the epic," in the wake of Intolerance and The Birth of a Nation), Thomas Ince, Robert Wiene and Fritz Lang. By 1922, a mere 6% of all films being shown on Italian screens were Italian productions. A number of independent production companies sought to consolidate their strengths by forming the UCI (Unione Cinematografica Italiana), but the plan failed. Italy's Prime Minister, Benito Mussolini (b. 1883), responded by enforcing a strict quota on Italian theaters, requiring them to play one Italian film for every ten features brought in from other countries. But it wasn't strict enough: Italian production companies folded, and some of Italy's most talented filmmakers had to leave their homeland to seek employment in the various hot spots of motion picture production around the world.

In 1924, Italy was responsible for the production of only ten feature films. One of these films, Galaor contro Galaor ("Galaor vs. Galaor"), produced by Fert Film, was again written, photographed and featured special effects by Eugenio Bava, under the direction of Eugenio Perego (not a pseudonym, but a real Milanese director who lived from 1876–1944). Unfortunately, the national film crisis required him to make the film in Turin, while his family remained behind in Rome. Eugenio was paid 20,000 lire per month to do all three jobs, but he was beginning to question the value of a profession that so often separated him from a family that was becoming harder to support.

3 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

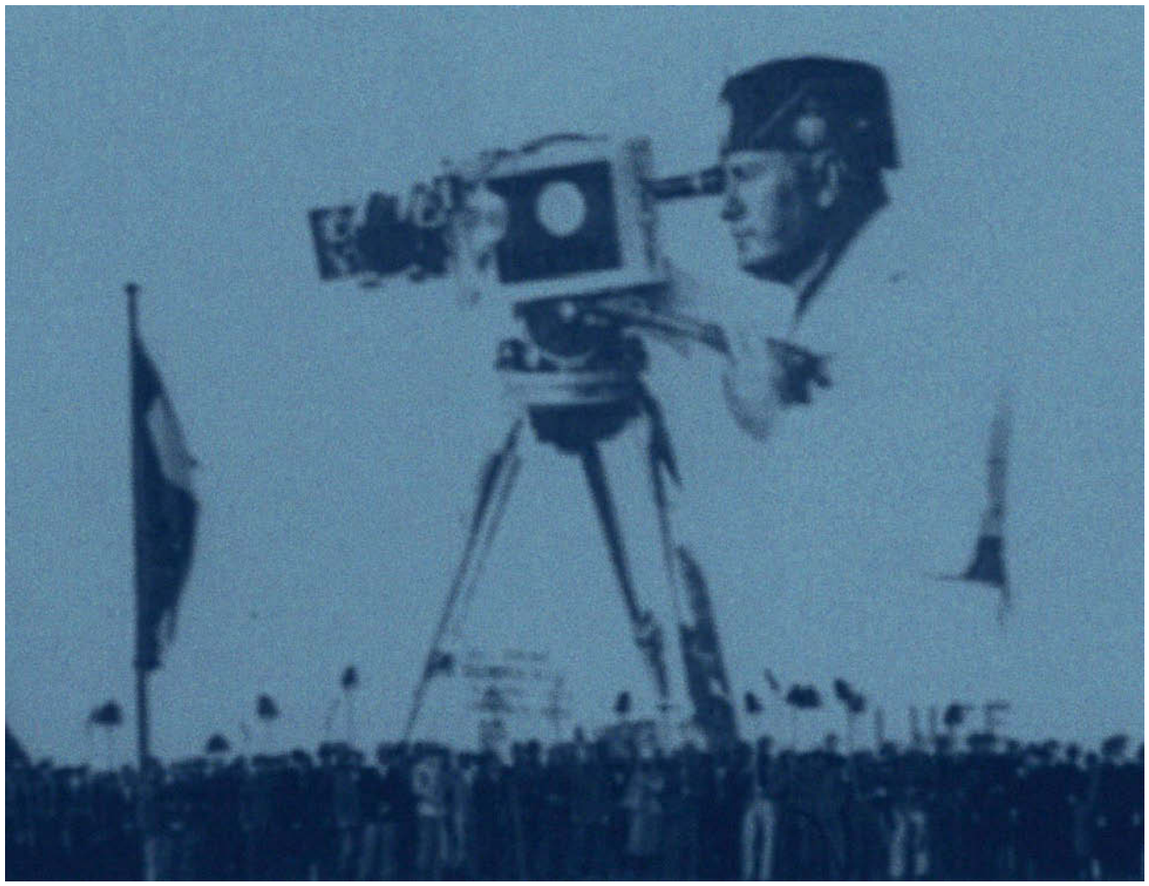
4 Ibid.



Mussolini & the Istituto LUCE

In 1924, the Italian epic—the foundation of the Italian cinema's worldwide success—stood on the brink of extinction. That year, German director Georg Jacoby, together with Gabriele D'Annunzio, collaborated on a colossal remake of the film that started it all, Quo vadis (the question mark now dropped)—an Italian/German co-production starring Emil Jannings as Nero. This version was photographed by Curt Courant, Giovanni Vitrotti and Alfredo Donelli. Made at enormous cost by a depressed film industry in a desperate move, this Quo vadis proved a commercial disaster both at home and as it made its tragic circuit around the world.

The final nail in the coffin of the Italian epic was driven deep in 1925, when Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer sailed a film crew to Rome to film the Biblical epic Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ, based on the 1880 novel by Gen. Lew Wallace. The first-ever collaboration between American and Italian film crews, the production was troubled from the start by union conflicts, personality flare-ups, and endless delays. Things did not get better when the first director was replaced by Fred Niblo, who had directed Douglas Fairbanks in The Mark of Zorro and Rudolph Valentino in Blood and Sand. Under Niblo's aegis, the sea battle—filmed in Lucarno—resulted in several near-drownings, and the climactic chariot race sequence (later deemed unusable due to camera shadows) ended in the death of one Italian stuntman and several horses. When the property warehouse caught fire (arson was suspected), Niblo's unit was recalled to Hollywood, where the arena sequences were reshot from scratch in early two-color Technicolor. The eventual cost of the film is reputed to be $3,900,000, making it by far the most expensive motion picture produced of its era. Despite its heavy financial and human cost, Ben-Hur was greeted by Variety as "the epic of motion picturemaking up to this time" and widely hailed as a masterpiece.

Ben-Hur left a very bad taste in the mouths of the Italian film community, who felt used and abused by the visiting Americans, and this may be part of the explanation why the proverbial buck stopped there. Furthermore, the film became a global triumph, and the Italians understood—especially after the lack of support shown to the latest Quo vadis—that there was simply no point in trying to duplicate Ben-Hur's mammoth success on a lesser scale. It is one of the more baffling aspects of the years of Prime Minister Benito Mussolini's dictatorship—given his developing interest in the cinema as a propaganda tool, and his determination to project a strong, resilient Roman image to the outside world—that he never spearheaded a resurgence of epic filmmaking in Italy in the 1930s and '40s. After all, poor as Italy was, the genre required little more than bare chests and the arenas, props and ancient scenery freely at its disposal. In the years following Ben-Hur, Italian escapist fare was scaled down to more intimate, comic dimensions with the arrival of the telefono bianca, or "white telephone" movies—which told romantic situation comedy stories in glamorous, antiseptic settings that were essentially pageants of Fascist illusion, distinctly at odds with the worsening economic conditions throughout Italy. (The closest American counterparts to this genre are the Astaire/Rogers musicals of the 1930s.) The epic genre would now remain dormant for another twenty years, until it was revived in the 1950s—in large part by Mario Bava.

Perhaps the Italian tradition of epic cinema disappeared because Mussolini wanted to transpose this brand of drama to the arena of the world stage, real life, and to reserve all demonstrations of national heroism for himself. Several historians have noted that Mussolini's image underwent a stark change over the years of his public career, morphing from an early, spectacled, intellectual look into a proud, bald-pated, boisterously physical one inspired by the Duce's favorite film star, Maciste.

In 1926, Mussolini founded the Istituto Nazionale LUCE—the acronym stands for L'Unione Cinematografica Educativa, in other words "The National Institute for the Union of Cinema and Education" ("Union" in its original meaning, not in the sense of a worker's union)—to produce educational and scientific documentaries, in an effort to create films with a stronger national identity to bolster the public morale. Eugenio Bava was recruited by Mussolini to supervise the Istituto's first major work, a documentary about the Giovani Fascisti ("Young Fascists"), which took him on an extended cruise to the Far East in the company of Mussolini's sons, Vittorio and Bruno, and many other young idealists. [5]

ITALIAN PRIME MINISTER Benito Mussolini, founder of the Istituto Nazionale LUCE.

For Eugenio, this working cruise meant another extended separation from his family, and the documentary realism of the job afforded him no outlet for his fascination with trick photography, which he found most fulfilling. In short, it was not a welcome trip, and a surviving photograph, showing Eugenio on deck with Bruno and Vittorio Mussolini, presents a man trying, without success, to disguise his unhappiness. When Eugenio finally returned home, he resolved to never again be placed in such a situation by his profession. He announced his retirement as a cinematographer, effective immediately.

"He got fed up with the business and shut himself away in a musty little room, a real alchemist's closet," Mario summarized. "It was there that I learned everything I know today about special effects and trick photography."[6]

That "musty little room" was at the Istituto Nazionale LUCE. After his extended voyage with Mussolini's sons, at the age of 40, Eugenio Bava was appointed by Mussolini as the Istituto's first production executive. From his modest workshop on Via Cernaia, Eugenio would oversee the production of newsreels, animated cartoons, scientific documentaries, title sequences, "Fine Primo Tempo/ Secondo Tempo" intermission cards, even studio logos.

One of Eugenio's assistants in the preparation of title sequences was Aristide Massaccesi, who later became a successful cinematographer in his own right, and also produced and directed numerous films under numerous pseudonyms, "Joe D'Amato" being the most famous. "I worked with the grandfather of Lamberto Bava when I was only a little boy," Massaccesi told interviewer Peter Blumenstock in 1994. "It wasn't really a job in a professional sense; I didn't see even one penny for doing it. I did it to learn, to experience the atmosphere and magic of movie making. At that time, Eugenio Bava did the opening and closing titles for countless movies. That was a tough job; we had to cut out all the letters of the credits, using stencils and so on. Nowadays, it's easy to do titles because computers do everything for you. But, at that time, every single letter, every comma, had to be cut by hand."

EUGENIO BAVA poses with il Duce's sons, Bruno and Vittorio Mussolini during an extended sea voyage.

Another of Eugenio's tasks in this regard was the filming of the trademark for Aquila Film, the logo heralding all of the Istituto's in-house productions.

"Mussolini liked very much the idea of putting a live eagle on the logo, as a trademark for the films of the Istituto," recalls Elena Bava, who assisted her father for a time. "He ordered the most beautiful eagle in the zoo to be brought over, and it so happened that this eagle gave us some scares. First of all, she got loose—Heaven knows who untied her! She flew very high toward the exit door, which happened to be wide open at that moment. Had she flown out, we never would have recovered her! The men from the zoo came to fetch her down . . . but this was nothing compared to the filming of the logo! The big lights scared her and she slipped down, hanging upside down with one of her claws caught. Poor creature—and poor us! But with a great deal of patience, on her part and on ours, we got a good result."

Every Wednesday evening, a projectionist took the newest films produced by the Istituto for a private screening at Mussolini's home, Villa Torlonia, where il Duce watched everything with aquiline vigilance. "The projectionist told us that il Duce, tired at the end of his day, was also sometimes visibly worried," Elena remembers. "He wasn't always calm, but he followed the screenings very attentively, and when the atmosphere wasn't good, his relatives understood to attend in silence. In moments like those, his son Bruno was the only one who stretched out on his seat and threw his arms around his father's neck. Mussolini didn't even have to look; he knew already who it was, and he let him have his way. Bruno was his favorite. In a film we made about Sardinia, we had an aerial view of Sardinia, but forgot to include Corsica. And il Duce saw this and said, 'What about Corsica? Put it in!' Another time, we went to Sicily and filmed some young people in a big living room, wrapping oranges in tissue paper. On one side of the room, one of these girls took a sheet of tissue paper by licking her finger. And il Duce said immediately, 'Cut that out—she licked her finger!' And then we made a film about hygiene . . ."

For this next project, Eugenio made a number of historical inquiries, which resulted in some astonishing discoveries about the standards of personal maintenance held by such famous personages as Queen Marie Antoinette (born 1755, beheaded 1793). "They sent us from Paris the small basin used by Marie Antoinette, no bigger than a dish—maybe a bit closer to a soup plate," Elena recalls. "They wrote us that Marie Antoinette didn't like to obey her doctor's orders—he had requested that the Queen bathe at least once a year! If that was the Queen, can you imagine her subjects?"

One of Eugenio's most important collaborators during his Istituto LUCE years was Roberto Omegna. Born in Turin on May 28, 1876, Omegna came to the Istituto with two decades of remarkable experience in cinema under his belt. He had been a cameraman and director of documentary short subjects for Ambrosio Film since 1906; he appeared onscreen to assist a Dr. Negro in a demonstration of the correct way to assist someone suffering an epileptic fit, and also showed himself to be something of an Indiana Jones adventurer by marching into a jungle, armed only with a small pistol, and bagging a leopard single-handed. A noted still photographer, he illustrated chapterbooks of the latest Ambrosio films and also unflinchingly documented many of the horrors of the 1908 earthquake in Messina, cranking his camera while panning down from a collapsed building to a pile of dead men, women and children. That same year, he applied his skilled hand to the writing of screenplays, beginning with Ambrosio's Gli ultimi giorni di Pompeii ("The Last Days of Pompeii"), directed by Luigi Maggi. (Some sources claim that he also photographed it.) It was later at Ambrosio that Omegna innovated the scientific short subject with La vita delle farfalle ("The Lives of Butterflies," 1911), remarkable for its pioneering use of microphotography.

5 Vittorio would later become the editor of Cinema magazine and producer of the Fascist-era epic film Scipione l'Africano, 1937, while the younger Bruno would become a pilot and die during a war flight in 1941.

6 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

The paths of Roberto Omegna and Eugenio Bava may have first crossed during the production of Champagne caprige (1919), one of Eugenio's first camera assignments at Ambrosio Film. The feature was scripted by Omegna, who would have taken an interest in the way his words were being filmed; it also included a scene of the heroine, Edith, tipsy on champagne and fantasizing a dozen or more tiny spirits dancing on a tabletop beside her, which gave Eugenio the opportunity to indulge his penchant for trick photography. When the two men reunited at LUCE years later, Eugenio encouraged Omegna to return to his true obsession—the world of science, particularly the worlds of smaller creatures and insects.

PROF. ROBERTO OMEGNA, whose fascination with insects inspired characters in Mario Bava's later films.

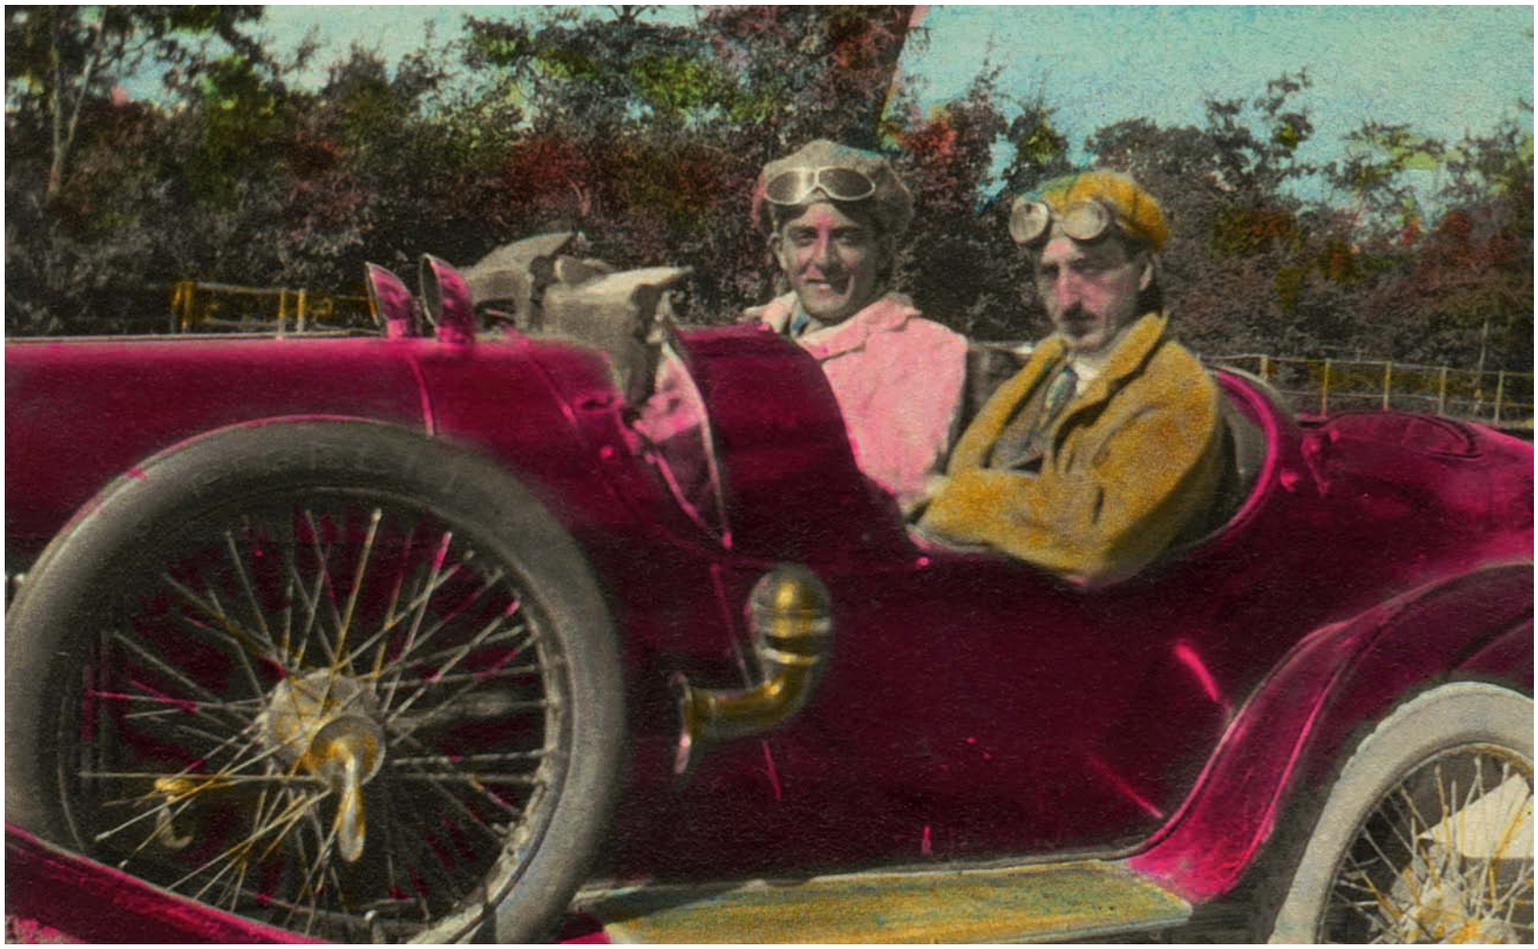
Between the years 1926 and 1948, Omegna directed more than 150 shorts for the Istituto on the themes of science, medicine and world travel. Several of these are available for internet viewing on the Archivio Luce website (www.archivioluce.com). Among these are Abitanti del mare ("Inhabitants of the Sea"), Dall'uovo alla gallina ("In the Egg of a Chicken"), La vita dei topolini bianchi ("The Lives of White Mice"), Insetti nocivi ("Harmful Insects") and Forme plantoniche ("Planktonic Forms"). Eugenio would often serve as Omegna's cameraman, and Forme plantoniche, a silent film dating from the 1920s, is particularly impressive as a pioneering yet fully achieved work of cinemicrography.



In later years, after the arrival of sound, Omegna and Bava branched out into shorts about botanical subjects, such as L'intelligenza dei fiori ("The Intelligence of Flowers," 1933), while yet other shorts about biological and general scientific subjects were co-directed by Omegna and Bava. Among these were the delightful Bolle di sapone ("Soap Bubbles," 1932-37), which demonstrates all the interesting ways soap and water can be magically manipulated by knowing hands, and L'occhio ("The Eye"). The latter, undated but produced in the mid-1930s, is an engrossing study of the components and functions of the human eye; it is of particular interest for its opening shot, in which the darting, hawkish eye of young Mario Bava —in his first known screen appearance—dissolves to the analogous lens of a still camera. (The father obviously knew his son all too well.) The collaborations of Omegna and Bava notably differ from Omegna's solo endeavors by virtue of their humor; in L'occhio, for example, we see a man admiring a woman standing on a balcony . . . popping in his monocle for a better look . . . and discovering that his Juliet is in fact a grumpy-looking man!

Elena Bava remembers Prof. Omegna in appropriately colorful terms: "He was a real magician who knew everything about the mysterious lives of insects, butterflies, ants . . . He would come in, saying in his Piedmontese accent, 'How are you? How is your work coming along?' He was interested in everything. Then he added, 'Tonight I will stay awake! The ants are hatching!' He was a dignified person with a small black beard and from the watchfob chain on his vest hung the claw of a jungle cat. He had crossed many deserts, and from these travels, he kept hundreds of photographic plates. He travelled alone, declining even the company of a native guide. 'They might get sick,' he reasoned—he didn't believe he could get sick himself! The last time he visited, he was about to leave for Turin. He told my father, 'Get ready—when I return, we will make The Life Cycle of Mice!' And then he suddenly died!"

Prof. Omegna apparently made an equally lasting impression on Mario, as well. One can readily see his influence on the short nature-based films he would soon make with Roberto Rossellini, and Mario's directorial debut with the short film L'orrecchio ("The Ear," 1946) is nothing if not a continuation of the work his father and Omegna had done on L'occhio. One can also see the imprint of Roberto Omegna in certain characters within Mario Bava's feature filmography, notably Paolo Fosatti, the entomologist played by Leopoldo Trieste in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve (1971).

Omegna died on November 19, 1948, in Turin. His contribution to cinema was promptly recognized with a fascinating 44-minute featurette, Un pioniere del cinema scientifico Roberto Omegna 1876–1948, directed by Virgilio Tosi. The first half of this film only is available for viewing on the Archivio Luce website, but it includes much invaluable footage, including a selection of scenes from Champagne caprige.

Omegna was just one of the many larger-than-life figures befriended by Eugenio Bava. Though often invisible on the dotted line, Eugenio himself was a man of formidable presence, talent and personality. He counted many of the best-known

EUGENIO BAVA sporting around with world racing champion Tazio Nuvolari.

Italian figures of his day among his closest friends. In addition to Pierre-Auguste Rodin, Gabriele D'Annunzio and Eleonora Duse, Benito Mussolini and Emperor Hirohito of Japan, one preserved family photo shows a goggled Eugenio out for a drive with Italian racing champion Tazio Nuvolari.

He also exacted a powerful influence on both his children, who inherited their father's skill for drawing, painting, sculpture and design. Elena Bava was particularly affected by her father's talent for sculpture, which after 1930 he used primarily to sculpt life-sized likenesses of the Saints. These unsigned works became his lifelong hobby, his own personal religion, his artistic refuge from bureaucracy. When these pieces were finished, he presented them as gifts to local churches, which brought his extraordinary talent to the attention of houses of worship the world over, who began to submit requests of their own. One of Eugenio's many surviving sculptures is the likeness of Sant'Andrea della Valle, which is housed in a glass coffin at St. Peter's Cathedral. It is said to be indistinguishable from an actual body lying in state.

Occasionally, Eugenio would return to the cinema in the role of sculptor and for these rare assignments, he deigned to accept screen credit under his own name. In 1948, he was credited with "special effects" in Roberto Rossellini's film La macchina ammazzacattivi ("The Machine That Killed Bad People"), a moral fable about a man (Gennaro Pisano) who—with the help of a supposed angel (Giovanni Amato)—invents a camera that petrifies evil people. The photographer sets about purifying his hometown of Amalfi, but soon realizes that Man is a complex creature in which elements of Good and Evil are entwined; this brings about the realization that the angel is in fact a demonic imp following his own agenda. Eugenio provided sculptures to match the live actors photographed in Rossellini's story, as well as additional in-camera trick shots. His own hands are seen manipulating the figures during the film's main titles sequence, which he prepared himself at the Istituto. Similar, later assignments were Giacomo Gentilomo's Sigfrido/The Dragon's Blood (1957), a color remake of Fritz Lang's Siegfried for which he supervised the screen debut of mechanical effects genius Carlo Rambaldi, and Alberto De Martino's Perseo l'invincibile/Medusa Against the Son of Hercules (1963), for which Eugenio provided a number of plaster victims for Rambaldi's rampaging, tree-like Medusa.

As the saintly sculptures stood in various stages of completion in his workshop and the corridors of Eugenio's home, they were visited by worshipful neighbors and regarded warily by his imaginative offspring. These figures had a special impact on the imagination of young Mario, who remembered once opening a drawer in his father's workshop and being shocked to discover what he believed to be a dead body. Like Eugenio's workshop, Mario's future films are inhabited by mannequins, dolls, wax heads, dead bodies—and the fear that they might somehow spring to life. (Freud once wrote that the presence of statues in dreams represents a feeling of being unloved, but in the films of Mario Bava, statues can more fairly be said to represent statues.) The cumulative effect of his early exposure to special effects and the common exposure to the Saints can be seen in the details of a prank that Mario played on his mother when he was in his early teens. One morning, he summoned his mother to his room with cries of agony. She rushed to his side in concern.

EARLY WORK AT ISTITUTO LUCE: Mario Bava (in white shirt and tie) assists the filming of a glass matte shot.

"Nino! What's wrong?"

"Mamma, it's my leg! I can't feel it! What's wrong with me?"

Emma felt under the blanket and found her son's leg to be hard and cold as stone. She recoiled, terrified. Feigning horror, Mario slowly pulled down his blanket to reveal his thigh, which slowly turned whiter and whiter, until his white leg culminated in a marble foot. It was a homemade illusion—his first—made from a bit of flour from the kitchen and a marble limb found in his father's workshop. Laughing, he pulled away the blanket and showed his mother how convincingly he had joined the false limb to his own at the knee. The family anecdote doesn't reveal whether the poor woman simply rolled her eyes at her son's mischief, or gave him the beating of his life.

"This story tells you a lot about his character," observes Roy Bava, Mario's grandson. "He was always trying to make a joke out of fear."[7]

On the other hand, Elena Bava doesn't credit her father's religious sculptures with prompting her decision to become a nun. Despite her father's devotion to his sculptures, and the meticulous research he conducted into the lives of each Saint before undertaking their likeness, Elena was already a grown woman by the time Eugenio fully consecrated his free time to this project. She insists that she did not have a religious upbringing; her only exposure to religion, as a child, was through the example of the two most important women in her life—her mother and great grandmother. She describes her Nonna Caterina (who died at the age of 82, after falling out of a tree!) as "an angel . . . very religious," and as a woman who "sacrificed everything to our Lord," but by the time Elena entered her life, she had grown too old and infirm to attend church regularly. "Only Mamma was a real churchgoer," Elena says. "She went to church, never missed the Mass on Sunday, and sometimes demanded that we follow her example, but without any result! Some years later, she told me how much she had prayed for us, seeing how adverse we were to her faith—and my eventual response was to consecrate myself to the religious life."

Today, Elena Bava is Mother Superior to the Ancelle del Sacro Cuore (Order of the Sacred Heart) in Rome.

"Mario's sister Elena is the best to reconstruct the family tree," her grandnephew Roy Bava told me in March 1993, "because she's not the kind of old woman who doesn't remember things; she remembers everything in great detail. She is very active, too; she's the kind of woman who will go from the center of Rome out into the suburbs on foot! She's 80 years old and still has black hair! She's amazing."

A decade later, she is still alive, but her memory is succumbing to age. "I recently visited her," Lamberto Bava told me in October 2002, "and she looked at me and asked, 'Why are you not dead?' So it is good that you asked for her memories when you did."

7 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

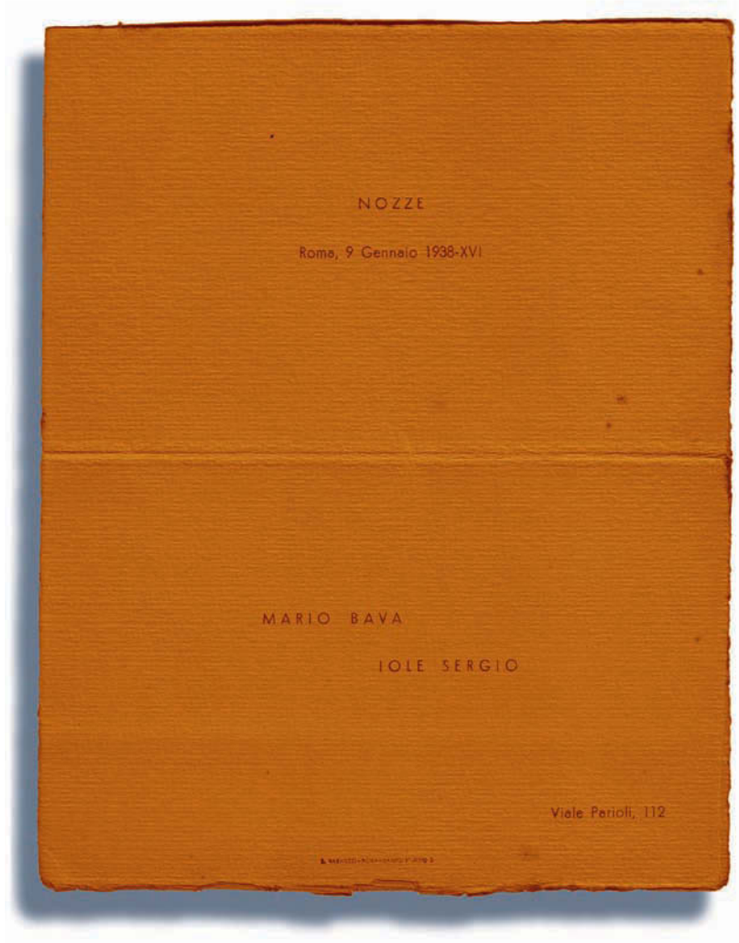
Art, Marriage, & Fatherhood

It would have been the easiest thing in the world for Nino Bava to follow in his father's footsteps at the Istituto LUCE. But like most young people, he embarked on a season of rebellion and vowed not to do this; he would be his own man. It was during this period that he announced his intention of becoming a painter. As we have seen, Nino was a very visually-oriented child; the earliest memory to stick with him was visual—the rising and falling levels of snow on the stone wall lining the road to Turin—and, as a young child, he was attracted to the bright colors of the chemical powders in his father's laboratory and delighted in arranging them, imposing an aesthetic order on them. Nino spent much of his childhood seeking his father's approval, but he also never forgot that resonating trauma of his childhood—when Eugenio slapped his face for signing an early drawing. Perhaps his choice of vocation was rooted in an instinct of rebellion, as all painters sign their work. It isn't difficult to imagine Eugenio's reaction to Nino's announcement.

Nino's best friend during his teenage years was Maceo Casadei, a painter born in Forli in 1899. Casadei was fifteen years older than Nino, but they found common ground in their love of art, and Casadei—who by 1920 had known the satisfaction of having his work widely exhibited—recognized and encouraged Nino's developing talent as a painter. The two friends often ventured out together to different locations with their easels and painted side by side. Under his friend's wing, Nino became adept at landscape painting and portraiture. But he was also too meticulous with his art, taking a week or more to put the finishing touches on his canvases, while Maceo was able to turn out three or four paintings per week. At the rate he produced decent work, Nino had to admit that painting would never earn him a decent living.

Maceo, on the other hand, would spend his entire life in art. His work was widely seen, and when he hit his stride with a series of works depicting Italian soldiers on different fronts during World War II—always rendered with tremendous pathos and feeling—his work began to be seriously exhibited, award-winning, and bought. Today, the work of Maceo Casadei hangs in the War Museum in Poland and the State Museum of Warsaw, and it is the subject of a permanent exhibition at the Palazzo Comunale, Piazza Garibaldi 1, in Cervia (Ravenna).



"Maceo was a very good painter, but he never had a great success," explains Mario's granddaughter Georgia Bava, who works as an art historian for a leading Roman auction house. "Today, he is well-known in Emilia-Romagna (his place of origin), but just as a local painter." Casadei died—in Forli, where he was born—in 1992.

IOLE SERGIO—the future wife of Mario Bava—seated in the foreground at a family gathering, circa 1930.

Having made his break with painting, Nino then (according to his sister Elena) "decided with great passion to devote himself to sculpture. He had his first big opportunity in France: to design the altar for a church in Paris. It was a serious and engaging challenge. There were many people competing for the assignment, and the job lasted nearly an entire year. My brother's work was one of the most appreciated, and it looked like he was going to do it. We were all happy to see his approaching success, because after all, it really was his first professional experience! But, after a long silence, one of the judges said, 'But this is not the one we choose!' Maybe if my brother had reacted, argued . . . but he was still too young to do that, and Lady Luck didn't help him! It was really a crushing defeat for my brother, who almost lost his health over it.

"Then bad luck struck again," Elena continues, "as Mamma told me some years later . . . In Sanremo, there was a big place completely enclosed by glass. My brother wanted it badly for his workshop, and he knew from the owners that no one else had lived there for thirty years. So my brother, who was in Florence by then, with his meager means, spent all of his money on some beautiful statues, to attract people to his shop. When he met with the owners, they apologized profusely and told him that the place had been sold. This was a terrible shock for my brother, who found himself unable to pay his debts for the foreseeable future. After a while, with the help of a photographer friend, Mario devoted himself completely to the art of cinematography." [8]

MARIO AND IOLE's wedding invitation.

The setbacks experienced by the young Mario Bava were also being felt on a national level. Once the reigning world capitol of cinema, Italy had lost considerably more than luster in the years since Cabiria. The universal language of cinema had died in 1928, when the "talkies" were introduced in America and Great Britain. Italian "talkies" spoke a more ancient, more mellifluous, but more regionally limited language; consequently, the cinema whose epic imagery had fired the imaginations of D. W. Griffith and Cecil B. DeMille was dealt a near-fatal setback. In 1930, Italy released barely a dozen films in the entire year. Never again would Italy lead the industry it had promoted from a parlor game into a world-class art.

So it was hardly a promising industry which Nino Bava entered in 1932, at the age of 18, when he joined the Istituto LUCE to assist his father in the production of animated shorts and special effects. (Unfortunately, no information could be found pertaining to Eugenio or Mario's adventures in the world of cartoon animation.) But the move had less to do with earning a living than with learning how to become a responsible adult with a viable trade.

It was required that everyone applying to work for the State had to become a card-carrying member of the Fascist Party, but knowing that his son was essentially apolitical and uncomfortable with this, Eugenio intervened. Thus, Mario managed to work at the Istituto without being issued the card that was disparagingly known among those who carried it as "the meal ticket."

"In those days," Mario later recollected, "in order to work in special effects, you had to specialize in that field; most people had to go to school for it. Today in America, they spend millions on machines to do these things, but in those days, if you spent even two cents on an effect, everyone would go crazy. I was crazy, too; I thought of myself as the last, romantic artisan of the cinema, for whom money was always the least important factor. I never got paid, but I took satisfaction in my work and all the innovations that were being made.

"I helped my father at the Istituto and, whenever he was sick, I took over the direction of his work. Of the fifty designers in his department, I chased many of them away, because they didn't know the first thing about design. I threw their work out." [9]

In 1936, at the Istituto LUCE, Nino Bava first set his eyes (they were brown, with a hint of yellow) on an attractive young woman who worked in the editorial department. Iole Sergio—who would become Mario Bava's wife and lifelong companion—was born in Rome on August 10, 1915. The circumstances of their meeting were remarkably similar to that of Alfred Hitchcock and his wife Alma Reville, who was working as a film editor for Gainsborough Productions when the young Hitchcock found employment there as an assistant director. As Hitchcock's daughter Patricia Hitchcock O'Connell has said, her father bade his time before speaking to Alma because they were not considered to be professional equals; it was only after he was promoted to screenwriter and art director that he felt it proper to address her in conversation. Nino himself was shy by nature, the kind of young man who needed a lot of encouragement from a woman just to make conversation, but his reticence was eroded by routine, and by the authority he assumed at the Istituto when his father was absent. With her light brown hair, moon face and dusky skin, Iole had an unusual beauty—almost plain, yet statuesque in its neutrality—that became much more apparent when she turned her bright blue eyes on Nino. In time, they began dating and eventually, they became engaged.

Iole preferred to call her fiance by his given name of Mario, and upon their engagement, he reclaimed it as his professional name. To be called professionally by a name other than that of his grandfather, a dead man he never met—to be called by a name other than that which his father called him—helped Mario to establish a sense of greater independence. With marital responsibilities looming ahead, Mario arranged to be transferred from the animation/effects department to the titles department, where he set to work designing main titles sequences and intermission cards.

"I went into titles because it was then a very lucrative business," he later reasoned. "All the American companies gave us the titles in English and expected us to come up with the Italian translation. When everything went according to plan, they paid you like a bank; after fifteen days, the check would arrive. Sometimes I earned as much as 10,000 lire a month, which is like 60,000 lire [$37.50] today . . . I used my father's Mitchell camera, which he had used to create special effects. It was patented in 1919, but is essentially the same one used today. My father could handcrank it, which allowed him to wind the film in reverse and make calculations without error." [10]

In addition to creating titles for films imported to the Italian market, Bava also did the reverse: creating title sequences of Italian films for export. One of the films known to carry titles designed by Mario Bava is the Carmine Gallone epic Scipione l'Africano/Scipio Africanus (1937), produced by il Duce's young son, Vittorio Mussolini. Bava admitted that his work in other languages was less than perfect: "I think Minerva Film got burned by the mistakes I made on their behalf," he said. "I did Scipione l'Africano in all the different languages they wanted, but they didn't pay me the 22,000 lire they owed me. It spoiled my honeymoon." [11]

Mario and Iole were married in a private civil ceremony at Rome's Viale Parioli on January 9, 1938. Unlike Alfred and Alma Hitchcock, whose marriage complemented an ongoing relationship in cinema (she contributed to all fifty-three of his films as either a screenwriter, editor, or trusted advisor), Mario and Iole's marriage almost immediately changed the relationship upon which it was founded.

"As soon as they got married, my grandmother stopped working at the Istituto and lost all interest in the cinema," Georgia Bava says. "Her real interests were family and cooking, things like this. She didn't care how special effects were achieved, for example. She didn't like to go out and meet people, to go to dinner parties or the theater. Once they began their family, she stayed at home."

The change would have come about anyway, because Mussolini was on the point of enacting a new law that banished all women from the workplace, and back to their "rightful" place as mothers and homemakers. The Italian workforce, in the Duce's view, had to be a male workforce: uniformed, buttoned-up, necktied, diligent. Mario dutifully supported his wife with his Istituto profits for the first year of their marriage, but for a young man bursting to express himself artistically, designing titles was unfulfilling, menial labor. Then—in late winter or early spring of 1938—Mario Bava learned that he was about to become a father.

Mario was earning enough to support a wife, but not quite enough to feed and clothe a family. He needed to find some other means—and quickly—of supplementing his income. Fortunately, new opportunities arose with the founding of Michele Scalera's new production company, Scalera Film.

"Word began to spread throughout Rome that all the great cameramen of that period—Massimo Terzano, Ubaldo Arata, Anchise Brizzi, and Mortuori—were now earning 14,000 lire [about $8.75] a month," Bava said. "So instead doing as my mother wanted, and continuing with my steady job at the Istituto LUCE, I did as my wife advised and became an assistant to Terzano. It was a step down for me to become an assistant, of course, because"—he added, with self-mocking irony—"I had been a cameraman all my life, but I reminded myself that my father also had to start at the bottom when he began." [12]

Mario didn't reveal his father's opinion of the matter, but it seems probable that Emma was speaking on her husband's behalf when she urged her son to remain at the Istituto; it offered more regimented, dependable work and higher pay. It is also interesting that Mario's new wife was already outspoken enough to oppose the wishes of his parents. Obviously, Mario felt torn, but his hand was ultimately forced by his need to prove himself apart from his father's shadow. Regardless of his expertise, he must have dealt with some level of resentment from his coworkers because he had joined the Istituto as the son of the department head. Considering that all of Scipione l'Africano's foreign releases took place in 1938 or later, Bava must have attempted to obey both of the women in his life for a while by juggling two jobs, or perhaps Eugenio kept the Istituto's back door open, so to speak, allowing his son to return to his old title design duties whenever he wasn't actively assisting his new mentor, Massimo Terzano.

Mario was more than qualified to work as Terzano's assistant. The position of camera assistant requires workers of exacting, responsible and reliable character; their duties entail loading and unloading the camera, a knowledge of lenses so they can equip the camera with what is required by specific shots, maintaining a shot list, and keeping a record of those takes which are to be printed. Mario had proved himself responsible at the Istituto, assigning and rejecting work as his father's proxy. Observant as he

IOLE AND DAUGHTER ELENA, photographed by Mario Bava in 1939.

8 I recorded Elena Bava's memories of these particular events in good faith, but upon reading her comments, members of the Bava family have suggested that she may have confused stories told to her about her father's early life as a struggling sculptor with memories of her brother's early years as a struggling artist. Mario Bava himself never spoke of wanting to be a sculptor—painting was always his metier—and, in interviews, he always noted a direct move to cinematography after abandoning his plans to become a painter. Still, these stories of Elena's are of great value to the family chronicle . . . and rather than correct her, or put words into her mouth, I have presented them as she shared them with me. But the reader should be aware that what she says here more likely pertains to Eugenio than to Mario.

9 Roy Bava.

10 Alberto Abruzzese.

11 Ibid.

12 Ibid.

MACISTE IN HELL: This US lobby card depicts a surprisingly exploitative panorama of women suffering punishments at the hands of demons. Eugenio Bava likely contributed to the film's hallucinatory imagery.

was around his father, and based on his own experience, he surely also knew how to take a camera apart and reassemble it. Cinematography was his second nature.

Working for Massimo Terzano could in no way be mistaken for "starting at the bottom," as Terzano was commonly regarded as one of the top cameramen working in Italian cinema. His fellow cameraman Carlo Nebiolo called Terzano "the most meticulous creator of images in the Italian cinema" and "the cinematographer for directors who favored stylistic cinema."[13] Both descriptions offer substantial testimony as to the character of what the young Mario Bava learned by working at his side.

Born April 23, 1892, in Turin, Massimo Terzano photographed his first film in 1915 and rose to prominence with a series of films whose visual style show an obvious influence on Mario Bava's own later work. Terzano had staked his claim on a series of opulently baroque opera films, and rose to prominence with a trio of epic fantasies starring Cabiria's own Maciste (Bartolomeo Pagano), including Maciste imperatore ("Emperor Maciste," 1924), Maciste all'inferno/Maciste in Hell (1925) and Maciste nella gabbia dei leoni ("Maciste in the Lions' Cage," 1926). Maciste in Hell—which achieved an American release in 1931 with a synchronized music and sound effects track, and glimpses of female nudity intact—featured extensive special effects credited to Segundo de Chomón, which suggests the uncredited involvement of Eugenio Bava.[14] Terzano actually co-photographed this classic—and much of his subsequent work for the next ten years—with Ubaldo Arata, for whom the cameraman named his first-born son. (Ubaldo Terzano would grow up to become a gifted cameraman in his own right, photographing all of Mario Bava's best-looking films.) Terzano and Arata were stylistic opposites; in later years, Arata would become the cinematographer most often associated with neorealism, particularly for his work on Luchino Visconti's Ossessione. The silent Italian cinema's top avatars of stylization and realism, they were cinematographically opposed, but apparently the best of friends.

CINECITTÀ, circa 1940.

It is not precisely known when Mario Bava became Terzano's assistant, but it was probably in the spring or summer of 1938, when Mario and Iole were expecting their first child—a daughter named Elena (in honor of Mario's sister), born in Rome on October 11, 1938. Among the films photographed by Terzano in 1938 were Il dottor Antonio, La principessa Tarakanova, Giuseppe Verdi, Inventiamo l'amore, and Solo per te. Mario certainly assisted Terzano on some, if not all, of these.

Mario Bava's debut as a camera assistant was also coincidental with perhaps the most significant single event in Italian film history. To bolster Italian film production, Mussolini's fascist government had initiated a number of new policies in the mid- to late-1930s, including the building of a new chain of theaters, the appointment of Luigi Freddi as Italy's first director–general of the cinema, and the planning of a vast, world-class production complex: Cinecittà (literally, a "city of the cinema"). The plan was forced to become a reality sooner than expected when, in September 1935, a calamitous fire destroyed two of Italy's major studios, Cines-Pittaluga and Via Vejo, making its completion more urgent.

Cinecittà opened for business on April 21, 1937—approximately fifteen months after the first stone was laid. Located on Via Tuscolana, near the center of Rome, the sixteen sound stages comprising Cinecittà conveniently adjoined the Istituto LUCE and Rome's famous national film school, the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica. It was an ideal arrangement: the Istituto now became the hub of all Italian feature post-production, and the students attending the Centro Sperimentale had the convenience of observing films in production right next door. The school was never at a loss for lecturing professionals, and graduate students never found it difficult to find work. A thriving success, by 1940 Cinecittà boasted approximately 1,600 employees. Part of this success, however, was the result of the 1938 Alfieri Law, which transcended Mussolini's earlier strict 10:1 ratio enforcement of Italian film bookings by banning the importation of American films altogether, and thus facilitating the resurrection of Italian cinema.

Under these circumstances, it appeared that Mario Bava might have a future in the film business, after all.

13 Alessandro Gatti, ed., I Cineoperatori: La storia della cinematografia italiana dal 1941 al 2000 Vol 2 (Rome, Italy: AIC, 2000), 81.

14 After Maciste all'inferno, de Chomón was among the cameramen who photographed Abel Gance's Napoléon (1926). His death on May 2, 1929, at age 58, brought a premature end to a stellar and influential career.

Cameraman

"Uncurtaining the night, I'd let dark glass Hang all the furniture above the grass . . ."
—Vladimir Nabokov, Pale Fire

MARIO BAVA*'s first professional photo, circa 1939.*

Proverbs and Propaganda

MARIO BAVA WORKED as a cameraman from 1939–1960, making the first half of his career in films actually longer (and more productive) than his second, better-known career as a director. One reason that Bava's directorial debut, La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday, is so impressive is that it feels like the work of a fully-grown artist, as indeed it was.

There can be no real understanding of Bava's development as a filmmaker without a knowledge of the years he spent as a director of photography; it is during this period that we witness his evolution as an artist and the emergence of a highly individual cinematographic style—a signature touch developed in the shadow of war and in response to the demands of a wide variety of film genres, at first in emulation of his heroes, and finally as self-expression. It is here—working under the auspices of such important directors as Francesco De Robertis, Mario Costa, G. W. Pabst, Steno, Mario Monicelli, Robert Z. Leonard, Pietro Francisci, Riccardo Freda and Raoul Walsh, among many others—that Bava (in his own words) "learned what a director must do, and more importantly, what he must not do." [1]

Readers primarily interested in Bava's work in the horror genre will find this portion of his story more instructive and relevant than they might expect, as some key moments from that later body of work were in fact restagings, secondary drafts, or ironic comments on scenes and effects that he had filmed earlier in his career.

Working With Rossellini

In the late 1930s, while earning his primary living as Massimo Terzano's camera assistant, Mario Bava began to see that he had traded one shadow for another. He had the utmost respect for Terzano, but he discovered that there was little room for advancement or creative expression in the new job; also, knowing what he had learned from his father after a lifetime of observation, working at the side of an accomplished cinematographer was really nothing new or as educational as it might have been for someone greener. Therefore, it was not long before Mario began to scout around for opportunities to work as a cameraman in his own right. The opportunity came when he made the acquaintance of a fledgling director, Roberto Rossellini.

Born in Rome on May 8, 1906, Rossellini was eight years Bava's senior, but cut from similar cloth. The son of a prosperous architect, Rossellini had enjoyed a comfortable upbringing in a household often visited by the artists who were his father's friends. Not only was Roberto's young imagination stimulated by such company, but he had leisure enough to encourage his daydreaming. He spent much of his youth obsessed by the films that played in a Roman theater built by his father, and his inbred familiarity with the workings of mechanical devices led him to become an inventor at an early age. (In later years, Rossellini would personally develop a number of different camera lenses and lighting devices.) He broke into films—inauspiciously—as an uncredited writer and assistant director to Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia on La fossa degli angeli ("The Pit of Angels," 1937) and, more importantly, contributed to the screenplay of Luciano Serra pilota (1938), produced by Vittorio Mussolini and the first film to go into production at Cinecittà.[2] Of course, any one of these biographical details would have provided common ground with Mario Bava, but their mutual interests were discovered through some short films that Rossellini had made in a makeshift studio in his family villa.

CANDID shot of Mario on the set of an unidentified production, late 1930s.

The first of these was the unfinished Prelude à l'apres-midi d'un faune ("Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," 1937), in which a mermaid rose from the sea, danced with a faun, and left a veil with the dazzled creature as a sentimental souvenir. The completed portions of this short turned out so badly that Rossellini abandoned it and concocted a story claiming that it had been banned on grounds of indecency by the Italian censors. More successful was Fantasia sottomarina ("Underwater Fantasy," 1938)—a 10-minute "tale of two fish in love, threatened by an octopus and saved by an eel"[3]—which was likely the foundation of his meeting with Bava, as it was released by the Istituto LUCE in April 1940. With his background in special effects and predisposition to fantasy, Bava would have been charmed by this short, which Rossellini and his cameraman Rodolfo Lombardi filmed in a series of aquariums with real (mostly dead) fish, which were animated by various ingenious means. Fantasia sottomarina proved so popular with moviegoing audiences that producer Michele Scalera contracted Rossellini to deliver sixteen more "animal" shorts just like it.

Based on the creative partnership that followed, we can assume that Bava saw the short, probably before its general release considering his associations at Istituto LUCE, and hearing about the Scalera contract, recognized the opportunity he had awaited. He met with Rossellini, introduced himself as the assistant to the great Terzano and the son of Eugenio Bava, and offered his services as a cameraman, which included a thorough working knowledge of trick photography.

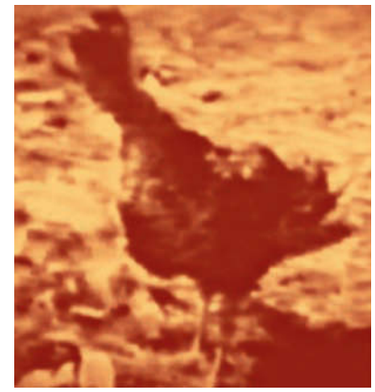
Rossellini's next short, his first collaboration with Bava, went into production under the title La perfida Albione ("The Perfidious Albion"), but was ultimately distributed by Scalera Film under the title Il tacchino prepotente ("The Arrogant Turkey," 1939). The film, which runs about 7 minutes, opens with the title and three screen credits, all spelled out in what appear to be beans, swept onto the screen with a broom. The sequence was, naturally, filmed in reverse, as they were swept off-screen—a technique that is taken for granted as a gimmick when seen today, but which at this time had only been explored in experimental cinema by surrealist filmmakers like Jean Cocteau. The first of the three credits is "Fotografia di Mario Bava," followed by a music credit for Maria Strino and Rossellini's own directorial credit; the script is uncredited, which is unusual for a film with narration. This is a barnyard parable, in which the titular fowl, a large proud turkey (representing England) struts around the henhouse, interfering with the hens (a metaphor for the nations of Europe), until its tyrannical ways are challenged and literally plucked down to size by a defiant, righteous rooster (symbolizing Italy).



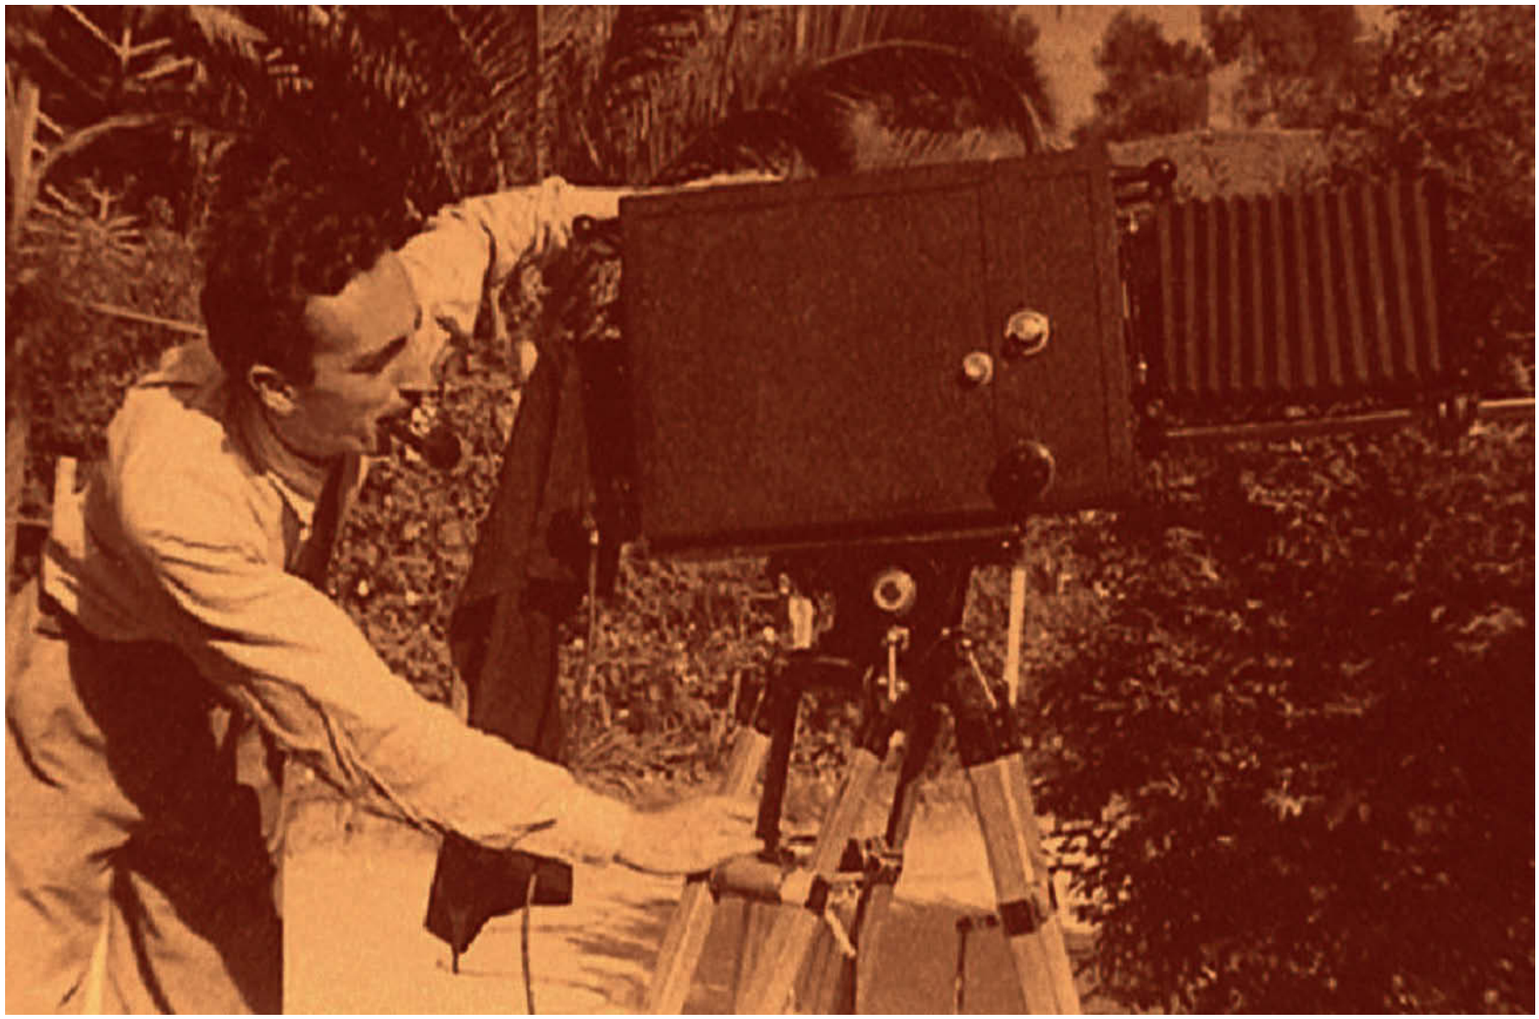
Rossellini apparently disliked this venture, which he felt overstepped its satirical intentions to fail on the side of propaganda, but it should be pointed out that this short predates George Orwell's Animal Farm (1945)—an acknowledged literary classic that also uses barnyard metaphors—by approximately five years. It also features scenes in which the narrator's voice is synchronized with the beak movements of the "actors," giving them the brief illusion of speech; in this detail, Il tacchino prepotente also predates the Oscar-winning novelty feature Bill and Coo (1947) by almost eight years. These facts alone lend it distinction.

Bava's first work as a cameraman in his own right is, for the most part, rough-edged but innovative. Filming on location at a real poultry farm, Bava took advantage of early morning shooting to photograph a mass of chickens marching in a group and casting very long shadows, lending dimension to what would otherwise have been a very flat shot. His views of the various animals, especially a family of kittens seeking refuge under the henhouse, reflect a tender but unsentimental spirit, and one is surprised by the fleeting audacity and grace of a near- 360° camera movement around the farmyard. His only technical misstep is the climactic fight between the two birds, which is photographed far too close to the action, without long-shots, reducing this key dramatic conflict to a staccato, blurry, mostly incomprehensible montage of flapping feathers. This approach was likely necessary to conceal the fact that Bava and Rossellini were creating the battle mostly by suggestion, with a minimum of interaction between the two birds.

BAVA*'s first screen credit.*

IL TACCHINO PREPOTENTE*'s arrogant turkey, representing England, before and after the Roman rooster plucks its proud feathers.*

The scene is a success in the sense that we believe what we see, but a failure in the sense that we also believe it is poorly shot.



While Rodolfo Lombardi was preoccupied with filming another fish fable, Il ruscello di Ripasottile ("The Stream of Ripasottile," 1941), Rossellini and Bava embarked on their second—and final—short together, La vispa Teresa ("The Lively Teresa," 1939), which starred an uncredited, blonde 10-year-old girl and a host of insects. Vintage Russian films were very much in vogue at the time among the audiences at Cinema Sperimentale de Cinematografica screenings and, judging from this effort, Rossellini and Bava had both been bitten by the Starevich "bug"—that is, the work of the great Polish-born, Moscovite animator Ladislas Starevich (1892–1965), who was fond of building short, urbane fantasies around the antennaed denizens of the insect world.

Adapted from a popular children's song, La vispa Teresa is the charming story of a community of insects living in an open field—black beetles, horned beetles, caterpillars, snails, ants, and butterflies—who find their day disrupted by the arrival of a young butterfly collector determined to net a new addition to her collection. The various insects rally together in the defense of a pretty butterfly she is pursuing, but there is little they can do but buzz around and climb onto her colossal shoe. Teresa eventually captures her prey, but suddenly appreciating that the field isn't as happy a place without it fluttering about, she releases it and admires its return to nature. Relieved and overjoyed, the insects raise their collective voice in song. It is easy to interpret the material as another parable of the working-class overcoming oppression, but this time, Rossellini and Bava manage to avoid the stumble into political message mongering. The film

1 Giuseppe Lippi and Lorenzo Codelli, Fant'italia (Trieste, Italy: XIV Festival Internazionale del Film di Fantascienza, 1976), 152–54.

2 Some filmographies credit Bava with contributing to the photography of this film, which is officially attributed to Ubaldo Arata. Since Arata was the best friend of Massimo Terzano, it is conceivable that Terzano filled-in for Arata, or supplemented his work in some fashion. Bava would have assisted Terzano in such an event, and could have even been loaned out to Arata.

3 Tag Gallagher, The Adventures of Roberto Rossellini—His Life and Films (New York NY: Da Capo Press, 1998), 55.

MARIO and his beloved De Brie camera, whose rear cloth allowed him to hide from onlookers.

simply is what it is, or we are tempted to accept it that way.

Somewhat longer than its predecessor at about 8 minutes, La vispa Teresa is a completely winning, enchantingly photographed short that becomes all the more remarkable when one realizes that its natural setting was largely recreated indoors at Scalera Film, and that a good deal of the action was achieved by means similar to stop-motion animation—that is, the moving of an articulated model, one frame at a time—though, in this case, some of the models were live (or dead) insects. Some of the insects—the black beetles, for example—were at times substituted onscreen by ingeniously constructed models.

An accidental eyewitness to the production was 18-year-old Federico Fellini, who remembered encountering Rossellini and Bava as they worked intently inside a "closet" at Scalera Film. "Inside a small enclosure made of nets and rope were a turtle, two mice, and three or four beetles," he recalled. "[Rossellini] was shooting one frame a day, very complex and very laborious, with great patience. He kept shooting for months."[4] Rossellini's biographer, Tag Gallagher, notes that Fellini was probably indulging his tendency to exaggerate in his last sentence, because "in fact, Roberto's attention flagged quickly." Therefore, it is possible—indeed, virtually certain—that Rossellini left most of the patient animation work to his cameraman, whose province they would have been in the first place.

For some shots requiring the camera to track the flight of the butterfly, Bava likely attached a hair-like monofilament to the insect and restricted its flight to the area in front of the camera lens—a technique demonstrated by the actor Ian Charleson in the coda sequence of Dario Argento's thriller Opera (1987). For another shot, shown only fleetingly, a winged beetle was affixed to a pane of glass and photographed in front of a rear-projected shot of moving clouds; here we sense an artist knowing exactly how long to sustain an illusion without destroying it in the eyes of the average viewer. The photo-micrographic animation is wholly successful—an astounding thing to be able to say seventy years further on—with the animation separable from the live action footage only by the presence of certain lifeforms that could not have been animated, such as ants and the sensuously undulating caterpillars and snails.

Bava's first cinematography in a controlled studio environment shows a quantum improvement over his earlier location effort. Every fascinating detail of the insects' physiognomy is underscored with light and caressing shadow: the countless hairs of the wriggling woolly worm, the luminous transparency of the snail's head, the shoe-like shine of the black beetle's armor. One senses that Bava was paying homage here to the teachings of his father's colleague, entomologist Roberto Omegna. Another impressive image is a ground-level, insects' perspective of Teresa as she towers above them, knee bent, net in hand—which must have been achieved by Bava with a deep focus lens and a deep hole in the ground. The film's credits are hand-written (in what appears to be Bava's own handwriting) in chalk on a piece of framed slate, with Bava's credit ornamented with line drawings of cameras and butterflies. The music is credited to Simone Coccia.

4 Ibid., 58.

The two Rossellini shorts were considered lost for decades until their surprise recovery in 1997. Once the elements were found, they were restored by the Compagnia di San Paolo, and now bear opening title cards crediting this organization and the Archivio Nazionale Cinematografico della Resistenza. A broadcast on RAI-3 in the late 1990s has been their only public showing since their restoration, and they remain difficult to see outside the Archivio Nazionale.

LA VISPA TERESA: The huntress and her captive. A caterpillar takes a shortcut over a snail in a delightful example of Bava's nature photography.

La vispa Teresa was based on a popular Italian children's song by Luigi Sailer (1825–85), originally titled "La Farfalletta" ("The Little Butterfly"). Here is the original text, accompanied by my own loose, rhyming translation:

La Farfalletta	The Little Butterfly
La vispa Teresa avea tra l'erbetta a volo sorpresa gentil farfalletta	The lively Teresa In the fields she did spy A lovely Little butterfly.
e tutta giuliva stringendola viva gridava a distesa: "L'ho presa! L'ho presa!"	It so dazzled her eyes That she plucked it from flight And cried up to the skies: "Mine! This beautiful sight!"
A lei supplicando l'afflitta gridò: "Vivendo, volando, che male ti fo'?	The thing started crying And to her it boo-hooed: "By just living and flying, What wrong did I do you?
"Tu sì mi fai male stringendome l'ale. Deh, lasciami: anch'io son figlia di Dio."	"You turned my wings blue When you pinched them so hard. Don't you know that I, too, Was created by God?"
Confusa, pentita, Teresa arrossì: dischiuse le dita e quella fuggì.	Its words so impressed her That her hand opened wide; Then the butterfly blessed her And returned to the sky.

Old Fantasy & New Realism

Bava's solo work for Roberto Rossellini was undertaken as part of a game plan, to gain independent experience and to rack up some solo camera credits rather than for any kind of meaningful remuneration. According to a (grievously incomplete) handwritten list of his credits, which he drafted in the mid-1970s, Mario was permitted to co-photograph his next feature assignment with Massimo Terzano, 1939's Il socio invisibile ("The Invisible Partner"), directed by Roberto Roberti—the father of Sergio Leone—and starring Clara Calamai (Osessione).

His next job with Terzano was Ecco la felicità! ("See the Happiness!")—the Italian-language version of La comedie du Bonheur ("The Comedy of Happiness"), which was directed by Marcel L'Herbier simultaneously with a French version. (The cinematography of the French version is credited to both Terzano—who is second-billed—and Maurice Desfassiaux, who lensed René Clair's silent fantasy Paris qui dort/The Crazy Ray, in 1924.) It isn't known to what extent Desfassiaux actually worked on the picture, or took advantage of Terzano's lighting, but the Italian version was released first, in December 1940, while the French release was delayed until 1942.

In the volatile early months of the new decade, Bava assisted Terzano on a film directed by Corrado D'Errico: La compagna della teppa ("The Company of Thieves"). Born in Rome in 1902, D'Errico is a fascinating case; he worked as an assistant director and screenwriter on silent pictures, and in 1934—one year before he began his directorial career—he published an early Italian science fiction novel, Chiaro di luna. Between 1935 and 1941, he would direct nearly a dozen dramatic pictures, including several costume dramas. Tragically, he died in September 1941—not yet 40 years of age—only six months after the release of La compagna della teppa.

It's a 19th century story about a gang of art thieves working out of an opera house, is comparable to the future collaborations of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger. Above all, it is a lavishly appointed costume picture, but it is also a picaresque romp in which imaginary characters encounter real historical personages—including the celebrated composer Gioacchino Rossini, who is visiting the theater in question to conduct a special performance of one of his operas—and in which the highest achievements of civilization are shown in stark contrast to Man's meanest and most selfish aspirations. Witty and dryly comic, the film is evidence of a unique and dazzling talent that the Italian cinema and never quite managed to replace.

So talented and prolific was D'Errico that two of his films—Capitan Tempesta ("Captain Tempest.") and its sequel, Il leone di Damasco ("The Lion of Damascus")—were released posthumously, in January and March 1942. Like La compagnia della teppa, Capitan Tempesta was photographed by Massimo Terzano with Bava serving as camera operator, co-credited with Sergio Pesche. According to a statement included in the credits, two versions of the film were shot at the same time, one in Italian and the other in Spanish. The same is likely true of its sequel, which was shot at Scalera Film immediately afterwards.

Based on a novel by Emilio Salgani, Capitan Tempesta is a pulpy, historic adventure akin to The Scarlet Pimpernel. The action is set in the year 1570, when Famacosta was under attack by the Turks and had to be defended by Venetian resistance fighters. The title character is the mysterious, caped, and helmeted figure who leads the resistance; in one of the film's most surprising moments, Capitan Tempesta is revealed to be a "bella donna," Leonora Bragadini (Carla Candiani)—the daughter of the Venetian general, Marc Antonio Bragadini. She is in love with the heroic soldier Marcello Corner (Adriano Rimoldi), and beloved of the crafty and ambitious villain Nijinski (Carlo Duse), who arranges to frame Marcello as a traitor by delivering him into the hands of the beautiful and corrupt Damascan princess Haradia (Doris Duranti), and drugged to believe that the Princess is Leonora. Nijinski also arranges for Leonora to visit the palace incognito, and she arrives just in time to see Marcello in Haradia's lustful embrace. (This is a truly remarkable shot, with the kiss in foreground, softening in focus as Leonora peers through a fabulously Byzantine drape, with a lantern whistling whorls of smoke off to one side.) After learning the truth of the matter from Haradia's handmaiden Suleika (Dina Sassoli), who pities Marcello, Capitan Tempesta tries to rescue her lover but is caught herself and chained with him to a rock in a chamber slowly filling with water. The couple are rescued at the last minute by Leonora's burly servant and the heroic Mulai el Kader (Carlo Ninchi), who forms a romantic attachment to Suleika.

More than any other example of Massimo Terzano's cinematography I have seen, Capitan Tempesta points the way to Mario Bava's future identity as an artist and filmmaker. It is an excellent example of the kind of heroic costume picture that bridges the classic mythological pictures of the silent era and the "sword and sandal" movement that Bava would spearhead in the 1950s. It is a purple pageant of larger-than-life characters, sword-crossing adventure, exotic and occasionally macabre atmosphere (Nijinski is shown procuring Marcello's drug from a wizard in a fabulous laboratory equipped with contemporary lab equipment, bubbling bottles, and a human skull), and the influence of American chapterplays. Terzano's camerawork is sophisticated, stylish, and audacious; an early in-studio exterior of the Damascan palace is an extended, two-level crane shot that begins atop the palace, then drops down to document the various movements of layer-upon-layer of passersby, which take the camera on a 180° tour of the immense set and literally dozens of extras. It is in space-defining, extended prowling camera movements such as this where we see one of Terzano's most important influences on Bava's future style, not only in his baroque approaches to lighting, but in the way he choreographed his camera movements to increase the verisimilitude of a film's settings. We can see this influence in the 360° shot in Il tacchino prepotente, and also in the 360° turn inside the crypt of the Vajda family, one of the most celebrated shots in Bava's directorial debut, La maschera del demonio. The women—Leonora, Haradia and Suleika—are all photographed like divinities, with the close-up that introduces the veiled face of the Princess qualifying as a stunner. It is easy to see in Capitan Tempesta the seeds of such future films as Riccardo Freda's directorial debut Don Cesare di Bazan, which followed later in 1942, and such key costume adventures of the 1950s as Freda's Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio/Theodora, Slave Empress (1954), and Pietro Francisci's Orlando e i paladini di Francia/Roland the Mighty (1956), both of which benefitted from Bava's creative participation.

SILHOUETTED view of Massimo Terzano's camera unit (Bava possibly among them) on an unidentified late-1930s production.

Remarkably, Bava's hand can be seen—even at this early stage of his career—branching out into the provision of some surprising trick shots. The establishing shots of Venice, for example, are entirely composed of stock footage, postcard photos pasted on glass, and one remarkable shot of a Venetian cathedral seemingly viewed from a window—which is actually a photo of the structure cut out in the shape of a window and placed against a black background. Bava was also likely responsible for the miniature shots of the Spanish armada, shown sailing across a sparkling sea, against a cloudy cycloramic sky.

Splendid examples of film as flights of fancy, La compagna della teppa and Capitan Tempesta can be seen in retrospect as the end of an era in Italian cinema. As Italy inched nearer to war, there would be no room in Mussolini's cinema for such bourgeois escapism.

MARIO measures the distance between his camera and an unidentified actress.

On June 10—although prior involvements in the Spanish Civil War and the occupation of Albania had indicated Italy's inadequacy as a military power—Benito Mussolini responded to his fears of losing a piece of the continental pie by formally declaring war against the Allies, and siding with the man he privately derided as "quite mad . . . a silly little clown": Adolf Hitler. The declaration of war was tantamount to an empty boast; unknown to Hitler's Germany and to the Italian public at large, there was no real Italian defense budget. Mussolini's "armies" were making due with rifles minted in 1891 and artillery dating back to World War I; their "three armored divisions" existed only on paper, and the military vehicles exhibited in Fascist rallies were in fact police property. Consequently, when Germany insisted that Italy lose some of its own blood in their joint battles, Mussolini's soldiers were marched into confrontations where their deaths were fundamentally guaranteed. Meanwhile, the pugnacious stylings of il Duce's Maciste-inspired public image remained jut-jawed and unbowed.

At the Istituto LUCE, Eugenio Bava was ordered to get cracking on a series of documentaries to bolster the national confidence. Part of this effort was the filming of counterfeit victories for the Axis powers to appear in weekly newsreels. Mario Bava and Rino Filipini were two of the cameramen who worked with Eugenio on the filming of faked land battles and aerial attacks, notably the bombing of Malta.

"In Rome, we were as ingenious as they were on the front," Mario later boasted. "My father and I faked that bombing; we invented it at Cinecittà with strips of photos. In other words, the LUCE newsreel was a hoax—a special effect that we created!" [5]

As Mussolini's Fascism swelled to delusional epic proportions in response to the desperation of the times, the very ways in which Italian people behaved and interacted was reinvented. Historian Tag Gallagher paints the following portrait of their day-to-day reality: "Listening to foreign broadcasts was banned and the squadristi were revived to hunt down transgressors; Jews were banned and driven off the streets; women were banned from professions and told to stay home; handshakes were banned and replaced with the Fascist salute; Lei, the word everyone used for 'you,' was banned and replaced with the more egalitarian voi; the old way of marching was banned and replaced with the German goose-step; even Saturdays were banned and replaced with 'Fascist Saturdays,' when every male was expected to be in a stadium or in a parade ground; 'Giovinezza' was played at the slightest pretext at sports and movies, and woe to anyone who declined to stand up and join in!" [6] This aggressive system of enforced national pride served to delude the Italian public, to provide them with a 3-dimensional fantasy of patriotic enthusiasm that denied the greater reality that Fascism wasn't working, that the national economy was crumbling, and that their showy war in Ethiopia was a disaster exacting a terrible human cost. At heart, the Italians knew differently—they saw that half their incomes were being spent on food—but it was somehow easier, and more reassuring, to believe in Mussolini's lies.

5 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

6 Gallagher, 61–62.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Martinati. Mario's first important special effects sequence sells the documentary.

Mario Bava's wartime duties—which, incidentally, included no actual military service—also occasionally extended to photographing Mussolini's speeches and rallies at the Mussolini Forum. None of this documentary footage is credited, but a portion of the archive of film that exists on il Duce is undoubtedly his work. Being one of the few privileged insiders to see the actual schism between the proud, posturing public figure Mussolini projected, and the insecure man in need of constant reassurance that he was behind closed doors, the young cameraman came to understand that illusion also had its place in avenues well outside the cinema.

Uomini sul fondo

First released: February 13, 1941
B&W, 1.66:1, 99 minutes

Production: Scalera Film.
UK: S.O.S. Submarine, 1952.

MARIO aboard the submarine where UOMINI SUL FONDO was filmed.

It was during this intensive period of patriotic work that apolitical Mario Bava received an unexpected call from Giuseppe "Peppino" Caracciolo. A Neapolitan cameraman active since 1918, Caracciolo had fallen ill during the production of Uomini sul fondo ("Men in the Deep"), a propaganda film for the Centro Cinematografico del Ministero della Marina—the filmmaking division of the Italian Navy—and needed someone to substitute for him as director of photography. Mario's big break had finally come.

The director of the film was Francesco De Robertis (1902–59), a former journalist who had ascended to the executive seat of the CCDMDM. De Robertis was a formidable man; he was not only a Commander of the Italian Navy, but had earned his stripes as a "hyphenate" filmmaker by writing, producing, directing and editing the documentary short Mine in vista ("Mines in Sight," 1940), beating Orson Welles to this distinction one year before Citizen Kane (1941). At the time, De Robertis' achievement was certainly respected, but his diversity of achievement was barely noticed. As Bava pointed out, "These were the years before specialization."[7]

The reason why Bava was chosen to step in, rather than Caracciolo's own camera operator, is interesting to ponder. Certainly, Mario was well-known to everyone in the industry because of his duties at the Istituto LUCE; it is equally possible that he was recommended to Caracciolo by Terzano, or perhaps by Roberto Rossellini, who was working on the production as an assistant director. He may also have been approached because he, alone among the working cameramen in Italy, was known to have the special ancillary talents that the production required.

Bava recalled the story of his hiring: "Peppino Caracciolo, the cameraman, rang up and ordered me to meet with De Robertis, who was in Le Spezia making Uomini sul fondo. He sent me because I was young and inexperienced. In time, I met with the 'Commandante' . . . We hit it off and I remember having dinner with him aboard the Albatross, the submarine he commanded. The sea was rough, so I stayed close to the escape hatch, in case we capsized."[8]

It's typical of Bava to paint himself as a hapless fool and accentuate his nervousness in this recollection, but a photograph taken of him aboard the Albatross shows a young technician very much in self-control. At 26 years of age—the age at which his father photographed Quo vadis?—Bava wore a trim mustache that complemented the angles of his dark brows and eyes, framing a frank and discerning gaze. Despite the close and claustrophobic quarters, Bava went to work each day wearing a jacket and necktie, a formality that was compulsory at the time.

Uomini sul fondo is the story of the A103, a submarine that grazes a cargo ship during war maneuvers and sinks, trapping its crew on the ocean floor. As gas seeps into the foremost compartment, the ship's Commandant orders it sealed; he releases a buoy equipped with a direct-line telephone and sends a raft to the surface, allowing his men to exit one-by-one in a special retrievable, airtight cylinder capable of elevating them to the raft. After two men (and the ship's mascot, a German Shepherd) accept this option, the remaining seven crewmen determine to remain aboard ship with their Commandant, for better or worse. A Naval ship, the Titano, discovers the crewmen on the raft and organizes a rescue, sending a bathysphere below to determine the extent of the damage, followed by another diver who volunteers to test an experimental diving suit designed to withstand the pressure of extreme depths. This diver must use a special underwater torch to clear wreckage from a valve that will accept the hook-up necessary to fill the A103 with enough gas to raise it, but clearing the wreckage is not enough—the valve is jammed. Fortunately, one of the crew hears the insistent banging of the diver against the hull of the ship, and dons a gas mask to enter the sealed compartment. There, he succeeds in opening the valve from the inside. His heroism results in his own death, but his sacrifice is rewarded by the rescue of his shipmates.

7 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

8 Ibid.

UOMINI SUL FONDO*'s submersible rescue chamber is met on the surface by a motorized rescue raft.*

Uomini sul fondo is a film of historic significance, because it appears to be a documentary but is actually a work of drama. Therefore, it could be argued that it was the first Italian feature to represent the style of filmmaking that would soon become known as neorealisme, or neorealism.[9] It also had the distinction of being the first movie ever filmed aboard an actual submarine; there were no actors in the cast, which was entirely composed of Italian Navy seamen; and no attempt was made to glamorize the cast or the situation, at least not in the accepted terms of movie glamor. And yet Uomini sul fondo is not a documentary, because it is clearly a scripted story, played for suspense, in which the exterior views of the rescue mission had to be cleverly faked. Of course, cinema audiences of the day were unsophisticated, and many accepted the film at face value as a document of actual heroism; for some reason, it is a reputation that the film continues to carry after the passing of sixty years, perhaps because it is more often discussed than actually seen.

Uomini sul fondo was a groundbreaking combination of documentary and drama—in essence, a feature-length counterpart to the faked propaganda newsreels which Eugenio and Mario Bava forged at the Istituto LUCE; on reflection, this may also have been one of the motivating factors behind Caracciolo's procurement of Bava's services. It has the coarse, unpolished complexion of fact, and yet—for anyone who takes a moment to look—it is quite openly fiction, told in part with the humble wizardry of Bava's special effects.

The film was so original in conception that De Robertis had a difficult time persuading the necessary support systems that such a thing was possible. "It was only after months and months of opposition, struggle, skepticism, and every kind of obstacle that the film got underway," he later mused. "No one believed real sailors could be substituted for actors. No one could believe that a Naval officer could—just like that—turn himself into a story writer, a scenarist, a director, and everything else. I'm referring to the Film Bureau, the various production houses, all the movie people involved . . . It was a real battle. Even after the shooting began, it didn't end. It went on all through production, in the form of the most amicable and respectful lack of confidence, on and on right up to the first private screening, which was for the film crew. Finally, I received the first and most expressive sign of faith when Monaco, the chief electrician, shook my hand firmly and said, his voice breaking with emotion, 'Commandante, I was really worried!'"[10]

The fact that Bava was first summoned to replace Caracciolo due to illness suggests that he was not recruited initially to lend his special effects expertise to the filming, yet it is impossible to imagine what Uomini sul fondo might have been without special effects photography. It is possible that Bava, after proving himself as Caracciolo's replacement, made it quietly known to his director that there were ways in which to depict the actual rescue mission from outside the submarine. Since these effects would have been filmed at the Istituto LUCE, which was also government-funded, it is possible that Bava had the wherewithal to present De Robertis with some test footage to help sell this suggestion.

Judging by the look of these seabottom exteriors, a miniature submarine was built and manually maneuvered inside an aquarium filled with actual, cloudy sea water. Considering the sweaty, unpolished look of the dramatic footage, Bava cleverly filmed these trick shots as murkily as they would have appeared had they been actually filmed on location. The miniature sub was equipped with radio-controlled opening/closing compartments that released scale models of the buoy, the raft and the passenger cylinder, and tiny counterparts were also prepared of the bathysphere and two versions of the experimental deep-diving suit. It says a lot about the success of these scenes that they were chosen to represent the film on the theatrical release poster, and that audiences and critics still remember Uomini sul fondo primarily as a documentary.

In addition to staging and filming the exterior underwater rescue, Bava also shot some special effects inserts that occur inside the submarine—notably, the climactic shot of the dead hero's hand (a doll-sized recreation!) as it splashes, clenched and lifeless, into the bubbling, gassy waters on the floor of the damaged compartment. This somewhat expressionistically staged shot qualifies as a signature touch, anticipating images in Bava's later work, notably the shot of Theseus' hand sinking below the lava in Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World (1961). The backgrounds of the main titles—a silhouette cut-out of a battleship matted over a moving backdrop of airbrushed clouds, and a painted stack of undulating waves dappled with light reflected off a small pool of rippled water—also look very much like Bava's work, and would have been made on his father's watch at LUCE.

As with all productions of the Centro Cinematografico del Ministero della Marina, Uomini sul fondo was considered a patriotic effort and issued 9 Bava's future editor, Mario Serandrei, is credited with coining the word "neorealisme" in response to Luchino Visconti's Ossessione (1943), an unauthorized filming of James M. Cain's novel The Postman Always Rings Twice. The idea of a "new realism" relates to the harsh "truths" being shown in such films, which had so long been repressed or disavowed during the false realism Italy had endured under Mussolini's rule. Neorealism is often mistaken as a reference to the realism of these films—a misnomer since, while these films may be gritty due to the crude circumstances of production, they are also usually stylized.

10 Gallagher, 67.

without screen credits. Some published accounts acknowledge "Fotografia di Giuseppe Caracciolo e Mario Bava," making it Bava's first credit as a fully-fledged cameraman on a feature film. Other filmographies list him as one of several cameramen who worked on the production, including Caracciolo, Angelo Baistrocchi, Carlo Bellero and Mirko Bisogni. The participation of these other cameramen is possibly explained by the hectic montages of the rescue mobilization, which encompasses more angles of battleships and seaplanes rising to the occasion than any single photographer could have amassed single-handedly.

Had Bava been credited onscreen, Uomini sul fondo would certainly have signalled the start of an auspicious career. As it happened, his contribution went unnoted and unnoticed when the film premiered on February 28, 1941, and so he continued to earn his living by assisting Terzano, and by doing odd jobs at the Istituto LUCE.

Due to wartime embargoes, Uomini sul fondo would not be shown in English-speaking markets until 1952, when it received a British release under the title S.O.S. Submarine.

La corona di ferro

First released: October 20, 1941
B&W, 1.66:1, 97 minutes

Production: ENIC (Ente Nazionale Industrie Cinematografiche), Lux Film. Distributor: Lux Film. France: La Couronne de Fer, 1/13/43. Portugal: Corôa de Ferro, 3/27/44. Spain: La Corona de Hierro, 10/5/42. US: The Iron Crown, Superfilm Distribution Corporation, Minerva Films, Classic Pictures.

Though released in early 1941, Uomini sul fondo was actually produced in the latter months of 1940. This leaves Mario Bava's professional itinerary for 1941 completely unaccounted for. By an interesting coincidence, it was in 1941 that the vast resources of Italian cinema were pooled at the behest of Benito Mussolini into the production of an extraordinary epic film that represents one of the high watermarks of Italian film production, as well as the rebirth of Italian fantasy: Alessandro Blasetti's La corona di ferro/The Iron Crown.

MASSIMO GIROTTI and Elisa Cegani as Arminio and Elsa in LA CORONA DI FERRO.

Produced entirely at Cinecittà, next door to the Istituto LUCE, La corona di ferro is (among other things) an eye-popping showcase for trick shots and special effects photography, all of which are uncredited. Given their proximity to the production, despite the lack of any concrete proof of their participation, it is extremely doubtful that Mussolini would have entrusted the film's extensive effects work to anyone other than Bava, father and son.

Filmed at immense cost, La corona di ferro was an anomaly at the time of its release. There had never been much of a fantastic element in Italian cinema; indeed, prior to this moment in history, Italian fantasy seems to have been limited to heroic fantasy, while darker examples such as Eugenio Testa's Il mostro di Frankenstein (1920) and Guido Brignone's Maciste all'Inferno/Maciste in Hell (1925) were much rarer. With the adoption of the Alfieri Law in 1938, Mussolini decided which films from the outside world were acceptable in Italy, and horror movies and escapist fantasies were, most emphatically, not permitted. The films which were allowed to play in Italian theaters were those which he felt would result in a stronger, more courageous and unified country. Though La corona di ferro features a Tarzan-like hero, a Cyclopian archer, an oracle with the ability to transform herself into a deer and other fantastic elements, all presented with a flair and flamboyance worthy of Powell and Pressburger, it also functions as a Mussolinian fable, which is the aspect that allowed it to be made.

An ancient tome tells the story of King Sedemondo (Gino Cervi, bravely modelling his performance on the public persona of il Duce), who took his crown from the head of his own dead brother, assassinated at Sedemondo's command after leading his nation's army into victorious battle. The Queen of the defeated King is released, later giving birth to a daughter named Tundra, who will figure later in the story. Returning home in "victory" and looking forward to seeing his own newborn child, Sedemondo and his troops cross paths in the woods with the escort of the Iron Crown, a treasure which is being taken to the Pope as a gift from the Emperor of Byzantium. A spinning woman (Rina Morelli) who lives in a forest cottage explains the unique power of the Crown, which is to seek out where Evil exists and remain until Goodness has been restored. The spinner speaks elliptically to Sedemondo of an evil woodcutter who once murdered his good brother in order to possess his goods, saying that the murdered man's family regained their lost property when the son and daughter of the two brothers fell in love and married. Sedemondo explains that he would be smarter than the woodcutter and would avoid that possibility by raising the two children as brother and sister, making their future love forbidden. Feeling superstitious, Sedemondo takes forceful possession of the crown and has it carried far outside his kingdom, to ensure that his evil deed remains undiscovered. Carried by the mighty cyclops Farkas (Umberto Silvestri), the crown resists being carried away by growing heavier and heavier, until Farkas drops it and watches as it sinks irretrievably through solid rock, beneath the earth's surface. When Sedomondo returns home, the widowed Queen and Sedemondo's wife, informed of his dark deed, have switched their infants in the cradle, fooling him into accepting his brother's son Arminio—the rightful heir to the throne—as his own child, while his newborn daughter Elsa is raised in the castle as a "false" sibling.

Some years later, King Sedemondo learns the truth and moves to slay Arminio, but Elsa intervenes—both children are marked on the upper arm by a single stroke of his angry lash. At his order, Arminio is carried into the wood by Farkas and dropped into an inescapable valley of lions, while Elsa is sequestered behind three gates, ensuring that she will never fall in love until he finds the right man for her. Princess Elsa (Elisa Cegani) languishes there for twenty years, until the King announces a tournament, open to the royals of other countries, with marriage to his daughter as the prize. Meanwhile, Arminio (Massimo Girotti)—raised to robust manhood by a pride of lions—is freed from the enclosed valley by an avalanche, triggered by the spinner woman while in the guise of a passing deer. Arminio helps to liberate a group of the conquered people enslaved by Sedemondo since their defeat many years before. They are led by the rightful Queen, Tundra (Luisa Ferida), disguised as a man. Tundra is attracted to Arminio and persuades him to represent her people at the coming tournament.

FOREGROUNDED models and mushrooms—a form of illusion common in Bava's work—lend verisimilitude to the spinning woman's home in the woods.

Many kings and princes from other lands come to Sedemondo's kingdom to participate in the tournament and vie for his daughter's hand. Arminio makes his way to the castle, given a sense of mission by a dream in which Princess Elsa pleaded with him to free her. He tells the story to all who will listen, and Elsa overhears it herself while posing as one of her own handmaidens. She warms to this stranger, and he to her, beseeching the "handmaiden" to arrange a meeting between himself and the Princess. That night, in a garden where it is too dark to see her face clearly, Arminio asks the Princess to let him compete in the tournament, but only as a representative of Tundra's people. He does not wish to marry the Princess, as he has already lost his heart to her "handmaiden."

At the tournament, Sedemondo—besieged by second thoughts about his daughter's fate—withdraws her hand as prize, announcing that the victor will now receive riches and property. The competitors object, even when he pathetically offers his entire kingdom as a substitute; thus, Elsa is compelled to remain in bondage. Numerous princes lose their lives in arena-staged combat until only Prince Aliberto (Osvaldo Valenti) remains. He is bested by Arminio, who, unlike Aliberto, is able to survive in a lion pit. When Arminio is introduced to Princess in the light of day, he recognizes his beloved; she asks if he will marry her—and he promises to tell her later, in her private garden. Tundra, intent on killing Elsa, eavesdrops on their meeting and overhears the Princess' unexpected wish to make peace with her people, to restore their freedom. Tundra drops her knife in shock and, conflicted, runs into the woods. Meanwhile, Sedemondo advises his daughter to ensure Arminio's love by turning him against Tundra.

THE PALM FRONDS visible in the background of this unidentified shot, suggest Mario may be preparing to film the radio-controlled exterior shots of Elsa's private garden.

THE DEATH of Elsa brings a stop to the conflict between Sedemondo and Tundra on this incredible interior set built at Cinecittà.

Tundra goes to the Princess' garden to retrieve the knife. Arminio discovers her and misjudges her intentions. She responds to his violent anger by setting fire to a tree near the Princess' rooms—her signal for her troops to invade. As the fire rages, the two women meet and Elsa recommends that Tundra meet and stop her troops at the Valley of Natursa, where the cyclopean Farka stands armed to assassinate any intruder. After Tundra's departure, Elsa and Arminio discover the necessary clue to recognize each other as siblings, and Elsa, horrified by the trap she has set for Tundra, races to the Valley of Natursa in time to receive the arrow meant for her rival. She accepts her fate as just punishment and apologizes as Tundra's army arrives, coincidentally with that of King Sedemondo. As the two armies face one another, a deep chasm opens between them that swallows Elsa's fallen body. Wracked with grief, Sedemondo orders his men to surrender their weapons to the chasm as well, at which point the sunken ground opens to reveal the Iron Crown, its job now done. Arminio and Tundra are married and crowned as the new rulers of the kingdom.

Though it clearly belongs on any short list of great Italian films, La corona di ferro has been historically ill-served by its ties to the Mussolini era, and blind eyes are turned to it in most English-language studies of epic filmmaking. Resplendently photographed by Mario Craveri and Vaclav Vich, who between them forged a perfect fusion of Eisensteinian formalism and the freewheeling exuberance and romanticism of the MGM Tarzan pictures, the film is also a triumph of production design (Virgilio Marchi) and confectionery wardrobe (Gino Sensani), which somehow transcend the monochrome cinematography to glitter like gold. Many of the picture's key production personnel were reteamed the following year on another costume picture: Don Cesare di Bazan (1942), the directorial debut of Riccardo Freda, who would become Mario Bava's most important mentor. La corona di ferro was also among the earliest films to be edited by Mario Serandrei, who would become Italy's premier Maestro of the editing table and supervise the creative cutting of most of Mario Bava's best films of the 1960s.

The film's myriad special effects shots include precisely the kind of illusions at which Eugenio and Mario Bava excelled: the live effect of the Iron Crown sinking into solid rock (which could pass for an excised scene from Bava's Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World); the combination of glass mattes and actual palm fronds in the Princess' gardens (which resemble the overgrown villa seen in the final reel of Lisa and the Devil); miniatures like the high angle shot of Sedemondo's bayside kingdom with its model ships in the harbor; the cloudscape visible through the marble columned windows of Elsa's bedchamber; the radio-controlled miniatures of the three gates shielding Elsa's domain from the outside world, as well as other mechanical gadgets like the working robot scorpion (the symbol of Sedemondo's kingdom) presented to Princess Elsa by Prince Eriberto—who himself looks very much like a model for Bava's later villain, Javutich, played by Arturo Dominici in La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday.

A further argument in favor of Mario's involvement in La corona di ferro is that it would have provided him a perfect opportunity to make the acquaintance of the film's production supervisor, Luigi "Leo" Menardi. This would be a most fortuitous meeting because, in the coming year, Menardi would hire Mario to photograph a directorial project of his own, thus finally awarding him the professional title he had worked so hard to achieve.

La nave bianca

First released: September 14, 1942
B&W, 1.66:1, 77 minutes

Production: Scalera Film, Centro Cinematografico del Ministero della Marina. France: Le Navire Blanc, 1943.

Pleased with Bava's extraordinary efforts on Uomini sul fondo, Francesco De Robertis and Giuseppe Caracciolo hired him again on their next production—La nave bianca ("The White Ship")—this time, as Caracciolo's camera operator. The story goes that the film was conceived as a Naval documentary set aboard a hospital ship; however, in the midst of shooting, Roberto Rossellini (still working as De Robertis' assistant) persuaded "the Commandant" that the picture might be more effective if, once again, dramatic scenes were integrated. Initially hesitant, De Robertis gradually warmed to the idea. And so it was that La nave bianca mutated into yet another early example of docudrama.

That is how the story as it is commonly accepted goes—and it is one of the reasons, along with Roma città aperta, why Rossellini is commonly regarded as the father of neorealism—but it does not take into account what De Robertis had already achieved with Uomini sul fondo. Certainly, Rossellini would later direct the films that are most often cited as the starting points of neorealism—Roma città aperta/Open City (1945) and Paisà/Paisan (1946)—but these works were built on a foundation learned by Rossellini during his tenure with Francesco De Robertis.

"In my opinion," Bava insisted, "De Robertis was the true father of neorealism. Rossellini stole everything from him. De Robertis was a great man, and . . . he was friendly with Rossellini, and let him reshoot some things, and eventually allowed him to take full credit for the picture." [11]

Watching La nave bianca, it's obvious that Rossellini's input amounted to much more than simply "reshooting some things." If De Robertis was truly the documentarian and Rossellini the dramatist, the end result is about 80/20 in Rossellini's favor. More importantly, Rossellini's inspired reinvention of the material resulted in a potent new dimension in what Mussolini had defined as Fascism's "strongest weapon"—namely, motion pictures. By combining propaganda with human drama, Rossellini had discovered a means of intensifying a film's message, of administering it under the skin of a rapt audience.

Bava's presence is immediately felt as La nave bianca opens with two trick shots. The film begins with the camera staring down the barrel of a battleship's cannon, which then pivots slightly while rising proudly to reveal other cannon on either side. A very dramatic opening, but the cannons were in fact radio-controlled scale models, placed in the foreground of a back projection plate of the ship's midsection. Photographed with a wide-angle lens to present an illusion of grand scale, the models were perfectly detailed but small enough to allow the camera to capture the entire width of the barrel while also retaining a focus sharp enough to read the inscriptions around its circumference. This is followed by a view from the side of the battleship, which is actually a motion background plate of passing ships with a foregrounded photographic glass matte of three cannons; that is, photographs of three cannons arranged on a sheet of glass and placed between the background plate and the camera. What gives this shot away is the sharp edges of the cannons—not soft-edged as they would appear in reality—and the fact that the lighting on their shafts does not move or change as the ship executes a slow turn.

In expanding La nave bianca from a documentary about a hospital ship into a dramatic narrative, it was decided to open the story aboard a Navy battleship and focus on its young crewmen. The goal of introducing the cast of characters is done promptly and effectively with an interior shot of a half-dozen crewmen passing the time. Some are writing letters to their sweethearts, some are playing games, and they are all doing a lot of talking—but there is another crewman sitting apart from the others, reading, pegging him as the "sensitive" sailor. All of this is impressively conveyed in a single 180° shot—operated by Bava—that finds the young cameraman once again indulging his liking for revelling in the dimension of a set, to communicate a greater sense of its realism.

An effective study of military camaraderie, the movie develops a sense of separation between the quiet crewman, Augusto Basso, and the others, as personified by the talkative ringmaster of the bunch, Morero. But when their ship is under attack, the two sides ally themselves visually when Morero and Basso encounter one another in a smoky corridor; Morero pauses in the midst of emergency to good-naturedly show the horseshoe that he keeps in his pocket for good luck; Basso replies by smiling and patting the medallion he wears around his neck. (The shape of the pendant is halved, not unlike a yin without a yang.)

The point—that these outwardly different men are the same underneath, and on the same team—is further driven home when an explosion knocks Basso unconscious and separates him from his medallion. When he is discovered—droplets of his blood striking the hand of another crewman below decks—it is Morero who spearheads his rescue and the retrieval of his charm. Most of the ship's men are wounded (some of them more gruesomely than any American war film of the period would have permitted) and transported to the hospital ship Arno, where they are tended by a flock of Sisters of Mercy from the Croce Rossa. (At this point, Renzo Rossellini's score—the only credited contribution to the picture—of staunch, militant readiness turns decidedly syrupy.) The angelic nurse who tends to the comatose Basso, Elena Fondi, is eventually revealed, as he regains consciousness, to be wearing a medallion complementary to his own. In her civilian life, Elena was a schoolteacher who corresponded with Basso and sent him the medallion for luck as he went to war. It was to help them recognize one another at a planned meeting, an appointment which the Navy prevented Basso from keeping.

The symbolism is obvious—Elena being the face that "launched a thousand ships"—but it must be noted that this crocerossina is the first of many Elenas to surface in Bava's work, as in his life. It is here, in the depiction of her character, that the camera operator's influence can be felt. Her face is so splendidly, sculpturally lit at all times, that she becomes worthy of Marlowe's mighty line. Her close-ups, all madonna lighting and angel faces, can be determined as Bava's contribution by comparing the film's visual approach with De Robertis' next film, Alfa tau! (1942), which is for the most part lacking in glamor and grace of movement, and also commits numerous sloppy, technical errors—"crossing the line" during conversations (i.e., photographing two actors supposedly facing each other from the same angle), shots that don't cut together fluidly, even out-of-focus shots. [12] Clearly, Bava's great contribution to the look of La nave bianca was sensuality—not a carnal sensuality, of course, but an assured fluidity of movement, an inviting use of shadow, and a spiritualized way of depicting the heroine. The film's human aspect is so accentuated that it almost becomes depoliticized.

The extent to which La nave bianca is, or isn't, Fascist propaganda has been a subject of debate for decades among cinéastes, but the truth—for this writer, anyway—falls somewhere between the two extremes. Apart from the apparent influence of Leni Riefenstahl in some shots (which is consistent in all of Caracciolo's photography I've seen), the film implies visually that it is for home, and for faces like Elena's, that the Navy is fighting—not for country or political ideals. Nevertheless, when La nave bianca was presented at the Mostra di Venezia in 1941, it was awarded the Coppa del Partito Nazionale Fascista ("Cup of the National Fascist Party") in recognition of its outstanding value as Fascist propaganda.

MEMBERS of the Italian Navy play themselves in LA NAVE BIANCA, a pioneering work of neorealism.

Bava's experience of forging military victories at Istituto LUCE had given him an encyclopedic knowledge of their available library of stock footage, which also served him and his feature assignments in good stead. This may seem at first an editor's contribution, but Bava's remarkable ability to select and manipulate unrelated footage to the benefit of various projects became part of his reputation. It was a talent he would be called to use time and again throughout his career, from assignments as disparate as La morte viene dallo spazio/The Day the Sky Exploded (1958) to Moses the Lawgiver (1975). Thus, his participation can also be felt in La nave bianca's extensive uses of stock footage to involve its cast in moments of war. One particularly clever sequence details an attack on the ship by a biplane sea bomber, which Bava introduces by cutting away from the response to a call for "All Hands on Deck" to a model aircraft, swooping low on an invisible wire. This is followed by an apparent camera truca shot of the model plane flying across the sky in the top half of the frame, which is matched to the horizon line of the sea, as filmed on the bottom of the frame. At this point, the model is replaced with stock footage of an actual aerial attack (the unmatching film stock turns noticeably grainier), intercut with the battleship's retaliation and close shots of cast members to further sell the illusion, with the plane's fate finally suggested—without an actual shot of anything crashing into the water—by the salty plume of an anonymous explosion at sea.

In Bava's hands, neorealism was just another illusion.

SANT'ELENA, PICCOLA ISOLA: Elsa De Giorgi and Ruggero Ruggeri are featured in this atmospheric shot of an early, seemingly lost Bava work.

Sant'Elena, piccola isola

First released: February 12, 1943
B&W, 1.66:1, 82 minutes
Production: Era Film, Scalera Film.

L'avventura di Annabella

First released: March 31, 1943
B&W, 1.66:1, 85 minutes
Production: ACI (Alleanza Cinematografica Italiana).

After working on the epic La corona di ferro, Luigi "Leo" Menardi's next project was the romantic comedy L'avventura di Annabella ("The Adventure of Annabella"), filmed in late 1942 at Titanus Studios. [13] The story of two young working-class lovers—Annabella (Fiorella Dolfi) and Roberto (Maurizio D'Ancora)—who have been told by their parents that they must pretend to be wealthy in order to attract a mate, it was written by Menardi in collaboration with Luigi Giacosi, Paolo Moffa, and Stefano Vanzina (later known as "Steno"). The supporting cast included a newcomer named Anna Magnani, who would achieve stardom only two years later in Rossellini's Roma città aperta/Open City. Behind the camera was Mario Bava, who—according to all previously published references—was acting as sole director of photography on a feature film for the very first time.

Films are not always released in the order in which they were made, so it may well have been his first . . . but Bava was also the sole director of photography on another feature released to theaters six weeks prior to L'avventura di Annabella: Sant'Elena, piccola isola ("St. Helen, Tiny Island"), co-directed by Renato Simoni and Umberto Scarpelli. Not mentioned at all in many Bava filmographies, and mistaken by others as a short or documentary film, Sant'Elena, piccola isola was in fact a dramatic film starring Elsa De Giorgi and Ruggero Ruggeri, and the surviving still photos reveal a production rich in the visual stylings Bava had learned at the side of Massimo Terzano. The film itself has not been available for viewing, and it is my own suspicion that it was indeed Bava's first film as a director of photography. The name Elena, which already had a special significance for Mario as the name of his beloved sister and only daughter, would resonate throughout his life and filmography as the name of various characters, most importantly the alter ego of Lisa Reiner (Elke Sommer) in Lisa and the Devil (1973). It makes sense that the name would also signify his first feature as a cameraman in his own right, and the dates of release support this intuition.

As for L'avventura di Annabella, it fared better with audiences than with critics of the day. In the April 25 issue of Vittorio Mussolini's magazine Cinema, reviewer Giuseppe De Santis complained that "Mechanical plot twists too often resolve the [story's] situations, usually to predictable ends. Additionally, the film often veers from a tone of realism to the histrionic, to the grotesque, to the parodistic without any sense of psychological continuity. It's all very arbitrary . . . A woman seated beside me was perspiring, she was laughing so hard. They tell me that public opinion is more important than that of the critics—so there you have it!"

Sadly, after decades of effort, I was unable to see or review either of these early Bava works. Judging from the comments of De Santis, however, it sounds like Annabella's visual style was reflective of the young couple's honesty and pretensions, while perhaps overstating the latter to a point that occasionally teetered on the fantastic. In this regard, it sounds like the film offered a logical point of progression—for Bava—from the docudramas of Francesco De Robertis, while also providing for Italian audiences a much-needed, comedic escape hatch from their darkening days of economic distress and their fears about the coming war.

Bava would later reunite with Steno on several projects, but there would be no more movies for him and Leo Menardi, who directed only one other picture: La moglie in castigo ("The Punished Wife," released 1944). Menardi's death is not recorded in any film references, but his complete disappearance from the later Italian cinema suggests he may have died during the war.

11 Abruzzese.

12 In his Alberto Abruzzese, La città del cinema interview, Bava mentions in passing that he participated to some extent in the filming of Alfa tau!, adding that "half of it was later reshot in Rome" by the credited cameraman, Giuseppe Caracciolo.

13 "Titanus Studios" is actually a vague epithet; this information doesn't necessarily tell one where a film was shot. L'avventura di Annabella may have been shot at Titanus' original studio in Farnesia, or it may have been shot at Appia Studios, built by Cines in 1935 and badly damaged in a major fire later that same year, after which Titanus bought and rebuilt it. In the 1950s and 1960s, the name "Titanus Appia Studios" sometimes appeared on films, but some of these—including such important Bava-related titles as I vampiri and La maschera del demonio—were actually shot at Scalera Film near Tuscany, which Titanus later came to own. Although Titanus got the credit, Scalera Film was in fact the birthplace of the Italian horror film.

Triumph and Apocalypse

THOUGH ITALY had officially entered World War II in 1940, it was not until 1943 that Italian lives first felt the elemental impact of World War II on their home turf. "When the blackouts started," Bava said, "it was made a law that all automobile fenders must be painted white, but 90% of the people pasted strips of paper on them instead. Everybody was convinced that the war would be over in fifteen days, maybe less. Instead, we were struck by famine, so everyone hurried to Rome like horses to oats." [1]

Between the fall of Mussolini in July 1943 and the Allies' liberation of Rome from German occupation on June 25, 1944, Cinecittà was bombed, looted, and all but destroyed. Useless for film production, the ruins of Mussolini's Cinema City were adopted as a makeshift shelter for hundreds of Italians and other refugees left homeless by the war. Having finally launched his career as a cameraman, and with two features to his credit, Mario Bava's career stopped cold as the Eternal City assumed the look and smell of a tomb. He photographed no features in 1944 and 1945, but little was being produced in Italy in the wake of the Occupation. In 1942, the Italian cinema's most robust year to date, 127 films had been made and released—followed by 72 in 1943, 17 in 1944, and only 4 in 1945. Most of the active film community fled Rome in the latter months of the war, only to return after the peace treaty had been signed with the Allies.

Mario himself spent the war years working in the Annona, a municipal service that ventured out across enemy lines to find and bring back food for starving Italian families. Lamberto Bava explains: "My father had to go in a truck with other people—carabinieri, soldiers discharged from the Army—to the North, near the lines still under Nazi occupation, to buy food for the people of Rome. Anything that could be found: potatoes, tomatoes, apples. He had to pass through the enemy lines, risking his life, but at least he could bring home something to eat." Mario found this important, though dangerous, position with the help of a man named Lamberto, who subsequently became the namesake and godfather of his only son.

Lamberto Bava was born on April 3, 1944—some time after the Allies' successful invasion of Sicily in June 1943, yet still before the Liberation, when the impact of the war on the Mediterranean was at its height. As with Mario, whose middle name was not legal, Lamberto's middle name was considered to be "Francesco Giuseppe," after his two grandfathers, but these patronymics were not formally entered on his birth certificate. The boy resembled his mother Iole as much as his sister Elena (now 6) had taken after Mario. The birth of a son is obviously a key event in the life of any man, and happening when it did, this latest addition to his family surely steeled Mario's determination to do whatever needed to be done to provide for his family.

Mario did not drive the Annona truck himself—he didn't get a driver's license of his own until 1951, at the age of 37—but he risked his life daily by thwarting the Fascisti. He once threw himself out of the truck during an air raid, which left him with a scar on his chin that he carried for the rest of his life. Mario's grandson Roy was told that Mario carried on his person, at all times during this period, a small photograph of himself with Mussolini, taken at the Istituto LUCE; it saved his life more than once. "If the Fascist guards stopped his truck and gave him trouble, he would show them this old picture. They would be so impressed, they let him pass!"

In the peace treaty Italy had signed with the Allies, there lurked a "no-quota" clause that effectively ended Mussolini's embargo against films from outside countries. Within a year, Italian screens were dominated once again by a welcome flood of films from America, England, and France. American films alone soon claimed roughly 80% of Italian boxoffice profits, while Italian films became the victim of a national embargo of conscience; they reflected national betrayals and agonies too recent, too deeply rooted, to be overlooked. It was the beginning of a long-standing Italian bias against its own cinema, which is central to many aspects of the story this book will tell.

In April 1945, Benito Mussolini was captured with his mistress Claretta Petacci by Communist partisans, who shot them both to death and strung them up by their heels from the girder of a bomb-gutted building in Milan. The masses soon assembled in curiosity . . . looking on in horror . . . and then vented their pent-up hatred against the Duce's unresisting body: men kicking his head until it caved-in with a sickening crunch, women hiking their skirts to insult his battered face with urine. Two days later, Adolf Hitler committed suicide with his paramour Eva Braun.

MARIO astride his much-envied wartime bicycle.

That night, Mario Bava must have held his infant son close to his chest as he ruminated on what had happened, translating the gossip about the profanation of the Duce's corpse into hideous images, filing them away with the other memories never to be spoken about, and wondering on behalf of his young children if the horror would ever end. He may have also taken the occasion to destroy the photograph that linked him to Mussolini and his corrupt, fallen empire.

In later years, when the director Sergio Leone was asked why so many of his Westerns dealt with people living in towns on the edge of extinction, he responded, "I'm a Roman—all I have to do is look around me." The films of Mario Bava carry similar scars, left by the memory of the apocalypse Rome had suffered in the last years of the second World War. Though none of Bava's films as director are set during the war years, the majority share a prevalent obsession with the collapse of great empires, usually as a result of decadence from within, and caution those who survive these armageddons to never be too confident that such nightmares could never happen again. The Vajdas of La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday, the Menliffs of La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, even the fashion empire presided over by the Countess Christiana Cuomo in Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace or the bayside property of Countess Frederica in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve are indicative of houses or holdings of the nobility that become soiled and corrupted by greed, murder, and the thirst for power. In the midst of nightmare, as in Lisa and the Devil, there is always a deep and palpable longing for earlier times when its protagonists were younger and when times were uncomplicated and blissfully naïve. Even when the horrors of the past have been laid to rest, as in Baron Blood, we are shown that we run the risk of reactivating them if we do not regard them with the proper sobriety.

As a child, Benito Mussolini is reported to have said, "One day, I shall make the whole world tremble!" One need not look too deeply to find essentially the same promise emblazoned on the family crest of the Du Grand family in I vampiri, and sworn by Princess Asa in the moments prior to her public execution in La maschera del demonio.

Rebuilding the Italian Cinema

At the time of the American Occupation, Rome was a city of ruins both ancient and recent. Italy had been freed from war, but only after it had been wasted by it; her once-magisterial, world-class cinema was now all but extinct. Then gradually, working cameras once again found their ways into the hands of Italian filmmakers.

"My first job after the war, just after the allies arrived in Rome, was a documentary about the Christian Church," Bava remembered. "The director was a fellow named Gemmiti from the Istituto LUCE. We were walking around on the cornice of a building, twenty-five meters high—for the simple reason that we were starving. We were trying to keep our balance with our cameras in our hands. When I moved to the right I was fine but, moving to the left, I felt dizzy. Today, I'd surely fall. We even slept there, because we had no way of getting around Rome." [2]

The man Bava mentions was almost certainly Arturo Gemmiti, whose only recorded film work of the decade was not a documentary, but a neorealist feature entitled Montecassino nel cerchio di fuoco ("Montecassino in the Ring of Fire"), made immediately after the Occupation and distributed by Scalera Film in 1946. The film was set in the Abbey of Montecassino, founded by St. Benedict in 529 A.D., which had a history of being repeatedly destroyed and miraculously rebuilt—first in 577 (when it was brought down by the Longobards of Zotone, the Duke of Beneventum), then in 833 (when it was raided and burned by the Saracens), again in 1339 when a devastating earthquake levelled all but a few walls, and lastly on February 15, 1944, when the monastery—which provided shelter for hundreds of civilians, knowing it to be an inviolable safety zone—found itself poised between two warring armies, who destroyed it once again. It was not yet rebuilt at the time Gemmiti's film was made, but the Italian Government financed its complete restoration by 1954. Montecassino nel cerchio di fuoco was a neorealist treatment of the human dynamics within the Abbey on the night it was destroyed by Rome's enemies and allies. Future director Pietro Germi played a small role in the picture. Mario Bava is not one of the three cameramen credited with the production (Piero Portalupi, Vittorio Della Valle and Angelo Jannarelli) nor was he credited with its special effects, which were attributed to one R. Battistelli. Nevertheless, this production was Bava's first film project following the Occupation.

Immediately after the war, Mario found work as a photographer in the occupation camp of the American soldiers, in the area of the Foro Mussolini. "He specialized in photographing black soldiers," Lamberto Bava reveals. "It happened just by chance. He had to print hundreds of pictures a day, right after taking them, with wretched equipment, so they came out however they came out. There was one photo of two black soldiers that came out so underexposed he almost didn't want to give it to them, but the soldiers were very happy with it and recommended him to their friends. They all came because the underexposure made them look lighter-skinned, almost white. Mario immediately understood and began to intentionally make them look lighter-skinned. Those were different times."

Mario's own postwar memories paint a poignant vista of survival in a crippled landscape: "I was actually considered to be a gentleman because I managed to fix up a bicycle meant for an 8-year-old child. I used it to take my wife (who sat on the handlebars) to the hospital to visit her father. Everyone said I was fortunate to have such a means of transportation—like I was driving around in a Rolls-Royce! When I worked as a photographer at the Foro Mussolini, the Americans invited me to join them at their mess hall. When I saw all of their white bread and marmalade, I could think only of all the children in my neighborhood who were starving to death. So I stuffed my camera case with marmalade and sugar and peddled back to my home in Porta Latina on my toy bicycle." [3]

Characteristically, Bava's account makes no mention of the risk

YOUNG Lamberto Bava visits a park with sister Elena, circa 1947.

1 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

2 Ibid.

3 Ibid. Porta Latina is a southern Roman neighborhood, named for the ancient, twin-towered portal heralding the entrance to the vicinity, on a road that connects, further on, to the famous Via Appia.

he was taking in doing this. "Anyone who worked for the US Army could eat as much as they wanted, but they couldn't take anything offbase without running the risk of being fired," Lamberto explains. "But my mother, my sister and I—the newborn—were starving! So my father began to take home cans of film, which could not be opened because it could not be exposed to the light—and they were full of butter and marmalade."[4]

In the wake of the Occupation, it was commonly agreed that the only way for the Italian cinema to continue to exist was to co-exist with American features in the form of supportive short subjects and documentaries. Accordingly, a new law was passed which offered a 3% rebate on boxoffice takings to any filmmaker whose documentaries found backing from a commercial production house. These documentaries, like most, were inexpensively made celebrations of Italian music, painting, sculpture, architecture, and surviving landscape—things representative of an Italy predating Fascism; they were reminders that Italy had produced countless fragile treasures which had survived not just this most recent war, but centuries of instability, because they were made by a strong and resilient people.

Mario's first credited work after the war were short films of this kind: Donne belle nella pittura italiana ("Beautiful Women in Italian Painting") and Paolo Veronese, pittore della gioia e del fatto ("Paolo Veronese, Painter of Joy and Truth"), both directed by Raffaele Saitto and released in 1946. Bava and Saitto would collaborate once again, on Il mito di Giorgione ("The Georgian Myth") in 1947, but by that time, Bava had begun to direct short films in his own right.

L'orecchio

In the wake of wartime, every Italian with a motion picture camera was photographing rubble, the drama of people reassembling their lives and homes, and the surviving treasures of Italy's museums. Mario Bava, on the other hand, was turning his attentions inside.

Mario understood that the best way to ensure his survival in the rocky business of picture-making was to offer something that others could not, so he undertook a project that exploited the knowledge of science and cartoon animation he had learned at his father's side. The result was a somewhat legendary, home-made short entitled L'orecchio ("The Ear," 1946), which attracted a great deal of attention and admiration from those fortunate enough to see it. Whereas the other shorts being encouraged by the new law were generally travelogues or other static examples of the documentary form, Bava took advantage of all the skills at his disposal, wedding stock documentary footage of orchestra performances and everyday street sounds with original animation, to magically illustrate the process biomechanics of hearing. Of this remarkable debut, Riccardo Freda enthused (in his Foreword to this book) that "with very little means at his disposal, Bava managed to create special effects wholly comparable to those seen twenty years later in the film Fantastic Voyage." Unfortunately, L'orecchio—Mario Bava's first directorial effort—no longer exists.

LA FAMIGLIA BAVA: Elena, Lamberto, Iole, and Mario—enjoying a rare opportunity for outdoor play, circa 1948.

"I made them entirely by myself," Bava recalled about L'orecchio and his documentaries. "I was the director, the cameraman, even the best boy. I made my cuts directly onto the negative, to save myself the cost of work prints. Those documentaries helped me to stay ahead of the game for a year or two."[5]

Mario supplemented his painstaking work on this one-man project by accepting every other offer that came his way—anything and everything, as long as it was respectable, as long as it paid. For the moment, it was a matter of survival; in the years to come, even when Italy was revelling in the most prosperous years of its cinema's history, Bava would maintain this breathless pace as a kind of superstitious compulsion, eventually driving himself to the point of nervous exhaustion.

"My father worked very hard in the world of cinema, perhaps up to twelve hours a day, including Saturdays," Lamberto Bava confirms. "On Sundays, when I was really little (I can't remember how old), my father used to go and have a rest and I would go to rest with him. And this man, who must have been extremely tired, held me in his arms as he slept—and I remember the smell of cigarettes, which for a child is the smell of a man, and I can remember the smell of his tobacco and the shade in the room because the blinds were drawn."[6] Formerly a pipe smoker, Mario now smoked cigarettes exclusively—Lucky Strike or Chesterfields during the period of which Lamberto is speaking. (In later life, he switched to Marlboro.) Throughout his adult life, he smoked an average of two packs per day, a habit that Lamberto holds accountable for his father's early death.

Il barbiere di Siviglia

First released: April 6, 1946
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes

Production: Tespi Film. Distributor: Regionale. US: The Barber of Seville, Excelsior Pictures Corporation, 5/5/47 (in Italian with English narration).

Mario's first postwar feature assignment came from his mentor Massimo Terzano, who asked him to work again as his operatore—a backward step for someone who had graduated to camerawork in his own right, perhaps, but welcome income nevertheless. Mario assisted Terzano in filming Gioacchino Rossini's opera Il barbiere di Siviglia ("The Barber of Seville"), the second feature directed by another pioneer of the Italian documentary: Mario Costa.

Several Italian sources cite Il barbiere di Siviglia as a film that Terzano co-photographed with Bava, which may be true, but the film's main titles credit only Terzano as cameraman, with Bava mentioned further down the list as "operatore." Perhaps, unofficially, Terzano extended the olive branch of equality to his assistant by allowing him to shoot certain scenes independently, or perhaps Bava was compelled to take over in the event of Terzano's failing health. By and large, Il barbiere di Siviglia is photographed in a fairly straightforward, stagebound fashion in the manner of silent films, with minimal lighting effects and camera movement. However, there are a few shots that seem to belong to another emerging personality: a cutaway from Conte d'Almaviva (Ferruccio Tagliavini) strumming his guitar, which shows the gigantic shadow he is casting on a wall already occluded with the shadows of hanging vines; the closing shot of a scene in Rosina's (Nelly Corradi's) bedroom, as the camera pulls back to reveal a network of shadows on the backside of her vanity table; and so forth. These images stand out starkly from the shots surrounding them. If they are indeed Bava's contribution, they would show him already preoccupied with using his camera to move away from people, toward the study of atmospheres and psychological projections.

Il barbiere di Siviglia was later released in America as The Barber of Seville, with its original Italian soundtrack augmented by English narration. This commentary was scripted and read by Deems Taylor, best-known for his narration of another musical feature, Walt Disney's animated classic Fantasia (1940).

Il barbiere di Siviglia was Mario Bava's last official collaboration with his cinematographic mentor. (It would be fully consistent with Bava's character to continue to assist Terzano on an uncredited basis, as long as his schedule permitted.) With or without Bava, Massimo Terzano would direct the photography of only two more features—Gianni Franciolini's Notte di tempesta ("Stormy Night," 1946) and Giorgio Bianchi's Cronaca nera ("Black Chronicle," 1947) before his death on October 18, 1947, at the age of 55.

LAMBERTO on an outing with his paternal grandmother Emma, circa 1949.

4 Ibid.

5 Ibid.

6 Lamberto Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

L'elisir d'amore

First released: February 8, 1947
B&W, 1.66:1, 85 minutes

Production: Prora Film.
Distributor: Zeus Film.
US: This Wine of Love. Superfilm Distributing Corporation, 4/48.

OFFICER Tito Gobbi vies for the hand of Nelly Corradi in L'ELISIR D'AMORE.

Immediately following Il barbiere di Siviglia, Mario Costa chose Mario Bava to photograph his next film, L'elisir d'amore. It was the second Italian film to be made of this popular opera by Gaetano Donizetti in a six year period, the previous example being Amleto Palmeri's 1941 version for Elios/Fono Roma/Lux Film. L'elisir d'amore is the story of Nemorino (Gino Siminberghi), a penniless young man in love with the beautiful Adina (Nelly Corradi), who has eyes only for the handsome young officer, Sgt. Belcore (Tito Gobbi). Nemorino uses the little money he has to buy a love potion from the flamboyant huckster Dulcamara (Italo Tajo), whose vest is festooned with medals, and who travels with a turbanned black dwarf with a miniature parasol. When the magic mixture—nothing more than some covertly poured Vin du Bordeaux—doesn't work, the shyster insists that lovesick Nemorino needs to buy more to bring about the minimal result. To afford more potions, Nemorino joins the army, but then receives an unexpected inheritance—which attracts many young women. When Adina notices Nemorino's newfound popularity, and that he rejects it to serenade her on his last night as a civilian, she realizes that she loves him after all. As the local townsfolk witness this turnabout, they figure that Dulcamara's potions are responsible, and he can't keep up with the demand.

Reteaming the popular Corradi and Gobbi from Il barbiere di Siviglia, L'elisir d'amore is most historically important for featuring the first true supporting role of Gina Lollobrigida—whose screen persona would be cultivated, in the years ahead, by Bava's attentive and appreciative lighting. Bava would photograph seven of the actress' early films, and all of her most important Italian ones. This great star was born Luigina Lollobrigida on July 4, 1927, at Subiaco, near Rome. In 1946, young Luigina was approached on the street by a man who asked if she was interested in working as a film extra. Her interest at the time was in becoming an opera singer, and reasoning that the money she earned might help her to pay for singing lessons, she accepted. And so she appeared briefly onscreen in a party scene in Riccardo Freda's period swashbuckler, Aquila nera/The Black Eagle (1946).

One year later, Mario Costa also happened to pass her on the street and expressed the ever-popular suggestion of putting her in the movies. This time, Gina sought the approval of her parents, and Costa won their confidence. For her appearance as one of Adina's chorus of bonneted girlfriends in L'elisir d'amore, Gina was to be paid 15,000 lire [$9.00]—which eventually rose to 40,000 [$25.00] given overtime—and used the money to buy a coat and umbrella. Using the name Gina Loris, she found follow-up work as a model in fotoromanzi,[7] and entered that summer's Miss Rome competition, where she was voted the first runner-up. She subsequently entered the Miss Italia contest, held a short time later in Stesa, where Gina came in third—after the victor Lucia Bosé, and first runner-up Gianna Maria Canale. All three women would have distinguished careers in the cinema as a result of this competition, but none would go so far as she whom the press christened "La Lollo." Though she is only a face in the chorus in L'elisir d'amore, it is impossible to take one's eyes off of Lollobrigida when she is onscreen. Either Costa or Bava took note of this uncanny quality, because she is one of the few background players who rates her own cutaway close-up during one of Nelly Corradi's numbers.

GINA LOLLOBRIGIDA: A supporting cast member with a bright future.

Bava served as his own camera operator on L'elisir d'amore, and took advantage of this opportunity to reinvent the Italian cinema's traditional approach to filming opera—which had always been static and stagebound, with everything captured in medium shot. Bava reminded Costa that they weren't just filming an opera; they were making a movie. It may be difficult to appreciate on these grounds today, but when L'elisir d'amore was first released, it represented a magnificent technical liberation for filmed opera. Bava's camera isn't terribly mobile, but he and art director Aldo Calvo took great pains to lend dimension—or a sense of dimension—to the camera set-ups, filming scenes through hanging vines, through false window frames, through foregrounded onlookers framing the singers. Bava also dabbled in extending the dimensions of his available settings by suggesting offscreen environments with light and shadow. Obtaining scrap foliage and branches from a local florist, he hung these in the path of his brute light to paint the walls of sets as though sunlight was filtering into rooms through an imaginary arbor. For the sequence of Nemorino's melancholy serenade, the scene is introduced with a lovely shot of a full moon reflected in a studio pool, which pans right—past ripples and reflected trees—until it reaches the inverted reflection of our dejected hero. This is the first of many such "reveals" in Bava's work, introducing a character into a scene by catching their reflection in a pool of water, spilled wine, or even blood. The film also begins and ends with a long-shot of the town square, in which Bava completed Calvo's studio sets with a glass matte of roofs, chimneys, and treetops.

MARIO takes a light reading of opera great Tito Gobbi during the filming of L'ELISIR D'AMORE.

Although he approached the work at hand with vigorous innovation, Bava personally found the process of filming opera to be very taxing. The music on-set, obviously, was nonstop; the soundtrack was recorded in advance and played back (and back and back!) while the actors struggled to synchronize their lip movements not only to the completed score, but also to the meticulously choreographed movements of Bava's camera.

"I went home every night with a throbbing head," Bava groaned. "I sang to myself so much that my children learned all of 'L'elisir d'amore' from me!" [8]

When the film was released in Rome, its camera innovations were recognized by the critics—though as usual, the director was given credit for them. The critic for Intermezzo wrote: "Of the various films that faithfully reproduce the great operas on the screen, this one seems to us the best of them all, because its director was careful to observe the unique requirements of cinematographic presentation, which are quite different to those of presenting something on the stage. And the photography is splendid . . . so let us conclude by affirming that, of its kind, this painstaking work of Mario Costa merits every consideration and many tributes." [9]

L'elisir d'amore was sufficiently well received to win the most unusual accolade of distribution in the United States, where it was released as This Wine of Love in the spring of 1948. Evidently, something went wrong in the translation, as suggested by the film's reception by reviewer Thomas M. Pryor in the pages of The New York Times: "It hardly seems likely . . . that This Wine of Love will prove to be popular with moviegoers who have no special interest in opera, for there is nothing about the film to command attention other than the music." [10]

7 The plural form of "fotoromanza," these were a specialized "women's" type of fumetti (singular: fumetto); that is, a kind of comic book, illustrated with sequential photographs rather than artwork. The word fumetti means "smokes" and it was coined for this medium of storytelling because the Italians likened the word balloons used to convey dialogue to puffs of smoke.

8 Abruzzese.

9 Intermezzo, August 14–16, 1947.

10 The New York Times, April 19, 1948.

Bava's work on Il barbiere di Siviglia and L'elisir d'amore would have accounted for only one-third of his year, at most. The rest of the time was spent looking for work, creating work for himself in the form of new short subjects, and in photographing documentary shorts for others.

Mario's most frequent filmmaking companion during this period was a 40-year-old documentarian named Pietro Francisci (1906–75), who had been active as a feature film director since 1934's romantic dramas Rapsodia in Roma ("Rhapsody in Rome") and La mia vita sei tu ("My Life with You"). Beginning in the latter months of 1946, Bava photographed four short films for Francisci, all released in 1947: Cristo a Gerusalemme ("Christ in Jerusalem"), Musica nel cielo ("Celestial Music"), Passaggio del mar ("Sea Crossing"), and Le resurrezione ("The Resurrection"). The first and last were studies of Christian images in Italian paintings, and the second contrasted Angels in paintings with choral music. Passaggio del mar, on the other hand, is the likeliest setting for an anecdote Bava liked to tell about the risks he was sometimes obliged to take as a documentary cameraman. To film the landing of a sea plane, Bava and his camera (in a special waterproof rig) were strapped to the plane's ski leg as it was flown high into the air for a landing on the Tiber. It was a brave thing to do, but Bava made a joke of his daring, laughing that so much water had sprayed over him from the skis that he nearly drowned.

DIRECTOR Pietro Francisci, one of Bava's most important professional allies of the late 1940s and 1950s.

Bava worked well with Francisci, and when the director made his return to feature films the following year, Bava followed. It was the beginning of one of his career's most important alliances.

Natale al campo 119

First released: December 22, 1947
B&W, 1.66:1, 85 minutes

Production: Excelsa Film. Distributor: Minerva Film. France: Noël au Camp 119, 10/14/48, 83m. US: Escape From Reality, Superfilm Distributing Corporation.

The features Bava photographed during the years of Italy's postwar convalescence stand out as the most contemporary, humorous, and humanistic films he ever made. During these years, most Italian films had little hope of being distributed outside the Italian provinces, which gave them a sense of national identity that they have only recently begun to recover. They spoke Italian and addressed Italian subjects, with a mixture of warmth and humor and exaggeration that remains peculiarly Italian.

Under the sponsorship of Vittorio De Sica, Pietro Francisci directed Natale al Campo 119 ("Christmas at Camp 119")[11] in 1947. De Sica starred, co-scripted, and served as production supervisor, and the supporting cast included several actors who would play significant roles in Bava's later career: Aldo Fabrizi (the acclaimed star of Roma città aperta, who also co-scripted), Massimo Girotti (the handsome athletic star of La corona di ferro) and, in his second screen appearance, a young Adolfo Celi (oddly cast as an American sergeant). It is the sentimental story of a group of Italian soldiers who must spend Christmas in an American prisoner-of-war camp. When their radio breaks down on Christmas Eve, the men pass the time by sharing their bittersweet memories of home—Rome, Milan, Naples, or Venice, as the case may be.

MASSIMO GIROTTI and Aldo Fabrizi (both seated) and Vittorio De Sica (conducting) enliven a sad Christmas with happy music in NATALE AL CAMPO 119.

The film was later distributed in America under the title Escape From Reality, which is appropriate—not only because the film allowed its characters to find temporary liberation from their worries in sweet reverie, but because Natale al Campo 119 contains some of the earliest indications that the postwar Italian cinema was beginning to dream again, to drift away from documentary realism and neorealism. It is a film that stands with one foot in both worlds, consisting of several stories mostly filmed on location, and framing footage centered around a stagebound, stylized, clearly artificial concentration camp set—thus inverting the fabric of reality and illusion, as it were. The art director was Italy's premier sceneggiaturista, Gastone Medin (1905–69), whose richer-than-life approach to film decor was a key ingredient in the development of the telefoni bianchi ("white telephone") films of the 1930s.[12] The message is subtle but eloquently conveyed, and one that would be echoed later in the century by Francis Ford Coppola and Stanley Kubrick: War is an unnatural state, antagonistic to all that is most important in life.

FOLLIE PER L'OPERA*'s Constance Dowling is content to flirt with Aroldo Tieri . . . until he prefers Gina Lollobrigida.*

Natale al Campo 119 is a charming basket of human dreams and foibles, laughter and pain, adversity and camaraderie, and it contains a number of memorable images—including shots of various Italian art masterpieces being taken down from museum display and crated away for safekeeping at the height of wartime. The film acknowledges no museum cooperation, which suggests that none of the masterpieces shown were actually used, but were rather alternately supplied by Bava's trick photography. For example, one shot of a young couple meeting in front of Sandro Botticelli's The Birth of Venus, for example, is surely achieved via rear-screen projection. Rear-screen projection is more obviously employed during the close-ups of Massimo Girotti rowing his gondola through the canals of Venice.

But the film's most effective (and affecting) moments are those which catapult the film beyond reality and stylization into the realm of the spectral, in ways that anticipate Bava's later concerns as a director. At one point, the searchlight from the (highly artificial-looking) watchtower is allowed to strike the camera lens, signalling a flash-cut to another dimension, in which a black character—who exists nowhere else in the film—is shown walking mournfully though the barracks, observing the poignant expressions of the cast like a personification of their sorrow, as the soundtrack plays a stirring rendition of the gospel standard, "Motherless Child." The sequence ends with an image that will have resonance for anyone familiar with Bava's later film Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!: a shot of De Sica and Peppino De Filippo staring numbly through the greasy, unwashed window of their barracks. The composition is identical to those of the superstitious villagers peering outside at Dr. Eswai upon his arrival at Karmingen.

The film's cinematography credit is shared by Bava and someone identified as "Ferrer Tiezzi." The division of labor may be explained by the presence of numerous "travelogue" shots photographed in Italian cities other than Rome, but the matter of Tiezzi's identity is obscured by the main titles, which contain an unusual number of sloppy errors. Composer Angelo Francesco Lavagnino is listed as "Francesco Lavagnini," editor Gabrielle Varriale as "Variale," etc. The film's second cameraman was, in fact, Augusto Tiezzi (1910–80), who had also photographed Francisci's feature debut Io t'ho incontrato a Napoli (1946).

Follie per l'opera

First released: September 29, 1948
B&W, 1.66:1, 97 minutes (passed by Italian censor board at 94m)

Production: Scalera Film, GE.S.I. Distributor: Scalera Film. US: Mad About the Opera, Motion Picture Sales Corporation, 95m

Bava's next collaboration with Mario Costa—Follie per l'opera—would mark another significant step in the evolution of filmed opera. Perhaps spurred on by The New York Times' review of L'elisir d'amore (and others like it) to devise an opera film that was more universal in its entertainment value, writers Costa, Giovanna Soria, and two upcoming maestri of Italian comedy—Mario Monicelli and Stefano "Steno" Vanzina—delivered exactly that.

Follie per l'opera stars Aroldo Tieri as Gino, a two-bit Italian journalist based in London, who wants to marry Dora (Gina Lollobrigida) but is barred by her father Carlo Scala (Carlo Campanini), an Italian restauranteur. When Carlo's friend, Don Antonio (Aldo Silvani, billed as "Aldo Sylvani"), a local parish priest, mentions that his church was destroyed by bombing, Gino conceives the idea of staging an evening of opera performances at Covent Garden to fund the church's restoration—and persuades Carlo to guarantee Dora's hand in marriage if he can pull it off. Dora and Gino arrange a hefty loan from McLean (Lamberto Picasso), a local businessman who covets Carlo's restaurant, on the premise that the eatery will become his if they cannot repay the loan by midnight after the performance. By tricking Margaret (Constance Dowling)—a secretary at Covent Garden, who happens to be enamored of him—Gino obtains stationery from the renowned theater to secure the participation of artists like Tito Schipa, Tito Gobbi, Gino Bechi, and the La Scala Ballet

11 In Italian, "119" is pronounced "cento diciannove," but as the film's setting is an American POW camp, it's probably fair game to take the shortcut and say "one-nineteen."

12 Indeed, this Italian genre may owe its coinage to one of Medin's early assignments, Il telefonista (1932).

Company. When Margaret learns how she has been used, she turns against Gino and determines to sabotage the evening.

For those who can look past its surreal depiction of London as a city inhabited solely by Italians (even the BBC commentators are Italian!), Follie per l'opera is an enjoyable light comedy with romance and robust music, as well as an underlying melancholy tied to wartime loss and dislocation. As one sequence touchingly conveys, a roomful of Italian expatriates are moved to visible homesickness by a radio performance by Beniamino Gigli, opera being used as a metaphor for the Italian spirit. Costa's film clearly sought to inspire the postwar rebuilding of more than a single church.

By this point in his career, Mario Bava had become a more confident cinematographer, with a knack for lighting individual shots to make them alluring, comic, erotic, mysterious, dramatic, reassuring, antic, or purely decorative—before the actors on-screen spoke a word. He used light in the way film composers use leitmotifs: to reinforce character. Gino is always overlit, making him appear not only brazen but slightly absurd; Margaret is enveloped in velvety, come-hither shadow patterns that grow progressively dangerous, until the scene in which she rouses a crowd of union workers to crash the non-union opera performance, when Bava lights her like an authoritarian dictator, her shadow completely disengaged from her body, as though to suggest the dual purpose of her motives; Dora is softly, virginally lit, except for one delicious moment when she unmasks Tito Gobbi (posing as his own secretary) by tricking him into a public performance, and looks on tauntingly as he sings "Dicentencello vuie."

Follie per l'opera also contains some trick shots that once again show Bava working well outside the traditional boundaries of cinematography. With the exception of a scene filmed on location at a Roman airstrip, the film was shot entirely at the studios of Scalera Film, including the London "exteriors." The first exterior—as Carlo, Dora, and Gino take a taxi home from a piano concert—was actually filmed in the courtyard of Scalera's production office, where the walls were covered with false storefronts. Borrowing his father's super-steady Mitchell camera and truca, Mario exposed only the lower half of the frame as a few cars and taxis drove past the façades and dropped off the actors at the courtyard entrance. A night shot of city traffic was also filmed. Later, he rewound the film and, with the lower half of the frame now protected, matched a maquette of the buildings' upper floors and various clustered buildings huddled on a background hillside to what was already filmed. To match the night footage, Bava added several lightable windows to the maquette, as well as a flashing miniature neon sign. While not particularly recognizable as London, the shots remain very impressive—indeed, the average viewer would not recognize these as trick shots at all. Remarkably, Bava would later use not only the same technique, but the exact same location and vantage, to stage a scene on a street in Montmartre for Riccardo Freda's I vampiri (1957).

TWO ITALIAN FOTOBUSTE:
Tito Gobbi's climactic performance of "Prologo" from Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci," and Gina Lollobrigida with Aroldo Tieri.

Bava did not photograph Follie per l'opera in its entirety—Gigli's musical performance of Chenier's "Si, fui soldato" was excerpted from Franco Rossi's Solo per te, Lucia ("Alone with You, Lucia"), a film photographed by Arturo Gallea in 1952—but Bava's presence is strongly felt during the other musical highlights, notably Maria Caniglia's performance of "Casta diva," staged as a stirring Viking ceremony beneath a towering, gnarled tree—a prop trunk cleverly "extended" by a Bava glass matte painting—presaging the impressive, tree-dominated Viking set in Bava's early directorial effort Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (1961).

Follie per l'opera proved a popular success and was distributed in America by the Motion Picture Sales Organization, under the title Mad About the Opera. This English-dubbed version, which comically billed Gina Lollobrigida as "Lollo Brigida"—was evidently a disaster, prompting The New York Times to mistake it for "a chunk of farce which, for silliness and overacting, has seldom been equalled hereabouts." Abroad, Follie per l'opera had the distinction of becoming the first international motion picture to be imported and shown in the USSR after the war.

The Bava Squad

Follie per l'opera was the first of Mario Bava's photographed work to properly acknowledge the principal workers on his camera team.

Bava's operatore (camera operator), was Corrado Bartoloni, a lean, fair-haired technician who had learned his trade working for cameraman Vincenzo Seratrice on such films as Rossellini's Un pilota ritorna and Mario Bonnard's Avanti c'è posto (both 1942).

"I started at Cinecittà during the war," Bartoloni explained in a recent Italian television interview, "because letters had been sent out from Cinecittà, announcing that they were looking for cameramen and camera assistants. Some went, and some stayed." His duties? "To start with, I stayed behind the camera. I couldn't even change the film in the camera without permission, because the camera assistants were extremely territorial about their duties. The only thing I had to do was keep the camera clean. Meanwhile, waiting behind the cameraman, little by little, you started getting more important jobs, first of all cameraman-assistant, then cameraman . . ."

Today, such technological advances as the video tap allow cinematographers to oversee their work from a TV monitor, relegating the task of physically operating the camera to their operator. Bartoloni's duties on Bava's films were more limited, because the risks involved at that time were so great. "When we were preparing a shot, we set it up by looking through a particular lens, but during the actual shooting, only the cameraman could view the take through the viewfinder—because it was his responsibility to say, 'It's good—print!' or 'It's no good—let's do it over,'" Bartoloni explains. "Many times, the directors of photography—including Mario Bava—did the shooting themselves, riding the camera, because it was so difficult to keep one's eye on the lighting values. In those days, we weren't able to see the printed footage until four or five days after we shot it. We usually kept at least two or three takes, just in case the director said, 'This is all wrong, you see too much air over their heads' . . . In other words, the shot was not tight enough, leaving too much space between the heads of the actors and the upper frame. We were extremely precise about these sorts of things; when an actor had to speak, we were expected to have some 'air' to his left, or to his right, and so on . . ."

CAMERA OPERATOR Corrado Bartoloni takes a break with Mario on a 1950s production.

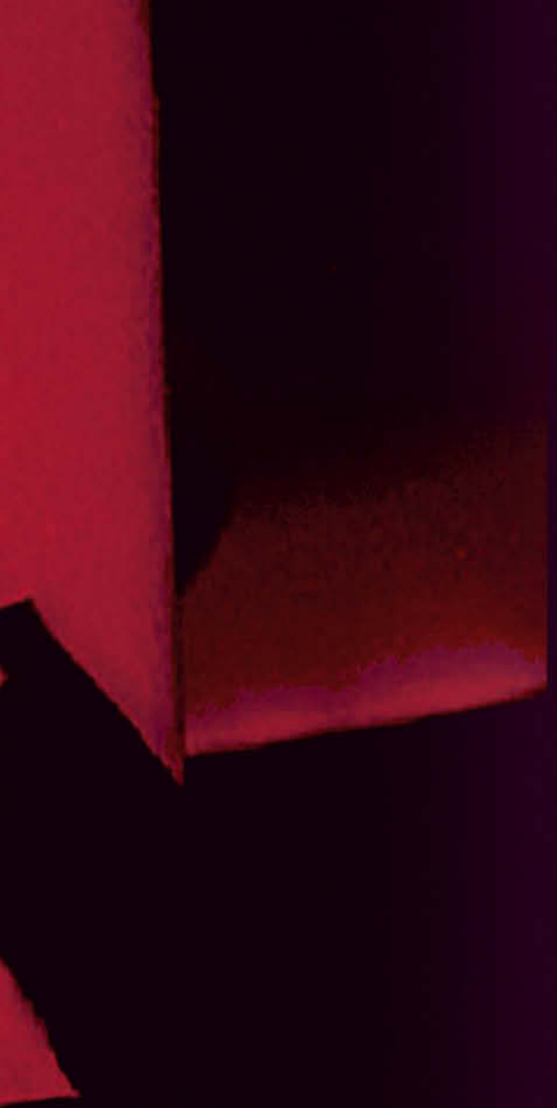
Bartoloni was absolutely enamored of Bava's visual style and his command of cinematic technique and technology. The two men got along extremely well, and worked together on all of Bava's most important camera jobs for the next decade, a period which would include some of the greatest commercial successes in Italian film history. Asked to share his personal memories of Bava, Bartoloni offers: "He was a very intelligent man, very cultured and confident about his abilities. He used to direct directors a lot of the time, but he was an easygoing, quiet fellow. He used to complicate his life during productions by designing extended takes and elaborate camera movements, unbroken takes lasting sometimes 8–10 minutes—but he liked doing this sort of thing. He was my Maestro; I learned from him everything I would ever learn."

For his camera assistant, Bava selected Ubaldo Terzano. A logical and compassionate choice, Ubaldo was the son of Bava's late mentor Massimo Terzano. Mario's grandson Roy Bava offers some insight that may pertain to this case: "He [Mario] paid a lot of attention to the human side of the people working with him. He liked to surround himself with familiar people, because he knew them and how to motivate them, but he also took an interest in their personal lives. He really cared about the people who worked with him, and he took an interest in their problems, like marital problems, or even economic problems. He sometimes hired people, knowing that they weren't exactly geniuses but needed to work, and in these cases, he was happy to have them and to help them." Thus, Bava would certainly have felt the need to repay his Maestro's past guidance and kindness by giving his son a job in which he could continue the family trade.

The working relationship between Bava and the young Terzano would become a significant one, with Ubaldo eventually graduating to the position of operatore (and later, director of photography) when Bartoloni left the squad in 1958 to work as a cameraman in Italian television.

The Richwild Shorts



During this period of upward mobility, Bava continued to supplement his career in feature cinematography by making a series of shorts for Richwild Produzione. These were one- and two-reelers, bulletins and valentines on the prevailing themes of Italian culture and religion, encouragements to a rebounding national spirit. Over the course of the next decade, Bava would photograph thirty more shorts, but he would follow the critical success of L'orecchio with only five of his own: Anfiteatro Flavio ("Flavio Amphitheater") and Santa notte ("Holy Night," both 1947), Leggenda sinfonica ("Symphonic Legend," co-directed with Riccardo Melani, 1947), Variazioni sinfoniche ("Symphonic Variations," 1949), and L'amore nell'arte ("Love in Art," 1950). These shorts were sufficiently well received in their time for their modest director to boldly refer to them as "famous" in the following anecdote:

"We Italians have a certain genius. People from other countries are more hard-headed than us. I remember an incident from the famous documentaries I made in '47 for Mr. Richwild. He wanted to have some swans built for 'Swan Lake' [a segment of Variazioni sinfoniche]; instead, I cut some swans out of white paper and hung them on branches that were moving strangely, out-of-focus, in the background. I was in such a hurry that I asked someone to hold the branches . . . and during Tchaikovsky's 'Nutcracker Suite,' he waved them in tempo with the music! If you ask an American to hold your branch, you can bet it won't swing—because he'll find some gadget to hold it for him. The fact that our branch moved in time with the music proves that we'd have become millionaires if only we'd gone to America." [13]

As Bava's words attest, it is imprecise in some ways to call his short films documentaries, because they mixed their documentary and stock footage with elements of fantasy and trickery. One of the legendary anecdotes about Bava is that, for one of his documentary shorts, he wanted to photograph the ornate interior of a church in Rome, but the church—fearing that hot lights might have an adverse effect on the ancient art adorning the premises—refused his request. Therefore, one morning, Bava visited the church with an ordinary still camera and telephoto lens and took hundreds of photographs, which he then used to wallpaper the interior shell of a scale model of the place, including the hollow of its dome. Onscreen, the final result was such a perfect replica of the original that no one knew it was a trick shot until Bava confessed what he had done.

13 Abruzzese.

Tragedies and Comedies

1948 WOULD BE a pivotal year in the career of Mario Bava, though the totality of his known output for this period is limited to a single feature and a short.

The short film in question was the most widely-circulated of his many documentaries: Carlo Castelli Gattinara's Il demoniaco nell'arte. Scripted by Enrico Castelli Gattinara, this was a visual essay on the infernal images in paintings by Pieter Brueghel, Hieronymous Bosch, Mathias Grunewald, Martin Schongauer, and other Flemish and German painters of the 15th and 16th centuries. Filmed in 16 mm, this 16-minute short was actually distributed to American schoolrooms in 1950, under the title The Demon in Art, sporting an English-language narration track by film critic Arthur Knight, best known for his "Sex in the Cinema" series of articles for Playboy magazine.

Bava's only feature of 1948, I pagliacci (amore tragico) stands out as his first masterpiece as a cinematographer. As such, it warrants detailed discussion.

I pagliacci (amore tragico)

First released: December 2, 1948
B&W, 1.33:1, 90 minutes

Production: Itala Film. Distributor: Artisti Associati. Finland: 6/4/54. France: Paillasse (Amour de Clown), 1/6/50, 86m. Germany: Bajazzo, Jugend-Schnoed, 1950. UK: Loves of a Clown, 1950, 80m. US: Loves of a Clown, Motion Picture Sales Corporation, 4/16/50, 67m.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

One of the dramatic highlights of Follie per l'opera was Tito Gobbi's climactic performance of "Prologo" from Ruggero Leoncavallo's classic opera Pagliacci, which figured prominently in the film's advertising. This sequence proved so popular with audiences that Mario Costa was inspired to film the opera in its entirety. In the earlier film, Mario Bava had filmed Gobbi's performance with very direct, naked lighting, but the singer had infused his reading with such silken, knowing menace that, despite the starkness of Bava's mise en scène, the scene had a sinister, decadent quality that harkened back to the great UFA (Universum Film Aktien Gensellschasft) films that came out of Germany in the 1920s. It was this intensively cinematic style that Bava and Costa courted in their follow-up, to often powerful effect.

I pagliacci (we will dispense with the subtitle for discussion purposes) is the story of a commedia dell'arte troupe that travels the countryside in a cavalleria rusticana, or rustic caravan, bringing opera to the common folk. Their current production is Pagliaccio e Columbina, in which the title character—a clown by trade—discovers that his wife is unfaithful and must continue to wear a smile, though his heart is breaking, while allowing her to run away with her lover, the harlequin balladeer Arlecchino. The troupe consists of Canio (Afro Poli, sung by Galliano Casini), the troupe's middle-aged leader, who portrays the cuckold; his beautiful young wife Nedda (Gina Lollobrigida, sung by Onelia Fineschi), who plays the unfaithful Columbina; Beppe (Filippo Morucci, sung by Gino Sinimberghi) who plays Arlecchino, and the deformed fool Tonio (Gobbi), who secretly adores Nedda on stage and off. Upon their arrival in a new town, Canio is greeted like a hero and invited for a drink, but when someone jokingly suggests that Nedda might not be safe if left alone with Tonio, Canio's jealousy flares. He makes it known that, if Nedda ever strayed from him, things would not end so happily as they do in the play. While Canio is away, Tonio sees Nedda singing to herself and her sweet voice emboldens him to declare his love, but she repels his advances. Later, Tonio spies on Nedda as she meets secretly with Silvio—a handsome young local—and watches them as she succumbs to his lovemaking. The spiteful Tonio goes to Canio with the news of her faithlessness, and as the lovers return, the cuckold overhears Nedda promise to meet Silvio after that evening's performance, and run away with him. Canio flies into a rage and chases the lover away before he can see his face or learn his name. During that evening's performance, when Canio hears Nedda sing—singing to Arlecchino the very words she spoke to Silvio in parting—he goes mad with jealousy and stabs her to death on stage. Silvio rushes to her defense and is also stabbed to death. As Canio realizes with horror what he has done, the skies erupt in a terrible, apocalyptic storm from an offended Heaven.

Unlike most opera films, I pagliacci requires some familiarity with the circumstances of the play's composition to be fully appreciated, not only in terms of its inspired construction, but also in terms of what it hoped to mean in terms of the history of opera on film. Pagliacci was the third opera written by Ruggero Leoncavallo (1858–1919), a Neapolitan composer whose earlier historical romances were met with public indifference. Inspired by the success of Pietro Mascagni's opera Cavalleria rusticana (which Massimo Terzano had photographed in 1939, very likely with Bava assisting), Leoncavallo decided to likewise tailor his third opera to popular, contemporary tastes; Pagliacci (the plurality indicating Canio's synonymity with Pagliaccio) was an uncompromisingly bitter story of love, betrayal and murder, but it also boasted a remarkable story-within-a-story construction that played hob with the proscenium separating fantasy from reality, in ways that anticipated the slightly later works of his contemporary, playwright Luigi Pirandello. Pagliacci was an instant success when first performed in 1892, when Leoncavallo was 34 years of age—the same age as Bava when he photographed Costa's film so brilliantly.

Leoncavallo's opera is equipped with its own prologue, but Costa and Bava precede it with an impressive 7-minute introduction—filmed entirely from the composer's point of view—intended to acquaint audiences with the circumstances and emotions which resulted in the opera's writing. The first image we see is a close-up of a gloved hand holding a letter addressed to Signore Leoncavallo, informing him that his opera I medici must be closed due to lack of ticket sales. The letter is sadly lowered out of camera range to reveal the wall of a theater, newly plastered with a poster for the successful Cavalleria rusticana, overcast by Leoncavallo's silhouette, with a broad-brimmed hat and handlebar mustache. As an embittered voice-over bemoans the sad state of contemporary life, the POV camera dollies through the night streets, passing a haggard woman in black selling fruit, pushy boys hawking newspapers full of ill tidings, until Leoncavallo is nearly killed by an abusive coachman while trying to cross the street to his front door. The camera pans left into a shadow, which masks a cut to the interior of the composer's apartment building, which then—as the camera surges forward—dissolves upstairs to his dwelling, where the gloved hand parts a velvet curtain to reveal the centerpiece of Leoncavallo's home: his pianoforte ("my only consolation"), which occupies a darkened room. "We" light a lamp, carry it to the keyboard, and "our" feverish hands pound out raw emotion that gradually coalesces into the familiar themes of the opera at hand. The camera wanders away to a framed landscape on the wall, which allows the camera to cut to a continuation of the shot, which crosses the room to a shadowed area, from which a clown with tri-parted hair—the "Prologue" of the opera—is manifest.

Today's cinema boasts numerous, progressively showy examples of this kind of "unbroken take," all of them inspired by Russell Metty's opening shot for Orson Welles' Touch of Evil (1958). At the time Costa's film was made, however, there was only one such celebrated example: the introductory sequence of Rouben Mamoulian's Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1931), photographed by Karl Struss, which incidentally included a shot of Jekyll's (Fredric March's) hands playing a pipe organ. Close examination of Struss' sequence reveals, however, that it isn't even fifteen seconds in progress when the first of numerous cuts is made, as the butler Poole (Edgar Norton) steps into the room. Other cuts and dissolves abound in the sequence until the camera meets Jekyll head on at his evening lecture, but it remains a remarkable sequence in that it sustains its subjective stance for so long. In memory, particularly in the years before it was possible to analyze and deconstruct the sequence and thereby determine what went into its creation, one remembered it as being accomplished entirely without cuts. With these facts in mind, Bava's sequence—a fluid procession of takes with ingeniously concealed interruptions—embodies a clear advancement of this technique that deserves to be better known and appreciated.

Bava must have seen the Mamoulian film during its initial release, because its subjective introduction of Jekyll was removed from all prints at the time of its re-release in the late 1930s, and remained "lost" until the film's complete restoration in the late '80s. Bava's interest in Struss' work may have been rooted in the fact that Struss had been the first American cameraman to work in Italy, where he photographed MGM's Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ (1925), a film whose trick photographic innovations would have an additional impact on subsequent Bava projects, such as I vampiri (1957).

ITALIAN fotobuste of Beppo (Filippo Morucci) and Nedda (Gina Lollobrigida) performing for an appreciative crowd, and Caino (Afro Poli) threatening Nedda.

As mentioned earlier, another outstanding influence on the cinematography of I pagliacci is the look of such UFA productions as F. W. Murnau's Der Letzte Mann/The Last Laugh (1926) and Josef von Sternberg's Die Blaue Engel/The Blue Angel (1930). One of UFA's outstanding cameramen, Karl Freund (who shot Der Letzte Mann) had a visual style that some critics compared to the frescoes of the 13th century Florentine painter Giotto, so it may well be that Bava's apparent UFA influence was, more accurately, a manifestation of his education in Renaissance art.

I pagliacci has a wealth of brilliant ideas, the next of which is Mario Costa's decision to cast Tito Gobbi not in the expected dual role of Silvio and Beppe, but as Silvio and Tonio—the handsome and the ugly, the beloved and the hated. Complicating the geometry further, Costa and his co-writers decided that the opera should not be introduced by Tonio—as Leoncavallo envisioned—but by a sinister, somber circus clown who introduces himself as "Prologio," the embodiment of prologue—a role also played by Gobbi. Bava's photography in this sequence is mystical and daring, moving from intimidating close-ups of the clown's demented ranting to sudden long-shots revealing him as the master of ceremonies at a theatrical event. The final shot moves from a long-shot toward the stage, across the proscenium, toward a curtain, which Prologio opens to reveal an establishing shot of a rustic setting—one of Italy's earliest travelling matte shots.

The camerawork and lighting are impressive throughout the film, with the stagebound exteriors enlivened by lighting filtered through actual tree branches that were hung around like Nature's goboes. The anticipated highlight of Poli's "Vesti la giubba" (the opera's most famous aria) is also impressive, sung into a mirror that promptly darkens as it plays Canio's memory of the day the caravan found Nedda starving on the side of a road, the day he proposed, and the day they were wed—a silent montage impressively synchronized to the musical score, all subtly intercut with glimpses of the beauties of nature. (This sequence is an excellent example of what Bava's work in art shorts had taught him about combining music and image.) The natural feel of the visuals build to the moment just before the evening's performance begins, when a long-shot shows the audience seemingly assembled before a patch of forest, which proceeds to take our breath away by being raised like the stage curtain it is. This shot would have been a delightful illusion had it stopped there, but it proceeds to trump itself as Bava's stationary camera suddenly pushes forward over rows and rows and rows of heads in the audience, until it reaches the stage. The camera hovers so closely above the heads of the audience, and the crowd is so wide, that all of the usual explanations of how such a shot is accomplished (crane, cameraman carried on a board, etc.) crumble to dust.

The performances are intense, with Poli at his maddest resembling Boris Karloff's Gorka in Bava's I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath, and Gobbi's Tonio looking even more like Luciano

THE JEALOUS Canio stabs Nedda to death at the climax of their stage performance.

Pigozzi's Losat in La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, similarities which reflect—as they should—Bava's range of influence on the production beyond his cinematographic province; a conscientious cameraman always works with the costume and art department heads to give a film a consistent look. Gina Lollobrigida is ravishing as Nedda, but her first major performance is compromised by her failure to embody the singing of Onelia Fineschi as well as she does her character. She must have realized this herself, because she subsequently began to study singing and was able to provide her own singing voice in some important later pictures.

Lollobrigida was reportedly frightened by the script's dramatic demands, which were in a league different to anything she had attempted before. "When Mario Costa first asked me to play the lead in I pagliacci, I refused," she confessed. "A week later, after he had screen-tested a number of other actresses, he came back, trying to get me to change my mind. At the time, I was earning a thousand lire [$0.62] a day for each appearance. I asked him for one million [$625.00], quite certain that he would refuse. To my surprise, he agreed!" [1]

The climax remains one of the most breathtaking tours de force found in the Italian cinema of this period, as the cuckolded Canio's performance obliterates all separation between illusion and reality, by stabbing Nedda to death before a shocked audience. As blood splashes Nedda's cleavage, Silvio rushes the stage from the audience and is stabbed to death over the floorlit proscenium. As Silvio's sagging body is supported by the crowd and his eyes roll back in his head in death, the murder seems to unleash a cosmic scream that reigns from that moment until the final Fine and fade-out. The night skies suddenly explode in a potent, wrathful tempest that recalls the apocalyptic storm in Tod Browning's own caravan horror story, Freaks (1932). Hysterical and stylized reaction shots of both cast and audience cut-away to dark, charcoaled clouds and vivid splashes of white-paint lightning—a spectacular display, crudely but effectively animated by Bava himself. (A frame-by-frame study reveals that the lighting was not literally "animated," but masked by black paper and exposed in increments.) In an especially powerful touch, Bava slyly incorporated one deep-set eye among the clouds in the shot immediately following Silvio's death, conveying a fleeting, subliminal impression of a hell-faced leviathan on high, puppeteering this cosmic eruption.

In later years, Bava would return again and again to brutal "acts" of murder staged in illusory environments. With this in mind, the finale of I pagliacci becomes a seminal moment in the history of an Italian horror cinema as yet unborn; it is the progenitor of the "performance murders" that Bava would stage in such later films as La donna più bella sul mondo/Beautiful but Dangerous and Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace.

Like Costa's Follie per l'opera, I pagliacci received an American release from the Motion Picture Sales Organization, under the sexier title Loves of a Clown. The American version was poorly subtitled by Charles Clement, who left entire sets of lyrics untranslated, to the extent that the job appears not even half-done. Even worse, the American distributor deleted Bava's magnificent Prologia sequence altogether, and replaced it with a filmed introduction by novelist Sinclair Lewis. When prints were struck for 16 mm circulation, the Lewis intro was also dropped.

Nevertheless, Bava's achievement did not go unrecognized. His work on I pagliacci firmly established him among the elite of his profession. In recognition of his work in this outstanding effort, Bava was welcomed as a member of the Associazione Italiana autori della fotografia Cinematografica (AIC), the Italian equivalent of the American Society of Cinematographers (ASC). Beginning with his next picture, he would be credited onscreen as Mario Bava, A.I.C.

Antonio da Padova

First released: June 7, 1949
B&W, 1.33:1, 81 minutes

Production, Distributor: Oro Film. Germany: Antonius von Padua, Jara Film, 1952.

The early months of 1949 found Bava reunited with director Pietro Francisci. The project was a religious docudrama, Antonio da Padova, which shuffled a fictional story—about a woman (Sylvana Pampanini) who prays to St. Anthony for the safe homecoming of her husband (Carlo Giustini) after the war—with an account of the young St. Anthony's (Aldo Fiorelli) life, as it is read in a book by the woman's son (also Fiorelli). Produced by Francisci's brother Mario, the film presented Bava with the opportunity to renew his acquaintence with the great actor Aldo Fabrizi, who played an important supporting role in the picture, allowing them to further cement what would become a significant professional alliance in the coming years.

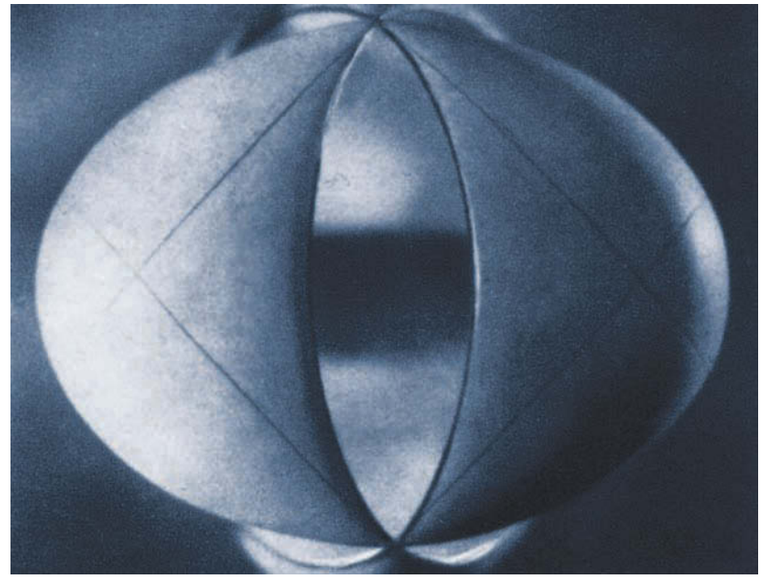
The cast also included Bava's erstwhile documentary cohort Raffaele Saitto, and a new young actor by the name of Sergio Fantoni, who would later play significant roles in Bava-related features like Ercole e la regina di Lidia/Hercules Unchained and Esther and the King. Critics commended Fiorelli's "measured performance" but complained that "movies and the lives of saints have never been compatible" and while appreciating that Francisci was attempting to do something innovative, "the two parts never quite gel, leaving the film seriously defective."[2]

Nevertheless, the film proved a notable commercial success. "In all, we shot maybe 4,000 meters of film," Bava reckoned. "Because the film's subject was the members of the Churches of Saint Cosma and Saint Damiano, there were only nineteen cast members. The film made a sack of money because it was shot entirely in the parish."[3]

Antonio da Padova also marked Bava's first collaboration with one of his most important later associates, art director (and later director) Flavio Mogherini (1924–94). A trained architect, the Florence-born Mogherini had entered the film business in 1946, assisting set designer Carlo Egidi on Piero Ballerini's opera film Lucia di Lammermoor. This production had utilized several of the cast and crew members Bava had known while working for Mario Costa, including Nelly Corradi and Gina Lollobrigida.

"We grabbed Mogherini the minute we saw his models and designs," Bava recalled. "He began making the grotto [for the film] with heavy stones, which he brought in a truck, but we eventually made it with papier-maché, as though it was a Nativity scene. It looked wonderful on the screen. When [Carlo] Ponti's lawyer Todini got an eyeful of this grotto, he immediately offered me a job working for Ponti."[4]



At this point in time, film producer Carlo Ponti (b. Magenta, Lombardy; December 11, 1912) was an important man but not yet the powerful movie mogul he would become. In 1949, he was a salaried producer on the staff at Ricardo Gualino's company Lux Film. Therefore, when he offered Mario Bava a non-exclusive contract with the company, it was not the Ponti name that enticed him to sign; it was the welcome prospect of a regular paycheck.

ITALIAN fotobusta picturing Aldo Fabrizi.

Bava's first assignment for Lux was to photograph and supervise the special effects and animation sequences for an ambitious short entitled Una lezione di geometria ("A Lesson in Geometry," 1948), directed by Virgilio Sabel and based on the writings of Leonardo Sinisgalli, a poet and professor of mathematics. The whereabouts of this short are presently uncertain, but in his seminal study The Italian Film, Vernon Jarratt recorded this tantalizing description for posterity:

"Beginning with a spoken quotation from Lautreamont, it shows a machine tracing a series of ellipses, explains with beautiful clarity the geometric basis of the ellipse, and the algebraic formula for calculating the position of any point on it; from this point it sets off to explore, with the most logical fantasy, the infinite variety of complex shapes that occur in science, and the even more complex shapes that we find in Nature—the

A FRAME of mathematical animation from Virgilio Sabel's UNA LEZIONE DI GEOMETRIA, photographed and animated by Mario Bava.

1 Maurizio Ponzi, The Films of Gina Lollobrigida (Secaucus NJ: Citadel Press, 1982), 17.

2 Ernesto G. Laura, review in Hollywood 199, 1949, as quoted in R. Citti and R. Poppi, Dizionario del cinema italiano, I Film 2 (Rome, Italy: Gremese Editore, 1991), 360.

3 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

4 Ibid.

fantastic geometry of the crystal, the extraordinary perfection of the egg, the relation between the curves traced by the cathode ray oscillograph and the movements of the heavenly bodies, and ends up, after a diversion by way of the human skeleton, by establishing the correspondence between the work of such modern artists as Archipenko, Brancusi, Picasso and Moore, and some of the more complex figures we had been studying a few minutes ago. It is photographed with great skill and beauty, and has an admirably written commentary."[5]

Miss Italia

First released: February 15, 1950
B&W, 1.33:1, 95 minutes

Production: ATA (Artisti Tecnici Associati). Distributor: Lux Film. US: Miss Italy, My Beautiful Daughter, Lux Film Distributing Corporation, 5/9/52.

By early 1950, Carlo Ponti had formed a partnership with a fellow Lux producer, Dino De Laurentiis (b. Agostino de Laurentiis, August 8, 1919). Both men had been moderately successful as independent producers for Lux, but once they pooled their resources, they became the most powerful production alliance in the history of Italian film.

Bava explained how this partnership was formed: "There was a hallway at Lux with Ponti on one side, and De Laurentiis on the other. They hated each other's guts because they were both milking [company president Riccardo] Gualino. In time, they came to the conclusion that they might have better luck if they combined their energies, so they co-founded Artisti Tecnici Associati, better known as ATA."[6] It must have seemed an ironic twist of events for Bava to have his paychecks signed by Laurentiis, who had entered the business as a busboy in the commissary at Cinecittà. Whenever the name of Dino De Laurentiis came up in conversation, Bava liked to reminisce about these old days, when he and others took turns bouncing bread rolls off the young Dino's head!

MARIO BAVA, increasingly camera-shy, crouches behind the camera as Gina Lollobrigida holds the clapboard.

One of the foundation blocks in the success story of Dino De Laurentiis was ATA's premiere production Miss Italia, again starring Gina Lollobrigida, which was filmed in the latter months of 1949 for director Duilio Coletti. This iconoclastic film is one of the most significant of Bava's early professional history because it was one of the first Italian films—perhaps the first—to fuse the neorealistic qualities that characterized postwar Italian cinema with a more fanciful, escapist visual quality that dared to make Rome look not as it was, but as it imagined itself to be in its wildest dreams. It is also an extraordinary film for its irony and candor, and in retrospect, one cannot imagine how or why the owners of the Miss Italia competition allowed it to be made.

Massimo Lega (American actor Richard Ney) is an Italian-American journalist who is assigned a behind-the-scenes story about the contestants of the current Miss Italia pageant. After meeting with the director of the competition and being given an assortment of photographs of the contestants, Massimo drives to their various homes to meet them. One of the contestants, Gabriella (Luisa Rossi), is embroiled in controversy because she once posed for a painting of St. Cecilia, and her priest (Carlo Campanini) feels it would be sinful for St. Cecilia to be crowned Miss Italia. Another contestant, Nadia (Barbara Leite), is the ambitious type. Another, Lilly (Constance Dowling), is the emotionally abused mistress of jewel thief Mario Vergani (played by—of all people—Antonio Mambretti Sonzogno Juva, one of the film's producers). After meeting these and other contestants, Massimo meets Lisetta (Lollobrigida), a contestant so down-to-earth that he initially mistakes her for a dressmaker. As the competition nears, Massimo and Lisetta become engaged, while Lilly's dreams come completely unravelled. While trying to save Lisetta's father (Luigi Almirante) from Mario's wrath after a suitcase mix-up deprives him of some jewelry stolen from the pageant, Lilly misses out on participating in the competition entirely. As she hears of Lisetta's victory on the car radio, she drives over a cliff, killing both Mario and herself.

PHOTOGRAPHER Umberto Melnati demonstrates how to film a fumetti model so that she appears to be falling—an early Bava dissection of cinematic illusion.

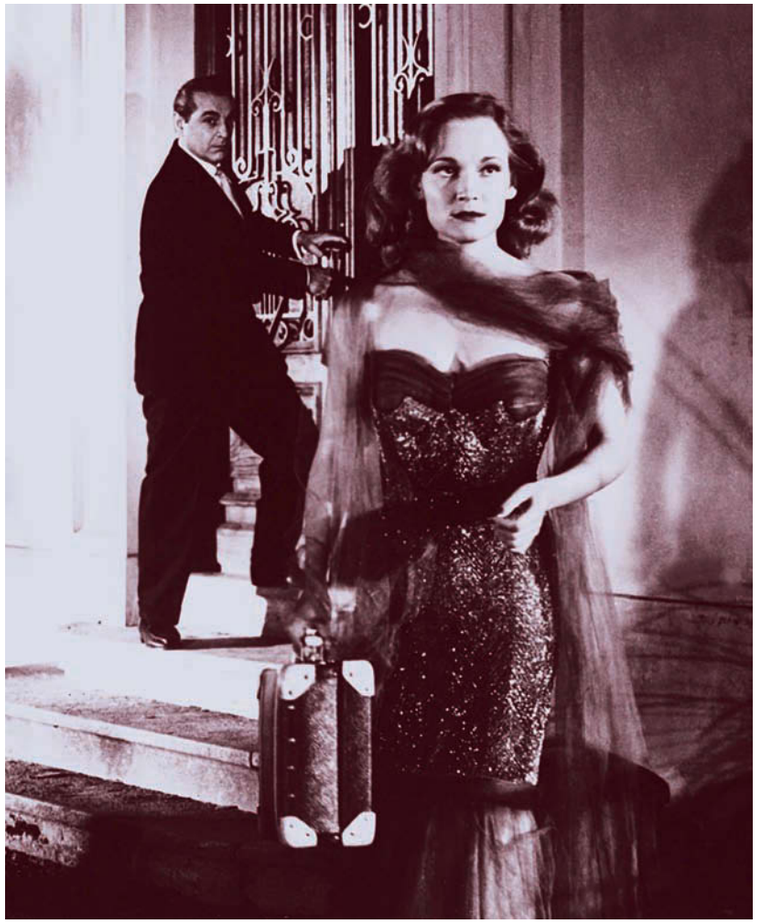
Like Francisci's Natale al Campo 119, Miss Italia is about the dreams of a group of people—in this case, young women—who occupy various prisons of circumstance. The film is occasionally brightened by some exceptional cases, including one none-too-bright sexpot contestant and another who scrapes together a living from work as a fumetti model (as Lollobrigida had done), but it is further brightened by picturesque seaside location shooting, beautiful men and women, and fabulous costumes. The pageantry trappings allow the film to simultaneously straddle fantasy and reality, while subtly breaking away from neorealism and moving once again toward the glamor that were symptomatic of the telefoni bianchi of the 1930s. But whereas the original telefoni bianchi were a response to being unable to openly acknowledge in films what was happening to Italy under Mussolini's rule, Miss Italia depicts these images of beauty and glamor as a dream commonly cherished by all Italians, whether as participants or as spectators, and as a positive, healing ritual for the unbowed spirit of a war-ravaged country. It is a film that uses escapist imagery to intensify and lend dimension to a confrontational entertainment.

Miss Italia is not subject matter typical of Bava, but it accommodates some exceptional visuals that presage images that will surface later in the films he directed. There is a splendidly photographed fashion show, whose velvet-edged lighting contains something of the atmosphere found in Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace. Even more effective is the transition as the camera pans slowly away from a crying woman and pauses, before dissolving to the next scene, on an ornate lampshade strung with glass-beaded pendants echoing the woman's tears (this recalls the scene in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon wherein an objet d'art of glass balls is upset and sent rolling into a bubble bath where a woman has committed suicide, the glass balls forecasting and merging with the bubbles).



Two other scenes are also of particular interest. The first follows Massimo to the studio of a photographer (Umberto Melnati) who is using one of the contestants to stage panels for a fumetti. For the predilection of Massimo, the photographer uses a series of before-and-after shots to explain to his guest how certain special effects are achieved—after the model's skirt is blown up over her face by a gust of air, the cameraman explains that she will be falling from a great height in that panel—and afterwards, he is shown working closely with the model to coax a frightened expression out of her. Bava's personality is particularly strong in this scene, which also provides another metaphor for the film's comparative views of illusion and reality, as well as illustrating how a cameraman might help to create a scene of terror.

5 Vernon Jarratt, The Italian Cinema (London, UK: The Falcon Press, 1951), 92–93.

6 Abruzzese.

The second outstanding scene is Lilly and Mario's climactic death drive, which incorporates a few miniature special effects inserts that were supervised by Bava. These involved a miniature tree-lined hillside, a small car with bright headlights (which appears to have been manipulated behind the miniature set on a simple rod), and a second model car and hillside built around a small pool, allowing the vehicle to be rolled into the water with a splash. The effects are somewhat obvious—when we first see the miniature, we are tipped off that something otherwise unstageable is about to happen, which badly deflates the surprise outcome—but they also have a charming naïveté, and more importantly, a style. The sequence works nevertheless on the strength of the performances, the suspense of anticipating Mario's discovery that he has still not recovered his stolen jewels, and also thanks to one unexpected effects shot—a subjective view of several roadside columns passing by the speeding car in an almost Expressionistic queue that recalls the finale of Fritz Lang's Das Testament des Dr. Mabuse/The Testament of Dr. Mabuse (1933).

CONSTANCE DOWLING as the hellbound Lilly, about to lead Mario (Antonio Juva) to his death.

Quel bandito sono io!

First released: May 11, 1950
B&W, 1.66:1, 89 minutes

Production: Lux Film (Rome), Renown Pictures (London). Distributor: Titanus. UK: Her Favourite Husband, Colin Leslie–Orlux Films, 12/49, 88m 5s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts. US: The Taming of Dorothy, Eagle–Lion Classics, 79m.

By 1947, reconstruction of the war-ravaged Cinecittà had been undertaken. By 1949, most of its original sound stages were once again operational; only four were never rebuilt. Despite the piecemeal resurrection of this central facility, it did not attract immediate business from the outside world on the basis of lower studio costs alone. A more decisive initiative came about as a result of a new Italian law regarding imported films—that the income from these productions could not be removed from the country, meaning that the assets of numerous international film companies became frozen in Roman banks. Furthermore, in 1949, a new "dubbing tax" was placed on all non-Italian language films, in an effort to intimidate outside productions from meddling in the convalescence of the Italian film marketplace. The two laws had the combined effect of bringing the Mountains to Mohammed: film companies from other countries began to send representatives to Rome, in the hopes of forming new and mutually profitable alliances with Italian producers. By being half-Italian, the resulting productions could also sidestep the obligation of the dubbing tax.

An early example of the new "co-production" was Bava's next Lux assignment: Quel bandito sono io! ("That Bandit Was Me!"), directed by the novelist and filmmaker Mario Soldati (1906–99). Though it was filmed in Rome by an Italian crew, the film was essentially a British production—co-produced by Lux's Carlo Ponti and John Sutro of Great Britain's Renown Productions, who had been responsible for the financing of such pictures as Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's The Forty-Ninth Parallel (1941) and Carol Reed's The Way Ahead (1944).

Based on a play by Peppino De Filippo, the screenplay was a joint effort between Stefano "Steno" Vanzina, Mario Monicelli and Soldati, though the film was acted primarily in English, from dialogue written by Noel Langley (one of the contributors to 1939's The Wizard of Oz) and the possibly pseudonymous W. F. Templeton (who never received another screen credit). The dual lead role was played by Canadian actor Robert Beatty, but most of the supporting cast were British actors, including Jean Kent, Margaret Rutherford, Gordon Harker, Max Adrian, and Norman Shelley.

Quel bandito sono io! is a situation comedy about Antonio (Beatty), a timid bank clerk whose life is dominated by his wife Dorothy (Kent), their pesky toddler Giorgio, and Dorothy's parents (Rutherford, Harker), who have been invited to live with them without Antonio's approval. Antonio meekly accepts whatever comes his way, even his wife's open flirtations with her lawyer, Catoni (Adrian, in a delightfully effusive performance). Our hero's life is soon to be further complicated by a criminal named Leo (also Beatty), who looks exactly like him, but Leo has problems of his own, namely Angelo—his former crime boss, whom he has framed in order to inherit his glamorous moll Rosanna (Tamara Lees)—who escapes from prison to have his revenge. As fate would have it, the fugitive Angelo seeks food from a party hosted by Antonio, and attacks him, mistaking him for Leo. Catoni comes to his rescue and the newspaper stories of Angelo's recapture bring Antonio to Leo's attention. He abducts Antonio, poses as him to quietly rob his bank, and is caught dining with Rosanna—by Dorothy and Catoni! Dorothy demands an explanation of his two-timing, and Leo poses as Antonio . . . but only up to a point. Returning home with her, he loses patience with Antonio's situation and orders Dorothy's parents to their room, and takes his hectoring wife across her knee and spanks her! (Hence, "The Taming of Dorothy.") By the next morning—presumably after a night of uncommonly wonderful lovemaking—Dorothy's attitude toward her husband has completely changed. With the help of his housekeeper, Antonio manages to elude Leo's henchmen—an escape that coincides with Angelo's latest prison break. Antonio gets back home, where he and Leo have a number of "near miss" non-encounters before the police arrive to question him. His newly sweet "piccola" dutifully hides him, but Leo is hiding on the same premises. The story is resolved in a grand chase through the rooms of the apartment, with twin chasing twin, wife chasing husband, and police chasing everyone, until everything is straightened out. In the end, Antonio realizes that the only way to remain the master of his home is to trick his wife and in-laws into thinking that the police arrested the wrong twin.

QUEL BANDITO SONO IO! features the striking Tamara Lees (center), seen here taunting British co-star Jean Kent.

Here, for the first time, Mario Bava was formally credited not only with a film's cinematography, but also with its special effects—namely, about a half-dozen in-camera split-screen shots that allowed Beatty to play opposite himself. The majority of these shots are seamless but fairly straightforward, with Beatty sharing opposite sides of the screen with himself, on either side of a vertical line provided by an object on set (a pillar at the bank, the folded corner of a decorative partition, etc.). More interesting are a couple of shots that take an adventurous approach to finding ways for Beatty to cross those dividing lines, to baffle audience members who may be sophisticated enough to know something about how the other shots were done. For example: when Antonio escapes from Leo's henchmen and returns to his apartment, there is a shot in a darkened kitchen of the two men narrowly missing each other. The shot begins with Leo (we assume) standing center-screen, his face averted and looking toward the door; he dashes behind the door, just before it opens to reveal Antonio; Antonio then races toward the camera, crossing into the same area where Leo stood; as he passes in front of the camera, he blocks Leo, who turns toward the camera as Antonio exits the shot. The trick was accomplished very simply: Leo, in the first shot, was Beatty's stand-in (he never faces the camera, but we've been tricked by persistence of vision into believing he is Leo), and at the point when the trenchcoated Antonio (whose face we have seen) races forward to eclipse Leo and block the camera's view, a pause-cut allowed Beatty and his stand-in to change positions. When the camera began rolling again, the stand-in continued running past the camera, and Beatty turned toward it in the background, selling the entire illusion. In another shot, a tight close-up of Leo taunting Antonio with a gun, the waved pistol inhabits the area where the shot would appear to be split; in fact, this is a rear-screen trick shot, with Beatty (as Antonio) and Lees inhabiting the foreground, acting to a background of Beatty (as Leo) and a henchman, photographed with a deep-focus lens that tricks the eye into perceiving everything on the same level. While playing the scene opposite himself, Beatty (as Antonio) waved the gun in front of his own face, the movement appearing to be engineered by Beatty from the background plate, thus introducing another layer of deception to the shot.

Quel bandito sono io! is visually inventive throughout, with Bava taking full advantage of recent innovations in deep-focus photography to stage the film's action in depth, which is particularly useful in circumstances where the protagonist and antagonist are played by the same actor and depicted as leading parallel lives. By dividing the action in depth, as well as width, Bava provides Soldati with twice as much space in which to surprise the viewer's expectations.

The story's twin motif is further reinforced by the use of mirrored set decorations. In one shot, a man is shown walking briskly toward the camera from the right, but before we've had time to consider anything but his movement, he arrives on the left, revealing our initial impression as his mirror image. Later, when Dorothy hides Angelo from the police, she places him inside an open closet, whose door is closed to reveal another mirrored surface—in which we see a reflection of Leo running for a hiding place of his own. The mirror motif is picked up again during Angelo's final escape from the police, as some of the action is photographed as reflected by the shiny curvature of a parked car's hubcaps.

Elsewhere, Bava can be seen working his usual magic—using light and shadow with eloquence, making women beautiful—but he's beginning to push beyond his influences and on the road to becoming himself. Men are lit and shaded sharply, women softly—with texture and diffusion. Honest women are lit to highlight their entire face, while the duplicitous Rosanna has only her eyes illuminated—literally masking her in light—when she acts dishonestly. Similarly, the honest characters are lit directly, while Leo and his cronies are usually lit from behind, or at some indirect angle. When confidences are shared, the characters are also lit from behind, at a low angle, suggesting that the light—like their whispered words—are coming from the corner of their mouths. There is also a thematic consistency in the use of scrim patterns, the shadow motifs seen on various walls: they run neatly parallel in Antonio's normal household, zigzagged in Leo's crooked hideaway, and finally cross-hatched like prison bars at the police station. Discussed out of context, these lighting practices may sound overly cerebral or self-conscious, but they do not draw overt attention to themselves and, most importantly, never upstage or overwhelm the film's comic agenda. It helps that Quel bandito sono io! is more of a smart comedy than an outright farce; it was intended to provoke laughter with its cleverness and elegant surprises of expectation. This approach is signalled immediately with the musical footage that provides the backdrop to the main titles, as we are directly (even ogreishly) serenaded by a man singing and accompanying himself on a mandolin. As the credits end, we learn that this entertainment was provided by one of Leo's henchmen, while his other partners split the money from a bank heist.

The movie's buoyancy—aided in part by Nino Rota's sprightly score—makes it very apparent that Bava and Mario Soldati worked happily together. Bava later described Soldati as "one of the few intelligent persons I've ever known in the cinema, perhaps even too intelligent for this business," and remembered their collaboration as one of ease and humor. In fact, the working atmosphere Soldati created on the set was so creative and supportive that he and Bava entered into a game similar to that of Antonio and Leo, swapping not lives, but their onset responsibilities. On occasion, Bava allowed Soldati to light the sets and frame shots, while Bava was given his first taste of feature film direction. "Soldati turned out to be a marvelous cameraman," Bava attested.[7]

Worthy of special mention is the presence of the stunning Austrian actress Tamara Lees, whom Bava photographed in such a way as to declare her the first of his great femmes fatale. Born Diana Helen Tamara Mapplebek in Vienna on December 14, 1926, Lees made her first screen appearances in British comedies like John Irwin's A Piece of Cake (1946) and Anthony Askwith's While the Sun Shines (1946). By 1949, Lees was still unable to secure better than minor roles in British films—including Brian Desmond Hurst's Trottie True (in which her Quel bandito sono io! co-star Jean Kent was billed far above her) and Terence Fisher's Marry Me—but in Italy, where beauty was prized far above voice or dramatic talent, she was placed immediately under contract to Lux and became a star. Quel bandito sono io! was her first Italian co-production and her first significant role, thanks in large part to Bava's careful, adulatory attention to her mysterious, glacial beauty. Lees would remain in Italy for the remainder of her screen career, working frequently with Bava in the early 1950s. She retired from onscreen appearances in 1961, thereafter working in the dubbing industry.

Bava's work during this period was suave and steady, showing a noticeable advancement in the planning and layering of images; it showed a cameraman in total command of his métier. The Italian film industry responded to what they saw. "At that time," Bava reminisced, "if I stopped working for even an hour, I would receive forty calls offering me something else to do!"[8]

As long as these jobs didn't interfere with his obligations to Lux, Bava took them on. A number of these jobs have certainly gone unrecorded by history, but in addition to the two features he shot in 1949, it is known that he also photographed a half-dozen known documentary shorts—one each for Riccardo Melani (Le porte d'oro, "The Golden Doors") and N. Pasqualini (Arte nella porcellana, "Art in Porcelain"), and three for Telloli: Fantasie di statuine ("Fantasy in Sculpture"), Porcellana nell'arte ("Porcelain in the Arts"), and Il vangelo del Beato Angelica ("The Gospel of the Blessed Angels"). In the coming year, Bava would further supplement his career with six more, including works for Luciano Emmer (Disastri della guerra, "Disasters of War," La festa di Sant'Isidro, "The Feast of St. Isidore"), Marino Girolami (I nuraghi), Augusto Petrone (Sulle orme di Esculapio, "On the Trail of Esculapeus"), and Luigi Comencini (L'ospedale del delitto, "Hospital of Crimes").

Bava's short films, particularly those made for other directors, may appear to be impersonal works for hire, but it would be a mistake to underestimate their place in his filmography. In more ways than one, his short films can be seen as an ongoing process of self-discovery, acts of cinematic hommage through which Bava arrived at a better understanding of the filmmaker he hoped to become. A cursory overview of their subject matter reveals an interest in the lives of the Saints, art and civilization, his homeland, Greek and Roman history and, above all, a reverence for artisanship. He was unquestionably his father's son, in search of an interest or perspective that would distinguish him not only as a craftsman but as an individual. Over time, a steadily emerging detail of interest in the shorts is the relationship between art and the imagination; a couple of the later shorts (such as Comencini's L'ospedale del delitto) also brought Bava into haunting contact with the darker possibilities of the imagination, bringing him that much closer to coming face-to-face with the self-expression that eluded him. The shorts also offered Bava opportunities to experiment with special effects, trick shots, and other forms of fanciful illusions, not to mention the art of montage. On the whole, the shorts are conspicuously more serious in tone than the comedies and melodramas that were Bava's principal bread and butter during this period, and also more personal. In the 1950s, the self-knowledge he had acquired from working in short form cinema began to express itself through his feature work, adding to his distinction as a cameraman.

Vita da cani

First released: September 28, 1950
B&W, 1.66:1, 108 minutes

Production: Carlo Ponti Cinematografica. Distributor: Lux Film. Argentina: Vida de Perro. Belgium: Achter het Voetlicht, Pathé Consortium Cinema, 8/56. France: Dans les Coulisses, Pathé Consortium Cinema, 1955. UK: It's a Dog's Life, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 1952, 86m 36s (shortened export version), Certificate "U," passed with no cuts.

Bava's next assignment, Vita da cani ("A Dog's Life"), represents a significant turning point in his career. It is the production where important professional acquaintances became close and trusted friends, encouraging his work—and theirs—to new levels of shared achievement. Aldo Fabrizi, Gina Lollobrigida, Tamara Lees . . . Bava had photographed them all before, but in this film, along with newcomer Marcello Mastroianni (credited onscreen as "Marcello Mastrojanni"), they evolved beyond what they had been onscreen before. Bava's camerawork was partly responsible, but Vita da cani was also the right vehicle for making stars. The comic story was the invention of a consortium of writers led by Fabrizi and the directorial axis of Steno and Mario Monicelli, for whom Bava would photograph two more features in the coming year. The bonds founded here with Fabrizi and Lollobrigida were at least equally important.

Steno (a.k.a. Stefano Vanzina, 1915–88) and Monicelli (b. 1915), college-educated contemporaries, had entered the film business with separate yet surprisingly similar experiences as assistant directors and screenwriters. In 1999, Bava's grandson Roy Bava worked as a second assistant director to Monicelli, still active in his mid-80s as a film director. "He's amazing," Roy marvels, "still a young man in his energy and his attitudes. When I met him, I introduced myself as Roy Bava, and he mistook me at first for Mario's son!

BELGIAN affiche for VITA DA CANI.

I told him no, that I was the grandson, and he couldn't believe that so much time had passed. He told me some general things about working with Mario on films like Guardie e ladri and said that he considered my grandfather to be the finest cameraman of his generation, and despite his great talent, he said that he considered him to be an even better friend."

Before Vita da cani, Bava had worked at least twice before with actor Aldo Fabrizi, but it was on this film that they formed a true alliance. Born in Rome on November 1, 1905, Fabrizi started out as a stage actor and comedian, and made his acting debut onscreen in Avanti, c'è posto (1942), which he also co-scripted. He achieved international recognition as the priest in Roberto Rossellini's Roma città aperta/Open City (1945) and made his directorial debut in 1948 with Emigrantes and Benvenuto, referendo (1949), which he also co-authored, the latter being the first production of the newly formed Alfa Film. Fabrizi continued to generate his own projects as a hyphenate, while also working as an actor on outside projects, such as his two earlier films with Bava: Natale al Campo 119 and Antonio da Padova, both for director Pietro Francisci. Bava would go on to preside over many of Fabrizi's definitive comic performances. Almost thirty years later, the cameraman maintained that, during those years, "Fabrizi was the only actor I didn't mind eating with, because he was not the usual, self-conscious bag of neuroses; he was, foremost and above all, an intelligent man."[9]

Vita da cani is the story of three women from different backgrounds who become affiliated with a struggling variety troupe in hope of stardom. Franca (Lees), a blonde Milanese with natural glacial beauty, sees no future with her earthy, working-class fiance Carlo (Mastroianni), so she decides to leave Milan for Rome and aim for the top. (She makes this decision after recognizing an actress in the back seat of an idling car—an uncredited cameo appearance by Alida Valli, who subsequently played herself again in the 1953 Totò comedy Siamo donne.) At a rooming house, she befriends Vera (Delia Scala), a dancer with the variety troupe of corpulent comedian Nino Martoni (Fabrizi), whose stage costume consists of a plaid suit and hat several sizes too small. It's a derelict company, with a glass-eyed conductor presiding over a tone-deaf orchestra of cat-scratchers, and Franca arrives for her audition on the night that Lucy D'Astrid (Nyta Dover), the troupe's female headliner, quits the troupe . . . but Martoni likes Franca's legs and hires her as a showgirl. (The theater's backstage area is recognizably the same area also seen in the early backstage scenes of I vampiri, made in 1957.)

While the troupe is travelling by train between engagements, Martoni discovers a young, doe-eyed runaway, Margherita (Lollobrigida), hiding from the police in his compartment. Questioned about her at the next station, he persuades the officials that Margherita is Lucy, the headliner, and when they object that she looks nothing like the pictures on the troupe's posters, he produces a comic photo of himself that doesn't resemble his offstage persona as an example of the illusory nature of show business. (I find myself chuckling at the mere memory of this photograph.) Something doesn't sit well with the police, however, and they arrive at the troupe's next engagement, where Margherita flees from them onto the stage and gets caught up in an outrageously athletic dance performance, which climaxes with her falling through the theater's weak stage floor! Martoni also proves himself adept at impressing hotel clerks with autographed pictures of himself and, while they are distracted, leaving with his troupe's bills unpaid.

On the road, Vera receives a letter from her fiance Mario, explaining that

7 Ibid.
8 Ibid.
9 Ibid.

MARCELLO MASTROIANNI and Tamara Lees as VITA DA CANI's tragic lovers, Carlo and Franca.

his parents disapprove of her working as a variety dancer, and will not consent to their marriage. Martoni hustles card games, and Franca and Vera reluctantly decide to take advantage of the interest being shown in them by wealthy admirers, allowing meals to be bought for them in return for companionship. Vera storms away from her date when he gets too fresh, and when she returns to the theater, she finds Mario waiting for her; he still wants to marry her, regardless of his parents' edict.

Meanwhile, in need of a headliner, Martoni educates Margherita—now given the stage name of Rita—in singing and dancing, and her debut is met with great success. She is so aglow with achievement that she kisses her mentor, who allows himself to hope that she, Franca, might love him. Franca, on the other hand, feels intimations from Rita's overnight success that she has achieved as much as she ever will in the troupe, and accepts an invitation to a private evening with Borselli, a wealthy industrialist who sends her flowers nightly. Arriving at his apartment, she is impressed with his material possessions, but the sincere and intelligent man who greets her is short and bald. He proposes marriage. Missing the handsome Carlo, she decides to pay her first return visit to Milan in several years, to see if any sparks remain between her and Carlo, but when she arrives at his old apartment, she sees a couple of kids, bugs on the floor, and a concierge telling her that the gentleman of the house is not at home. Revolted, she agrees to marry her rich admirer. (The film communicates this by cutting from Franca's distressed exit from Carlo's apartment to a shot of Borselli on the telephone, who smiles as he silently mouths the word "Bene.") At a party announcing their marriage, an unexpected guest arrives—Carlo, now a young executive working for her husband. Realizing that "the man of the house" in Milan was not Carlo at all, but someone else currently inhabiting that apartment, the shattered Franca exits the party to a private room, where she leaps to her death from an open window.

Martoni decides to ask Rita to marry him, but his plan is sidetracked by an emergency summons to the office of the police commissioner, where Mario and Vera have been arrested at the request of the young man's father. Impassioned by his own unexpressed love for Rita, Martoni makes a moving case that these young people should be together and the father, seeing Vera for the first time and realizing that she is not a "typical" showgirl, consents to their union. Martoni thanks the police commissioner with an autographed picture, which pegs him as the character who has left unpaid hotel bills all over the country. "I never would have recognized you!" the commissioner says, sentencing him to an immediate few weeks in jail. By the time Martoni can get back to the theater with his engagement ring, Rita has become a local celebrity, and he overhears her accepting an invitation from another impresario to headline for his more upscale troupe. She wants to accept, but claims she wouldn't know how to tell Martoni, who has done so much for her; realizing that this could be her great chance, Martoni nobly fakes an argument with her and fires her, allowing her star to ascend. In the aftermath of this scene, he walks behind the screen of the theater for privacy, shaken by real life as a fantasy of cowboys and Indians unreels behind him. The film ends on a note of scoundrelly optimism as, once again, Martoni must make his way out of town on charm.

Made at Titanus Studios (Scalera Film), Vita da cani is a charming, often hilarious, occasionally moving film that covers all the hilly terrain between comedy and tragedy. It shares much in common with Federico Fellini's debut feature Luci del varietà/Variety Lights (co-directed with Alberto Lattuada), which was not only made the same year, but at approximately the same time at the same studio, sharing some of the same sets.[10] Ironically, while the Lattuada–Fellini film was scored by Felice Lattuada, Vita da cani was graced with an outstanding score by Fellini's great future collaborator, Nino Rota—another reason why it is the more appealing of the two films, in retrospect. (Rota also co-wrote some of the music hall songs, like Lollobrigida's expertly delivered "Equador," with Fabrizi and Mario Ruccione serving as lyricists. Most admirable of all, in some ways, is the music Rota composed to represent the tin-eared caterwauling of the troupe's flea-bitten orchestra.) Fabrizi was never funnier, especially in the scenes of him teaching Lollobrigida to dance by flouncing his ample bulk around in the manner of a showgirl on a makeshift catwalk that collapses under his weight, but his character also accommodates endearing moments of passion, persuasion, and pathos. It's hard to find fault with any of the film's performances; Tamara Lees is perhaps the most moving of all, as the ice goddess who cannot even shed a tear before taking her own life. Lollobrigida, in her breakout role, had the good fortune to portray a developing character: a young woman who is allowed to transform onscreen from a shy, vulnerable-looking young woman into a glamorous, voluptuous showgirl; she demonstrates considerable range in the part and, performing her own songs, she also sings well.

Though not as obvious a cinematographic tour de force as Costa's I pagliacci (amore tragico), Vita da cani shows Bava continuing to evolve a potent signature style. The early scenes involving Franca are heavily latticed with light and shadow, emphasizing her feelings of imprisonment, while she and Carlo stand somehow apart from them, occupying the same tenebrations of intimacy. When she expresses her feelings to Carlo, Mastroianni turns on a hanging lamp, lighting only one side of his face, perfectly visualizing his divisive shock, while the shadows on Lees' face are softer, more resolute and decisive. As she makes her exit, pausing in the doorway to say, "Addio, Carlo," the light on her face could not possibly be whiter or colder. There is a certain consistent suavity in the film's use of shadow, but the style only overwhelms the realistic stance of the film when it's dealing with Franca, whose unrealistic expectations of life are her real prison. As her tragic story arc progresses, the lighting becomes more grimly stylized—in fact, the look of these scenes anticipates the chilly yet velvety atmosphere of Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino/ Blood and Black Lace. At the moment she takes her own life, Bava makes the choice of not following her as she walks out of frame; instead, the camera remains focused on the pair of lovely, ornate, painted doors that she closes behind her before exiting frame to leap quietly from a window—the first of Bava's beautiful deaths.

RITA (Gina Lollobrigida) electrifies an audience with her performance of Nino Rota's "Equador."

A scene in a hotel bedroom shared by four of the showgirls is also a standout, with the women softly lit while the only visible light sources are a pair of lamps—foregrounded and backgrounded—both in the shape of a flower, both glowing brightly, and the light peering through an arrow-like arrangement of shutter slats. When Vera sits beside the foregrounded lamp to write a letter, she dampens its light by placing a newspaper over it, which Bava complements with the choreographed brightening of a secondary keylight. Here, as Vera's roommates prepare for bed hazily in the background, Bava appears to be temporarily without the deep focus lens that was in his arsenal for Quel bandito sono io!; the movie contains several instances of noticeable focus adjustment from foreground to background, as the content of a scene demands. At times, such as during an argument that breaks out when a strange woman recognizes Rita in a bar, Bava cleverly creates the illusion of deep focus by arranging the actors of the foreground and background on the same approximate plane, or field of focus, while emphasizing the "foregrounded" actors with key lighting.

Bava also photographed Gina Lollobrigida splendidly. Her early scenes are carefully lit to prevent her from standing out in any way, but after her "Ecuador" performance, the actress' hair and bare shoulders are suddenly caressed with luminous backlighting to lend her enchantment, and another light is positioned to compliment her bosom when she pivots to one side. The moment was apparently not missed on Howard Hughes, who—evidently in response to her appearance in Vita da cani—invited Lollobrigida to come to Hollywood and sign an exclusive seven-year contract with him and RKO. She agreed, arriving in Los Angeles on June 22, 1950, whereupon she began taking English lessons. It was a slow process, however, and by October, Gina's husband Milko Skofic (whom she married in 1949) began to complain. Putting her marriage first, the actress flew back to Rome despite her contract and the anger of Hughes; it was a wise move because, by this time, RKO was already a ghost of its former standing in the Hollywood community, and Hughes produced only three more films subsequent to 1950. Lollobrigida's marriage, on the other hand, survived until she and Skofic divorced in 1966.

10 The Lattuada–Fellini film also features a diverse variety troupe of colorful performers, but narrows its focus to a single, ambitious young girl (Carla Del Poggio, Lattuada's wife) who wants to break into show business via Peppino De Filippo's humble company. As in Vita da cani, the impresario is talked into hiring a beautiful young girl he meets on a train, while everyone else is sleeping, and he soon falls in love, only to have his heart broken as she passes him on the showbiz ladder.

Hollywood on the Tiber

Simultaneously with Gina Lollobrigida's and Marcello Mastroianni's steps into the spotlight in Vita da cani, another young Roman actress—Sofia Scicolone—was making made her screen debut as a slave girl in a Metro–Goldwyn–Mayer spectacle being shot at Cinecittà. That actress would be remembered by her future screen name, Sophia Loren; that production—Mervyn LeRoy's Quo vadis (a color remake of the silent classic), starring Robert Taylor, Deborah Kerr and Peter Ustinov—would be remembered as the film that changed everything. In its wake, Rome became known as "Hollywood on the Tiber."

Filmed in Rome in an effort to liberate billions of MGM lire held captive in Roman banks, Quo Vadis was the first major Hollywood production to be filmed in the Eternal City since Fred Niblo's Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ fell victim to catastrophic accidents and pre-war ideological tensions. That experience, in addition to the devastating commercial failure of the 1924 German-Italian co-production of Quo Vadis, had so impressed itself on the Italian film industry that there had been few subsequent attempts to revive the native genre of the Ancient Roman spectacle. Carmine Gallone's Scipione l'Africano (1937)—whose titles Bava had designed at the Istituto LUCE—was one of two notable exceptions, but in its depiction of the titular Roman senator bent on global conquest, it was readily interpreted (indeed, by Mussolini himself) as a Fascist allegory, a declaration and affirmation of national politics and purpose, rather than as an escapist fantasy.

The other exception was Alessandro Blasetti's Fabiola (1949), a French-Italian remake of Enrico Guazzoni's 1916 silent epic which—budgeted at 500 million lire [$312,000]—is said to have been the most expensive film produced in Italy up to that time. (In Italy alone, it recouped slightly more than this investment.) Fabiola was essentially a whodunit set in Ancient Rome, as emperor Fabius Severus (Michel Simon) is bludgeoned to death on the eve of his liberation of his Christian slaves, an act falsely blamed on the Christian gladiator Rhual (Henri Vidal)—the secret paramour of the King's daughter Fabiola (Michele Morgan)—by members of a disapproving senate. The principally French cast was complemented by outstanding supporting performances by the key players of Blasetti's La corona di ferro—Massimo Girotti (as Sebastian, the martyred leader of the Christian underground) and Gino Cervi as the guard Quadratus—and once again, it was magnificently photographed in black-and-white by Mario Craveri and crisply edited by Mario Serandrei, whose name now habitually appeared on all of the best features coming out of Rome. Though more somber and ultimately not as rousing as Blasetti's earlier masterpiece, Fabiola is also historically noteworthy for the viciousness of its arena sequences. Here, Christians are not only fed to the lions, but graphically nailed to cruciform displays, burned alive, tied to poles and used to bludgeon other Christians tied to other poles, dropped from high towers, even dismembered with cleavers. In shots that retain their capacity to shock half a century later, one female victim is stripped nude before she is slain, and we are also shown a young man in a lion den, dazed in the post-traumatic shock of having one of his legs eaten off. Covered in black blood, his stump flails in such a way that an actual amputee must have been used.

US lobby card.

Fabiola was a tremendous success throughout Europe, and its popularity—not to mention the desire to spend otherwise unspendable millions—surely prompted MGM to undertake their new version of MGM's Quo Vadis. The film was such a major event in Rome that Harriet White—the first American actress to relocate to Rome with the express goal of working in the Italian film industry, who subsequently won starring roles in Rossellini's Paisà/Paisan and Primo Zeglio's Genoveffa di Brabante (1947)—illustrated the enormous gulf between Italian and American films by consenting to play a 5-second cameo in the picture. As Nero (Peter Ustinov) reluctantly walks onto his balcony to greet his public, White can be seen hoisting a small infant into the air and crying, "Look, my baby! The Emperor!" She remembered that the extras were paid the equivalent of five dollars and a cestina (or "box lunch"); she also remembered getting into a fistfight that day with a fellow extra, who recognized and taunted the "big star" for "slumming." Later taking the name of her husband, art director Gastone Medin, Harriet White Medin would become one of the best-loved character actors associated with Mario Bava's body of work.

Quo Vadis (the question mark dropped, the untranslated title was seldom questioned by US audiences) became such a big hit for MGM that it prompted the American release of VITTORIO GASSMAN is the unlikely hero of IL LEONE DI AMALFI, an early Pietro Francisci pepla.

Fabiola by United Artists in 1951—in censored, restructured, and newly narrated form. (The same version was also released in Great Britain, by New Realm Pictures, under the more cumbersome title Fighting Gladiator and Fabiola.) Quo Vadis not only helped to reestablish a market for this kind of Italian product, but its elaborate sets were left standing at Cinecittà for a time, to be subsequently reused by Italian productions like Mario Soldati's O.K. Nerone (1950). Thus began the tradition of popular Italian cinema aping the recent successes from America.

Il leone di Amalfi

First released: 1950
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes

Production: Oro Film, Laura Film. Distributor: Oro Film.

È arrivato il cavaliere!

First released: December 6, 1950
B&W, 1.66:1, 92 minutes

Production: ATA (Artisti Tecnici Associati), Excelsa Film.
Distributor: Minerva Film.

Mario Bava's colleague in documentary filmmaking, Pietro Francisci, was one of the first directors to stake a claim in this new era of Italian costume epics, beginning with Il leone di Amalfi ("The Lion of Amalfi," 1950, a.k.a. Il ribelle di Amalfi, "The Rebel of Amalfi"), shot at Safa–Palatino Studios. The film starred Vittorio Gassman as the son of the leader of the Amalfi republic, imprisoned by his father's enemy (Carlo Ninchi) since childhood, who with the help of two women conspires to overthrow his jailers and return triumphant to his homeland. Still at work on Vita da cani, Bava was unavailable to photograph the picture, but he was free by the final week of special effects photography and stepped in to provide his friends, Francisci and art director Flavio Mogherini, with some uncredited assistance. In the words of actor–screenwriter Fiorenzo Fiorentini, "In Il leone di Amalfi, the palace of Saladin was only a model built by Bava, but it looked like an immense castle right out of a fairy tale!" [11]

A COMIC cheesecake shot from È ARRIVATO IL CAVALIERE!

Vita da cani and Il leone di Amalfi performed similarly well at the boxoffice, earning 253 and 256 million lire [$158,000 and $159,000] respectively, proving that Italian audiences were warming once again to films of escapist fantasy. Both pictures were tales of people triumphing over adversity, but the more realistic treatment proved less financially successful. (It should be mentioned that Lattuada–Fellini's Luci dei varietà performed only half so well, earning a mere 117 million lire [$73,000] upon its release.)

Bava and Mogherini closed out the year together by collaborating on a new film for Monicelli and Steno: È arrivato il cavaliere! ("The Knight Arrived!"), an unenthusiastically received comedy starring Tino Scotti, which was followed the next year by a third collaboration far more significant.

Guardie e ladri

First released: November 29, 1951
B&W, 1.66:1, 109 minutes

Production: Ponti–De Laurentiis Cinematografica. Distributor: Lux Film. Denmark: 5/11/53. Finland: 9/24/54. France: Gendarmes et Voleurs, 1981. Germany: Räuber und Gendarm, Neue Filmkunst, 1957. Mexico: Mi Amigo el Ladron, "My Friend the Thief."

One of the most beloved films from Mario Bava's years as a cameraman is Guardie e ladri ("Cops and Robbers"), co-directed by Monicelli and Steno for Lux Film. It was the first production of the renamed Ponti–De Laurentiis Cinematografica—formerly ATA—and the only official collaboration between Bava and Italy's premier screen comedian, Totò (1898–1967).

Born Antonio de Curtis, Totò was a long-faced Neapolitan music hall performer who first found fame on the Italian stage. He made the transition to movies in his late 30s, with Fermo con le mani (1937), and his dour, strong-jawed, basset hound face—a dual mask of tragedy and comedy, at once handsome and ridiculous—captivated audiences. His star billing was rapidly elevated to the very titles of such screen parodies as Totò le mokò (1950) and Totò Tarzan (1951). He joined forces in early 1950 with Monicelli and Steno, on Totò cerca casa ("Totò Looks for a House," which immediately preceded Vita da cani), and it was the genius of the two directors to recognize in Totò's shifty, sad-faced demeanor a reflection of the current Italian spirit, an embodiment of the survival instincts brought out by the recent war; an individual pride compromised, but never broken, by defeat. The Totò–Monicelli–Steno troika lasted for eight films, until the dissolution of the directors' partnership in 1954. Afterwards, Totò continued to work separately with both directors; Steno made him the subject of the first Italian film photographed in color (by Tonino della Colli): Totò a colori ("Totò in Color," 1952), and Monicelli finally elevated the local hero to international celebrity with I soliti ignoti/Big Deal on Madonna Street (1958).

ITALIAN locandina.

Guardie e ladri is the story of an unlikely friendship. Half of this friendship is Ferdinando Esposito (Totò), an aging man who supports his family of five in the postwar years by fleecing American tourists. We first meet him posing as a city guard and persuading Mr. Locuzzo (William C. Tubbs) to buy a phony Roman coin for $100 American, with the help of his American colleague "The Professor" (Aldo Giuffré). Locuzzo sees through the deception minutes later, but it's too late: Ferdinando is already gone. Later that day, a local theater is hosting the distribution of CARE packages to the local poor from an American philanthropic organization, and Ferdinando corrals a group of kids to make himself look needy and con his way inside with free admission. Supervising the program is Locuzzo, who recognizes him and sends the on-duty security cop, Lorenzo Bottoni (Fabrizi), in hot pursuit. Bottoni becomes the second half of this friendship. A lengthy, comically slow chase of the aging crook by the obese policeman ends with the two exhausted men having a philosophical conversation about whether, technically, Bottoni caught his man or Fernando got away. When they disagree, the chase resumes . . . until Bottoni slaps on the handcuffs, which Fernando escapes while feigning a visit to the restroom. Locuzzo raises a stink at police headquarters, and Bottoni's superior (Pietro Carloni) informs him that he must recapture the crook or lose his job. Finding Ferdinando's photo and address on file in the department archives, Bottoni begins a stakeout from the barber shop opposite Ferdinando's apartment building, and initiates friendships between the children of their two families to get to his quarry. This scheme backfires when the suggestion of a family meeting is mistaken for a dinner invitation, which is enthusiastically met with a visit from the Esposito family—including Ferdinando's elderly, card-shark father (Ernesto Almirante), his wife Donata (Pina Piovani), and three children—but no Ferdinando, who remains in hiding in their freezing apartment. There is another unforeseen side effect when Bottoni shadows Ferdinando's eldest son to a secret assignation; he summons assistance from other patrolmen in the vicinity, but it turns out that the young man is not meeting his father, but Bottoni's own daughter (an early screen appearance by the future Helen of Troy, Rosanna Podestà)! After being chastised by his wife for his rudeness, Ferdinando goes to Signora Bottoni (Ave Ninchi) with an apologetic bouquet of flowers—a tribute taken from a graveyard—and the reciprocation of an invitation to dinner. As the hour approaches, Ferdinando loses courage and prepares to duck out, but encounters the arriving Bottoni family at the bottom of the stairs. As always, Ferdinando tries to charm his way out of arrest, citing the needs of his family, but Bottoni responds by explaining the needs of his own family, a family that will also suffer if he doesn't "get his man." The two families dine together, and—though "The Professor" arrives dressed as a priest, part of an escape plan—Ferdinando turns him away, agreeing to take his "three or four months" of prison. But by now, Bottoni feels such a kinship to the crook that he can't bring himself to arrest Ferdinando, who must once again use his charm to make the officer do what must be done . . .

11 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers," Spaghetti Cinema 72, July 2000, 2–12.

Totò and Fabrizi were a perfect match—combining the fat and the LORENZO captures his prey, but not for long.

THE BOTTONI FAMILY (Ave Ninchi, Aldo Fabrizi, Carlo Delle Piane) at home.

FERDINANDO charms a cemetery icon for the free loan of some flowers.

BAVA*'s lighting foreshadows prison as Ferdinando and Lorenzo have a heart-to-heart.*

lean, the flamboyant and the humble, the low-key and the apoplectic, the artful dodger and the seemingly artless pursuer; both actors were also particularly gifted at projecting a sense of humanity. Fabrizi is brilliant from his very first scene: in uniform, he looks serious and comic, funny yet also poignant, an object of fun but never of ridicule. Totò's performance is initially broader, but as his character reaches a dramatic crisis—realizing how his family has suffered from his clandestine lifestyle—it deepens significantly, and his farewells to his individual family members as he prepares to leave for prison are genuinely moving. Italy's top comedians would work together again several times after this initial success, beginning with Una di quelle, directed by Fabrizi himself in 1953.

Guardie e ladri also perpetuated Fabrizi's onscreen alliance with rotund actress Ave Ninchi (1915–97), who first appeared as his wife in Natale al Campo 119 and had reprised this continually renamed character as recently as Parigi ë sempre Parigi/Paris Is Always Paris (also 1951). Fabrizi and Ninchi were a great comic duo—the archetypal Italian papà e mamma, two sweet people always at each other's throats—and some of their greatest collaborations were still ahead of them. Guardie e ladri was the second film for young Libyan actress Rosanna Podestà, who may have been recommended for the film by Ave Ninchi, who had previously worked with her in the children's film I sette nani alla riscossa/Seven Dwarfs to the Rescue (1951), a sequel to "Snow White" directed in Rome by the mysterious, Cleveland-born Paolo William Tamburella (1910–51).

Bava approached the filming of Guardie e ladri in a neorealistic style, which was imposed on him by the working-class nature of the story, the winter schedule (the actors' breath is sometimes visible indoors) and the desolate scenery, which Bava frequently imbues with a dimension of hope by including Michelangelo's Dome of St. Peter's in the Vatican Basilica in the background of the rubble-strewn exteriors. Interior shots are predominantly natural looking, with the occasional stylized glimpse of the unused or unlit (actually, very creatively lit) room. As he was adopting as a trademark practice, Bava also brought a natural aspect to the setbound interiors by using various goboes and props to suggest a "fourth wall" in his compositions, projecting the shadows of non-existent window frames and flora onto background surfaces. The scenes in the respective apartments of Totò and Fabrizi were shot in the studio, but Bava's clever "fourth wall" lighting makes them utterly convincing as actual locations. Only once does Bava indulge in symbolic lighting, during the conversation between the two leads prior to their "last supper"; after a lengthy dialogue exchange that graduates from medium shots to over-the-shoulder close-ups as the two men reach a sobering agreement, Bava adjusts to a high angle framing both men, who are shown beside a large square of crosshatched light apparently cast through a barred window.

Both Totò and Fabrizi were short men, and Bava increases both in stature by documenting the story in predominantly low angles, resorting to higher angles only when wishing to show Ferdinando at a disadvantage, or to emphasize the futility of the traps he sets for himself. Bava and his directors understood the importance of allowing the actors to dictate the comic pacing of scenes as often as possible, the film therefore contains a number of dialogue scenes conducted in long, single takes; it ends with an uninterrupted tracking shot that runs nearly two full minutes. If comedy is the juxtaposition of opposites, Bava also shows a deft knowledge of how to use the camera to create its own comic effects. For example, during the initial chase scene in the theater, long-shots of the actors cut unexpectedly to shots of the overwrought actors coming absurdly close to the lens, creating contrasts which are in themselves funny. Likewise, Bava's handling of the long chase sequence is comical in its technique; stationary shots that isolate the physical struggle of the individuals involved in the pursuit are intercut with mobile shots photographed from the lead, encompassing in depth Totò, Fabrizi, Tubbs, and the unpaid taxi driver, in which we perceive that everyone (hindered by weight, age, and poor condition) is actually running absurdly slowly, juxtaposing all their expended energy and desperation with a pathetic, yet hilariously dainty trot. Judging by the rubber tire tracks visible in the dirt, Bava captured these shots from a wagon-based dolly without laying track, a very innovative move at the time.

Asked what he remembers best about Guardie e ladri, camera operator Corrado Bartoloni says, "Well, the huge success of that movie is my greatest memory, the success of Monicelli. I also remember the end, when Totò has to feel sad. I remember he almost did not want to do this, because he had this personality, which was very difficult—but we had no problems with Monicelli."

Guardie e ladri was shown at the 1952 Cannes Film Festival, where jurors awarded it their top prize for Best Screenplay. (It was signed by no less than seven authors: Monicelli, Steno, Fabrizi, Vitaliano Brancati, Ennio Flaiano, and Ruggero Maccari, with story credited to Piero Tellini.) Later, Totò won the Nastro d'argento ("Silver Ribbon") for his performance, and the picture went on to become one of the year's top-grossing Italian films. It is regarded today as a classic of Italian neorealistic comedy.

Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . .

First released: December 7, 1951
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes

Production: Excelsa Film.
Distributor: Minerva Film.

The bittersweet Excelsa Film comedy Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . ("I Have No Lover! . . . However, However . . . ," 1951) was a fateful job for Bava, as it marked the first of several fruitful collaborations with director Giorgio Bianchi (1904–68) and gave him new opportunities to exalt the beauty of Gina Lollobrigida with his camera.

Giorgio Bianchi entered the film business as an assistant director to Amleto Palmeri—a writer–director from the earliest days of Italian cinema, who at a very young age had co-directed the Eleonora Duse film Cenere, photographed by Eugenio Bava—and specialized in romantic drama. Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . was a vehicle not only for La Lollo, but also for Renato Rascel (b. Renato Ranucci, 1912–91), a diminutive, stocky, sad-faced comedian who started out in show business as a jazz drummer, a talent he displays in Bianchi's film in a nightclub sequence, when his character sits in with the New Orleans Jazz Band while eluding some armed gangsters. Rascel's brand of humor didn't travel well outside of Italy; his only American release was Steno's Tempi duri per i vampiri/Uncle Was a Vampire, a 1959 horror parody featuring Christopher Lee and Sylva Koscina, which launched the hit single, "Dracula Cha Cha Cha" by Bruno Martin.

Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . is a winning mixture of woebegone romance, slapstick, and sentimentality that deliberately hearkens back to the silent era with its undercranked, high-speed chases and melodramatic storyline. Rascel stars as Teodoro Scutipizzo—the shlemiehl younger brother of Antonio (Luigi Pavese)—who earns his living by sitting inside a talking scale with his little dog Rof and telling people their weight in a faux electronic voice. One day, Teodoro loses his job when he finds himself tongue-tied by the ample bosom of a customer, whose jealous boyfriend tears the talking scale to pieces with his bare hands. While walking dejectedly home with Rof, Teodoro witnesses an attempted suicide by Gina (Lollobrigida), who in a fit of despondency over the wrongful arrest and conviction of her boyfriend, jumps off a bridge into the Alba river. Teodoro tries to save her, but as he is unable to swim, she ends up rescuing him instead. The wrathful Antonio insists that they both make up for his lost concession by working in his carnival sideshow. The timid Teodoro soon falls in love with Gina, whom he must always save from desperate attempts at self-annihilation, but his love runs afoul of his basic honesty when he discovers a newspaper item about Gina's lover. This leads him to the Mafia-run

ITALIAN fotobusta featuring Gina Lollobrigida (Renato Rascel pictured in corner).

Tabarin nightclub, where he successfully locates documents exonerating him. He dutifully steals them, eludes the gangsters, and delivers the proof of his innocence to the police. Meanwhile, Antonio has abducted Gina for his own carnal uses, and Teodoro must rescue her—although Gina ends up rescuing herself, and Teodoro as well. Returning home, Teodoro prepares to propose marriage, but just then, her boyfriend arrives a free man, and Gina leaves with him, without so much as a backward glance.

Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . is of particular interest as the earliest credited collaboration of Bava, father and son. Eugenio Bava is acknowledged in the film's main titles as the designer of special effects, and the film contains two standout effects sequences: a delightfully sustained and well-synchronized triple exposure scene of Teodoro at the center of an argument between his "devil" and "angel" (both Rascel in appropriate costume) as he decides whether or not to present the evidence of his rival's innocence to the police; and, where Eugenio's talents surely came into play, a charming moment when Gina rests her head on Teodoro's shoulder and a nearby bush bursts into bloom with animated flowers.

Mario's contribution is also first-rate. Lollobrigida never looked more ravishing than she does here, skimpily dressed in a thin, tasseled bedspread after surviving her suicide swim, and Bava found a kindred spirit of sorts in production designer Mario Chiari, [12] who loaded Antonio's warehouse with turn-of-the-century bicycles, sagging draperies, dressmaker's helpers, Roman helmets, dolls, and dead clocks (whose hands are once pulled off for use in an impromptu swordfight)—the sort of darkly evocative ephemera that adorned the dwellings of the most disturbed characters in Bava's later films. But their greatest showpiece takes place in the "Ramo d'Argento" ("The Silver Branch") of the Tabarin nightclub, a two-tiered, fully-enclosed set that Bava introduces with one of his most impressively choreographed shots to date: a 90-second, tracking crane shot that manages to cover most of the twin-levelled set by following one character, and then another, and then another—adding to the story and situation with each transitory vignette—while the walls of the set are dazzled by a constant mesh of rotating, stencilled light.

12 Chiari (1909–89) was a Florentian production designer who had previously contributed to such important films as La corona di ferro/The Iron Crown (1941, also co-scripted), Fabiola (1949), and Miracolo a Milano/Miracle in Milan (1951). He would work with Bava again on Terza liceo (1954) and Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (1955). In later years, he designed Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963), Doctor Dolittle (1967), and the Dino De Laurentiis remake of King Kong (1976).

La famiglia Passaguai

First released: December 20, 1951
B&W, 1.66:1, 75 minutes.

Production: Alfa Film.
Distributor: Rank Film.
Germany: Aufruhr im Familienbad ("Uproar at the Family Bath"), Rank, 1953.

La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna

First released: February 20, 1952
B&W, 1.66:1, 75 minutes

Production: Alfa Film XXXVII.
Distributor: Rank Film.

Papà diventa Mamma

First released: September 25, 1952
B&W, 1.66:1, 84 minutes

Production: Alfa Film XXXVII.
Distributor: Rank Film.
Spain: Papá se Convierte en Mamá, Rey Soria Films

Despite the style and ingenuity he had brought to their collaborations, Mario Bava was not destined to work more than once with Totò or Renato Rascel; it was a deliberate choice, apparently, as he found neither of them particularly likeable. Instead, Bava found his greatest simpatia with a man whom many consider Italy's greatest postwar comedian, and also one of its most talented actors, writers, and directors: Aldo Fabrizi.

Fabrizi got along so famously with Bava that he recruited him to photograph a series of comedies he had chosen for his return to the director's chair. The first of these was La famiglia Passaguai ("The Passaguai Family," 1951), based on Anton Germano Rossi's comedic story La cabina 124 ("Cabin 124"), published in 1931. A comedy of errors built around an ordinary Italian family's cursed attempts to spend a pleasant day together at the beach, La famiglia Passaguai is a gem of riotous, slapstick comedy, but never far removed from underpinnings of neorealistic bittersweetness and warm humanity. (The name "Passaguai" itself suggests finding a way to overcome one's troubles.)

The film starred Fabrizi himself as the endearingly apoplectic patriarch Valenzi Passaguai; Ave Ninchi as his huge, jealous, argumentative wife Margherita; Giovanna Ralli as their attractively maturing daughter Marcella; Carlo Delle Piane (one of the great faces in Italian cinema of this period) as her mercenary, younger brother Pecorino [the name of a popular ewe cheese]; and Giancarlo Zarfati as Gnappetta, the piccolo of the family, who communicates with the world almost exclusively in raspberries. Complicating Peppe's day at the beach—as they do during his days at the office—are Mazza (Peppino De Filippo), a womanizing twit accountant; Viletti (Tino Scotti), his overbearing shrimp-of-a-boss; and his very decorative secretary Marisa (Nyta Dover), who types maybe three words a minute.

THE PASSAGUAI FAMILY, from left to right: Ave Ninchi, la piccolo Giancarlo Zarfati, Carlo Delle Piane, Aldo Fabrizi and Giovanna Ralli.

ITALIAN promotional banner.

Making matters worse are the dogged presence of Enrico (Pietro De Vico), the much-detested boyfriend of daughter Marcella, three eavesdropping old busybodies snooping on everything that transpires in the Passaguais' beachside dressing room, and a certain Signore Treppi (Luigi Pavese), who cannot seem to buy a refreshing watermelon that Valenzi's incessant bungling does not break, and whose attractive wife Iole (Iole Sylvani) keeps finding her way quite innocently into Valenzi's arms.

Released at Christmas time, the film proved so popular with audiences that two sequels followed in short order, also photographed by Bava: La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna ("The Passaguai Family Get Rich") and Papà diventa Mamma ("Papa Becomes Mama"). A master of tragedy and comedy and those places where the two intertwine, Fabrizi was comparable as an actor and personality to Jackie Gleason, and the Passaguai series could reasonably be called the Italian equivalent of The Honeymooners.

"It would make me so happy to see it again!" Bava exclaimed when reminded of this project. "I remember people laughing their eyes out when it played the Cinema Imperial in Rome. We worked from a script that said nothing more than 'Fabrizi buys a watermelon, Pavese does something else, etc.,' and we had a contest every day to see who could dream up the most jokes. We almost died laughing!" [13]

PEPPE's nightmare in LA FAMIGLIA PASSAGUAI FA FORTUNA: Bava's first extended sequence of surreal cinematic horror.

Macario, a popular comedian from Turin) while bumming a ride in the Alfa Romeo of his wealthy landlord, the great stage actor Gardini (Luigi Pavese). Embarrassed that he has not been as successful as his dapper-looking friend, Peppe takes advantage of the misunderstanding and passes himself off as a millionaire, expecting their paths will not cross again. On the contrary, Giocondo is broke too, and he decides to pose as a Count to lure Peppe into joining him as a partner in a new construction company. Peppe—smelling money—agrees, not realizing that it is his imaginary millions which are expected to underwrite the scheme.

La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna is not as funny as its predecessor, because much of its humor arises from troubles that the protagonists get into by their own volition, rather than finding themselves victimized time and again by hilariously escalating cosmic circumstances outside themselves. Even the AVE NINCHI turns her back as Aldo Fabrizi's day on the beach is complicated by a run-in with office co-worker Peppino De Filippo.

Filmed in Fiumicino under the title Un mare di guai ("A Sea of Troubles"), the largely improvised production was completed in twenty-nine days—somewhat less than the standard six-week schedule of most Italian features. The violent chemistry between Fabrizi and Ninchi was a thing of beauty, and benefitted from their longterm working relationship; Fabrizi had been the star of Ninchi's first film, Circo equestre Za-Bum ("Za-Bum Equestrian Circus," 1946), and she had played his wife at least twice previously, in the Rome flashbacks of Natale al Campo 119 and in Fabrizi's own directorial debut, Emigrantes. Audiences loved them together.

In La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna, Valenzi (who now goes by the nickname Peppe) is recognized by old friend Giocondo Diotallevi (Erminio film's best moments are too highly strung with nervous tension, such as the sequence in which Peppe borrows Gardini's lavish apartment to misrepresent it as his own to Giocondo, his "Countess" wife (Marisa Merlini), and his colleagues. As Gardini plays the role of the Passaguai butler, the guests manhandle his irreplaceable valuables with Peppe's amiable indulgence; the humor of the sequence is overwhelmed by uncomfortable suspense over what will break first: the valuable antiques, or Gardini's façade, as he threatens to lose his patience with these fatuous intruders.

13 Abruzzese.

MARIO BAVA on location during the beachfront filming of LA FAMIGLIA PASSAGUAI: between takes, conferring with actor–director Aldo Fabrizi, twirling pasta.

However, the film contains one great sequence of paramount interest to the story of Bava's own creative development: When Peppe is finally goaded by his associates into lending his worthless signature to a personal check for many millions, the scene cuts abruptly to an expressionistic nightmare sequence. Peppe is shown in a striped jail uniform, screaming behind bars. Outside, a tempest rages. His daughter, in tears, reproaches him from outside the barred window—and transforms into one of Giocondo's associates in a woman's wig! Apparitions of his son Pecorino, dressed in Napoleon garb, pop up and down like a jack-in-a-box from a hole in the ground. Faces viewed through bevelled prisms laugh. As Peppe wrenches his prison bars in panic, the camera pulls back to reveal them as part of a hanging grating that can easily be walked around to freedom! At this new vantage, even the roaring winds visible on the cyclorama outside the prison walls are revealed as occupying only half the sky . . . which is now obviously a stage cyclorama. As Peppe runs through the artificial tempest—the shadows of tree branches revolving on the studio sky behind him—Napoleon races after him and leaps onto his back! The shock awakens the guilt-stricken Peppe, who finds himself at home in bed.

This sequence is an early milestone in Bava's creative arc because—however amusing it was intended to be, and is—it represents his first attempt at filming a sequence of a surreal, psychological, frightening nature. Predictably, the sequence reveals a definite knack for this kind of thing, but what is most startling is the extent to which it prophesies many shots and themes that would later resurface in Bava's own work as a director. The images of Pecorino popping out of the ground are very reminiscent of the reviving dead in the last reel of Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World, and indeed the moment in which he hops onto Peppe's back and rides him like a devil indicates that Bava had already read Nikolai Gogol's story "Viy," which would later become the basis of his directorial debut, La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday. Most amazing of all is the way the sequence sets up shots only to rip away the illusions of cinema that produced them, often with only the slightest, slyest movement of the camera, making this the earliest example in Bava's work of perhaps the major theme of his directorial oeuvre: the wisdom of not trusting in what we can see with our own eyes. As such, the sequence is very much a dry run for the famous, Pirandello-like ending of his 1963 omnibus feature I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath.

The series' third and final entry, Papà diventa Mamma, is more successful as comedy than its immediate predecessor, though still not up to the high standards of the original La famiglia Passaguai. Here, Peppe—now working as a clothier—returns home after a very hard day, only to be dragged by his family, against his will, to an evening performance by the great hypnotist Bhorma (Luigi Pavese again!). After Bhorma demonstrates his talent by transforming a tall, skinny man into a boxer, a radio announcer into a man with speech impediments, and a humorless fellow (Alfredo Rizzo, the future star of L'ultima preda del vampiro/The Playgirls and the Vampire, 1960) into a man with a chronic laugh, Margherita beseeches the turbanned entertainer to do something to change her husband. When Peppe can describe himself only as a "padre de famiglia" ("the father of a family"), Bhorma tells him that he will then become a "madre di famiglia." After planting this suggestion in Peppe's subconscious, Bhoma falls off the stage and descends into a deep coma. What follows is a dramatic tour de force for

IN PAPÀ DIVENTA MAMMA, a stage hypnotist chooses Peppe Passaguai as his subject, convincing him that he is the mother of his family.

Fabrizi, who suddenly adopts feminine characteristics—wearing his wife's nightgown and bonnet to bed, stealing her facial cream, sewing loose buttons on his son's jacket, ironing and doing the laundry to the dismay of neighboring washer women. In the meantime, Margherita takes over Peppe's job at the clothing store, where she falls victim to the same jealous misunderstandings that formerly plagued her husband. When Bhorma recovers from his coma, the Passaguai family goes to his hospital bed to put an end to Peppe's spell, but the hypnotist's eyes are crossed and his command "You will no longer be a woman, but a man! A man! A man!" misses Peppe altogether and influences Margherita, who suddenly becomes very butch! A climactic rooftop chase sets everything right, and the trilogy ends with Peppe and Margherita in their kitchen, restored to their proper roles, sharing a laugh, a kiss and a cuddle—their only laugh, kiss or cuddle in the entire series. It is a sweet farewell to characters who, by now, had become quite beloved.

Bava's cinematography in these three films is characteristic of his work during this period. Static sets and backgrounds are enlivened and complicated with projected "fourth wall" shadows of baroque ironwork, lacework, latticework, venetian blinds, or simple cut-out frameworks, the latter suggesting incoming light from unseen windows. Foreground information is also used with painterly sensitivity: in the first film, an otherwise balmy-looking beachfront store is turned into a sweat shop by placing an overworked fan with ragged streamers in the foreground right; in the second, an interior view of an old woman's hovel shows a cat trying to find comfort on a cot in the foreground, making the woman seem not only poor, but lonely. Aside from the nightmare sequence, there are few outstanding visual effects, but one remembers the impressive shot in La famiglia Passaguai that begins as a close-up of Fabrizi's suffering face, deep inside the crowded shuttlebus bound for the beach, which then pulls away as the bus accelerates, disappearing down the long road; a similar shot in Papà diventa Mamma, in which Bava's camera jolts from the stage to the back of the Teatro Orpheum as Bhorma sends hypnotic commands into his audience, also commands attention. The latter film also contains an amusing scene in which the rotund Peppe, dressed in his wife's pajamas, cowers at the sight of a mouse—a trick prop attached to two strings which, when pulled apart at the rear, propel the mouse forward. A similar gadget—perhaps the very same one—would later figure in Bava's Schock/Beyond the Door II (1977).

Bava's visual ingenuity can also be felt in the funniest moment of the entire trilogy—in La famiglia Passaguai, when Peppe is buried in the sand by his children, leaving only his face exposed. When the children resume swimming, Peppe asks Margherita to cover his face with a handkerchief as a precaution to sunburn. After dutifully covering him, Margherita stands up from her own handkerchief to mind their toddler, and the wind blows it away. A helpful neighbor retrieves it, but moves it to the wrong side of Peppe—so, when Margherita returns, she plants her considerable heft right on her husband's face! Immediately feeling something is wrong, she jumps to her feet and looks dreadfully under the handkerchief, only to find Peppe's fat face smashed flat! (Bava photographed Fabrizi with the actor's face smooshed against a pane of glass.) Hilariously, Fabrizi's next two scenes initially avert his face only to reveal that his features are still flattened to one side, the revelation postponed longer and longer for richer comic effect. These trick shots are filmed entirely without light reflection or any other telltale signs that could have destroyed the illusion.

Fabrizi was a perfectionist, and surely one of the reasons he worked so well with Bava is that—however comfortable they became with one another—Bava was careful never to trespass on any of Fabrizi's many provinces. This sometimes meant holding his tongue, when Fabrizi did not accord him the same consideration and made decisions about special photographic effects.

"At one point, Fabrizi prepared a maquette of the now-famous saloon with the roof of a church," Bava remembered. "He had a tiny, complex, little thing built, with exact proportions; it cost quite a bundle. For fifteen days, the set designers and a ten-man crew labored to finish this thing. Then the day of shooting came; the lighting had to be just right, so we shot a zillion tests. I knew that we could have achieved the same effect by getting a photograph, trimming it, and pasting it on a sheet of glass, but I didn't say anything. I wasn't a meddler." [14]

RAF VALLONE as the soccer hero of GLI EROI DELLA DOMENICA.

Gli eroi della domenica

First released: December 30, 1952
B&W, 1.66:1, 98 minutes

Production: Rizzoli Film. Distributor: Cineriz. Finland: 4/23/54. Germany: Die Helden des Sonntags, ZDF (German TV), 6/25/72. Spain: Los Héros del Domingo, Cipesa Films.

Bava next photographed Gli eroi della domenica ("Sunday's Heroes"), the story of a girl (Cosetta Greco) who determines to corrupt the star player of her local soccer team (Raf Vallone) on the eve of an important game. The film, which featured Marcello Mastroianni in a secondary role, was directed by Mario Camerini and scripted by four different men, including Dino Risi, Franco Brusati, Lionello De Felice (Blasetti's assistant director on La corona di ferro and Fabiola) and, significantly, Ennio De Concini.

Born December 9, 1923, in Rome, De Concini began his career in collaboration in 1947, as a contributor to the script of Goffredo Alessandrini's L'ebreo errante/The Wandering Jew. In 1949, he formed an important alliance with Riccardo Freda, with whom he co-authored the screenplays of the Freda films Il tradimento/Double Cross (1949), La vendetta di Aquila Nera and Vedi Napoli e poi muori/See Naples Then Die (both 1951). Though neither man could have foretold it at the time, De Concini was destined to become the screenwriter for most of Bava's important films of the 1950s, and also the primary author of his directorial debut, La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday. Most of De Concini's script credits are shared, and it has been said by some eyewitnesses of the period that he was principally an idea man; that he would sell producers on a concept or a treatment, and leave the actual screenwriting to others. But, as we will see, there are thematic consistencies in De Concini's work that define him as something more than this.

Another important new alliance formed on this production was with Camerini's assistant director Paolo Heusch, who would later become a director in his own right and collaborate with Bava on the first Italian science fiction film, La morte viene dallo spazio/The Day the Sky Exploded (1958).

Though Gli eroi della domenica was a story absolutely rooted in everyday realism, it nevertheless called for Bava to summon all his arts of visual deception. For example, the film's climactic match between Milan and Palermo, held in the San Siro Stadium in Milan, was shot entirely without any audience in attendance.

"No audience!" confirms Corrado Bartoloni. "Mario Bava and the director Camerini always were telling us camera operators not to get the audience seats in the picture—because they were all empty! We had a 'ground zero' camera shooting towards the sky, and also a high-angled camera shooting towards the field, and we tried like hell not to get in each other's way!"

Gli eroi della domenica opened to lukewarm reviews that did little more than compare it favorably to a similarly themed early talkie, Mario Bonnard's Cinque à zero ("Five to Zero," 1932). It failed at the boxoffice when it was released in early 1953, but today in Italy, where the interest in soccer is at an all-time high, the film plays so frequently on television it has become something of a national mainstay.

14 Ibid.

SPARTACO: Sabina (Gianna Maria Canale) teaches Spartacus (Massimo Girotti) the meaning of temptation.

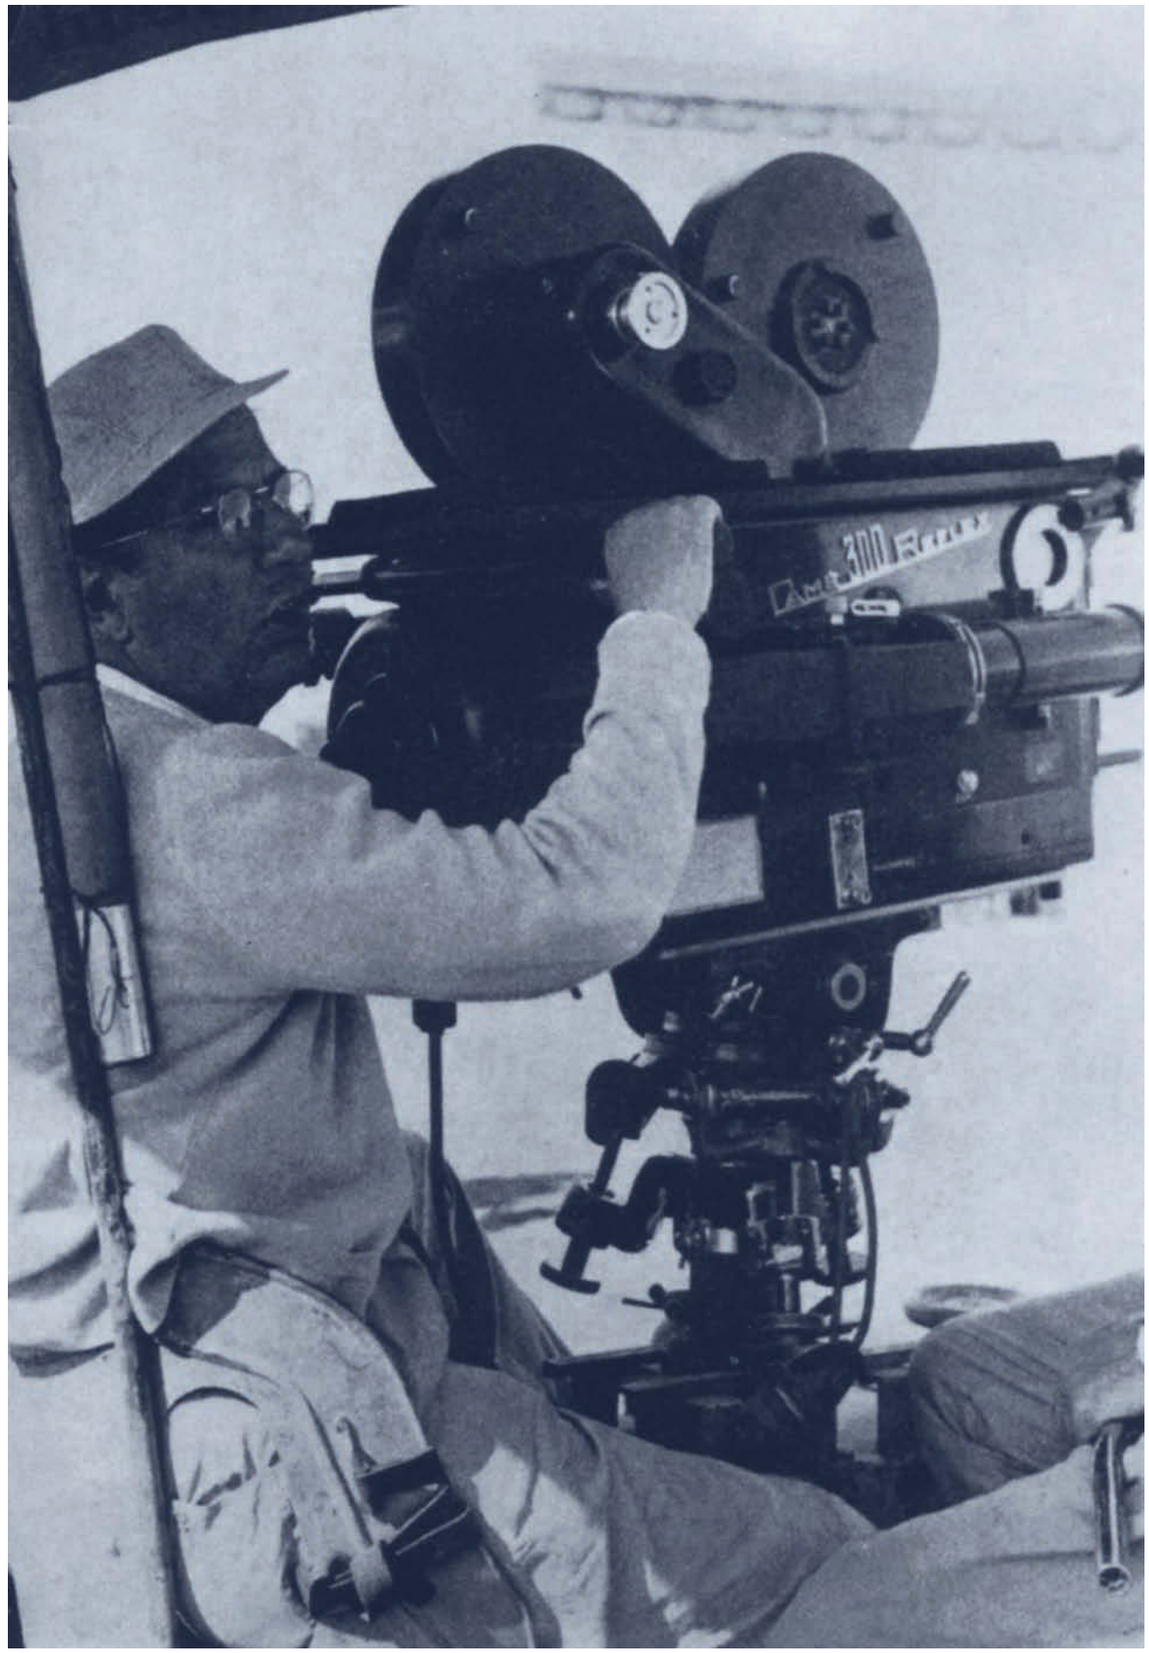
Melodrama, Myth, and History



ANOTHER anonymous, but known, assignment of this period found Mario Bava lending a helping hand to Hungarian cameraman Gábor Pogány (1915–99), who was photographing an ambitious new screen version of the Spartacus legend. For reasons unknown, Pogány was unable to shoot the crucial arena sequence of this film and recommended Bava to his director—a man who would become his new mentor, and arguably the most important professional acquaintance of his entire career.

DIRECTOR Riccardo Freda.

Riccardo Freda was born to Neapolitan parents in Alexandria, Egypt, on February 24, 1909. He attended school in Italy as a child, completing secondary school in Milan after the first World War. He planned to study writing at University, but his interest in literature was soon eclipsed by his passion for sculpture. He consolidated his interests in writing and sculpture by working as an art critic, and his critical eye led him in turn to an increasing infatuation with the cinema. Freda entered Rome's film school, the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia, at the age of 24 and spent five years (1937–43) writing scripts for the likes of Gennaro Righelli, Giacomo Gentilomo, and Raffaello Matarazzo, before directing his first film, Don Cesare di Bazan (1942), at the age of 33. [1] He quickly established himself as an expert at crafting swashbuckling romanzi such as Aquila nera/The Black Eagle (1946, the screen debut of Gina Lollobrigida), I miserabili/Les Miserables (1947, the debut of Marcello Mastroianni), Il cavaliere misterioso/The Gay Swordsman (1947, starring Vittorio Gassman as Casanova), and Il figlio di D'Artagnan/Son of D'Artagnan (1950).

GIANNA MARIA CANALE, promotional shot circa 1952.

Another key player in this enterprise was the Calabrese actress Gianna Maria Canale (b. 1927), who had made her screen debut as an extra in Carmine Gallone's Rigoletto (1946), and met Freda while playing a small supporting role in Aquila nera. In 1947, she entered the Miss Italia competition at Stresa and won second place, losing to Lucia Bosé but winning out over third-placed Gina Lollobrigida. After this tempered victory, Canale embarked on a love affair with Freda and subsequently graduated to speaking roles in his movies, such as Contessa Lehmann in Il cavaliere misterioso. For the next couple of years, she worked almost exclusively for Freda and his cameraman Rodolfo Lombardi, but it was not until she appeared in Guido Brignone's noir-styled Il bacio di una morta/Kiss of a Dead Woman (1949) that she found a cameraman capable of making her look like a star. That cameraman was Gábor Pogány.

Pogány's stark technique became stately in a heightened, fantastic context, which had the residual effect of bringing out Canale's statuesque qualities—the very qualities which had attracted Freda to her. In Pogány's lens, Miss Italia's second-best stood on equal footing with queens, sibyls, and dusky-eyed immortals. After the release of Il bacio di una morta, Pogány replaced Rodolfo Lombardi as Freda's cameraman of choice, beginning with Vedi Napoli e poi muori/See Naples Then Die (1951). With Pogány's help, the down-to-earth Canale (who can be seen in a rare, humanistic performance in the 1951 American film Go for Broke!, as an Italian woman surviving the war years as a prostitute) became the mystifying Sphinx at the center of her Egyptian lover's filmography. Despite popular belief, Freda and Canale never married, but they stayed together through the end of the decade; Freda's partnership with Pogány, on the other hand, lasted twice as long. The cameraman worked for Freda, off and on, through A doppia faccia/Double Face (1969), while Freda's final film Follia omicida/Murder Obsession (1980) was photographed by Pogány's son, Cristiano.

1 Freda had previously co-directed (with Flavio Calzavara), co-authored, and acted in Piccoli naufraghi (1938).

FRENCH affiche.

Spartaco

First released: January 28, 1953
B&W, 1.66:1, 120 minutes

Production: Consorzio Spartacus, Api Film (Rome), Rialto Film (Paris). Distributor: Api Film. Finland: 9/2/55. France: Spartacus, Rialto Films, 1953. Germany: Spartacus, der Rebell von Rom, "Spartacus, the Rebel of Rome," 7/30/53. Mexico: Espartaco, el Gladiador de Tracia, Jorge M. Dada. UK: Spartacus the Gladiator, International Film Distributors Ltd., 9/53, 93m 55s, Certificate "A," passed with cuts. US: The Sins of Rome, RKO Radio Pictures, 6/54, 71m.

Gábor Pogány's second collaboration with Riccardo Freda was Spartaco ("Spartacus"), a pointed attempt to bring the gladiator film back home to Rome in the wake of MGM's Quo Vadis. This Italian/French co-production was the first Spartacus film of the sound era, preceded by two Italian silents, both also titled Spartaco (made respectively in 1915 and 1918). These movies were based on the exploits of a true historical figure, a Thracian warrior slave who led other Gaul and Thracian slaves to rebellion against Rome, circa 73 B.C., after organizing their escape from a gladiator training school in Capua. The revolution was the longest and bloodiest of its kind, lasting two years, until Marcus Licinius Crassus finally dealt death to Spartacus on the battlefield, crucifying his surviving forces as a gruesome example along the Via Appia. Prompting Freda into action was not only the worldwide boxoffice success of Quo Vadis, but also the publication in late 1951 of Spartacus, a best-selling novel by the American author, Howard Fast. As the story was based on actual history, it was unnecessary for Freda to acquire the screen rights to Fast's novel, but the existence of the book did prevent the film from carrying its original title when it was released abroad.

Knowing that the film's arena sequences would involve lions, and thus a certain amount of special effects photography, Pogány recommended Bava to Freda—and thus began the most significant creative alliance of the early days of Italian fantasy cinema. Though Spartaco is not "a Bava film" per se, it was one of his most pivotal assignments, in terms of establishing his working relationships with Freda and Canale, and the development of his craft. It is also a crucial chapter in the slowly unfolding renaissance of the pepla, so crucial to the "Golden Age" of Italian film production (1956–66).

Spartaco opens with Spartacus (Massimo Girotti), a Thracian enlisted as a Roman centurion after the invasion of his country in 73 B.C., being arrested for interfering with the punishment of Amytis (The Tales of Hoffman's Ludmilla Tcherina), who objects when another centurion stabs her elderly father to death in cold blood. Shackled with other Thracian slaves, Spartacus is marched through the streets into Rome and taken to Crassus (Carlo Ninchi) for judgment. Crassus orders him to be made a slave, but an attempted escape proves Spartacus to be strong and resourceful—good gladiator material. He is therefore sent to be trained as a gladiator, but he doesn't respond favorably to being bullied; early in his stay, he lifts his instructor above his head and threatens to hurl him into a large, blazing brazier. To curb his temper, Spartacus is sent to a subterranean dungeon, where he is brutally whipped and left to stand in chains for many days. He is secretly visited by the sultry daughter of Crassus, Sabina (Canale), who has been smitten with him from the moment her father consigned him into slavery, and strokes his scars while taunting him with her beauty.

SABINA pays a clandestine visit to the rebel camp of Spartacus.

Some time later, a guard finds Spartacus hanging deadweight in his bonds, frees him, and begins to carry him upstairs—but the hero has been feigning illness to break free. Dodging Roman patrols in the streets, he finds his way to his mother's bedside, where Amytis is watching over the delirious old woman. Spartacus arrives just in time to see her die, and both he and Amytis are arrested soon after. Amytis is made the centerpiece of the next arena event hosted by Crassus, where she dances an exotic ballet based on the episode of the Sirens from The Odyssey, flitting ethereally about another dancer cast as Ulysses, tied to the mast of an enormous ship pooled in the center of the arena. At the close of her performance, soldiers tie Amytis' wrists together and hungry lions are set loose into the arena. Scheduled to make his debut as a gladiator, Spartacus rushes to her rescue. The lions run amok, some managing to maul and kill the soldiers who tied Amytis, and are promptly repelled from the arena by Spartacus. He frees Amytis and raises her into his strong arms. Her eyes burning with jealous rage, Sabina turns her thumb down, but the satisfied crowd objects—and so does Crassus, who cheerfully offers Spartacus his freedom. Embracing Amytis, Spartacus proudly refuses his liberty until all his people are released.

Returning to the gladiator school, Spartacus is greeted by a salute and oaths of solidarity from his fellows. That night, guards arrive to take Spartacus to Crassus and the gladiators rebel, attacking and murdering the guards with torches and tridents, and jumping to freedom in the Tiber.

Spartacus and Amytis meet on the road to Naples and pledge their love to one another. Pursued by troops led by Rufus (Vittorio Sanipoli), Spartacus plummets over a cliff into the sea; injured, he finds his way to Sabina, who nurses him back to health and tries to make him forget his responsibilities. The sound of a flogged slave's cries of pain restores his senses, and he returns to his encampment—weakened by lack of water and suspicions aroused by his second-in-command, Octavius (Yves Vincent)—just in time to help them escape from Rufus' troops. Spartacus' return reinforces the stance of the revolt, and Sabina comes to the camp with an invitation to meet with Crassus. During the meeting, Octavius takes it upon himself to stage a surprise attack. Spartacus, though on the verge of negotiating a peaceful truce, walks out on Crassus to die among his people. After the battle, Amytis walks the battlefield and finds Spartacus dying. He hands her his dagger, saying, "Today it failed, but someday it will be victorious."

In some ways, Spartaco is the missing link between the Italian silent epics and the Italian pepla, or "sword and sandal" films of the 1950s and '60s. Whereas Blasetti's La corona di ferro and Fabiola were respectively nearer to fairy tale and historical drama traditions, Spartaco is a stylized flight of fancy rooted in dramatic historic events. As Derek Elley points out in his excellent book The Epic Film, the film (scripted by Jean Ferry) has almost nothing to do with recorded history, nor does it use its material to make a pro-Zionist statement, as Stanley Kubrick's (Dalton Trumbo-scripted) Spartacus would do in 1960. Instead, Freda's version can be seen as a bold reclamation of Italian cinema traditions in the wake of the fallen Fascist era, combining the settings of Italian silent epics like Quo vadis? and Cabiria with the trappings of a highly stylized, baroque elegance that feels equally indebted the decadent imagery of Cecil B. DeMille and the telefoni bianchi of the 1930s. It also introduces elements that move beyond history into the realm of mythology; the story's attention to the almost supernatural power of Spartacus' enslavement to Sabina's beauty seems indebted to Ulysses' long enslavement on the isle of Circe—and echoes of this theme would resonate throughout the pepla to come, notably the "waters of forgetfulness" in Ercole e la regina di Lidia/Hercules Unchained, whose taste cause Hercules (Steve Reeves) to forget his wife and become the love slave of Omphale (Sylvia Lopez).

As historical dramas go, Spartaco is closer to a psychologically rich dream of history than to a straightforward dramatization of historical events. As a director, Freda was uninterested in reality, preferring to chart the schism between the surface of events and their subterranean currents of emotion. The film's main titles depict various historic friezes pertinent to the story, and throughout the picture, Freda observes events with a sculptor's eye: he is fond of introducing new scenes with indulgent establishing shots of period architecture that bespeak an era of large and ennobling ideas. When Spartacus escapes from the dungeon on the night of his mother's death, his plight is observed several times from on high, the camera placed on the shoulder of various sculptures of the city's founding fathers, whose silent watchfulness in the face of close brushes with the Roman guard patrols seems to bestow their implicit favor on his mission. Likewise, the static positioning of the actors in most shots emphasizes their actions as the subjects of future sculptures and friezes. (This fascination with immobility echoes throughout most of Freda's later work, reaching its apotheosis in 1962's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible

HUNDREDS assemble for the Verona arena sequence photographed by Mario Bava.

Dr. Hichcock, about a respected British surgeon who indulges his necrophilia by injecting his wife with a chemical that renders her completely passive in the face of his sexual advances.) Despite such predilections, and possibly due in part to the tensions they create, Freda nevertheless acquits himself here as a gifted action director. To argue that the film is merely well-photographed or well-edited is to ignore the large number of camera set-ups in, for example, the sequence of Spartacus' rescue of Amytis in the arena; without the preplanning evident in these facets, the sequence would not play nearly so kinetically or heroically as it does. In praising the film's components, mention must also be made of the thrilling score by Renzo Rossellini, one of his finest works.

The interiors of Spartaco were filmed at the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia, while most of the exteriors were filmed in Verona's Arena. [Some years later, Richard Fleischer would direct Dino De Laurentiis' production of Barabbas in the same locations.] Despite Gábor Pogány's sole credit as photographer, Riccardo Freda confessed in the foreword he wrote for this book that Mario Bava photographed "all" of the film's arena scenes, which encompass Ludmilla Tcherina's splendid "Circe" dance (almost certainly the high point of all peplum choreography), as well as some spectacular effects shots involving the interaction of Girotti and the lions. Most of the latter were accomplished with split-screen set-ups and by replacing the helmeted star with a helmeted lion trainer, but in two startling shots, Bava captures the horror of a lion tearing a man to pieces. On location, he filmed a close shot of the lion rending a mannequin limb from limb, but masked the lower left portion of the frame, where the dummy's head was secured in position. Later, in the studio, Bava rewound the film in the camera and, masking the previously exposed frame area, photographed a live actor's head screaming in pain, completing the illusion.

The arena sequence is magnificent, revelling in the newfound dimensional freedoms afforded by the deep-focus 30 mm lens, composing in depth whenever possible and giving the picture the overall look of a mythological frieze, such as those shown under the opening titles. (As the son of a sculptor, Bava was surely attuned to the look Freda sought to achieve.) In this arena sequence, Bava uses deep focus to bond Spartacus with his excited audience, always clearly visible behind his heroic profile. The sequence is finally crowned with the magnificent shot of Spartacus embracing Amytis under a beautiful sky (with clouds accentuated by a red filter) as he announces that he can never be free so long as his people remain enslaved; it is the first truly iconic shot of Bava's career, and it was this image that heralded Freda's film in all of its advertising.

Photographing the close shots of the lions in this sequence required Mario and Freda to work inside a protective cage. Bava's longtime friend and colleague Goffredo "Freddy" Unger remembers an anecdote about the production that Bava was fond of repeating. "They were shooting without sound, so while Bava was photographing these wild beasts, he was describing to Freda what he was shooting. 'Ah, Freda,' Bava said, 'these lions are so beautiful! They look so hungry and deadly. Wait a minute—one of them is coming this way! This is fantastic! He's getting closer . . . closer . . . closer . . . Freda, you will love this footage! Wait a minute! Where'd that lion go?' A second later, Freda pulled him away from his camera just in time; the lion was on top of the cage and reaching down for Bava with its claws!"

SPARTACUS rescues Amytis (Ludmilla Tcherina) from the dangers of the arena.

FRENCH grande affiche, art by René Bretonne.

Bava had been an unknown quantity to Freda when they first met in Verona, but he impressed the director greatly with his efficient handling of the arena scenes, which were shot early in production. Being a sculptor, Freda himself had experimented with building maquettes and was fascinated by special effects, which gave him and Bava a great deal in common. The two men talked, and moved quickly past a mutual professional respect to a personal simpatia based in their shared backgrounds and interests.

"[Bava] was always of good humor and his character was in perfect accord with mine," Freda wrote in his autobiography. "Endowed with an extraordinary technical ability, it amused him to find solutions to the most arduous problems. I can remember a time when the film stock we were using didn't have the correct sensitivity; he filmed a sunset scene with the characters in close-up, surpassing the known limitations of the stock. He was a master of special effects, capable of solving any technical problem, regardless of its difficulty."[2]

As Freda explains in his Foreword to this book, he began to accompany Bava to his home after work during this production—and since Mario did not reside in Verona, Freda's words imply that Bava's services were retained even after the filming of Spartaco returned to Rome. Bava introduced Freda to his father Eugenio and shown his handiworks as a sculptor and inventor. Bava also screened 16 mm prints of his short films for Freda, who was particularly impressed by L'orecchio and its animated renderings of how sound was received and processed by the human ear. In the course of their conversations about special effects, Bava was likely encouraged to suggest some tricks that could work to the benefit of their current project; consequently, as the evidence of the film itself suggests, he was adopted by the production to supervise various trick shots.

AMYTIS looks for her lost love amid speared bodies on the battlefields of defeat.

When I interviewed Cameron Mitchell for this book, he surprised me by mentioning, "Did you know that Mario worked on Ben-Hur?" I certainly didn't, so he proceeded to volunteer: "Absolutely! As I understand it, Bava masterminded a scene in . . . Ben-Hur, I believe it was . . . where a torch was stuck in somebody's face. He could take a mold of your face and give your face to me, using nothing more than latex and sculpture." I made a point of watching William Wyler's Ben-Hur (1959) and there is a scene in which Charlton Heston, escaping the slave ship, pushes a flaming torch into someone's face—but the very same thing occurs in Spartaco, so it is possible that Mitchell was confusing Ben-Hur and Spartaco (or Spartacus). Nevertheless, Heston's Ben-Hur was also shot in Rome, so Bava may have freelanced on that production as well. We may never know for sure.

At the moment of rebellion and escape from the gladiator training school, Spartacus is shown blinding a bullying centurion by pushing a flaming torch into his face. The effect was shot from behind, so it's quite possible that it wasn't necessary for Bava to take a mold of the actor's face and create a perfect, fire-proofed likeness to be worn by a stunt man. Indeed, when the effect was staged in Ben-Hur, it was shot from the front, and it's an effective trick even when viewed frame-by-frame, so perhaps Bava did engineer both moments. Wherever special effects were involved, Bava insisted on being the cameraman for those shots, because camera placement was crucial to the success of the illusion.

The majority of Spartaco looks like Gábor Pogány's work, yet certain scenes—Rufus' visit to Sabina in her room, the gladiator school and dungeon scenes, Sabina's veiled visit to the rebels' encampment, Amytis walking through the spear-studded battlefield with a torch looking for her dead lover, and several glamorous close-ups of Gianna Maria Canale—more strongly resemble the work of Bava. Pogány's style (in the context of Freda's films, anyway) tends to be realistic, static, with sculptural Rembrandt lighting delineating the actors like the figures in a wax museum. The result is stark and cold, whereas the exceptions listed above reflect the ripened, sensual quality that was becoming Bava's trademark. They also showcase his fondness for "fourth wall" shadowplay with inspired uses of props and set dressing to introduce a sense of movement in otherwise static shots—for example, the sheer, billowing curtains in Sabina's chamber, or the scene of Spartacus' beating in the dungeon, which unfolds entirely in silhouette on another prisoner's screaming face, as a barred window beside him looks out onto an ancient Roman riverside street produced in miniature.

The scene of Rufus' visit to Sabina's chamber opens with a shot of two handmaidens busying themselves with humble tasks, viewed through an ovoid-patterned screen. The camera glides to the left, revealing the silhouettes of other handmaidens moving dutifully in the background, until it comes to rest on Sabina, reclining on a bed—one leg raised, her knee bent. This vision of exotic languor, of feminine luxury ("You may fasten my sandal," Sabina sighs to Amytis, now one of her slaves), has no correlation in what I've seen of Pogány's other work, but it abounds in Bava's catalogue. Later, when the disguised Sabina pays a clandestine visit to Spartacus' encampment, there is a long-shot of her standing in the entrance to Spartacus' tent; the lighting and positioning of the actors is pure Pogány, but for one aspect. The element of Sabina in the shot is piercingly Bavian: Sabina looks like one of the oracles from Bava's Hercules films, her nose and mouth covered by a veil as a key light illuminates her painted eyes, and thus her identity, to the viewer.

2 Riccardo Freda, Divoratori di celluloide—50 anni di memorie cinematografiche e non (Milan, Italy: Emme Edizione–Il Formichiere, 1981), 80-130.

But why should the cameraman's duties be divided? Illness is certainly a possibility, but Freda's films were also notorious for running overschedule, and he sometimes utilized additional camera units to speed things along when a production began to run out of time or money. At least one scene indicates that Spartaco may have been running out of both: Spartacus' confession of fear to Artorigius (Carlo Giustini) on the night before the climactic battle. This was Massimo Girotti's big acting moment in the picture, and it was filmed in a single 2-minute take, without cutaways; one might expect that such an approach was deliberately chosen to enhance the scene's dramatic gravity, but in fact, the take used in the final cut is botched. As Girotti emotes in the foreground, in the background, a fly lands on his co-star's forehead, where it proceeds to take a long and very distracting walk. Watching the scene, you can see Giustini's torment, not wanting to swat the fly away and risk upstaging Girotti, who is upstaged anyway by this rude intrusion of nature. The only explanation for such a moment to be left in the picture is that retakes were, at this point, no longer possible.

Spartaco was a great success in Italy, earning close to half a billion

GIANNA MARIA CANALE takes the reins of the chariot sequence of TEODORA IMPERATRICE DI BISANZIO, which featured special effects contributions by Bava.

lire [$312,000]. When it was released in the United States as The Sins of Rome, over a quarter of its two-hour running time was cut by its distributor, RKO Pictures.[3] This version forfeits much of the original's scope and spectacle, jumping past the pomp and ceremony to get straight to the dialogue scenes, which themselves sound as though they were dubbed from a synopsis, without any attempt to translate the actual Italian dialogue. The British version—entitled Spartacus the Gladiator—evidently fared somewhat differently; whereas The Sins of Rome ends with the dying Spartacus handing his dagger to Amytis and saying, "Today it failed, but someday it will be victorious," Derek Elley describes Spartacus the Gladiator ending with Amytis' revelation that she is pregnant with the child of Spartacus, and that his dying gesture was meant as a bequest to his unborn son. There is no such inkling in the US release version, presumably because the couple are unmarried.[4] Freda later claimed that the American producers of Stanley Kubrick's 1960 version of Spartacus (that would be Kirk Douglas' company Bryna Productions) paid him $50,000 to keep his version out of circulation while their new version was playing.

Over the course of the next few years, with Bava's camerawork in great demand, Bava and Freda were unable to work together officially. But according to Freda, Bava performend small jobs on his next few pictures unofficially, providing them with trick shots, miniatures, and the occasional retake. For Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio/Theodora, Slave Empress (1954, one of Freda's best films), Bava executed some glass matte shots seen prior to, and during, the exciting chariot race sequence, and I suspect on grounds of style that he also substituted for Rodolfo Lombardi for the shooting of the remarkably horrific climax, in which the empress Theodora (Gianna Maria Canale)—wrongly accused of betraying her husband, the emperor Justinian (Georges Marchal)—is surrounded by the spears of guards and exposed to the revenge of a man earlier blinded with hot pokers for inadvertently allowing her escape. We will see this image turn up again in Bava's later work. Freda also told me that Bava contributed to his comedy Da qui all'eredità (1955) and his fine historical drama Beatrice Cenci (1956), for which Bava built and photographed the exterior miniatures seen in establishing shots.

MEXICAN lobby card.

Perdonami!

First released: February 18, 1953
B&W, 1.66:1, 104 minutes

Production: Rizzoli Film, Royal Film. Distributor: Dear Film. Germany: Verzeih mir, Deutsche Cosmopol, 1954. Mexico: Perdoname, Mario J. Dada. Spain: ¡Perdoname!

By far the most commercially successful film Bava photographed during this period was Perdonami! ("Forgive Me!"),[5] his final collaboration with director Mario Costa. Scripted by Costa, Anton Giulio Majano, Alessandro De Stefani, and Mario Monicelli, the film is a neorealist subject treated à la Hitchcock, with equal doses of romance, irony and suspense. It finds Bava taking decisive steps toward the visual style that would later achieve perfection in such Bava-directed films as Sei donne per l'assassino, a look fusing elements of film noir and fashion photography. Perdonami! also shares with that later film a modelling milieu, a beautiful woman who does ugly things, and an occasionally ominous score by Carlo Rustichelli, whose music accompanied Bava's images here for the first time. Paolo Heusch, who had assisted Mario Camerini on Bava's previous assignment, Gli eroi della domenica, assisted Costa on this production.

Perdonami! opens at night, as a group of thieves break into a stockyard to steal a waiting shipment of automobile tires. They are surprised in the act by Carlo, an armed security guard, who is shot dead by one of the thieves—we don't see by whom—before he can see them. Later that night, Anna (Antonella Lualdi) returns home from her job as a dressmaker to discover her older brother Nicola (Aldo Bufi Landi)—one of the thieves—hurriedly packing a suitcase to get out of town; he says only that he's in trouble, offering no further explanation. The next morning, Anna overhears some neighbors discussing the murder of Carlo, who lived in the apartment directly across from the flat she shares with her ailing mother and (now absent) brother. She puts two and two together, and becomes convinced that Nicola was responsible. Once Carlo is buried, she visits his grave to assuage her feelings of complicit guilt, and there she is observed from a distance by Carlo's brother Marco (Raf Vallone), who later sees her again from a window, while making a painful visit to the adjacent apartment. Needing to discuss his feelings with a friend, Marco crosses the courtyard and introduces himself to Anna. In time, they fall in love—but Anna harbors the terrible secret of her brother's involvement in Carlo's death, and when Marco seems to be nearing a proposal, she cuts off the relationship without explanation. Anna writes to Nicola, who writes back to admit his involvement in the theft but also to assure his sister that he was not the trigger man. Relieved, Anna rushes back into Marco's arms.

Unfortunately, by this time, Marco has found a night's solace in an empty fling with Vera (Tamara Lees), one of the models at the dressmaking shop where Anna works. After proposing to Anna, Marco tells the persistent Vera of his plans, and she does not take the rejection well. Some years later, after Anna's mother has died, and when Marco and Anna have been married long enough to have two young children, Vera reappears in the wake of her own divorce. She ingratiates herself back into Anna's life, as a former co-worker—this unsuspected relationship between his wife and ex-lover startles Marco, who coldly keeps his distance. One night, Anna is approached by an associate of her brother's, who offers her a chance to meet with him; Vera overhears the invitation and presumes that she is going to meet with a lover. Excited by the possibility of inheriting Anna's family, Vera informs Marco, who follows Anna and discovers her just as she is about to be raped by one of Nicola's cohorts. He misinterprets the attack as consensual and banishes her from their apartment, refusing to let her see their children, who are entrusted to Vera's craven care. Anna is given shelter by a family friend, Michele (Dante Maggio), but she descends into depression and delirium, eventually abducting her children and taking them to the edge of a precipice, where she plans a suicide solution to her problems. Fortunately, Marco discovers the errors of his ways in time, and catches Anna and their children as their lives hang in the balance. As Marco embraces them, he blurts out the film's title; it appears onscreen and the end titles roll.

F. Zannino, writing for Rassegna del Film, expressed a strong distaste for the film's stylized approach to a subject matter that seemed, to him, to call out for a more realistic (or neorealistic) treatment. "As can be easily deduced from the pathetic exclamation of its title, Mario Costa's Perdonami! (the print we viewed was minus the exclamation point) belongs to the genre of the fotoromanzo," he wrote. "The young Calabrese [protagonist] is introduced . . . like a species from a working-class Eldorado."

3 The Sins of Rome runs 31 minutes shorter than the 120-minute Spartaco.

4 Derek Elley, The Epic Film (London, Boston, Melbourne and Henley: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1984), 112.

5 The title "Perdonami!" appears in quotation marks on most, but reportedly not all, prints.

Though Zannino was not receptive to the innovation, he was perceptive in tracing the methods of the film's presentation to the fotoromanzi. The "actors" in these stories were models, and some of them went on to future film acting careers as a result. What was interesting about the fotoromanzi is their ability to generate escapist fantasy from the starting-point of neorealism, which remained an all-but-standardized form of Italy's cinematic expression. The characters in the fotoromanzi were all working-class, and they were all beset by problems that were initially complicated, and ultimately resolved, by love. They were perhaps truer to life than intellectuals like Zannino cared to admit, but they were also stylized in a way that could make them look phony to unsympathetic onlookers. Knowing that Bava's future work would be informed by his personal interest in pulp fantasy, science fiction, and comic strips, Perdonami! asserts itself in importance as an early indication of Bava's interest in pop culture and its expression in his work.

While the fotoromanzi could be cloying and tacky, Perdonami! illustrates what the genre could be in the hands of two confident artists, working with actors of conviction. Made almost two years before Hitchcock's Rear Window (1954), Costa's film boldly prefigures it by predicating its story on the proximity of two apartment windows, facing one another across a courtyard. (Even the art direction of the two films is similar.) Anna first indulges her feelings of complicity in Carlo's murder by walking onto her balcony and staring into the void of his darkened apartment window; when Marco later visits the apartment and observes Anna from the opposite vantage, they are matched in action, and thus destined to meet, because they encounter one another while examining an emptiness in their lives. In a manner of speaking, Death introduces them.

While Anna's troubled spirit is reflected in softly mottled lighting schemes, Marco emerges—after sharing his own early scenes of mourning and confusion with her—into a world of light. The scenes at his place of work, a shipbuilding factory, are bright and functional and impressive, full of swinging machinery, scale, purpose, and motion. Shadows converge in the bar where he meets Vera, with darkness foregrounded and occasionally relieved by painterly puffs of luminous cigarette smoke in the background. The next morning, after Marco and Vera have spent the night together, Vera wakes alone; Marco is already out of bed and dressed, eager to remove himself physically from what has happened, and the setting of sin is slashed with horizontal bars of light and shadow, a visual metaphor for his feelings of guilt about an animal act conducted in secret between two whispering adults. As Anna sinks into despair and depression, the look of her scenes becomes more diffuse, almost submarine in quality, while the corresponding scenes of Marco grow more hard-edged, initially a reflection of his unforgiving rigidity, but ultimately an expression of his strength and resolve as he races to Anna's rescue.

There is an unstudied confidence and natural uniformity of style about Perdonami! that was new to Bava's work. His previous achievements, however fine, could be emulatory, inconsistent, uneven due to budgetary or material constraints, even technically predictable at times; but with Perdonami! he turned out a glossy, yet earthy, product that was wholly comparable to the best film noir and melodrama cinematography being done in Hollywood.

ITALIAN locandina.

Il viale della speranza

First released: April 10, 1953
B&W, 1.66:1, 100 minutes

Production: Cinematografica Mambretti. Distributor: ENIC (Ente Nazionale Industrie Cinematografich).

Bava's next assignment, Dino Risi's Il viale della speranza ("Avenue of Hopes"), is a film of particular importance as it was the first movie to mythologize the fantasy factory of Cinecittà. After decades of being filed among the films feared "probably lost," it recently resurfaced on Italian television, confirming its significance—not only for what it represented to Italian filmgoers, but for the ways in which it differs to films from other countries that took a similar approach. In some ways, it is a derivative film—essentially a remake of Miss Italia, which follows three women as they pursue their dream of becoming movie stars, rather than beauty contest winners—but it suspends its duties as a melodrama often enough to present what is, one feels, a fairly honest depiction of how things worked in the Italian film industry at that time.

MARCELLO MASTROIANNI as a Cinecittà cameraman named Mario (!), consoling hopeful actress Luisa (Cosetta Greco) in IL VIALE DELLA SPERANZA.

Three young women—brown-haired Luisa (Cosetta Greco), blonde Giuditta (Liliana Bonfatti), and brunette Franca (Piera Simoni)—meet in Rome while sharing quarters in a rooming house, all harboring dreams of breaking into the movies. The film opens with Luisa and Giuditta riding the train that stops outside the entrance to Cinecittà, two glamorous apparitions standing out like specters among the ogling, everyday working-class they hope to escape. Getting directions to a casting call from an actor dressed as a Roman centurion, they find work as extras in an historical costume picture, but while Giuditta eagerly swallows her pride and dons a horrid wig and helmet, Luisa feels demeaned and starts to storm off the lot. She is intercepted by, of all people, a cameraman named Mario (Marcello Mastroianni), who takes her to the commissary and calms her down, assuring her that—with her looks—she'll be recognized soon enough and win the parts she wants. Cheered, Luisa dons the wig and helmet and plays along. That night at the rooming house, they are joined by Franca, another hopeful, and during dinner they meet another roomer, Stefania (Bianca Maria Fusari), who has a beautiful curtain of hair like Veronica Lake—but in the next of the film's surprises, she reveals that the hairstyle has been improvised to conceal the bruises inflicted by an abusive boyfriend. The girls are saved from feeling too sorry for her by a sudden invitation, from Mario and his pal Tonino (Pietro De Vico), to attend a party at the home of an important producer. At the party, Franca steals the limelight from her roommates by crossing the room in a form-fitting bathing suit, winning a choice modelling assignment; she also makes a play for Mario and is caught kissing him by Luisa, who leaves the party in tears. She is intercepted by a friendly guest, who takes her to his apartment for a drink, which turns into several and causes her to pass out, preventing her host from taking advantage of the situation. Luisa's failure to return home that night arouses Mario's jealousy. As the story progresses, we see the three women pursuing stardom by different routes: Luisa's hard work, Giuditta's zeal (she poses as a stenographer to get into an elusive producer's office), and Franca's dating of various producers. In the end, Franca gets her big break first, but does not have the necessary talent to make a go of it (we see her muff line after line in a faux hospital drama, the inside joke being that she is wearing a surgical mask and they never shoot with live sound at Cinecittà anyway); Giuditta, who indecisively sleeps with a two-sided photo on her night table (Errol Flynn on one side, and a picture of her hometown boyfriend on the other), has actually come to Rome to forget the lover who wouldn't propose to her, but she readily surrenders her acting ambitions when he lowers himself on bended knee at Cinecittà; and Luisa, on Mario's recommendation, is recruited to replace Franca in the hospital picture—and is discovered to look positively luminous on camera.

Working once again with art director Flavio Mogherini and assistant director Paolo Heusch, Bava here transcended even his high level of quality on Perdonami!, the subject matter giving him the latitude to light scenes even more luxuriantly. As well as he accounts for himself, one is nevertheless troubled by the feeling that Bava may have been the wrong cameraman for this assignment. His style inverts the trappings of reality and illusion, so that the scenes taking place at Cinecittà have a straightforward, almost documentary appearance, while the actresses return home from work in cars driven in front of rear-projection screens and reside in a rooming house of caressing, velveteen shadows, where every wall is splashed with a different gobo pattern—venetian blinds, bevelled glass, ironwork, an embroidered lace curtain. Of course, this was the way melodrama was filmed at the time—in high style—and Bava was already a master of these techniques; yet, from a contemporary perspective, one expects a bit more (that is, less) from a film so supposedly steeped in reality, or at least a bouquet of irony about the inversion. As it is, the women's "real" story too often looks like scenes from a film they've been making together.

This isn't to say the photography isn't effective. The scene of the furtive coatroom kiss between Mario and Franca is painted in half-tones that leave only bands of pure light across their eyes, emphasizing at once their mutual attraction and Franca's deceptive manipulation of her photographer, the man she must entrust with all she has—her image. Another scene, of an acting class being conducted near a boxing arena, is enlivened by an expressionistically lit background of a single man in the ring, shadow-boxing, as the students in the foreground are asked by a crotchety old teacher to produce facial expressions on demand. Particularly wonderful are the scenes of the activities at Cinecittà—Bava photographing his own place of work, his home away from home—especially when his camera tracks away from the action to reveal another, faux camera crew in place, supposedly filming the action, framed by the enticing mysteries of shadow-drenched set flats and catwalks. In the scene of Giuditta being pursued from active set to a procession of empty sets by her hometown boyfriend, Bava conveys a vivid sense of a place essentially dead that is given the occasional appearance of life by a small and dedicated crew of artisans.

DINA D'ORSINI comforts her terminally ill child (la piccola Patrizia Remiddi) in the melodrama BALOCCHI E PROFUMI.

The Rassegna del Film reviewer complimented Il viale della speranza, noting that it afforded the ideal "occasion for an Italian director to indict the world of motion picture production, but Risi has not done this . . . It's a humble, simple story . . . told to perfection." While the film had a certain value as a promotional tool for the rebuilt and soon-to-be-flourishing Cinecittà, it never confuses the illusions produced there with reality, and it confirms that the key to all success is talent and hard work. The difference between Risi's film (scripted by him, Ettore Margadonna, Gino De Santis, and Franco Cannarosso) and, say, William Wyler's A Star Is Born (1937) is that, regardless of how honest the Wyler film may be about the yearnings and failings of human beings, on a level most unusual for Hollywood at the time, it continues to perpetuate the image of Hollywood generated by all the movies that came before it. Risi's film, on the other hand, acknowledges that sex greases the gears of the industry, that sleeping one's way to the top can be an effective option for the right would-be actress, and that the business is really no more glamorous than sordid. Risi also doesn't demur from showing what the Italian cinema was sometimes up against, in terms of popular Italian acceptance. One memorable sequence depicts the travails of a small camera unit trying to capture a brief location shot of Luisa and Giuditta in the rain; it isn't raining, so they have to be rained upon by a hose (which seems to get everyone wet except them), and they are center-stage in a crowd of jeering onlookers, an apoplectic director, and policemen who want to see their non-existent permit.

Italian moviegoers did not support the opening of Il viale della speranza, and it became a commercial failure. Nevertheless, it is an important film: one of the most accessible of Bava's early years, a time capsule which affords some insight into the Italian film production of the early postwar era, and an important precursor to the far-more-sentimental tributes to Cinecittà made in later years by Federico Fellini.

Balocchi e profumi

First released: September 16, 1953
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes

Production, Distributor: S.A.P.

Bava's next job came about as a result of a chance meeting with a man named Natale Montillo, who owned a large number of movie theaters in Naples. Much as Eugenio Bava had observed prior to the founding of San Remo Film, Montillo saw an abundance of theaters and too much shared product, and he thought it might be to his advantage to produce some films for his theaters himself. Thus was born Balocchi e profumi ("Toys and Perfumes"), co-directed by Montillo and F. M. De Bernardi, a romantic Neapolitan melodrama.

"We shot this movie in Castellammare di Stabia," Corrado Bartoloni remembers. "This guy always paid us, and . . . well, I must tell you, Bava and I were never paid with checks . . . and we were always paid regularly!"

Based on a popular song of 1929 written by E. A. Mario, Balocchi e profumi is the story of Clara Florani (Dina D'Orsini), a single Neapolitan woman who lives with her young daughter, Corallina (la piccola Patrizia Remiddi). To provide her child with a family, she consents to marry Lorenzo (Cesare Danova), a wealthy suitor. When Corallina succumbs to a fatal illness, the marriage falls apart and Lorenzo leaves the embittered Clara for another woman—but time passes and heals, allowing him to return into her arms in time for the final curtain.

Critics praised the film's "colorful Neapolitan scenery" (though Balocchi e profumi was shot in black-and-white) and considered it to be a "slightly progressive" film of the melodramatic type. It did not perform well commercially, perhaps equally due to Montillo's inexperience as a distributor outside his own chain of theaters, and to the resistance of competing exhibitors outside his region. His co-director, De Bernardi, never had another screen credit, and Montillo himself would helm only one more, meager effort—1952's Rosalba, la fanciulla di Pompei.

Villa Borghese

First released: December 18, 1953
B&W, 1.66:1, 98 minutes

Production: Astoria Film (Rome), Sigma Cinevog (Paris). Distributor: Diana Film. Germany: Roemischer Reigen, "Roman Round Dance," German TV, 3/19/61. US: It Happened in the Park, Ellis Films Inc., 8/12/57.

A film of only moderate interest in Bava's filmography is Gianni Franciolini's Villa Borghese, a collection of six stories that take place in the famous Italian park in the course of a single day. Originally built by the nephew of Pope Paul V, the Cardinal Scipio Borghese, Villa Borghese is located in the heart of Rome and consists of sprawling gardens, adorned with carvings of eagles and dragons, surrounding the nominal family home of the Borgheses, which is now a museum, as it was at the time this film was made.

The first segment, "Serve e soldati" ("Servants and Soldiers"), is about a group of pretty, young governesses supervising children in the park. Some visiting Marines seek to impress the women; when one of them (Giulia Rubini) shows no interest in a persistent soldier (Antonio Cifariello), he spreads the rumor that she is frigid.

In "Pi-greco," a group of students notice one of their professors (François Périer) in the park and persuade Anna Maria (Anna Maria Ferrero) to trick him into an embrace so they can photograph it for blackmail purposes. The girl has an unexpectedly compassionate encounter with her teacher, who reveals that he is losing his sight and learning to read Braille. One of the students is played by Mario Girotti, who would later work with Bava again on Le meraviglie di Aladino/The Wonders of Aladdin (1961)—and even later, would change his name to Terence Hill and become a major star of Italian Westerns.

The film's dark and discontented tone grows lighter with the comedic "Incidente a Villa Borghese" ("Incident at Villa Borghese") in which Arturo Cavazzuti (Vittorio De Sica), a prominent attorney, begs off a social engagement with his wife and friends to spend the afternoon with a young client (Giovanna Ralli, the pretty daughter of La famiglia Passaguai). As they drive through the park, Arturo's car is accosted by the girl's fiance (Maurizio Arena), who raises such a stink about seeing them together that everyone in the vicinity comes rushing to the scene of the misunderstanding, including the girl's mother and the police, much to the lawyer's embarrassment.

ITALIAN locandina.

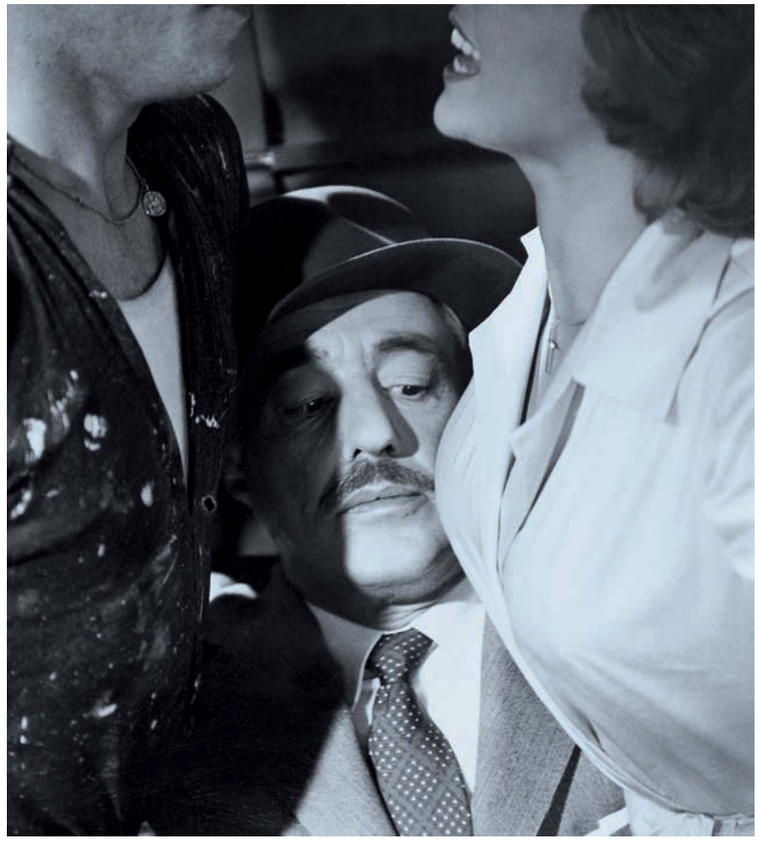
In "Il paraninfo" ("The Marriage Broker"), an unmarried woman (Margherita Autuori) in her 20s is brought to the park by her parents (Eduardo De Filippo, Leda Gloria) to meet the eponymous character (Enzo Turco) and the young man (Dino Curcio) they have found for her. Meeting this similarly graceless fellow, she becomes flustered, but when she flees the table—revealing the man's shoes and socks that this poor, impoverished woman is forced to wear even in public—her match goes after her and shows a side of warmth and sensitivity that brings her back.

Micheline Presle and Gérard Phillipe star in "Gli amanti" ("The Lovers") about a woman who accompanies her two children and their governess to the park, only to send them off on a boat ride so that she can meet her younger lover. Unknown to her, he has agreed to meet her only to announce that he cannot see her again because he is going to marry. The woman is so devastated that she slaps the face of her own young son, as he rushes back from the boat into her arms.

The final story, "Concorso di belezza" ("Beauty Contest"), is the film's highlight, about two prostitutes—the blonde romana Antonietta (Franca Valeri) and the bolognese brunette Elviara (Eloisa Cianni)—who work the park by night. The two are jealous rivals, because the blonde gets all of the business, but they are thrown together when a police raid forces them to flee the park into a nearby nightclub where the "Miss Cinema" beauty contest is being staged. While hiding from the law in a backstage dressing room, the girls are absorbed into the proceedings—Antonietta as a contestant, and Elviara as a judge! Antonietta wins the competition and drives away with a famous movie producer, while Elviara exits the club into the waiting arms of the police.



From the standpoint of Bava's cinematography, most of Villa Borghese is merely serviceable. The first five stories are shot on location, with natural daylight only subtly augmented with reflectors and such to accent the face of one actor over another. The compositions are seldom surprising, and the visual storytelling is limited throughout to the primary plane—counterpoint as opposed to contrast—a creative decision antithetical to Bava's own guiding aesthetic. There are a few of the lovely, shadow-sculpted close-ups that had become Bava's trademark touch, but on the whole, there seems little for him to do, other than follow the increasingly sentimental situations, one by one, to their inevitable conclusions—although there is evidence that Bava enjoyed filming the segment with De Sica, one of the most charismatic of all Italian film personalities. (There's a very funny shot of him, caught seated between the standing. arguing couple, as the girl's bosom is thrust into his face.)

The final story, however, takes place at night and grants Bava with opportunities to assert his personality more fully. The night scenes in the park—where harsh contrasts rule as white light bombards the peripheries of the night, clinging to the boughs of trees and the ends of roads—are pregnant with moods of illicitness, clandestine excitement, and danger. One remarkable shot attends an assignation between Elviara and a client (who originally asked for Antonietta), and shows them in the night-cloaked front seat of a car with only their eyes illuminated—intensifying the air of anonymity and fantasy that exists between them. These scenes very much belong to the same universe of decadent glamor as the Tamara Lees thread in Vita da cani and of course, Bava's later gialli La ragazza che sapeva troppo/Evil Eye and Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace, though at the time this film was made, the atmosphere Bava had captured remained placeless—a flavor still awaiting its genre—unless this was the fumettistico quality which had caused the critic of Perdonami! to complain. The ironic tone of the story, in which "Miss Cinema" is revealed to be a whore, is also very typical of Bava, who had little reverence for the business in which he worked, where craft counted for little, and where success was sometimes predicated on who slept with whom.

This segment is amusing and intriguing to look at, but on the whole, VITTORIO DE SICA comes between discontented lovers Maurizio Arena and Giovanna Ralli in VILLA BORGHESE.

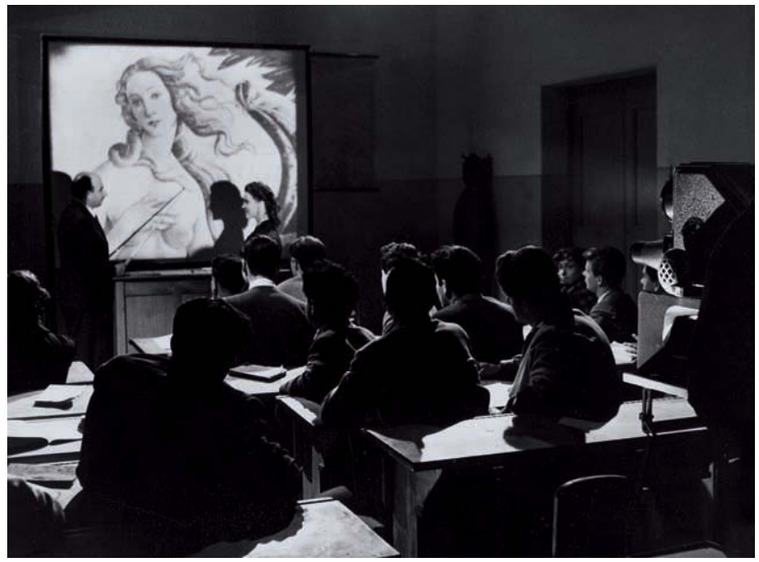
Villa Borghese is a bittersweet melodrama that is not significantly better than the average, postwar "woman's picture." It is not surprising that Bava never worked again for director Franciolini, who specialized in this kind of film—Siamo donne/We, the Women (1953; Alida Valli segment only), Racconti d'estate/Love on the Riviera (1958)—until his early death on January 1, 1960, at the age of 49.

Villa Borghese was given a small, belated US release in 1957 as It Happened in the Park, courtesy of Ellis Films, Inc. This art and exploitation-minded company made a practice of importing various European films and parading them under such sleazy titles as Wasted Lives, Gambling Hell, Inside a Girl's Dormitory, and The World's Most Beautiful Swindlers.

Terza liceo

First released: March 18, 1954
B&W, 1.66:1, 104 minutes



Production: INCIM (Industrie Cinematografiche Milanesi). Distributor: Diana Film. Finland: 11/23/56. US: High School.

A much more commercially successful assignment of this period was Terza liceo ("High School, Third Year"), the first feature film directed by Luciano Emmer, with whom Bava had collaborated on some earlier short films, including Disastri della guerra and La festa di Sant'Isidoro, both released in 1950. Primarily scripted by Sergio Amidei (the author of Rossellini's Paisà and Roma città apertà, also credited with the "idea" of Villa Borghese), Terza liceo chronicled the lives and loves of a group of high school students, from the first day of school to final exams.

Terza liceo performed well at the boxoffice because it was one of the earliest films from any country to specifically target a teenage audience. It did this by chronicling the situations of young adults, in and out of school, without the usual condescension. (Before this, teenagers were usually seen in Italian films only to lend the appearance of duration to marriages, or to provide established actors with a child they could conveniently slap without having the audience turn against them.)

ISABELLA REDI as a young woman with too many responsibilities in TERZA LICEO.

ITALIAN teens are taught about love through exposure to the classics.

Emmer's film is unmistakably a melodrama, a soap opera of sorts, but despite a prevalence of stereotypes and familiar situations (at least one of them dating back to Shakespeare), it succeeds in treating its young cast as real people, which was somewhat revolutionary for its time.

The story begins with the student body arriving for a new school year, and being promptly alienated from their studies by elderly professors incapable of making their lessons relevant. Things go a bit easier in philosophy class, which is instructed by Prof. Valenti (Bartolomeo Rossetti), a young teacher with a talent for involving his students; he rallies to their defense when the school board is enraged by an editorial in the school paper criticizing the old guard faculty. In the meantime, love blooms between various couples: a shy, serious boy falls for the most popular girl in class; another pair are forbidden to see each other by their parents (there is also a hint of possible, or brewing, sexual abuse in the girl's family, as her sculptor father is working on a nude statue that resembles her); and the most responsible of the girls (Isabella Redi)—who follows her school day with a part-time secretarial job and spends her evenings at home, caring for her widowed father and two younger siblings—finds love with a handsome young architect in her workplace. At one point, one of the girls plays a record of Nat King Cole's "Too Young," which too boldly underscores the film's thesis: that Italian youth of the post-war period had been forced to grow up quickly, and were deserving of their elders' respect and indulgence.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

Though innovative and well-meaning, Terza liceo is ultimately a failure. The script has the tone of a serious, neorealist work that wants to break new ground, but Emmer's direction (hamstrung by the severity of Italian film censorship) is too reticent and clinical. The young cast is attractive and occasionally talented, but they come across unnaturally, like models in a catalogue, sapped of all vitality by the film's insistent sense of poise. This is a teenage world, but nowhere is there any sense of youthful energy or enthusiasm—not in the awkward kissing scenes, nor in the "action" scenes of the characters getting around Rome on Vespa scooters, winning basketball games, or going off on skiing trips. Such sequences were obviously included to provide the film with some sparkle, some exuberance, but the camera (and thus, the audience) remains firmly sidelined throughout, eavesdropping on these lives without ever crossing the proscenium and becoming truly involved in them. As the authors of the Dizionario del cinema italiano report in their entry on the picture: "It is interesting to point out (to better understand the climate in which filmmakers were obliged to participate in the early '50s) that even an innocent, wholesome film like this one had troubles with the censors—because the members of a girl's basketball team were shown playing in shorts!"[6]

The film is a particular disappointment for Bava watchers, because—though all of his (by now) trademark touches are present and accounted-for (the "fourth wall" shadowplay, the madonna lighting on the girls' faces, the moments of intimacy filmed in silhouette, and so on)—there is no sense of spontaneity or creative involvement. There is a sense of a master stylist, miscast and bored to tears, coasting through the production by imitating himself.

According to Corrado Bartoloni, Bava's lack of involvement in the material became literal, for about one-third of the shoot: "Once, we were making a movie called Terza liceo with Luciano Emmer, and [Bava] left me alone for the last fifteen days, because he was busy on another set. He left me alone to shoot the movie with Emmer, who was a very strong director, and . . . I began to feel confident. In fact, sometimes, if Mario wasn't feeling well, he would go to the director and say, 'This will be Bartoloni's day.'" On these occasions, Ubaldo Terzano was temporarily promoted to camera operator, and the job of camera assistant was filled by Enrico Umetelli.

Bartoloni's story helps to explain why the film looks the way it does. He did what any competent cameraman would have done in such a situation—reproduce, as best he could, the style of the cameraman he was replacing, to ensure that the picture would be visually consistent throughout. Unfortunately, the studied nature of the cinematography adds to the overall staleness of the piece, which despite the absence of a name cast, nevertheless went on to earn four times as much money as Risi's Viale della speranza and only slightly less than Perdonami!

For all its faults, Terza liceo is worthy of note for its anticipation of the teen picture that would become a popular facet of American film production in the years ahead. It was reportedly acquired for US distribution and released under the title High School, but additional details have proven elusive.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

Bava's reputation as a fast, efficient cameraman now preceded him, and it was during this period that he also began to garner a reputation as a film doctor, filming pickup shots for other cameramen who found themselves out of their depth in action sequences, advising fellow filmmakers on the art of trick photography, and even taking over the reins from other directors—"as they took their siesta," he once described, perhaps with less humor than it seems. Consequently, from this point on, the full scope of Mario Bava's professional activities becomes impossible to chart definitively.

For example, some filmographies credit Bava with photographing the Tullio Covaz film Una croce senza nome ("A Gravestone Without a Name," 1952),[7] but the cameraman of credit is Carlo Carlini. Did Bava lend a hand to the production? It's possible, but filmographies seldom state the sources of their information. Confirmation certainly didn't came from Bava, who never took credit for assisting his fellow cameramen—partly because it might have appeared a backward step for a director of photography to be seen accepting work in secondary capacities, and partly because of the anonymous work ethic instilled in him by his father.

Cose da pazzi

First released: March 20, 1954
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes
Production: Kronos Film.
Distributor: Regionale.

Mario Bava's earlier assistance to Gábor Pogány during the production of Riccardo Freda's Spartaco had been much appreciated, and this positive experience led to another sort of collaboration on one of Bava's most distinguished early projects: Cose da pazzi ("Things Go Crazy," 1954), a bizarre psychological comedy directed by the great Viennese filmmaker Georg Wilhelm Pabst (1885–1967).

Best-known for his darkly erotic, silent collaborations with the striking American actress Louise Brooks—Die buchse der Pandora/Pandora's Box (1928) and Das tagebuch einer Verlorenen/Diary of a Lost Girl (1929)—G. W. Pabst had spent the past few years pursuing a dream project of bringing Homer's The Odyssey to the screen. In 1950, he had completed a script which he hoped to shoot in America, with Gregory Peck as Ulysses (the names of Clark Gable and Orson Welles were also bandied about). Most intriguingly, Pabst hoped to tempt Greta Garbo out of retirement with a dual role as Ulysses' wife Penelope and as his supernatural temptress, Circe. He presented the script to Garbo in New York, but the only response he received was no response at all. Not knowing what to do, he accepted the next offer that came along—to direct a series of staged operas in Florence and Verona. In Italy, he was able to get a new film off the ground—La voce del silenzio ("The Voice of Silence," 1953), which was signed by no fewer than thirteen screenwriters, including Jean Cocteau, and featured Aldo Fabrizi, Jean Marais, and Ettore Manni. The cameraman was Gábor Pogány, who was initially carried over

(along with Fabrizi) to Cose da pazzi, Pabst's first picture for his new production company, Kronos Film.

Never released in America, Cose da pazzi is a dark comedy about Dalia Rossi (Carla Del Poggio, the wife of Italian director Alberto Lattuada), who lives in the same apartment building as a mentally ill woman. One night, after the crazy woman wakes her entire neighborhood by standing on her balcony, ranting and throwing breakable objects into the street, an ambulance arrives to take her into protective custody—but the attendants mistakenly arrest Dalia, whose apartment occupies the same balcony. Dalia is committed to Villa Felicità, a mental hospital, where she has difficulty proving her sanity—and equal difficulty telling the doctors from the patients! When Dalia awakens from her sedative, she finds herself attended by Prof. Gnauli (Fabrizi, brilliant as always), who appears to be the head of the asylum until his examination of her culminates in the mad tickling of her bare feet! The true director of Villa Felicità is Prof. Ruíz (Enrico Viarisio), a manic-depressive with a dictatorial complex who decides to keep an eye on his patients by replacing the artwork on the walls of their rooms with enlarged photographs of himself—staring at the ones who need constant vigilance, and laughing maniacally at the ones who suffer from depression. As Ruíz and Gnauli continually overthrow one another, each taking over the asylum periodically to equally crazed effect, the truly calm and sane Dr. Forzi (Enrico Luzi) becomes convinced of Dalia's sanity and falls in love with her. Dalia manages to place an outside call to her fiance Enrico (Piero Palermini) and best friend Silvia (Rita Giannuzzi), who make plans to free her, but fall in love during their endeavor—no problem, as it leaves Dalia free to marry Dr. Forzi.

For some reason, Gábor Pogány worked only a short time on the picture; Mario Bava was brought in to complete the assignment—one presumes, on the joint recommendation of Pogány and Fabrizi. Indeed, Fabrizi may have suggested Bava on the basis of the special aptitude he showed for dark, surreal subjects during the filming of the nightmare sequence from La familiglia Passaguai fa fortuna. It seems reasonable to further speculate, on the basis of Pogány's own stark visual style (the best known example being Vittorio De Sica's La ciociara/Two Women, 1960), that his technique did not extend at that time to the range of paranoid illusion and optical effects that Bava could deliver in spades. Many Italian sources credit Bava and Pogány jointly with the

CARLA DEL POGGIO nestled amid trademark Bava lighting in COSE DA PAZZI.

DRS. GNAULI AND RUIZ (Aldo Fabrizi and Enrico Viarisio) in conference, representing the inmates and staff of the asylum.

6 R. Citti and R. Poppi, Dizionario del cinema italiano, I Film 2 (Rome, Italy: Gremese Editore, 1991), 360.

7 I have not seen Una croce senza nome, so, in the event Bava's participation is confirmed someday, it should be noted here that the film was produced by Produzione Cinematografica Mario Prodan e Cesare Torri and first released in Rome on November 21, 1952. Its only other known continental release was in Germany, where it appeared much later on German television under the title Ein Kreuz ohne Namen ("A Cross Without a Name") on November 15, 1963.

film's cinematography, but only Bava is credited onscreen.

Regardless of its quality, Cose da pazzi was a crushing commercial failure, earning roughly one-tenth as much as Spartaco; it ruined Pabst financially. His health also deteriorated, his diabetes trumped with Parkinson's Disease, and after many painful years of physical decline and professional inactivity, he died from a liver infection in 1967. Because he owned the property himself and so few prints were struck, Cose da pazzi was considered a lost film for decades, and is described as such even in fairly recent books devoted to Pabst. Fortunately, a print in excellent condition was rediscovered in the 1990s and acquired for distribution by Ripley's Films. It has since played on Italian television and been released on DVD.

Seen today, it is easy to understand why Cose da pazzi met with popular resistance at the time of its release; it was very much ahead of its time. A forerunner of films like Samuel Fuller's Shock Corridor (1963, which also told the story of a sane patient in a madhouse whose other inmates were used to venture socio-political commentary) and Phillipe De Broca's Le Roi de Coeur/King of Hearts (1966, which also tells a love story while questioning who is mad and who is sane), Cose da pazzi was perhaps the first film since Robert Wiene's Das Kabinett des Dr. Caligari/The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari (1919) to use a sanitarium for macabre/satirical purposes, as a mirror held up to society. Produced at a time when normalcy was prized by most people above all other traits, Pabst's film had the audacity to declare that craziness can be very attractive, to point out that everybody is crazy in one way or another—crazy to believe the things we believe, crazy to follow the leaders we elect—and to probe the craziness that underlies our everyday interests and even the craziness of falling in love.

Bava's photography is an elaborate exercise in shadowplay, bordering at times on German Expressionism, as befits the Wiene connection. Villa Felicità is a forbidding place of deep, gleaming white corridors, where the shadows cast by barred windows are visible everywhere: erect, angled, distorted. He also lights the objects of madness—one patient's strange bicycle contraption, the dress and mannequin collection of another—in such a way that they are given pride of place, not in terms of composition, but in terms of illumination; he makes them look prized and special, cut off from their surrounding reality. The inescapable delirium of the place extends to the presence of a revolving door that always brings one back to the same spot, foreshadowing the Escher-like dislocations of time and space that would proliferate in Bava's Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!. Prof. Ruíz interrogates his patients a la Dr. Mabuse, seated behind a desk while blazing a spotlight in their direction, blinding them to all but his imperious shadow. As disturbing as all of this seems to be, it's actually quite innocent and not nearly as dangerous a place as the real world. At one point, Dalia is helped to escape by a man claiming to be a visiting journalist, who leads her to a nearby abandoned shack, produces a toy airplane, and tells her that it cannot fly them away until it has been fuelled . . . with her blood. She is rescued in the nick of time by Dr. Forzi, but in context, this encounter with madness outside the madhouse is so shocking that her subsequent return to Villa Felicità feels quite calming and sheltering in its whimsy and stylish abstraction. Bava's complex, angular lighting in Cose da pazzi is, in some ways, an antecedent of Vittorio Storaro's memorable cinematography in Bernardo Bertolucci's Il conformista/The Conformist (1970).

Bava's camera operator on this film, Corrado Bartoloni, reflected on a recent Italian TV broadcast of Cose da pazzi: "I saw this movie again yesterday and I said to myself, 'I can't believe how great Bava was!' You know, seeing those black-and-white movies nowadays, it's incredible. He had this style of photography—we used to call it 'French photography'—and I am still amazed, watching it today. I can remember watching the dailies in the screening room, and whenever I saw Mario's work after a reel of anyone else's, I had to turn to him and say, 'You're the best! How can anyone deny it? You're the best!'"

MARIA FIORE as Graziella, the tragic heroine of Giorgio Bianchi's haunting romanza.

Graziella

First released: October 28, 1954
B&W, 1.66:1, 95 minutes

Production: Trionfalcine.
Distributor: Cei–Incom.

Bava's second job for director Giorgio Bianchi (Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . .) was Graziella, based on an "homonymous" tale by Alphonse de Lamartine. This late 17th/early 18th century romantic melodrama addresses the potential for disaster when attraction occurs between the working and upper classes. It therefore covers much the same ground as Bava's debut as a cameraman, L'avventura di Annabella, though in tragic rather than comic terms.

The film's complicated plot defies attempts to compress it. The author Alphonse de Lamartine (Jean-Pierre Mocky) arrives in Naples late one evening, needing to reach the Neapolitan isle of Procida, home to his brother Gerard (Michele Sakara). Despite threatening weather, he tempts old Andrea (Francesco Tomolillo) with money to get him to his destination; the boat barely makes it to Procida intact, and the old man offers sanctuary to Alphonse till the storm blows over. In the boatman's humble cottage, the writer is introduced to Andrea's wife Assunta (Tina Pica) and granddaughter Graziella (Maria Fiore), who pays him special attention.

The next day, Andrea's boat is found destroyed by the tides. Feeling at fault, Alfonse agrees to finance the building of a larger, more resilient vessel. Alfonse and Graziella break away from a religious procession in the village to gambol in the hills, where she confidentially shows him the abandoned shelter where she spends time by herself. As the procession passes by in the distance, Graziella veils herself and they kneel together—like a couple about to be married. That night, at a town festivity, Ceccho (Franco Nicotra)—Graziella's boyfriend since childhood—sees her obvious affection for the newcomer and leaves in a jealous huff, but the new couple are too happy to notice. As a writer, Alfonse is staggered by the discovery that no one in Graziella's family knows how to read. After dinner, he reads them a chapter from a cheap romance novel they happen to own, always a source of mystery for them, and the reading moves Graziella to tears.

Alfonse is summoned back to his family's vacation home on the mainland, and Graziella carves a keepsake for him: a paperweight bearing the likeness of her secret sanctum. She sends her grandfather to deliver it, but the old peasant is automatically turned away by the condescending servant at the door. Graziella receives her gift back with wounded pride, and hides it guiltily behind the legs of Jesus on the crucifix above her bedroom door.

MARIA FIORE*'s mood darkens as she breaks the keepsake made for her lover.*

When Alfonse returns to the island, he learns that Graziella has been missing for days. Her family is distraught, but he knows exactly where to find her: she is in her hilltop sanctuary, where she has been praying for his return to a self-made shrine of the Virgin Mary. She has cut her long, beautiful hair as a sacrifice to the Holy Mother. They kiss and Alphonse promises never to leave her again. A few days later, when Graziella asks Alfonse about his life in Paris, he responds elaborately, going so far as to describe the beautiful clothes that Parisian women wear. Graziella decides to surprise him by having a special dress and bonnet made, but when he stumbles into her dressmaking session and tells her, eyes agog, that she's bound to win First Prize at the masquerade, her heart is broken. He dries her tears by confessing that he loves her.

Alfonse is summoned back to Paris by the French consul. He promises Graziella that he will return as quickly as he can, and as she fetches her paperweight to accompany him, it falls and breaks—a bad omen, but Alfonse puts a good light on it by suggesting that each of them carry half. As he and the consul are rowed out to a large ship, Graziella runs out to a windy precipice and watches him leave through tearful eyes. She calls out her own declaration of love to him, but he doesn't hear, and she collapses in despair.

Detained in Paris, Alfonse is miserable. Weeks pass, and he sends a letter to Graziella reaffirming his love and vow to return. Unbeknownst to him, Graziella has fallen ill after her prolonged exposure to the high winds, but when the letter arrives after a doctor's housecall, she becomes reanimated with curiosity and chases her doctor, begging him to read it to her. She is overjoyed by its contents, but going outside in an already vulnerable state worsens her condition and she becomes consumptive.

In Paris, Alfonse's parents throw a party in the hopes of attracting him to a more suitable match. When he realizes their goal and their callous indifference to his stated intention to marry Graziella, he defies them by departing once again for Procida. He arrives in time to see his beloved's funeral procession—a visual rhyme to the religious procession which he and Graziella witnessed the day they fell in love. As he stands where she stood the last time she saw him, he watches with tearful eyes as her white coffin is rowed out to sea.

Graziella is an intriguing and picturesque romance, effectively interwoven with its faraway time and place, reminiscent in several ways of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's I Know Where I'm Going! (1945)—another story about two people from different cultures and backgrounds who find love when they are thrown together by fate on a strange island on a stormy night. But whereas the Powell and Pressburger film encompasses the whimsical, magical, passionate, and gnostic all at once, Bianchi's film is grave and baleful, overcast by dark fate and superstition. Though the film hasn't any humor, it evinces tremendous compassion for its characters; the sequence in which Graziella coerces Alfonse into reading to her family the first pages of what is apparently a low brow, romantic novel (called Paolo e Virginie)—with Graziella shedding real tears over the fictional clichés and her grandmother responding to the descriptions of their actions with complete belief in these ciphers as real people—is profoundly affecting, and makes one appreciate, with Alfonse, the magic of everyday things that educated people take for granted and learn to view with condescension, if not derision.

Viewers who approach Graziella with a knowledge of Bava's later directorial efforts will be surprised to find a number of affinities with them. The beachfront and other exterior settings are evocative of La frusta e il corpo, and Mocky's period wardrobe is nearly identical to that worn by Christopher Lee in the later film. The two films also seem to occupy the same Brontëan universe, in which forbidden love stands in stark contrast to the repressive structure of family. Likewise, some of the settings in Procida—particularly the net-strewn rooms of Andrea's cottage—are nearly identical to those of Gorka's family in I tre volti della paura or, closer still, to the village tavern in Operazione paura. In fact, the interiors of Graziella were shot, like some of Bava's later horror films, at Titanus Studios, so they may well have shared set components and actual sound stage area. The climactic funeral procession and burial at sea look ahead to Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (1961), as well.

Bava's contribution to Graziella is difficult to overestimate, because its appeal is largely visual and atmospheric. Maria Fiore—born Jolanda di Fiore in 1935—was only 19 at the time of filming; she emotes well, but she is a fairly plain young woman, and even when her face is angelically haloed with Bava's velvety madonna lighting, one can't help wondering how much more striking the movie would have been with a more compelling actress in the role. Bava's lighting lends a specific commentary to Fiore's performance throughout: he highlights her eyes when tears are about to flow, enshrines her face with light when she adores or is adored, mottles her sickbed with shadows that she rises above by sitting erect as Alphonse's letter is handed to her, and she dies offscreen, her passing indicated only by the exclamation of her grandmother. Always attentive to the eyes of actors, Bava also pays special attention to a wrinkle under Mocky's left eye, highlighting it selectively at moments when Alphonse feels tenderly toward Graziella.

ALFONSE (Jean-Pierre Mocky) returns to claim his beloved but finds her already permanently, morbidly distracted.

Bava's mastery of lighting and composition were, by now, now fully matured and benefitted from the atmospheric settings of art director Veniero Colasanti—who would continue to work with Bava on his next few assignments. Bava makes this familiar tragedy compelling with an exacting attention to environments and their emotional resonance. The story takes us to religious processions and elaborately choreographed parties replete with smoke and fireworks and crane shots, but nothing is quite as dazzling as the simplicity of Andrea's cottage in Procida, especially the fireplace where Graziella dries Alphonse's feet when he comes in from the storm. There is a small fire, and some wisps of smoke, but pouring forth from the hearth is so much light that the viewer feels its heat, and the illusion is sold a bit more by someone's offscreen hand flickering the light cast onto the wall at the right. In this cottage, it's what we don't see that makes the deepest impression: the crucifix where Graziella later hides her carved memento, for instance, is first introduced as a silhouette cast on the wall outside her door. In the scene of the party in Paris, however, Bava takes the extreme opposite approach and so overwhelms every set-up with baroque content—antique furniture, rococo wall moldings, chandeliers, opulent clothing, women's hats with extraordinary plumage—that the eye overloads and retains nothing but a (desired) hollow impression. The distance between these two worlds is further emphasized by Bava's continued use of deep focus photography, which allows some of the film's conversations (notably one between Graziella and her estranged boyfriend Ceccho) to be conducted literally in depth.

Ulisse

First released: October 6, 1954
Technicolor, 1.66:1, 108 minutes

Production: Lux Film. Distributor: Lux Film. Austria: 2/55. Finland: 9/23/55. Germany: Fahrten des Odysseus, "The Adventures of Ulysses," 2/8/55, 113m. UK: Ulysses, Archway Film Distribution Ltd., 6/55, 108m 32s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts. US: Ulysses, Paramount Pictures, 10/55, 104m.

When production on Cose di pazzi ended, G. W. Pabst turned his attentions once again to filming The Odyssey, now in partnership with Dino De Laurentiis as producer. Surprisingly, this bedrock of all adventure stories had never been filmed in its entirety; all previous adaptations had been one- or two-reelers, beginning with Georges Méliès' Ile de Calypso: Ulysse e le Géant Polyphème (1905), Pathé Cinema's La retour de Ulysse (1908, co-directed by Charles De Bargy and André Calmettes, running only 925 feet) and, the longest of the few, the Milan-made Odissea (1911), directed by Giuseppe de Liguoro (1869–1944).

Because the epic that came to be known as Ulisse was ultimately financed by Lux Film, co-produced by Carlo Ponti and Dino De Laurentiis, designed by Flavio Mogherini on the sound stages at the new Ponti–De Laurentiis Studio, and entered preproduction with Pabst at the helm—and because so much special effects photography was required by the material—it is inconceivable that Mario Bava was not also invited to be part of this "old home week" production, at least in its early phases. However, as the project matured in pre-production, Lux joined forces with Paramount in America, Kirk Douglas was cast as Ulysses, and Pabst—whose last two films had been boxoffice failures—was replaced as director by Mario Camerini. Camerini's signing would not in itself be enough to knock Bava off the roster, because Camerini's recent film Gli eroi della domenica had also been shot by Bava. But Paramount (and probably Kirk Douglas as well) would have insisted on protecting their investment by using an American director of photography, and this is the likeliest reason why cameraman Harold "Hal" Rosson (1895–1988) was brought over to Rome. Production began on May 18, 1953, in Porto Ercole.

Though it is grandly entertaining and contains some of the most poignant moments found in any mythological film, Ulisse is awkwardly constructed; it begins in the middle of the story, as the amnesiac Ulysses struggles to recall his memory on the eve of his wedding to Nausicaa (Rosanna Podestà, a carry-over from Pabst's La voce del silenzio), and thus looks back on a few prior adventures before he recovers himself and sails home to his wife Penelope (Silvana Mangano, the wife of Dino De Laurentiis) in Ithaca, where he must overcome the arrogant suitors who would claim his bride and throne. This odd, inside-out construction may be due to too many cooks in the kitchen, or perhaps it is evidence of an editor (in this case, Leo Catozzo) struggling to combine the conflicting visions of two different directors into a coherent story. (In this respect, Ulisse is very much like 1940's The Thief of Bagdad, which was signed by three directors, including Michael Powell.) In his autobiography The Ragman's Son, Kirk Douglas admits that he and "the director" (whose name he evidently didn't recall) were "on the outs" during the production, and didn't come to a truce until the wrap party, where the actor kneeled and serenaded Camerini. Their adversarial relationship may also have contributed to a failure to get everything needed into the can.

Looking at Ulisse, made in the last year that Technicolor's three-strip camera was used, it is obvious to the trained eye that Rosson was the principal cameraman. The brother of noted director Robert Rosson, he had supervised some extremely inventive color photography in Hollywood, including several cornerstones of the Technicolor process, such as The Wizard of Oz (1939), Duel in the Sun (1946), and the Esther Williams swim pageant Dangerous When Wet (1953), and Ulisse shares the visual character of those films: a bright, colorful look shot through with undercurrents of darkness. Despite Rosson's outstanding credentials, It is questionable that anyone but Mario Bava was responsible for lighting the scenes involving Circe (also played by Mangano, whose dual role was one of several ideas retained from Pabst's 1950 screenplay). These scenes are so remarkably different in approach and texture to everything else in the picture, including other fantastic scenes such as the encounter with the cyclops Polyphemus—and so true to Bava's own aesthetics, Rosson's involvement in them becomes dubious.

Throughout her scenes as Circe, Mangano is bathed in an uncanny aqua-green light that imbues her with a supernatural presence, and the weeping walls of her cave are similarly illuminated with painterly daubs of irrational, saturated gel lighting—giving it the feel of the proverbial cake left out in the rain. These sequences, complimented by Flavio Mogherini's magnificent set design, are identical to the photographic effects Bava would later achieve in Ercole e la regina di Lidia/Hercules Unchained, and the bizarre attendance of Circe's handmaidens in their anachronistic Belle Epoque gowns and black scarves likewise distinctly foreshadows the Hesperides in Bava's Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World. The sequence continues with Circe conjuring various spirits from the Beyond to persuade Ulysses to stay with her, full of typical Bavian smoke to "animate" an otherwise inanimate sequence, and ends with a clincher: as Circe looks into the camera and says, "Go then, if that is your choice—the sea is waiting!" Mangano's close-up is curdled with a "water glass," a camera prop from Mario Bava's personal arsenal. This pane of partially clear, partially rippled glass was a present given to Mario by his father Eugenio, who had manufactured it for his own use in the days of the silent cinema. In his later films as a director, Bava was fond of using the "water glass" to illustrate hallucinations and moments of derangement; here, it draws the curtain on Ulysses' protracted enchantment, and provides a bridge to a shot of the rolling sea. The presence of this unique camera prop in the sequence would seem to clinch Bava's presence on the set. Mangano's dual role as the witch Circe and as Ulysses' faithfully chaste wife Penelope can also be seen as a seminal influence on a recurring theme in Bava's later horror pictures: the way that Good and Evil can harmonize in the face of a beautiful woman. (One of the seven credited screenwriters on Ulisse was Ennio De Concini, who would later script La maschera del demonio/ Black Sunday.)

ITALIAN fotobusta.

The main titles of the English-language version credit "director of photography" Rosson and "cameraman" Mario Parapetti with the film's cinematography. Parapetti—who later photographed Le sette fatiche di Ali Babà (1961) and Il mostro di Venezia/The Embalmer (1966), among other undistinguished features, without ever becoming a member of AIC—was a Lux contract camera operator at the time, and his prominent screen credit here betrays Paramount's lack of understanding about his professional provinces, and a curious determination to share Rosson's credit with an Italian cameraman. We get an idea of how imprecise Italian screen credits can be when we compare those of Ulisse to the Italian print of another Lux production shot at roughly the same time: Pietro Francisci's Attila (1954). Here, the cinematography is credited to Aldo Tonti, AIC, while listed among his four (!) credited camera operators is the legendary American cinematographer, Karl Struss! This is one of the most preposterous examples of Italian quota juggling, because Struss (who actually photographed all of Anthony Quinn's scenes) had literally been a leading Hollywood cameraman since Tonti was 10 years old! (Tonti must have been profoundly embarrassed to see Struss relegated to the onscreen status of his dogsbody, but at least the film had the official appearance of having an Italian cameraman—which helped it to procure Italian funding.)

If Hal Rosson was responsible for shooting every scene in Ulisse, it would be the first and only time an American cameraman ever took complete charge of an Italian picture; when cameramen were imported, the scenes involving primarily Italian talent were usually handled separately, regarded as second unit shooting, in a manner of speaking. For the scenes involving Mangano, Kirk Douglas may well have bowed to his co-star's greater need to communicate with her director of photography. In such instances, Rosson would not have been replaced by his camera operator, as the main titles suggest, but by another AIC cameraman brought in to supplement his work without credit. Given his prior working experience with literally all of the film's principal crew, Mario Bava would have been at the top of a list of such men. If true, Bava's involvement in the Circe scenes would mean that he had already conceptualized some of his most advanced lighting ideas at a time when his own career had not yet presented him with the opportunity to shoot a film in color.

While I feel fairly confident of Bava's covert involvement in this portion of the film's cinematography, I am similarly convinced he had nothing whatever to do with its special effects unit. Ulisse's "special photographic effects" are credited to Eugen Schüfftan ("Shuftan" onscreen), the optical effects technician who had built his reputation on the special matte and miniature effects shots he contributed to Fritz Lang's Metropolis (1926), an elaboration on principles first presented onscreen by Eugenio Bava a decade earlier. Like Rosson, Schüfftan was a known quantity in Hollywood; a successful cameraman in Germany since 1930, he had relocated to France in 1936 and finally moved to America in the early 1940s, where he assisted his old friend Edgar G. Ulmer by anonymously photographing such low-budget cheapies as Bluebeard (1944), Club Havana (1945) and The Wife of Monte Cristo (1946). At the time of Ulisse, Schüfftan had moved back to France and was working steadily. To have his name on a feature brought it international prestige, and it's possible that his signing was responsible for displacing Bava from the picture officially. The film's special effects—which are basically limited to miniature shots of Ulysses' ship being tossed about in a turbulent seastorm, and the sequence with Polyphemus—have neither the look nor personality of Bava's work, and especially in the Polyphemus sequence, they commit several basic errors that work against their effectiveness.

For example, when the cyclops Polyphemus (played by Oscar Andriani, a cast alumnus of Pabst's Cose da pazzi) is introduced by having his shadow cast gigantically on the wall of the cave visible behind Ulysses and his men, it is obviously not the shadow of a giant, but that of a normal man cast at a distance to make it look larger than normal. Likewise, Schüfftan neglected to photograph the monster's movements with an overcranked camera, which would have had the desired effect of slowing onscreen movement to give him a more believable aspect of volume and gravity; consequently, when Polyphemus spills wine on his chest, the trickles seem to race down at least twice as fast as a normal flow should, spoiling the illusion. Surprisingly, there are no forced perspective shots to lend a false sense of scale to the giant, who is instead represented in many shots by awkward, "life size" hands and legs that are false- and rigid-looking. Even the blinding of Polyphemus is miscalculated by having the monster lying on his back while Ulysses and his men apparently thrust the red-hot poker from somewhere under the monster's chin! The mishandling of the sequence must have been especially painful to Bava, who could have done it so much better—and would, in the 1968 TV miniseries Odissea.

SILVANA MANGANO as Circe, tempting Ulysses (Kirk Douglas) in an eerily baroque sequence representative of Bava's color lighting style.

Attila, il flagello di dio

First released: December 27, 1954
Technicolor, 1.66:1, 100 minutes

Production: Lux Film (Rome), Lux de France (Paris). Distributor: Lux Film. France: Attila, Fléau de Dieu, "Attila, the Blight of God," Lux Compagnie de France, 12/30/55. Germany: Attila, die Geissel Gottes, 4/1/55, 80m. UK: Attila the Hun, Archway Film Distribution Ltd., 2/57, 79m 23s, Certificate "A," passed with cuts. US: Attila, Embassy Pictures Corporation, 5/17/58, 83m.

Another reason to suspect Mario Bava's involvement in Ulisse is that, during this same period, he was already present at the Ponti–De Laurentiis Studio, devising (again, uncredited) optical effects for Attila, il flagello di Dio/Attila, directed by Pietro Francisci.[8] This was another Ponti–De Laurentiis production for Lux, this time starring Anthony Quinn (who had come to Rome to play the role of Antinus in Ulisse, and stayed long enough to play Attila and then Zampanò in Federico Fellini's La strada) and, in one of her earliest lead roles, Sophia Loren. Curiously, another adaptation of this story was being filmed almost simultaneously: Douglas Sirk's Sign of the Pagan (1954), with Jack Palance as Attila.

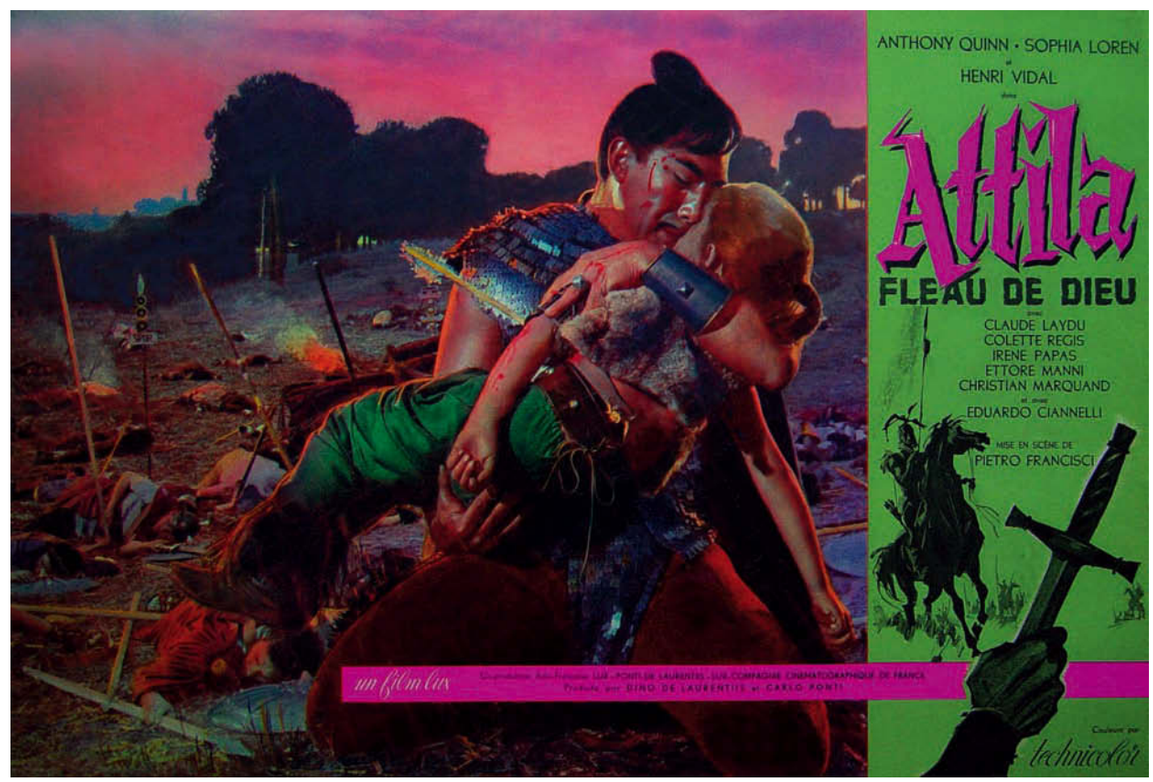
Set in 450 A.D., Attila chronicles the teetering balance of power between the dying Roman empire and the barbarian hordes of Attila, warlord of the Huns, whose previous assaults on Roman territories have been rewarded with literal pay-offs for peace. In Francisci's version (again scripted by Ennio De Concini), Attila wants desperately to take advantage of the empire's political weakness and conquer it, but his wishes are held in check by the pacifism of his brother Bleda (Ettore Manni) and the visions of doom foretold by his wife Grune (Irene Papas). When the leader of the Western empire, Valentiniano/Valentinian III (Claude Laydu), sends his emissary Ezio/Aetius (Henri Vidal) to the Huns' encampment high in the Alps with a proposal for peace, the Huns rally and attack his company from the rear on their return. Soon arriving at Attila's tent is Valentiniano's beautiful sister Onoria/Honoria (Loren), who seduces the warlord in her quest for personal survival. Later, while hiding in a coach on the battlefield where Rome and Hun forces clash in mortal combat, she is stabbed to death by a Roman soldier (unaware of her identity) between the very breasts she used to tempt Attila. Later, Attila rides with his young son (Fabio Bellisario) through the blood-strewn field of Roman corpses. "These are the proud Romans," he tells the boy, "sons of Caesar and Augustus, conquerors of Gaul and Carthage . . . Look at them now! Nothing but bones and blood . . ." (De Concini's dialogue here parallels the words he would later put in the mouth of La maschera del demonio's Dr. Kruvajan, who remarks upon entering a dilapidated family chapel that "nothing remains of the Princes of Vajda but the shadows of their former glory.") The Huns invade a town, rape and pillage, but are ultimately barred from entering Rome by a theological procession led by Pope Leone I. As Attila's cowed hordes turn and ride away, a shining, celestial cross forms in the heavens—courtesy of Mario Bava.

Bava had been working off and (mostly) on as Pietro Francisci's cameraman for the past eight years, and according to actor–screenwriter Fiorenzo Fiorentini, he had also made uncredited contributions to several Francisci films made over the intervening years between Antonio da Padova and this one: Il leone di Amalfi (1950), Le meravigliose avventure di Guerrin Meschino (1951), and La regina di Saba/The Queen of Sheba (1952). Bava was not the credited cinematographer of any of these films, but Francisci summoned him—as did increasing numbers of his colleagues—to provide trick shots, to build maquettes of castles, to execute glass mattes.



"They were well-crafted productions, but made with very little capital," Fiorentini revealed. "Francisci could always finish a picture spending only one-tenth of what other directors would spend. Guerrin Meschino, for example, was a swashbuckler shot with only six horses, that were somehow made to seem like six hundred . . . It was Francisci and Bava who created all of these things; both of them had a love of cinema and a gift for cutting costs. The whole of Italian cinema was rebuilt on their shoulders. And I have no doubt that our industry could flourish again, even today, if we better followed their examples."[9]

Given their history of collaboration, which would continue through the remaining years of the decade, it seems certain that Francisci would have invited Bava to photograph Attila . . . who would only have turned down such an offer owing to a previous commitment—for example, working with Pabst on Ulisse. At any rate, Bava must have become available later in the production (for example, when Hal Rosson was brought in) because Attila's uncredited optical trickery and beautiful matte paintings bear all of his unique signature touches.

In addition to executing a number of striking glass matte paintings—the establishing shot of a Roman street with its vista of boxy houses (positioned to blend in with the foregrounded street set in the studio), the Huns' encampment in a green valley nestled below a rolling hillside (the actors and set visible through a clearing in the center of the painting), a background of majestic snow-capped mountain peaks (positioned above a path used as a crossing for Attila and his men on horseback), and another which added dozens of tents in the distance of a view of the Roman encampment—Bava also used his ingenuity to multiply the number of available extras. Francisci had at his disposal no more than twenty-five extras for the film's respective armies, and Bava was able to turn them into hundreds by photographing them through a sheet of glass covered in pre-cut sections of black paper. By exposing one area at a time and arranging the extras in a pre-defined space, Bava was able to photograph their choreographed movements, stop, cover the exposed area, expose a new area, rewind the film and thus continue shooting until an entire encampment was seemingly populated. He would use this technique on later pictures, but never again at the same level of success seen here.

Bava never spoke in interviews about working with Karl Struss. If the great Hollywood cameraman's work was limited to working in the studio with Quinn and Loren, there was no reason their paths would cross; nevertheless, Attila could have provided Bava with the opportunity to quiz Struss directly about the means by which he had transformed Fredric March's Dr. Jekyll into Mr. Hyde in Rouben Mamoulian's 1931 film—a top secret lighting trick which Bava would later surpass and simplify for the aging and rejuvenation effects of I vampiri (1957).

In Attila, we can see the Italian cinema moving farther away from traditional historical adventure to embrace those aspects that would later characterize the peplum, as well

ATTILA (Anthony Quinn) mourns the death of his son in this French lobby card.

8 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers," Spaghetti Cinema 72, July 2000, 2–12. Dizionario del cinema italiano credits "Steffen Grimes" with the film's special effects. The odd spelling arouses suspicion, as does the fact that no other screen credits exist for such a person.

9 Ibid.

MARIO BAVA (behind camera) photographs a dolly shot for HANNO RUBATO UN TRAM with director Aldo Fabrizi helping to push. The man in the sunglasses at left is assistant director Sergio Leone.

as the Viking films that were made in Italy in the wake of Richard Fleischer's 1958 film The Vikings. In chronicling the conflict between Roman forces and Attila's Huns, the movie plays both sides in definitive fashion. Everything about the Hun sequences—Quinn's lusty swagger, his fur vest, the shocking twists of the violence on the battlefield and, finally, the flaming Viking-like funeral of Bleda—foreshadows such later films as Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ultimo dei vichinghi/Last of the Vikings (which Bava co-directed) and Bava's own Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (both 1961). Loren's Onoria is the archetypal peplum slut/Queen, surviving on the ripe, pink pelt of her sexuality, and eroticism is also summoned by one of those choreographed dance sequences which would become an obligatory feature of the pepla. Here, Francisci stages a truly bizarre sequence that begins with female dancers in Flash Gordon headgear feigning battle with fishing nets and tridents, and culminates in the faked decapitation of one of the dancers, her wax head crushed between the hands of her victor, thus revealing the status of the illusion. (It's a very convincing wax head, too, possibly supplied by a moonlighting Eugenio Bava, who would perform similar tasks on his son's future films.)

Certain aspects of Attila—such as the decapitation, and particularly a later scene in which a priest is attacked in his church and nailed through his palms to an ornamental cross—were considered so extreme that the film was subjected to much cutting before it could be released in America. To this end, American director Richard C. Sarafian [10] was hired to write and direct some replacement footage in New York, which he did with actors Richard Bakalyan, Dickie Jones and Scott Marlowe (all of whom specialized in "juvenile delinquent" roles at the time) made up as Huns. This version has become exceedingly rare since its theatrical release. Despite its great cast, and enduring sense of scope and spectacle, Francisci's Attila has all but disappeared from general circulation in America.

Hanno rubato un tram

First released: December 30, 1954
B&W, 1.66:1, 90 minutes

Production: Imperial Film. Distributor: Columbia–Ceiad. Germany: Geliebte Tram, "Beloved Streetcar," German TV, 2/27/60. Spain: Han Robado un Tranva, AS Films, S.A.

Bava's next assignment was a contemporary comedy, Hanno rubato un tram ("They've Stolen a Streetcar"), starring Aldo Fabrizi. Filmed at Cinecittà and on location in Bologna, it is the hectic but light-hearted story of two bickering streetcar drivers—Cesare (Fabrizi) and Bernasconi (Carlo Campanini)—who must join forces to recover a missing streetcar or lose their jobs. The feature went into production under the direction of Mario Bonnard (who later directed the Steve Reeves version of Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei/The Last Days of Pompeii, 1959), but he was soon replaced by Fabrizi himself.

Hanno rubato un tram marked yet another collaboration between Bava and art director Flavio Mogherini, who was now flanked by a remarkable young assistant, Giorgio Giovannini, who would later rise to prominence and design many of Bava's best-known films as a director. The film was also scored by Carlo Rustichelli, and it marks the only known occasion when Bava worked side-by-side with Sergio Leone, the future father of the Spaghetti Western, who at the time was Mario Bonnard's assistant director and continued to assist Fabrizi after Bonnard's leave-taking.

In the wake of this collaboration, Bava's successful and mutually friendly working relationship with Aldo Fabrizi curiously came to an end. There was no apparent reason for this termination—no known argument or betrayal—but a possible clue may be found in one of Bava's rare interviews. "I have a knack for making friends," he confessed to Ornella Volta, "but not for keeping them. I once had a very good friend who was, in my opinion, the greatest of all actors. For three years, we saw each other every day—morning, noon, and night. Then one day, he decided to give me a present. He sent to my house a pair of antique, sterling silver candelabra—a matched set of the sort which could only be found in the castle of Count Dracula! I didn't know how to thank him, certainly not by telephone . . . so, suddenly, he heard no further sign of life from me! I felt I had to do something spectacular to match his generosity, but I couldn't think of anything, so I simply withdrew and disappeared." [11]

Though Bava did not reveal the name of his actor friend, what he does say only helps to support the theory that it was Aldo Fabrizi. A shy and retiring man, and his father's son, Mario found that the narcissism endemic to the acting profession went against his grain, so he almost never socialized with actors. Fabrizi was the only exception to this rule in Bava's life up to this time, and the only actor with whom Bava worked over a period as long as four years; true to his words, the bulk of their collaboration took place during the three-year period between 1949 and 1952. Fabrizi and Bava would work together again on only one more known collaboration (1961's Le meraviglie di Aladino), but it could not hold a candle to their remarkably fertile, frantic, and funny collaborations of the postwar era.

ITALIAN locandina.

Buonanotte . . . avvocato!

First released: March 16, 1955
B&W, 1.66:1, 84 minutes
Production: Fortunia Film.
Distributor: Dear Film.

Another collaboration with director Giorgio Bianchi, Buonanotte . . . avvocato! ("Goodnight . . . Lawyer!") is an interesting Alberto Sordi comedy that shares much in common with Billy Wilder's classic The Seven Year Itch, with which it was concurrently produced. It is easily mistaken as an imitation, but its release actually preceded that of The Seven Year Itch by several months.

Sordi plays Alberto Santi, a young, self-absorbed attorney who is paid 50,000,000 lira by a man to clear his son of a charge of robbery. His courtroom summation, full of strutting peacockery, is more incriminating than helpful to the (doubtless) guilty party, but he pockets the money all the same and leaves the court with no more than an indifferent shrug of his shoulders. Alberto is happily married to Clara (Giulietta Masina), but she has driven him crazy with sexual frustration with a period of chastity prior to her annual trip to Rome to participate in a Catholic procession; she will not even kiss him on the lips at the train station. When Clara leaves for Rome, Alberto arranges with his womanizing colleague Vittorio (Vittorio Caprioli, whose oft-repeated line is "My name is Vittorio . . . but you can call me 'Baby'") to spend the evening at a nightclub, where they live as bachelors for one night. On the point of leaving his apartment, Alberto is startled by a voluptuous blonde in a low-cut gown—Bianca Maria (Mara Berni)—who rushes into his rooms, begging sanctuary from her jealous husband Franco (Andrea Checchi). Franco follows, suspiciously searching each room in the apartment without invitation, and somehow never catching sight of his wife. He leaves, and Alberto tries his damnedest to seduce Bianca Maria, who eventually locks herself in the bedroom and—in a visual joke that screams "Mario Bava"—positions a photo of Clara on the other side of the keyhole, to admonish the Peeping Tom.

10 Born in New York City in 1925, Sarafian worked primarily as a television director from 1955–1968, at which time he began to make feature films. Among his best-known works are Run Wild, Run Free (1969), Fragment of Fear (1970), and the cult classic Vanishing Point (1971).

11 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

Alberto awakens to find Bianca Maria gone, with the 50 million lire he brought home missing from his study. He assumes that the woman used her feminine wiles to steal the money, and he traces her to her parents' home (where a rhumba party hosted by her younger sister is in progress), demanding that the cash be returned. All is chaos until Clara returns and points out that she secreted the money herself in one of Alberto's desk drawers for safekeeping. Realizing his mistake, Alberto secretly returns to Bianca Maria to apologize, and is followed by both Clara and Franco, who suspect that their respective spouses are having an affair. The two couples converge, and Alberto clears his own good name in a grand parody of a courtroom summation. All is well afterwards, but the next time Clara goes out of town, Alberto walks repentently in the devotional procession beside her.

Buonanotte . . . avvocato! is a very amusing comic diversion, but it does not offer Bava the wealth of opportunities for memorable cinematography that earlier Bianchi films, such as Graziella, did. There is an eye-catching nightclub sequence, in which a voluptuous Amazon sings and dances in a costume that one deep breath might completely vaporize, and her performance is ornamented with effervescent pinwheels of light—but this vivacious highlight is the exception to the rule. Shot in only four weeks, the film is primarily an illustration of Bava's experimentation with long, uninterrupted takes, which allowed Sordi (whose mock-vain style of comedy recalls the characters and manner of American writer–director Carl Reiner) to move freely about the large apartment set, the courtroom set, the party set, without undue editing restrictions on his effusive comic performance. For example, one scene—in which Alberto celebrates his first night of freedom by meticulously following all of his wife's written directions about how to prepare and serve an already-made dinner, only to unceremoniously dump the end result into a trash can, then accidentally frees a pet parakeet from its cage and attempts to catch it—consists of a single, 4-minute-plus take; one senses that it was cut only because the movements of the bird, once outside its cage, were not exactly as planned. As a result, Bava's lighting had to cover a lot of ground and provide a steady, sedate, and moderately stylish backdrop to Sordi's antics; Bava—not the bird—was kept in a creative cage.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

At times, Bava's lighting appears almost jarringly somber for such a frivolous, silly movie; the exterior night shots of Bianca Maria's house, for example, are bedecked with low-angled cross-lighting, making it look more like the scene of a murder than a party. The shot may have been lighted this way to underscore Alberto's misguided suspicion that Bianca Maria plans to blackmail him to his wife with overheated lies about their night together; but elsewhere, the movie's atmosphere is also culpable—projecting, and thus reinforcing, Alberto's worries—which ultimately works against the light, soufflé-like handling it needed.

There are some clever visual jokes—especially the aforementioned moment when Bianca Maria, knowing that she is being spied upon as she disrobes for bed, places a finger-wagging photo of Clara in line of the keyhole Alberto is using—and also a glass matte effect of a luminous, clouded moon, to which Alberto sings a lament after watching other lovers from his balcony. It is not Bava's most accomplished glass matte, being wholly stationary and unlayered (as similar, later shots would never be), and is glimpsed only in a single, brief cutaway.

The movie's unapologetic lechery has not dated well; Alberto actually makes a grab for Bianca Maria's breasts at one point, and later, when his binoculars observe a struggle between a man and a neighboring woman that looks like attempted rape, he is inspired not to call the police or rush to his neighbor's rescue, but to take another crack at the blonde who's locked herself in his bedroom! Ultimately, it is not Sordi's overblown buffoonery that leaves a lingering impression, at least not a favorable one; instead, it is Masina's prim, minxish presence that strikes a true comedic counterpoint, and there is also a first-rate supporting performance by Tina Pica (from Graziella) as Antonia, the Santis' elderly housekeeper.

If Buonanotte . . . avvocato! has any ultimate relevance to the Bava canon, it is for establishing his professional collaboration with actor Andrea Checchi, the second actor (after Aldo Fabrizi) with whom Bava would form a lasting personal friendship. Bava's family remember Checchi as one of Mario's best friends; he would later be featured in several of Bava's Galatea productions, most famously as Dr. Kruvajan in La maschera del demonio.

Non c'è amore più grande

First released: August 7, 1955
B&W, 1.66:1, 91 minutes

Production: Serena Film. Distributor: Dear Film. Germany: Erkauftes Glueck ("Luck For Sale"), German TV, 1/22/62. Spain: No hay Amor mas grande, Procines.

Bava's fourth collaboration with director Giorgio Bianchi, Non c'è amore più grande ("Nowhere a Greater Love") was another love story about the rich and the poor, and how money has the power to corrupt even a sincere relationship. Franco Interlenghi starred as Mario, a university student of prosperous background who meets and—against the advice of his father—becomes attached to an impoverished young woman named Luisa (Antonella Lualdi). As he comes to know Luisa better, he falls in love with her—and discovers that she is pregnant. This is no obstacle to the enamored young idealist; though he must leave Rome on an extended voyage with his family, Mario proposes to Luisa, leaving her with enough money to see her through the pregnancy. Shortly thereafter, Luisa suffers a fall and loses the baby; she becomes terrified that, without a baby, she will lose Mario's sympathetic affection and have no right to the money he gave her to survive. In desperation, she arranges to "buy" another child—Andreino (il piccolo Massimo Kurz)—from Ines (Teresa Pellati), another woman in dire economic straits, whose husband is in jail. Upon his return, Mario and Luisa marry, but happiness cannot be founded on such a deception. When Romolo (Arnoldo Foà), the true father of Andreino, is released from jail and discovers that his son has been sold to the wife of a wealthy man, he sets out to blackmail Luisa. In the end, the matter is taken to the courts, where the judge demonstrates understanding and allows Mario and his wife to legally adopt the child.

In the 1955 edition of Segnalazioni Cinematografiche, an anonymous critic opined: "The [film's] argument is not without points of interest . . . Noteworthy are the verisimilitude of settings, and the dialogue is delivered well by some of the actors." Not exactly a passionate endorsement, but whatever its qualities might have been, Non c'è amore grande was the kind of soap opera that scored well with mainstream Italian audiences, grossing nearly half a billion lire at the boxoffice—in fact, of all the films Mario Bava had photographed to date, only Guardie e ladri and the Famiglia Passaguai films proved more commercial. In terms of what had been proven possible by the recovering Italian cinema up to now, this was almost an unbelievable achievement. Nevertheless, it would be trumped by the historic success that immediately followed.

ITALIAN locandina.

Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova

First released:
May 6, 1955 (Germany)
Eastmancolor, 1.66:1, 95 minutes

Production: Orso Film, Iris Film (Rome), CFPC (Comptoir Français de Productions Cinématographiques, Paris). Distributor: Cei–Incom. France: Casanova, 8/5/55. Germany: Casanova—seine Liebe und Abenteuer, "Casanova—His Loves and Adventures," 5/6/55, 90m. Italy: 12/22/55. Mexico: Las Aventuras de Casanova, Mario J. Dada. US: The Sins of Casanova, Times Film Corporation, 10/6/57.

A milestone in Mario Bava's career as a cinematographer came with Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova ("The Adventures of Giacomo Casanova"), a romantic historical romp directed and co-written by Steno. It was Bava's first feature-length work to be filmed in color—Eastmancolor, to be precise. It may seem strange, considering his pre-eminence in his field and his liking for color, that Bava did not photograph the first Italian film in color. Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova was shot almost three years after the film boasting that particular claim, Totò a colori ("Totò in Color" 1952), also directed by Steno but photographed by Tonino Delli Colli. In fact, Bava had been the first cameraman offered the opportunity by Steno, but he turned the job down, finding the conditions unacceptable. Accepting the feature would have obliged Bava to work in Ferraniacolor, a monopack color process with an ASA [exposure setting] of six—meaning that it required a tremendous amount of onset lighting. He had other objections to the stock as well that will be discussed later.

Tonino Delli Colli remembered his difficulties on the assignment in a 2003 www.Kodak.com online interview: "No one else wanted to do it . . . They chose me, saying 'You're under contract so you'll do what we tell you.' All we had available was the lights for shooting with black-and-white film, because color lamps didn't exist yet. The lighting became extremely complicated. I said 'Are you all crazy?' In short, what they wanted was an avalanche of light. And poor Totò was subjected to these showers of light.

Poor little guy. Among other things, he was already prone to eye problems. As soon as Steno, the director, called 'Stop,' Totò was off. He wanted to get out of that inferno as soon as he could."

Delli Colli told Kodak.com that the arrival of color revolutionized not only the craft but the essential tools of cinematography—the film, the exposure, the lamps, the lab equipment, as well as the processing. "Like everyone else," he said, "I had to study the new product, with help from Kodak and from the laboratories. I got furious with Kodak whenever a new negative came out because I had always wanted to use the same film. With each new product, I had to start again from scratch.

"The shooting technique was more or less the same," he continued. "There was a substantial change in the concept of things that had originally been considered secondary, such as set design, set decoration, and costumes. Everything took on a different importance and a different value. There's no question that cinema has gained something through the advent of color, but I also think it has lost a lot. Black-and-white made it possible to create unique and [impossible to duplicate] atmospheres."

By biding his time, Bava was able to make his own official color debut in Eastmancolor, which at the time was offering their 5248 filmstock (25 ASA tungsten), which had greater light sensitivity and allowed him to light the sets and actors basically as he had always photographed them in black-and-white.

Released the year after Norman Z. McLeod's American farce Casanova's Big Night (starring Bob Hope and an unbilled Vincent Price as the eponymous amator), Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova starred 29-year-old Gabriele Ferzetti as the irrepressible ladies' man, Giovanni Giacomo Casanova de Seingalt (1725–98), a man of 35 as the film opens in 1760. While seated inside a coach, Casanova's eye is delighted by the physical attributes of Dolores (Irene Galter), a shapely young woman employed at an inn, as she climbs atop the coach to fetch down some baggage from its upper rack. Inspired to spend the night, he finagles his way into her boudoir but is caught by her fiance, José Ramirez, the leader of the royal guard, who arrests him. The prison guards, a slovenly bunch, decide to pass the evening by reading haltingly aloud from a book of handwritten memoirs confiscated from the prisoner. As they read, Casanova rests in his cell, reminiscing . . .

ITALIAN locandina.

Born to a showgirl, Giacomo recalls his earliest memory of lying in a backstage crib while being admired by a flock of exotic dancers. After being expelled from school in Venice on grounds of immorality, he grew into a young man who made his living by tutoring the son of the consul of Weimar. One night, he succeeded in persuading the maid, Bettina (Fulvia Franco), to have an assignation with him, but the consul's daughter Lucrezia (Lia De Leo), overhearing their plan, had the servant sidetracked and kept the date on her behalf, under cover of a darkened room. The next day, upon learning from Bettina that she didn't keep the date, Casanova imagined that the responsive woman in the dark must have been the consul's wife, Barbara (Mara Lane). He proceeded to make subtle overtures to her, but she, being the wrong choice, took offense . . . before deciding that she was interested after all! That night, as Giacomo took his leave from Barbara's room, he was intercepted in the corridor by her wanton daughter, and after that, by the still-needy Bettina . . .

Years later, after returning to Venice, Casanova became smitten with Louise de Chatillon (Corinne Calvet), a member of the French aristocracy who bested him at cards. Determined to conquer her in other ways, Giacomo commenced to woo her, taking her on gondola rides, wining and dining her, and when all else failed, lowering himself on bended knee to propose marriage. At this vulnerable moment, Louise turned the tables on him, opening a curtain to reveal an audience of eavesdroppers. An inveterate gambler, she has won another bet: that she could make the great Casanova forsake all other women and propose marriage! Mortally embarrassed, Casanova scrambled across the rooftops with the authorities once again on his trail.

Later, having escaped into the countryside and acquired a personal valet (Carlo Campanini), Casanova stumbled upon a wedding and became immediately infatuated by the young bride. Wanting desperately to possess this girl, he introduced himself as her long-lost cousin, kissed her warmly, and was invited to accompany the wedding party to a local inn. Once there, it was discovered that there was no room for the cousin and his manservant, so he and his valet were promptly invited to share the bridal chamber, where the groom spent the entire night snoring and tightly hugging a small wooden chest as his beautiful bride lay awake and neglected. Casanova caught the sleepless bride's eyes in the dark and communicated silently with her by writing on a mirror: "Why did you marry him?" (She carefully removed a gold coin from the wooden chest to explain.) And finally, after several other progressively probing questions, came the ultimate one: "Do you really believe I'm your cousin?" (She smiled warmly, obliquely, conspiratorially.) Casanova woke his groggy manservant and ordered him to feign sleepwalking, wake the husband by bumping into him, and lead the poor cuckold out of the room while passion had its sway. The husband woke according to plan, dropped his treasure chest, and followed the sleepwalking valet onto the roof. A scene of comic precariousness followed, ending when the two men turned a sharp corner and bumped into a real sleepwalker marching along the same scenic route, who nearly knocks them off the ledge! The shaken husband returned to his bride, whom he found alone, sated and smiling, waiting to embrace him most gratefully . . .

We return to present tense as the prison guards listening to this tale sit around with mouths agape, aroused, perspiring, and stroking each other's heads in sweet fraternal misery. Casanova receives an unexpected visitor at his cell, who arrives in bal masque disguise; it is none other than the Cardinal de Richelieu, who has come to retrieve a document incriminating her highness Marie-Thérèse, the Margrave de Richebourg (Marina Vlady), as one of Casanova's lovers. He reiterates the tale to Richelieu, about how his royal adversary was one night forced into his arms by a thunderstorm, a wet dress, and a candlelit room blown dark by an errant wind . . . After telling the story, Casanova clouts his Excellency on the head and steals his mask and costume to effect an escape from prison. He is met by soldiers who greet him as Richelieu and escort him back to his room at the inn, where the bed is inhabited by none other than . . . Dolores! Ignoring the desperate urgings of his valet, Casanova lingers to make love to Dolores and remains in her arms until the recovered Cardinal and his soldiers—led once again by José Ramirez—are literally shouldering down the door. As they burst into the room, they find Dolores alone, and very, very happy. Astride two horses on the open road, Casanova and his valet decide to set out for France. After galloping a short distance, they are stopped by a coach, whose lovely passenger (a brunette Ursula Andress, in her first screen role) asks the directions to Spain. They point in the direction opposite to that which they are taking, and as the coach trundles away, Casanova cannot hold the reins of his own nature, and turns his horse in pursuit of his next lover . . .

The screenplay and dialogue of Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova were written by more than a half-dozen people, including Steno's burly young assistant director Lucio Fulci (1927–96), who became a long-standing personal friend of Bava and would succeed him, after Bava's death, as Italy's leading director of supernatural horror. Though the film is an important title in Bava's early filmography, Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova was not an easy or always enjoyable experience for the 41-year-old cameraman. Corrado Bartoloni recalls that Mario clashed repeatedly with the film's producer, Dario Sabatello, "because [Sabatello] insisted that color had to be lighted 'flat . . .' However, Bava insisted on lighting the scenes in the same way he would have lighted them in black-and-white—and it was possible!"

CASANOVA (Gabriele Ferzetti) creeps into the marital bed of willing newlywed Marina Vlady, as husband Giacomo Furia snores on.

FUTURE MASTERS of Italian horror, Mario Bava and assistant director Lucio Fulci, photographed on-set during the production of LE AVVENTURE DI GIACOMO CASANOVA.

MEXICAN lobby card which inadvertently misidentifies Ursula Andress—who is not pictured!

Bava had been pressured by Sabatello to shoot the film in Ferraniacolor, but he refused. Eastmancolor was a more expensive stock but, in the short time since its introduction, Bava had determined through personal experimentation that Ferraniacolor was unstable, doomed to premature fading. Bava's quality control did not end with the selection of Eastmancolor stock; he took the additional precaution of entrusting his negative to Boschi (then Italy's best printing-developing company), despite their higher-than-usual costs. Bava clearly pursued his end result with extreme care. He did everything possible to ensure that his images would look as good as they possibly could for as long as they possibly could, even if it involved more work, more expense, and greater discomfort for the actors on the set.

Almost immediately, the look of the film's cinematography sets Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova apart from other Italian color films of the period, which tend to look as bright and flat as Dario Sabatello felt that all such films had to look. Bava invests his compositions with mottled key lighting and soft, caressing shadows, which give the film and its characters an inviting sense of sly intrigue. He introduces his first really daring lighting effect during the scene of Casanova romancing Dolores at the inn; there is a close two-shot, cloaked in shadows and intimately framed as they hesitate over a kiss, while the background wall is given animation by a flickering latticework of shadow, like the reflection of a candle's flame seen through the netted weave of its container. As he and his valet prepare to depart, we see them standing, poised for escape, before a much larger and wider wall shaken with still more complex, trembling latticework. In these early scenes, Bava offers no unusual emphases of color; he is not yet following in the footsteps of Ray Rennahan's work on Rouben Mamoulian's Becky Sharp (1935)—the film often cited as the starting point of "psychological color" in cinematography—but doing exactly as Bartoloni said, and photographing a color film with lighting techniques traditionally seen in black-and-white movies. The art direction would seem to have left Bava little recourse in the matter, as it is very busy and baroque, presenting more opportunities for shadow than color.

And yet, as the film hits its delightful stride, the viewer can sense Bava gradually awakening to the untapped possibilities of color. Candlelight suffuses the evening interiors with pink and orange, and when those candles are doused, the night scenes turn extremely, deeply blue—as blue as a line crossed, as blue as a dare accepted. In the film's most memorable and erotic scene—the silent conversation between Casanova and his newlywed "cousin"—the blue of night becomes a palpable third presence in their clandestine flirtation, and it returns in important later scenes, particularly the beautifully choreographed storm sequence, which employs backlit cycloramas and flashing lights and looks ahead to the thrilling, perversely romantic moment in Bava's La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body when the ghost of Kurt (Christopher Lee) first appears to Nevenka (Daliah Lavi) at the height of a storm. Bava introduces some interesting camera tricks too, undercranking a shot of Ferzetti's gloved hand making an entry in his journal, and faking an overhead shot of Corinne Calvet as she reclines in bed, without the use of a crane, by recreating her bed on the back of a chair. Furthermore, Bava devised some superb maquettes of the exterior of Louise de Chatillon's palais and also the clock tower seen during the sleepwalking sequence. Another shot, more impressive in its execution than in its cleverness, shows Ferzetti and Valvet riding in a gondola through the canals of Venice; although the actors did take an actual gondola ride for long-shots and still photographs, it was impossible for Bava to fit his camera into the watercraft, so the actual shots within the gondola were faked in the studio with the actors positioned in front of a rear-screen projection plate of a rowing gondolier. The elements are so perfectly executed that the effect is actually convincing.

Because it was a French/Italian coproduction, Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova was able to include some shots that were more explicitly erotic than had been permitted in Italy since the end of the war. Consequently, in the months prior to its release, Steno's film gained considerable notoriety from newspaper reports of how much footage was being snipped by the chief minister of Italy's censor board.

Corrado Bartoloni: "There was nothing really too scandalous about it—just Ferzetti looking at a bare-breasted woman, and a sequence of Marina Vlady with a camera movement along her body, but nothing really so daring." The scene with Ferzetti actually shows him kissing a woman's neck while pulling down the shoulders of her blouse, allowing her breasts to tumble free; never shown in Italy, it was retained in the French edition. Bare-breasted women had actually been a part of the Italian cinema since the silent days—such nudity is evident in production photos from the set of Quo vadis? (1913) and in surviving Italian prints of Fabiola—but the climate in regard to such matters had grown more conservative in the postwar years.

As a result of last-minute cuts, the Italian version turned out to be far more mild than advance publicity had led the public to expect. Consequently, though it made almost three times as much money as some of the black-and-white films Bava photographed during this period, it generated less than half the money earned by crowd pleasers like Totò a colori and was counted a disappointment. The French version, on the other hand, was released intact and became something of a cause celèbre.

An anonymous reviewer for the highbrow magazine Cinema nuovo expressed mixed feelings about the picture: "[The film is] a rare one, perhaps the only truly amorous film ever produced in Italy, because of its discreet and happy interplay of humor and eroticism. Unfortunately, the direction is not up to the level of its screenwriting, as it too often resorts to the cheap eloquence of a plunging neckline or other transparent devices for its sense of spectacle; it fails to provide Casanova with a setting worthy of this personage, one of the greats of our 17th century literature."

When that critic used the word "rare" in reference to Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova, he was being more prophetic than he realized. The film was never released in America, and only one print (of the French edition) is known to still exist today. The surviving print is mildly color-faded and heavily scratched, but seemingly intact; Bava's use of secondary colors, like green and orange, is more muted now than he likely intended them to be, but his primary colors remain sexily accentuated. Seen today, Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova is a startling picture to an American sensibility because, in the 1950s, every comparable American film—that is to say, any American film of this period that dared to be sexually conscious (Baby Doll, Splendor in the Grass, Picnic)—was obliged to simultaneously counter any suggestion of promiscuity with violence or shame. Steno's film manages to tell its story, without leering prurience, while at the same time being charged throughout with a sense of healthy sexual urgency. There is never any hint of inequality between the sexes, nor is it ever implied that Casanova is doing anything but being absolutely true to his nature and celebrating his profound appreciation of the fair sex, who give as good as they get. Thus, as the Cinema Nuovo reviewer suggests, it was a unique film in Italy when it was first released, and even when viewed today, it is still remarkable for the uncanny wholesomeness of its sexual candor.

GINA LOLLOBRIGIDA as Lina Cavalieri.

By reading between the lines of the Cinema nuovo review, we can see that Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova was being reprimanded not because it failed to entertain, but because it did not treat its historical figures with overt respect or authenticity. Yet it is this very characteristic that brings Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova into line with Bava's other historical canvasses of this period and, in some ways, provides a foundation for the later historical romps of Ken Russell. It was the very nature of the struggling Italian cinema to make do (and make new) with wardrobe, props, and set dressings left behind by earlier pictures, and to organize these disparate elements—often from films set in a variety of periods—into unusual new worlds. This synthesis of composites resulted in a strain of filmmaking, peculiar to Italy, that developed apace with neorealism. If we were to coin a word for this strain, it might well be "pseudo-realism," because even when the scripts dealt with characters and episodes of recorded history, they were often dressed in fashions and set decor that cobbled together an acceptable alternative to reality—a baroque impression of reality, rather than realism itself; a playground of the imagination.

La donna più bella del mondo

First released: November 1955
Eastmancolor, CinemaScope,
2.35:1, 107 minutes

Production: GE.S.I. (Gestione Studios Internazionale). Distributor: GE.S.I. Denmark: 10/1/56. Finland: 4/3/59. France: La Belle des Belles, 3/16/56. Germany: Die schönste Frau der Welt, Bavaria- Schorcht, 8/3/56, 102m. Spain: La Mujer mas Guapa del Mundo, Mercurio Films, S.A. US: Beautiful but Dangerous, 20th Century-Fox, 2/5/58. UK: Beautiful but Dangerous, Border Films, 4/56, 102m 26s, Certificate "A," passed with no cuts.

By 1955, only five years after her motion picture debut, Gina Lollobrigida had ascended to a lofty position of celebrity never before known by an Italian actress.

Upon returning to Rome after being unsuccessfully courted by producer Howard Hughes, Lollobrigida went back to work in Italian movies, acting for Vittorio De Sica in Altri tempi and scoring popular successes at the Cannes and Venice Film Festivals. In 1953, Sam Spiegel hired her to co-star with Humphrey Bogart, Jennifer Jones, Peter Lorre, and Robert Morley in Beat the Devil—in which she commanded more than her fair share of attention. Thereafter, La Lollo appeared opposite Errol Flynn in Crossed Swords, played the coveted title role in Luigi Zampa's film of Alberto Moravia's novel, La Romana/The Woman of Rome (1954), and could be said to have truly LINA is about to meet her future maestro while working in a sheet music store.

LINA after becoming the toast of the town.

"arrived" when—on August 16, 1954—her portrait appeared on the cover of Time magazine. This tribute was quickly followed on November 15, 1954, with Gina on the cover of Life. After these epochal triumphs, Gina found herself in the position of not only being able to pick and choose the films she wanted to make, but being able to conceive and execute the material that she felt would best suit her talents.

The production of Lollobrigida's greatest commercial success, La donna più bella del mondo ("The Most Beautiful Woman in the World"), is credited to Maleno Malenotti of Gestione Studios Internazionali (the film's Italian distributor), but its true producer was the actress herself. A canny, streetwise businesswoman, Lollobrigida chose the subject matter and hand-picked the screenwriters; she chose the songs best-suited to her own vocal range (arias from Tosca); she selected her co-stars (including Tamara Lees, with whom she had shared many scenes in Vita da cani); she imported a prestigious Hollywood director with experience in staging movie musicals (Robert Z. Leonard); and—leaving absolutely nothing to chance—she hired Mario Bava (who knew better than anyone how to honor her beauty on film) to photograph the Eastmancolor spectacle.

In his long Hollywood career—which began as an actor in 1914—Robert Zigler Leonard (1889–1968) had produced and directed dozens of successful entertainments, and had shown himself particularly adept at melodramas involving stage performers: Broadway Rose (1922), Jazzmania (1923), Dance Madness (1926), Dancing Lady (1933), The Great Ziegfeld (1936), Broadway Serenade (1939), Ziegfeld Girl (1941) and In the Good Old Summertime (1949), to name several. La donna più bella del mondo was Leonard's penultimate work; it was followed by one last film, Kelly and Me (1957), starring Van Johnson and Piper Laurie—a comedy about a 1920s vaudevillian who finds a talented dog that helps him make the leap into talking pictures.

There is some controversy about how much of Leonard's participation in the actual filming was mere window-dressing. Not only was the final word on each scene left to its star, but because it was later reported that the Italian actors and crew were given on-set direction by one of the film's screenwriters, Piero Pierotti (1912–70)—who had previously scripted Enrico Caruso, leggenda di una voce/The Young Caruso (1951, also starring Lollobrigida) and Giuseppe Verdi/The Life and Music of Giuseppe Verdi (1953). [12] Regardless, the fact remains that La donna più bella del mondo—apart from its narrative clichés—is an extraordinarily accomplished film from a production standpoint. Any number of its scenes look every bit as polished and inventive as an MGM musical of the same (or slightly earlier) period, and Bava's pastel, color-sensitive camerawork recalls the look of Vincente Minnelli's musicals on many levels. This could hardly be accidental, or the work of a director without experience.

The film purports to be a biography of the legendary Italian soprano, Lina Cavalieri (1874–1944). Cavalieri had started her singing career at the Foliés-Bergère and in Paris cafés. With the financial support of her first husband, Russian Prince Sergei Bariatinsky, she was able to take singing lessons from the best teachers in Europe, and her talent grew to the point where she could star in opera productions. Among her crowning achievements: she was the first L'Ensoleillade in Massenet's Cherubin; the first Adriana Lecouvreur of Manon Lescaut at New York's Metropolitan Opera, and the first US Fedora. Though the film ends with Cavalieri walking into the Siberian sunset (so to speak) with Prince Sergei, their real-life marriage was actually short-lived; in all, she was married four times, once to the French tenor Lucien Muratore. She died during an air raid on Florence, Italy, on February 7, 1944. Greta Garbo had played a version of Ms. Cavalieri in her 1930 film Romance, directed by Clarence Brown, and this film may have played an important role in the inspiration for La donna più bella del mondo—and Lollobrigida's hiring of director Robert Z. Leonard, who had once directed Garbo (and the young Clark Gable) in Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise (1931).

LINA CAVALIERI in the arms of her great love, Prince Sergei Bariatine (Vittorio Gassman).

By the time its generous roster of screenwriters—Giuseppe Cavagna, Liana Ferri, Frank Gervasi, Maleno Malenotti, Luciano Martino, Mario Monicelli, Piero Pierotti, and Giovanna Soria—finished with it, La donna più bella del mondo bore little resemblance to the true story of Cavalieri's charmed life and career. The movie opens with young Lina going to a cheap Roman music hall, where her adoptive mother Olimpia (Nanda Primavera) is struggling through a musical performance after suffering a mild heart attack, and being heckled by an uncharitable crowd. A bold Trastevere girl, Lina yells at the abusers and slaps one jeering woman's face. She is not facing the friendliest crowd, then, when she must take her mother's place on stage. The crowd is lying in wait, but a gallant, visiting nobleman, Prince Sergei Bariatine (Vittorio Gassman)—in town for a champion riding competition—physically ejects the two principal hecklers from the front row, allowing the remaining audience to respond enthusiastically to Lina's beautiful voice and vivacious delivery. Afterwards, Lina learns that Olimpia was sent to the hospital after suffering a second attack. The gallant prince accompanies her to the hospital, where they find that Olimpia has already died; as Lina is distracted in shock, Sergei slips some money and a jewelled ring inside her purse undetected and quietly exits.

Dressed in black, Lina attends the riding competition to return the money and ring to Prince Sergei, who wins the contest and advises her to keep the gifts and put them to good use. He foresees a day when she will be a great success, and they will meet again in Paris. Lina uses his kind charity toward singing lessons, and her voice attracts the attention of Rome's greatest voice instructor, Maestro Doria (Robert Alda). After some time, Doria invites Lina to accompany him to Paris, where he will introduce her to some influential people—but once there, he allows his infatuation for her to show too fiercely, and teacher and student part ways, unpleasantly. Doria promises that she will never succeed without him; true enough, Lina tries to find a singing engagement in Paris without success—until she meets and teams up with a guitarist, Carmela (Anne Vernon). Lina and Carmela are promptly hired to perform at the Eldorado, where they attract an enthusiastic following. The scowling Doria witnesses a standing ovation for them from the back of the theater and leaves in anger. Lina is also the object of jealousy for the Eldorado's headline performer, Manolita (Tamara Lees), who secrets a needle in her makeup stick; Carmela nearly disfigures herself for life when she borrows it and Lina launches into a furious catfight with the singer. The Eldorado management suggest that the two women settle their differences in a duel—"It will be great publicity!"

Lina and Manolita come together for a well-attended swordfight—ostensibly for the title of "Most Beautiful 12 Pierotti would later script one of Bava's early directorial ventures, Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (1961).

Woman in the World"—which Lina wins with style and alacrity, embarrassing her adversary further in the bargain. She is promptly awarded with a contract to headline at the Foliés Plastiques, which she accepts. Once she is established at the Foliés, Prince Sergei attends one of her performances with a group of roguish friends, one of whom bets his entire stable of horses against the Prince's prize race horse that Sergei cannot add Lina to his list of conquests. Recognizing Lina, but not letting on, Sergei accepts the bet. The men extend an invitation to Lina to be the guest of honor at a private party, which—recognizing the Prince, with whom she has always been in love—she accepts. Lina and Sergei dance into a private room and consummate their love, after which the Prince proposes marriage. Their intimacy is interrupted by the drunken row of his friends downstairs, and Sergei rushes downstairs to call off the bet . . . but it's too late. Lina overhears the details of the gamble and storms out of the Prince's life, heartbroken.

Lina throws herself into her work, with no thoughts of romance. One of Rome's leading tenors, Sylvani (Gino Sinimberghi), befriends her and expresses his affection for her, but is content to leave their future in her hands. It is decided that Lina's voice is now ready to make the leap from popular music to classical opera, and Maestro Doria is engaged to conduct her in a performance of Puccini's latest opera, Tosca. Disobeying the edicts of the Tsar, Sergei leaves a train in Paris to meet with Lina at the opera house; he finds her still upset, and to discourage him permanently, she agrees to become Sylvani's wife. In anger, Sergei threatens the tenor's life, and goes back to his train. Doria has overheard the announcement and arranges for a criminal marksman to fire a real bullet into Sylvani as he faces the firing squad at the end of Tosca's third act. Her hands covered in blood, Lina believes that Prince Sergei has made good on his threat. (This dramatic crescendo strongly recalls the apocalyptic climax of I pagliacci (amore tragico), in which Lollobrigida's character is strangled to death in a paraphrase of grand opera, and is a significant early example in the long—and distinctly Bavian—tradition of depicting the "reality" of death in color-drenched, theatrical settings.)

ITALIAN quattro-foglia depicting Lina's appearance as Botticelli's Venus on stage at the Foliès Plastiques—a great early showcase of Bavian fantasy.

Lina Cavalieri goes on to become the most popular singer of her day, but she refuses ever to sing Tosca again, due to its tragic associations. In the course of a world tour, she is invited to Russia to sing for the King and Queen. Doria's increasingly erratic behavior begins to unmask him as the true architect of Sylvani's death, and Lina insists on performing Tosca during the royal performance to bait him. At the pivotal moment of Act III, Doria breaks down, shouting "Don't shoot!" and Lina rushes into the arms of Prince Sergei—all forgiven, all forgotten.

Though more a work of outlandish invention than biography, La donna più bella del mondo became Italy's top boxoffice hit of the 1955–56 season; in fact, its domestic commercial take (1,85 billion lire—nearly equal to 1.2 million US dollars) would remain unchallenged even by the vast boxoffice success of 1958's Le fatiche di Ercole/Hercules, the film that Bava would later credit with saving the Italian cinema. But while Hercules had an international appeal that would rack up huge numbers around the globe, Lollobrigida's parade float of a movie did not; it was given the tribute of an American release through 20th Century-Fox (under the intriguing but misleading title Beautiful but Dangerous), and it had an American director's name attached, but the subject matter was obscure to American audiences, few of whom could understand why Lollobrigida was playing someone less famous (and possibly less beautiful) than herself.

Even in Italy, the film received a less-than-warm critical reception. Tuilio Kezich, writing for Sipario, was particularly unsparing: "It is a monument to mediocrity." Giuseppe Marotta of L'Europeo admonished Lollobrigida by saying, "Stop being a beautiful statue and become a beautiful, living creature . . . Really, Gina, this is little more than a comic strip story." However, earlier in his perceptive review, Marotta held up the special values of Bava's cinematography for particular acclaim: "Not that I don't like [Lollobrigida] here: on the contrary, that shadow of corruption, that perfidious shadow as it seeks and touches her, on the one hand distorts, and on the other refines, spiritualizes and exalts her."

Lollobrigida herself had reservations about how the film turned out, but was proud of the fact that she had done some of her own singing in the picture, notably the aria from Tosca. "When the film was released in France," she told biographer Maurizio Ponzi, "it received some enthusiastic reviews from Le Figaro, but they added, 'What a pity it is not Lollobrigida's real voice!' The New York Times wrote the same thing. Nobody could believe that I had such a good singing voice." [13] In truth, Lollobrigida is credited only with the Tosca performance, but as Lina Cavalieri, she sings many other popular turn-of-the-century songs for which she is not credited. As a promotional salvo, a soundtrack EP recording of Lollobrigida's vocal performances was issued in Italy.

La donna più bella del mondo was Bava's second film in color and his first effort in anamorphic widescreen (2.35:1). It would mark a quantum advance in his approach to lighting for color and controlling its effects. As Lamberto Bava remarks, "When there was the transition to color, the cameramen who had worked until then with black-and-white weren't called upon anymore. There were people coming from [Technicolor] or Ferrania, who [insisted the cameramen] use a battery of ten 'brutes,' those enormous white heat lamps [to light each set-up], and the actors would just melt away. My father, who loved doing things the easy way, went to a photo shop one day and saw some Kodak pictures, shot by everyday people. He thought, 'Wow, these are beautiful—and they weren't shot with all that light! Why are they making us use ten brutes?' He was shooting La donna più bella del mondo at the Royal Palace of Caserta. He went to the set one morning, and found all the stairs completely lit [in the designated way, by his assistant] . . . and he said, 'I want only one brute, for back-lighting, at the top of the stairs, and another one over here . . .' Everybody looked at him, like 'What the fuck are you saying? Are you crazy?' . . . but, when they saw the dailies, they realized the result was superb." [14]

Furthermore, Bava had reasoned out the perfect way of maximizing color effect economically: he used Eastmancolor stock and arranged for his negatives to be processed at Technicolor Roma. This was only now a possibility, as Technicolor Roma had reversed their long-standing policy of refusing stocks manufactured by other companies. Eastmancolor was not as expensive as Technicolor stock, easier to work with, but prone to premature fading; by having his Eastmancolor prints developed at Technicolor, Bava was ensuring that their color printing would stand up to the most aggressive projector lamps Roman cinemas could throw at them. Remember that, at this moment in history, Bava had no reason to suspect any of his work would have a shelf life of more than a few years, and a future of television broadcasts was even less likely for features shot in anamorphic widescreen. The only reason for Bava to have concerned himself with any of this was that he took an artisan's pride in his work.

Anamorphic photography—simply put, a process by which films are shot through a distorted "squeezed" lens and later projected through a translation (or "anamorphic") lens to "stretch" the image across a screen nearly twice as wide as the conventional cinema screen—was at this time in its infancy, having been introduced only three years earlier with 20th Century-Fox's CinemaScope production The Robe (1953). So popular was the process that Paramount had released George Stevens' classic Western Shane—which was shot in the standard American "Academy ratio" of 1.37:1—with its frame matted in the projector to an approximation of 2.35:1 "scope." (Film critic Pauline Kael felt that cinematographer Loyal Griggs must have counted it as a "black joke" when his "mutilated" compositions won the Academy Award for Best Cinematography.) In 1954 and 1955, projection matting—or "soft-matting"—became a more common practice, as the exact proportions of screen matting became standardized by individual studios, but it was no better controlled; to soft-matte a feature film was to consign the final artistic decision of how it should look to each individual projectionist at each individual theater. For Mario Bava (who was meticulous in his framing), soft-matting was unacceptable, so after adopting the 1.85:1 ratio in the 1960s, he began "hard-matting" his work in the camera by pre-masking the frame with a special matte card that fit over his lens. In the remaining years of his career as a cameraman, and as a director, Bava dabbled in many different screen dimensions, but 1.85:1 (the widest of the non-anamorphic gauges) seems to have been his preferred ratio, perhaps because it best approximated the dimensions of a landscape canvas. And yet, for the remainder of the 1950s, when CinemaScope and other anamorphic processes were at their peak of popularity, Bava was called on time and again to film in anamorphic widescreen, and he continually proved himself a master of the format.

From the very first scene in La donne più bella del mondo, Bava shows himself to be extraordinarily adept at furnishing the entire frame with atmospheric business. With his department given fuller financial support than usual, his approach to lighting here continues its ongoing experiments in depth. Some striking shots—such as the moment when Doria is shown eavesdropping behind the curtain outside Lina's dressing room, as she leaves arm-in-arm with Sylvani—feature diffuse lighting in the extreme background, and more sharply defined, bold-stroke lighting in the middle- and foreground. Here, the intensity of lighting informs one about the character, the soft dressing room door redolent of his love and vulnerability, while the sharper lighting angles he inhabits bespeak of his mental unbalance. Bava later inverts this scheme, as Lina overhears the details of Sergei's bet with his gambling buddies: Lina, in the foreground and pushed to far screen left, is softened with velvety shadows and diffused focus, while the men occupy the center of frame, in sharp focus and bold, primary colors.

Bava's knowledge of the psychological values of color—worked out in advance with art director Alberto Boccianti and wardrobe designer

13 Maurizio Ponzi, The Films of Gina Lollobrigida (Secaucus NJ: Citadel Press, 1982), 19.

14 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

TITLE CARD of the US lobby card set.

Vittorio Nino Novarese [15]—is advanced and impressive. Throughout the film, the color red is used sparingly, initially merely as an accent to offset the redundancy of blues and grays in the audience heckling Lina's adoptive mother. Its uses advance when Lina arrives for her duel with Manolita; unlike her adversary, who arrives in a heavy dress and hat of black feathers (already a symbol of defeat, if not death), Lina glides to her appointment on a bicycle sporting a red-feathered hat, a black leotard, a white bustier, tan boots, and red gloves—a dazzling vision of Musketeer-like panache. Red is then suppressed in the film's palette until Dorio is shown stalking behind red velvet curtains, as a prelude to the assassination of Sylvani, after which his blood is seen on Lina's white hands as she raises them over her face in shock. Later, the color is slyly used to suggest Lina's defloration by Sergei, who seduces her in a white jacket, which he exchanges in the following scene of their intimate cuddling with a red silken cossack's shirt. Likewise, blue is used throughout as the color of love—it is worn by virtually every man who comes into contact with Ms. Cavalieri, and it suffuses the scenes of Lina's private moments with Sergei—and yellow is given as a backdrop to scenes indicative of caution, such as their first reunion dance together, when neither Lina nor Sergei is sure whether they are remembered by the other. When Lina receives her voice lessons from Doria, she wears a blouse of strong, thick, black-and-white stripes—and the camera comes to rest on her after an introductory shot of Doria's hands gently playing the black-and-white keys of his piano; the indications are plain, that Doria secretly yearns to have his hands on his student, who in turn is aware at that moment only of her music. Bava's consistent use of pastel colors, used in concert with the film's turn-of-the-century wardrobe and music hall settings, evokes a Toulouse-Lautrec flavor throughout—an association which becomes especially pointed during the backstage introduction of Manolita, in which the side of Tamara Lees' face is limned in blue by a nearby stage lamp.

The movie's showstopper is Lina's first performance at the Foliès Plastiques, where a glimpse at Sergei's program promises a performance entitled "The Most Beautiful Woman in the World," consisting of three vignettes:

the Birth of Venus, Cleopatra (the most beautiful woman of ancient times), and Lina Cavalieri (the most beautiful woman of the modern world). The second vignette, sadly, was not retained in any of the versions I have seen, but the first may well be Lollobrigida's most breathtaking moment on film. Dancers in pastel leotards cavort around the stage, lifting and bending one another in postures evoking a sense of swimming and frolic. Behind them, several tiers of painted ocean saw back and forth with the illusion of movement, before an airbrushed vista of paradisiacal clouds. A shell rises upright from amidst the zigzagging waves, occupied by the kneeling form of Venus—Lina Cavalieri, adorned in a fabulous, form-fitting gown of sequins and seashells, which also spangle her hair. Having taken in the full picture of the performance up to now, Bava cuts to a close-up of Lollobrigida, who says nothing—who needs to say nothing. She simply glows like gold at her adoring audience. It's a scene worthy of Georges Méliès, and a potent indication of the visual genius yet to come in Bava's later, fantastic reimaginings of beloved mythic stories and images.

Bava also supervised the film's special effects, which include some arresting glass matte shots that extend the sumptuous stage settings to the top of the frame, as well as a briefly shown, and not particularly convincing, miniature Siberian wilderness through which a toy train is pulled. The naïveté of the shot provides most of its charm, as in the following, Ophuls-like shot of Lollobrigida and Anne Vernon sitting in a train compartment set, as a crude cyclorama is scrolled outside their window.

La donna più bella del mondo was the seventh and last of Bava's collaborations with Gina Lollobrigida, and it represents the apex of their alliance—a collaboration between actress and cameraman nearly as significant as that between Garbo and William Daniels. It's hard to imagine La Lollo seeing the "Birth of Venus" sequence projected for the first time and not rewarding her cameraman with a kiss. Though she failed to respond to my invitations to be interviewed for this book, Gina Lollobrigida could not have overlooked Bava's important contribution to the cultivation of her screen persona. Captured in the eyes of other cinematographers, Lollobrigida could be an Earth Mother, an overdone exotic, or a glacial cipher, but it took Bava's special sensibility, his unique appreciation of her as a woman, to "exalt" her (to use Marotta's perceptive word)—that is, to light and frame this earthy, attractive, ambitious businesswoman so that her features radiated a glow of divinity. It is unlikely that Lollobrigida was oblivious to the pains Bava took with his craft, as photography was to become her own ultimate vocation. She officially retired from acting in 1971, at which time she published her first, well-received book of photographs—Italia Mia, with a foreword by Italy's premier novelist, Alberto Moravia—which was subsequently followed by The Wonder of Innocence in 1994.

Mio figlio Nerone

First released: September 1956
Eastmancolor, CinemaScope,
2.35:1, 105 minutes

Production: Vides Cinematografica, Titanus (Rome), Les Films Marceau (Paris). Distributor: Titanus. Belgium: Les Plaisirs de Neron/De Genoegans van Nero. Finland: 1/15/60. France: Les Week-ends de Néron. Germany: Neros tolle Naechte, "Nero's Awesome Nights," Union, 1957. UK: Nero's Weekend, Gala Film Distribution Ltd., 9/57, 90m 24s, Certificate "A," passed with cuts. US: Nero's Mistress, Manhattan Films International, 11/62, 104m.

1956 was to be a pivotal year in the cinema, as it would be in all categories of the arts. In the world of music, it was the year when the young Sun Records recording artist Elvis Presley signed his contract with RCA Records and made his only "from the waist down" appearance on The Ed Sullivan Show; likewise, it was the year when Miles Davis left the small Prestige label in order to record for Columbia, and when "soul music" innovator James Brown recorded his first single, "Please Please Please," for King Records of Cincinnati. On the immediate horizon, a young Texan named Buddy Holly was about to record his first album, and in Liverpool, England, two teenagers—John Lennon and Paul McCartney—were soon destined to meet. In the world of literature, it was the year when the first Olympia paperbacks of Vladimir Nabokov's controversial Lolita were being smuggled into the country; when Günter Grass and Philip K. Dick published their first novels, and when William S. Burroughs successfully weaned himself from heroin, making it possible to apply himself to the writing of his first important novel, Naked Lunch.

Just as signs of a new cultural landscape were becoming apparent in these fields, so was the face of cinema undergoing a significant change. After the tremendous success of Rebel Without A Cause and The Blackboard Jungle (both 1955), the film industry responded with more and more product targeting the burgeoning youth culture. 1956 was the year when 20th Century-Fox produced The Girl Can't Help It with Jayne Mansfield and an exciting roster of rock 'n' roll acts, all photographed in CinemaScope and "Color by DeLuxe." It was also the year when James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff's American Releasing Corporation reinvented itself as American International Pictures, a company largely fuelled by low-budget science fiction/monster films, most of which were produced and directed by a 29-year-old independent named Roger Corman; and it was the year when Britain's Hammer Film Productions would announce the first Frankenstein film made in color, The Curse of Frankenstein (1957). A new generation of the arts was poised to make itself known.

1956 was also to be the most decisive year of Mario Bava's career, though it probably did not seem so at the time, from Bava's own perspective. For one thing, 1956 marked the end of his moonlighting career in short-form documentaries. Now gainfully employed with an average of three or four features per year, he no longer needed them; in fact, he is not known to have dabbled in this area since 1952. Nevertheless, in 1956, he somehow found time to photograph his two final contributions to the genre: Fernando Pisani's Alto Lazio pittoresco ("Pictorial North Latium") and Viviana Pasqualini's Copiando la natura ("Copying Nature").

Significantly, it was in 1956 that Mario Bava truly came into his own as a cameraman. This pivotal year commenced with his work on the prestigious historical comedy Mio figlio Nerone, which reteamed Bava with Steno and the star of Buonanotte . . . avvocato!, Alberto Sordi. Produced by Franco Cristaldi,[16] this satire of domestic warfare in ancient Rome was a major co-production between Titanus and Vides of Rome and Les Films Marceau of Paris, and played host to an uncommonly impressive international cast: Sordi as the demented Nero, Vittorio De Sica as his speechwriter and advisor Seneca, Brigitte Bardot as his pert and pouty mistress Poppea and, as Nero's mother Agrippina, the legendary American star Gloria Swanson. Only five years after her powerful, Oscar-nominated return to the screen in Billy Wilder's Sunset Blvd. (1950), the silent screen siren had more or less retired from the screen once again, after appearing in one other, ill-received feature and two Broadway plays in 1951. Away from the screen a successful writer and entrepreneur, Swanson had accepted the role of Agrippina from Cristaldi while working as a reporter for United Press International in Italy. Unknown at the time, but clearly visible now among the supporting cast, are Giorgia Moll as the handmaiden Lidia and future Hammer star Barbara Shelley as one of the emperor's adoring audience.

Presented as a legend from the annals of Tacitus, Mio figlio Nerone is the story of a mother's difficulty in raising a responsible, all-powerful son. Having reached the age of 21, the emperor Nero is quite mad and has no interests in governing or conquering new frontiers; he wants only to sing, to play his lyre, to conduct his orchestra of farm animals, and to subject all of Rome to regular performances of his intolerable songs. His mother, Agrippina, returns to Rome after a long voyage to finds its former military muscle grown lax and flaccid; the soldiers supposedly guarding its shores against invasion are lolling about with women, drinking wine. Agrippina finds Nero doing the same, with the nubile Poppea, of whom she disapproves. She determines at once to wrest her son's attention away from music and love, and apply it to a plan for the conquest of the British isles concocted by the captain of Rome's army, but the impressive suit of arms designed especially for him—a lion-breasted chestplate adorned with numerous menacing spikes—only frightens the neurotic leader. With the help of his speechwriter Seneca, Nero initiates a plan to do away with his mother with poison, unaware that she is simultaneously planning to do away with Poppea by having vipers secreted in her bed. Both murder plans fail, and mother and son laugh about this later . . . and Seneca and Poppea are respectively given official blame and consigned to prison. But Nero's schemes do not abate. He arranges to have the ceiling above his mother's bed collapse (instead, it collapses on the army captain standing guard over her), and then by sinking a ship bearing her abroad (she swims back to the palace, looking like a bedraggled ghost, and bringing her son's celebratory orgy to a dead stop). Nero flees to his room and bolts the door, believing her to be a reproachful phantom come back from a watery grave, but when he marshals the courage to peek outside, he spies Agrippina calmly negotiating with Seneca and Poppea to have their freedom restored if the emperor is committed to an asylum, and sneaks away. In an ironic coda, Nero is shown singing, playing his lyre and conducting his little barnyard orchestra from a short distance away, as Rome (and the rest of the cast) burns in the distance. He has become the son his mother wanted, the conqueror of the world's most powerful nation.

15 Novarese was the father of actress Leticia Roman, who starred in Bava's 1963 film La ragazza che sapeva troppo/Evil Eye/The Girl Who Knew Too Much.

16 Born in Turin, Italy on October 3, 1924, Cristaldi became one of his country's most distinguished producers. Mio figlio Nerone was only his second film as producer, launching a career whose highlights included I soliti ignoti/Big Deal on Madonna Street (1958), Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce, Italian Style (1961), Gli indifferenti/Time of Indifference (1964), Lady Caroline Lamb (1972), Amarcord (1974), E la nave va/And the Ship Sails On (1983), and Il nome della rosa/The Name of the Rose (1986). He died in 1992.

Bava's own recollections of the production were typically deflating. "We were supposed to start in September, but [Rodolfo] Sonego's script wasn't ready on time," he recalled. "I went to Cristaldi and told him that, in the meantime, I couldn't just wait around,

ITALIAN locandina, art by Arnaldo Putzu.

I had to take another job—because at that time, if I stopped working for a single hour, I would receive forty invitations to shoot something else. But no, he said, I had to stand by. By the second month [October], I was feeling like a dog, ashamed to be on his payroll while doing absolutely nothing. Then he said that, since it was being shot by Romans, we'd be done with it by the time we finished shooting the screen tests. We went to Punta Ala, shot some screen tests, and assembled the film from those! I could see, however, that I had nothing to lose when this came out. I used a Color Ferrania, at 50 ASA, that was all banged-up. This is how I filmed Mio figlio Nerone and Nel segno di Roma."[17]

Bava's comments about the CinemaScope equipment he inherited for this production says a lot about the state of camera equipment available to the slowly rebounding Italian film industry of the mid-1950s, and the circumstances under which he was sometimes obliged to work—even after photographing films that had grossed over a billion lire. His reference to the camera being "banged-up" implies that it was an orphaned piece of CinemaScope equipment left behind in Rome after suffering some misfortune on the set of a visiting 20th Century-Fox or Warner Bros. production. "50 ASA" refers to the light sensitivity rating of the film stock used by the camera; this was extremely slow stock compared to today's standard film stock speeds of 200–500 ASA, meaning that it would have required a great deal of lighting to produce a nice, colorful, readable image, and even more lighting to serve the individual needs of Technicolor and CinemaScope, whose 2.35:1 anamorphic lenses needed to import more light through the camera gate than standard lenses. Even more additional lighting would have been required for outdoor shooting. The upshot of all this is that Bava's camera rig on this production involved much more than his standard equipment, more camera and grip assistants, and more preparatory time before each new set-up than was usual for him. It also meant that the sets would have been extraordinarily hot and uncomfortable for the cast and crew, who—thankfully—were shooting in late autumn and winter.

Very little of this circumstantial misery is visible in the film itself, but the haphazard nature of the production was enough to send Gloria Swanson back into retirement from motion pictures, which lasted until Curtis Harrington's 1973 made-for-television movie Killer Bees. Accustomed to working under a strict code of mutual courtesy that was regarded as archaically conservative even within the Hollywood system—for example, she insisted on being addressed by every member of the crew, including her director, as "Miss Swanson"—the silent screen legend must have been shocked at the rampant discord that was the norm of the Italian system, where the hammering of the art department or the barking of the cameraman's dog was not expected to stop during a take, because the dialogue was always looped in post-production.

In her autobiography Swanson on Swanson, the actress recalled: ". . . Nero's Mistress . . . had a stellar international cast including Brigitte Bardot, Vittorio De Sica, and Alberto Sordi, but it was so bad that six years elapsed between the shooting in Italy and the picture's release in the United States in 1962. Nevertheless, it gave me an opportunity to be near [my daughter] Michelle, who had a brief acting career of her own in pictures in Europe until she gave it up to marry and settle down in Paris. In fact, it seemed so good to be in Europe again that I stayed for several years: in Spain, in France and in Italy." [18]

Elsewhere in her book, Swanson remarked that she was so disapproving of her own appearance in the film that she later had cosmetic surgery done on her eyes. She is a remarkable presence in the movie, giving by far its finest performance, but she does not look well at ease being manhandled by Sordi's overly affectionate Mamma's boy.

Regardless of the unfortunate circumstances under which it was made, or how unhappy its cast and crew may have been, Mio figlio Nerone is an important film in terms of its influence on the future course of popular Italian cinema. It was the native industry's first attempt to do something unusual with remote Italian history, in the wake of MGM's Quo Vadis (1951) and 20th Century-Fox's The Robe (1953)—to tweak it into something baroque, ironic, and fanciful. In this way, Mio figlio Nerone is a much more direct antecedent to the Hercules films of Pietro Francisci than Riccardo Freda's Spartaco, which was strictly serious business. The scenes in Spartaco where Bava's uncredited involvement is most keenly felt—the sultry Sabina (Gianna Maria Canale) lounging in her scarf-strewn aviary, for example—are almost too decorative and artificial in the context of Freda's stoic historical waxworks, but as staged here, in the context of a Steno satire, Bava's heightened sense of style seems buoyant and perfectly at home.

Furthermore, Mio figlio Nerone is a critical film in the arc of Bava's career because, in retrospect, it is the film in which he first fully discovered his own voice (or eye) as a cameraman. Earlier examples of his work—notably I pagliacci and La donna più bella del mondo—have genius in them, but it is a modelled genius, inspired by a close study of the works of other cameramen (like Karl Struss, Massimo Terzano, John Alton, Sol Polito and, indeed, Eugenio Bava) whose techniques Mario had admired and assimilated. One important reason for this sense of arrival was Bava's choice of view: the beach at Tor Caldara, a nature preserve near the Cap d'Anzio—roughly, the mid-shin of the Italian boot. Over the next twenty years, his camera would return to this location with such regularity that it became the heart and hearth of Mario Bava's filmography; his characters come here to ponder life and death, to peer into the future by gazing into the tides whence we came.

"Tor Caldara, near Marino, became a virtual open-air studio," he later said. "I first discovered it in 1948, when I took my daughter there to have her acne treated with a sulphur water cure. Later, we began to shoot everything there, even Westerns, though we could never set up camp there for any length of time." [19]

Tor Caldara benefitted from its proximity to Lake Albano, a broad waterfront formed by the ancient fusion of two volcanic craters, which could be easily transformed into an oceanfront bedecked with castles, moored Viking vessels, or whatever else was required of Bava's bag of camera tricks. It would be the meeting place of Hercules and Iole in Le fatiche di Ercole/Hercules, the primary setting of La frusta e il corpo and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon, the location of the pre-credits sequence and finale of I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger, and it was adorned with some glass matte paintings to become Vulture Canyon in Roy Colt & Winchester Jack—just to name a few of its many appearances in Bava's work.

"Tor Caldara was my father's favorite place to shoot," confirms Lamberto Bava. "He used to say, 'Wherever you put the camera, you can call "Action!"' He loved to watch the sea—he was born in Sanremo, which is by the sea—but he also feared it. I don't believe he ever learned how to swim, because the water disturbed something deep in him. I have no personal memory of ever seeing him in a bathing suit, though he kept one from the time he was young. It was always dry."

From the very first shot of Mio figlio Nerone—as the camera gazes out to sea, and pans down the coastline to an impressive matte painting of a series of columned Roman buildings lining the

NERO (Alberto Sordi) hides in bed from his tyrannical mother Agrippina (Gloria Swanson).

17 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

18 Gloria Swanson, Swanson on Swanson (New York NY: Pocket Books, 1981), 502.

19 Abruzzese.

shore, with just the edge of one foregrounded column at screen right to provide an illusion of depth and contrast—we feel at once that we are seeing things through the eyes of Mario Bava. This shot is also the most likely illustration I have found for an anecdote shared with me by Mario's grandson, Roy: "On one of the films he made before he became a director, he was setting up a shot with columns, and he only had three or four of them. He needed another column for the foreground, to balance the shot and give it a sense of dimension. So he asked the people around him if anyone had a match, and he took a wooden matchstick and stood it upright in a wad of chewing gum positioned in front of the camera. On film, the matchstick became the extra column!"

It may be that Rodolfo Sonego's script—co-signed by Sandro Continenza, Diego Fabbri, Ugo Guerra, and Stefano Vanzina—was closer to Bava's own ironic sensibilities than any other picture he had previously shot, and thus brought him into closer contact with the spirit of the filmmaker he would later become. Mio figlio Nerone takes a comic approach to the subject of a mother and son plotting mutual murder, and is thus appealingly prophetic of the tongue-in-cheek murder thrillers Bava would concoct as a director in the late 1960s and early '70s.

This perverse streak also afforded Bava his first opportunities to use color impressionistically, irrationally, to complement scenes or shots of a macabre nature. Most of these center around the presence of Agrippina, whose first appearance finds her being carried to her son's palace in a caravan, her head swathed in blood-red scarves that pack a chromatic shock when the golden outer curtain of her carriage is pulled aside. Later, when Agrippina survives the collapse of the ceiling above her bed, Bava photographed Swanson emerging from the dusty catastrophe like a rigid ghost who, as she approaches the camera, steps into a theretofore undetected belt of eerie green light, which discolors her face monstrously at the precise moment it begins to fill the frame. It is an unexpectedly chilling moment, nearly as hair-raising as her final "close-up" in Sunset Blvd., and must have been even more startling when the film was first released in 1956, several years before Bava made his first revolutionary horror films in color. And when Agrippina returns to the palace after surviving a sunken ship, disrupting the revels of Nero's celebratory orgy, her appearance—limned with icy blue light, much as Silvana Mangano is painted in her scenes as Circe in Ulisse—coincides with a thunderclap, and her formidable stance—flanked by angry soldiers—anticipates the first appearance of Princess Katia (Barbara Steele) in La maschera del demonio, as she stands at the entrance of her family crypt flanked by two menacing dogs. At the close of this same sequence, as Nero eavesdrops on the dealings between Agrippina, Seneca, and Poppea to have him committed, Bava paints in Nero's mercilessness by having Sordi lean forward into the same icy blue light that limned Swanson's return from her watery grave.

AGRIPPINA returns home to discover Rome and her palace corrupted by her son's decadence.

Where might Bava have derived his inspiration for these bizarre chromatic touches? We can't know for sure, but one timely possibility is Oswald Morris' acclaimed cinematography for John Huston's then-recent biopic Moulin Rouge (1952), which painstakingly reproduced the look of the paintings of its subject, Hénri Toulouse-Lautrec. It is a film (and an artist) Bava was likely to have studied before filming his own Belle Epoque drama, La donna più bella del mondo, and like both of those films, Mio figlio Nerone combines soft pastel colors, peripheral shocks of garishly unnatural theatrical lighting, and set design full of gauzy, lacy frippery—in this case, courtesy of art director Piero Filippone, a frequent collaborator with Riccardo Freda on such films as La vendetta di Aquila Nera/Revenge of the Black Eagle (1951), Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan/Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World (1961), and Giulietta e Romeo/Romeo and Juliet (1964)—in a way that smacks of Lautrec, though the film is set in ancient Rome.

As with his earlier collaboration with Alberto Sordi, Bava was again compelled by the actor's rapid-fire (and probably somewhat extemporaneous) performance to film most of the comedian's scenes in single extended takes, because it would have been impossible for Sordi to duplicate precisely what he had done in one take in a subsequent attempt. These scenes show Bava, once again, under creative duress with his camera locked down for minutes at a time. Consequently, his virtuosity is not as apparent for the movements of the camera as for what he brings to the mise-en-scène itself, in terms of contributions to the look of the film: its makeups, wardrobes, and set designs.

One instance of Bava's likely influence on Filippone's set design can be found in the scene of Agrippina's unheralded return to the palace, where she makes her way toward Nero's chambers through the snoring aftermath of an orgy. The set is completely dead except for a single, swaying, adult-sized swing, festooned with scarves. In several of the films he later directed, Bava used swings to introduce motion into otherwise overly stationary sets—as in Brett Halsey's "swinging" bachelor pad in Four Times

BEFORE GOD (or Roger Vadim) created her, Brigitte Bardot took a milk bath for Mario Bava in MIO FIGLIO NERONE.

That Night—and even more often in situations where he wished to make reference to a child separated from a parent—the ghostly Melissa Graps in Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!, the teenage Isabelle in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto and Marco in Schock/Beyond the Door II, for example. The genesis of this can be traced to the postcard Mario and his sister Elena received from his father Eugenio, when he was away at sea with Mussolini's sons, picturing the two siblings on a swing. As a cameraman in the Italian system, Bava was allowed a voice in all matters of a visual nature, including set decoration, makeup, and special effects; with this in mind, the swing is more likely a deliberate than accidental addition to the scene of Agrippina's homecoming. We can't know whether or not Bava was conscious of what the swing represented to him, but its consistent use in his films over the years as a symbol of solitary child's play, in addition to its value as a decorative object of motion, would seem to confirm this subconscious value. In this, the earliest use of the swing I have found in his oeuvre, it possesses the same value, commenting on the state of neglect and decadence into which Nero has fallen during his mother's absence.

Bava and Filippone also collaborated on a splendid setpiece built around Brigitte Bardot, who, at age 21, is captured in the first bloom of her beauty. The international sex star known as "BB" is widely regarded as the discovery of Roger Vadim, who met her in 1949 (after she had appeared on the cover of Elle) and married her in 1952, when she turned 18. (The emotional girl had attempted suicide when her parents refused to give their permission for an earlier ceremony.) Vadim wrote a series of original screenplays expressly for Bardot, beginning with two 1956 productions, En Effeuillant la Marguerite/Mademoiselle Striptease (directed by Vadim's uncle Marc Allégret) and Sette Sacrée Gamine/Ma'amzelle Pigalle (directed by Michel Boisrond). Vadim's own directorial career began, after these, in 1956 with the notorious . . . et Dieu Créa la Femme/And God Created Woman, which offered audiences many opportunities to admire BB's unadorned derrière. And yet before any of these memorable displays, Mario Bava—working with Bardot for the first and only time—recognized her possibilities and photographed her taking a milk bath.

The milk bath sequence, clearly inspired by a corresponding soak taken by Claudette Colbert in Cecil B. DeMille's Cleopatra (1934), is a delightful confection of cinematography, art direction and nubile flesh that is made even more enticing with the sudden intrusion of Nero, who babbles neurotically throughout the sequence. As Poppea steps from the bath (her figure silhouetted through a thin towel proffered by a quartet of placid handmaidens) and sets about toweling herself dry on her bed, Nero can't resist pausing in his babble now and again to crush his mouth against her milky, young flesh. [It should be mentioned that "poppea" is an Italian slang word for a woman's breasts, making every reference to Bardot's screen name a double entendre.] The sequence surprises us again when Poppea rises from the bed, steps offscreen, throws her towel in Nero's face, and announces that she is going to dance nude for him. In a shot most evocative of Bava, Nero raises his hand to watch the dance through a jewelled monocle ring, and the film cuts to a subjective shot of a vaguely nude female figure dancing at the green-tinted heart of a multi-faceted stone (evidently a kind of specially contrived extension of the lens, consisting of a "tunnel" of glittering arranged mirrors culminating in a thick green color gel). At this point, the disappointed egotist Nero—uninvolved by her display—suggests, "No . . . quasi-nude!" and throws her a bit of his own, homely brown clothing. The sequence is so much more enchanting than anything Vadim ever did with her, and Bardot would not be so well handled again until she worked with Jean-Luc Godard in 1963's Les Mépris/Contempt.

In the wake of Bardot's later success with Vadim, many of her earliest films were bought-up by zealous American distributors who exaggerated their erotic content with titles like The Girl in the Bikini, The Act of Love, A Night of Love and Crazy for Love. But Mio figlio Nerone was the first movie to really build an erotic sequence around the actress, and the first to showcase her considerable comic talents as well.

Not only was Mio figlio Nerone Bava's first assignment with a top-flight international cast, it also found him formally credited once again as "Director of Photography and Special Effects." Bava earned this distinction with numerous trick shots, including the aforementioned matte painting of the columned buildings lining the beachfront. When Nero gives a performance of an unendurable song called "Mamma," in tribute to Agrippina, it is prolonged through a thunderstorm which is introduced with a storm cloud matte whose highlights fluctuate from blue to gold with the rumbling of the soundtrack. Bava also used Vittorio De Sica in a shot filmed in reverse, as Seneca jumps backwards to land on his bottom atop a tall cabinet at the sight of a slithering viper in his office. The final scene, in which Rome burns, was assembled with miniature columned buildings arranged in three dimensions on a tabletop of rocky terrain, in concert with silhouetted paper cutouts of a horse and carriage, while billows of blue, red, and yellow smoke rose in the background, slowed to a more dramatic scale by an overcranked camera.

Whereas Mio figlio Nerone was released in Rome with Sordi top-billed, the film was released in France as Les Week-Ends de Nérone with Bardot's name pre-eminent. There are some curious differences between the two versions that deserve comment—for the most part, too minor to have been intentional. The two versions include distinctly different takes of the shot of the soldier placing vipers in Nero's bed, and the later shot of one stray snake slithering through the beard of a sleeping senator. Nero's musical performance in his mother's honor is much shorter in the French version, hobbling its comic impact as the unendurable concert drags on through a rainstorm to the suppressed anger of the Roman populace. Also affected are the scenes of Agrippina's survival of the two attempts on her life. After the collapse of the ceiling on her bed, the French version cuts to the next shot before Swanson steps into the foregrounded field of eerie green light; it is not the effect of a bad splice, as the music remains consistent and unbroken. Agrippina's return to the palace after the sinking of her ship is also different in both versions, evidently making use of alternate takes. The French version makes her seem more vulnerable (a soldier rushes her into a cloak to warm her), while the Italian version makes her seem larger-than-life, indomitable, and frightening—like someone returned from the grave. The finale is longer in the French version, with a longer song from Nero and additional trick shots of Rome burning. The Italian version fades out the song and flashes "FINE" on the screen after only one view of the smoldering miniatures.

Filmed at Titanus Studios in the latter months of 1955, Mio figlio Nerone evidently took long to birth in the editing room. Though the shooting ended in time for the Christmas holiday, the completed picture was not delivered to the Italian censor until August 1956—an unusually long delay, considering that several of the films Mario Serandrei would later edit for Mario Bava were ready for release only three weeks after the end of shooting. The likelihood of editorial problems is furthered by the crediting of two editors, Serandrei and Giuliana Attenni. Serandrei's name appears as editor on thirteen films made in Rome between 1955 and 1956 (including Federico Fellini's Il bidone), whereas Attenni's name appears only on this one and one other (Marcello Pagliero's Chéri-Bibi, 1955). Attenni was a veteran of several Totò films for Steno, but this production stands out as the director's only collaboration with Serandrei, who had acquired a reputation for rescuing films in a pinch.

Given the static nature of so many of Alberto Sordi's extended scenes, Mio figlio Nerone would have given Serandrei few opportunities to exercise his craft, and this fact—combined with his hectic schedule and lack of history with Steno—makes it all the more unlikely that he was ever the film's supervising editor, despite his upper-tiered credit. It seems much more likely, given the chaotic circumstances of the film's production (as described by Bava, above) and its unusually long period of editing, that Attenni was unable to assemble the picture to producer Cristaldi's satisfaction, and that Serandrei was summoned at the eleventh hour to salvage the picture. Mio figlio Nerone was finally released to Roman theaters in September 1956, opening at the prestigious Basilica di Massenzio, but it was not a popular success.

It was not released in America until 1962, when it was distributed under the title Nero's Mistress by Manhattan Films International. In preparing their 8 x 10" stills to promote the film's release, MFI saw fit to doctor the photographs, "drawing" wardrobe on Bardot (by outlining and painting over the skimpier wardrobe she was in fact wearing), slyly deceiving prospective audiences into thinking that she appeared nude in the film itself! Like many other imports from this short-lived period of demure "Adults Only" exploitation, Nero's Mistress has not been seen in America since its theatrical playdates. This is a shame, because Mio figlio Nerone is a farce of considerable style that has withstood the test of time better than many other, overrated films of its time and ilk. It deserves to be resurrected—for Bardot, for Swanson, and also as a pivotal chapter in the career of its cameraman.

BRIGITTE BARDOT is made the center of attention, in a scene in which she did not appear, in this heavily "doctored" still for the US release of NERO'S MISTRESS.

Orlando e i paladini di Francia

First released: December 5, 1956
Eastmancolor, CinemaScope,
2.35:1, 110 minutes.

Production: Italgamma Film. Distributor: Regionale. France: Roland, Prince Vaillant, "Roland, Valiant Prince." Germany: Saragossa (original release), RKO-Atlantic, Roland der Eroberer, "Roland the Conqueror," (reissue title), Pilot Film, 1958. Spain: Orlando, Mundial Film. US: Roland the Mighty, 94m.

Produced in the spring and summer of 1956, Pietro Francisci's Orlando e i paladini di Francia ("Orlando and the Paladins of France") is a medieval swashbuckler derived from Matteo Maria Boiardo's unfinished epic poem Orlando innamorato ("Roland in Love," written 1487). It begins circa 800 A.D., with the Saracens invading a French Christian encampment in search of the painting Madonna di Saragosa, with which the Saracen leader Agramante (Cesare Fantoni) hopes to blackmail Charlemagne (Ivo Garrani), King of the Franks, into surrender. When this plan fails, Agramante decides to send his daughter, the pagan seductress Angelica (Rosanna Schiaffino, in one of her earliest roles) to the French headquarters, where she can corrupt the morality of the Paladins, the King's knights, and weaken Charlemagne's might.

Unfortunately, the film delivers neither the swordfights with fantastic creatures nor Angelica's scintillating erotic defeats of the Paladins which are found in Boiardo's masterpiece; instead, Francisci's script (co-written by Gaio Frattini, Giorgio Graziosi, and the ever-industrious Ennio De Concini) turns the tables on Angelica, by having her unexpectedly seduced by exposure to wholesome Christian living and the first true love of her life, the handsome paladin Orlando the Brave (Rik Battaglia). There is an interesting subplot concerning Orlando's arranged marriage to Charlemagne's daughter Alda (Lorella De Luca) and her love-at-first-sight encounter with the young, buffoonish paladin Rinaldo (Fabrizio Mioni), but it is allowed to become overcomplicated as the two lovestruck paladini conspire to swap uniforms and duties in order to correct the confusion of their arrangements and marry the women they love.

Orlando . . . was perhaps less inspired by Boiardo than by the boxoffice success of Jacques Tourneur's The Flame and the Arrow (1950), a Warner Bros. production, which starred Burt Lancaster as an acrobatic peasant who leads a successful rebellion in medieval Italy. Rik Battaglia, whose muscular physique quickly elevated him from earthy romantic roles to heroic leads in epic films, proves himself an able horseman and swordsman, but Francisci aimed too high when he decided that Orlando should be an acrobat on a par with Lancaster. In his first scene, during which he recovers the Madonna di Saragosa from its Saracen captors, there are a few embarrassing shots of Battaglia—or, more accurately, his stuntman—rocketing like a wire-propelled superhero from tree to tree. (The same wire rig is called into service during the tournament sequence, when Roland literally knocks his Saracen opponent into a somersault off his horse!) Despite the expert menace of Cesare Fantoni, Orlando . . . is ultimately too dry; it is primarily of historical interest as a precursor of Francisci and Bava's Hercules films with Steve Reeves, and therefore of the pepla in general.

As we have seen, Bava began to incorporate the baroque visual trappings of grand opera into his cinematography with comedies like Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova and Mio figlio Nerone, where decorative exaggeration underlined their comedic context throughout, and also in dramas like La donna più bella del mondo, where it was rationalized by the opera house milieu and the heightened emotions of the climax. Orlando e i paladini di Francia finds Bava—along with Francisci and art director Giulio Bongini—taking the brave step of interpreting a serious (or at least non-comic) historical action film in such a decidedly fantastical fashion. The Italian cinema was too poor to be meticulous about historical veracity; as a result, something unique and fascinating was brought to boil.

BELGIAN affiche.

The Saracens battle the well-feathered Franks in the scaled and spangled armor of Japanese warlords; Angelica's coach is a cake-like vision of pink and white frosting, rolling out of a fairy tale on tulip-styled wheels to cross corpse-strewn battlefields; a Renaissance painting is rescued from a battlefield 500 years before the Renaissance; the dust-blown tents of invading troops harbor velvet harems; in short, whatever was most tantalizing to the eye was stirred into the soup. The result was a kind of jackdaw expressionism, developed by artisans who had spent years picking workable props from the postwar rubble. Historical veracity was junked in favor of emotional authenticity, which was more affordable and looked more imaginative. Orlando . . .'s talented set dresser, Arrigo Breschi, would be promoted to art director eight years later for Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace.

Mario Bava shares the cinematography credit on this film with Renato Del Frate. Born in Rome in 1911, Del Frate had started his career as a cameraman in 1938, as a camera operator on the second unit of Goffredo Alessandrini's Luciano Serra pilota, coscripted by Bava's own earliest professional collaborator, Roberto Rossellini. Three years Bava's senior, he received his first credit as director of photography that same year on the comedy Il marchese di ruvolito, starring Peppino De Filippo—a very quick ascent—but his career was not a success. Perhaps his greatest distinctions were photographing L'amorosa menzogna (1949), an early short film by Michelangelo Antonioni, and the Totò comedy Totò e Marcellino (1958). He died in 1962, one year after shooting Alberto De Martino's second unit contributions to Silvio Amadeo's interesting horror peplum, Teseo contro il Minotauro/The Minotaur (1960).

I have not been able to discover why the film's cinematographic duties were divided between Bava and Del Frate, but the fact that the credits also list separate operators (Ubaldo Terzano and Nino Annunziata) suggests that they worked as separate units. Bava's unmistakable photographic style dominates the picture, including the tournament sequence; Del Frate may have been entrusted with the second unit scenes involving the Saracen warriors, which are also well-done, but show more concern with compositional balance than baroque detailing. Most of the film's outstanding visual moments involve, predictably, Rosanna Schiaffino's femme fatale Angelica. With much of Agramante's early dialogue concerning the "unseen" face of the Madonna di Saragosa, Bava cleverly withholds Angelica's face from her first scene, as her coach is accosted by would-be Saracen suitors offering her tributes from the spoils of the raid on the Christian camp. Her arm snakes through the curtains of her ornate coach in a haughty pantomime, her fingers painted and beringed, dropping the baubles acquired at the cost of innocent lives contemptuously into the dirt. There is also her pagan dance, performed in a light blue skirt that twirls in chromatic relief to the black-skirted silhouettes accompanying her, which is narrated with almost pornographic appreciation by her father ("In her eyes there is discord . . . her laughter is like the edge of a blade . . . her arms are a thousand times more dangerous than those of her goddess . . . they are as sinuous as serpents. She is beautiful"); the exotic sequence fades-out after a match-cut to an inscrutable stone likeness of Kali, each of her multiple arms ending in a tightly gripped dagger.

The scene in which Alda and Rinaldo first meet is especially memorable, as the entire 5-minute sequence was captured in a single uninterrupted take—Bava's longest such experiment to date. En route to her father's encampment, Alda pauses to stretch her legs by a magnificently picturesque waterfall (the Cascate di Montegelato, a location that appears in numerous Francisci films)[20] and is threatened by a marauding wild boar. Rinaldo responds to her screams by spearing the creature, which causes Alda to faint. Because no cuts occur during the sequence, their encounter has a spellbound, time-suspended quality that makes their sudden emotions for one another curiously plausible.

THE PALADINS of France are given orders as Rinaldo (Fabrizio Mioni, far left) listens.

Another of the film's outstanding attributes is a distinctive, heroic score by Angelo Francesco Lavagnino. His scoring of the jousting tournament between the Paladins and the Saracens is especially thrilling, with the preparatory closing of each contestant's visor complemented with reverberating chimes of escalating timber. Lavagnino would never score another Bava film, but his career would encompass such outstanding works as Gorgo (1961), Ferdinando Baldi's Orazi e Curiazi/Duel of Champions (1961), Antonio Margheriti's "Gamma I" quartet of science fiction movies (1964), and Tonino Valerii's Western Oggi a me . . . domani a te/Today It's Me, Tomorrow You (1968, scripted by Dario Argento). Lavagnino also played at least one bit part, as a doctor in Mario Colucci's Qualcosa striscia nel buio/Something Creeping in the Dark (1971), before his death on August 21, 1987.

Orlando . . . also marks the first significant collaboration between Bava and some key players who would appear again and again during Bava's most memorable work as a cameraman and director, notably Ivo Garrani and Mimmo Palmara. Solid, dependable actors, they tended to play the same roles over and over onscreen—Garrani as the nobleman who finds himself compromised in his autumn years, and Palmara as a secondary villain, always more boorish than threatening—but among Italian actors, they could bring these caricatures to life with more color and aplomb than anyone.

Born February 6, 1924, in Intradaqua, at Sulmona (L'Aquila), stage actor Ivo Garrani made his first screen appearance in Ragazze da marito ("Married Women," 1952) and first worked with Bava while playing the supporting role of a doctor in Città di notte. After playing the role of the compromised King in Orlando e i paladini di Francia, Garroni became stereotyped as such, and went on to play variations of this character in Le fatiche di Ercole/Hercules, La morte viene dallo spazio/The Day the Sky Exploded, and La battaglia di Maratona/The Giant of Marathon—all photographed and co-directed by Bava—before being cast as the apotheosis of this character, the white-haired Prince Vajda of La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday—a role which he would essay at the age of 36! Garrani was still active in the Italian cinema as recently as Antonio and Marco Manetti's horror comedy Zora la vampira (2000), in which he played a priest.

Born on July 25, 1928, in Sardinia, Mimmo Palmara—beginning with this film—became a fixture of the pepla, being featured in over twenty of them before turning to spy pictures in the mid-1960s under the restyled nom de l'ecran "Dick Palmer." Tall, handsome and muscular, Palmara entered films on the strengths of his accomplishments as a bodybuilder. His first screen role was an uncredited appearance as a French officer in King Vidor's international co-production of War and Peace (1956), but he evidently endeared himself to Francisci and Bava on this production; he would work with them both several more times, notably in the two Hercules films soon to come. Screenwriter Ennio De Concini would write (or co-author) almost every Bava film for the next six years.

RIK BATTAGLIA as Orlando and Ivo Garrani (below) as Charlemagne.

20 One of the classic Italian film locations, famous for its appearances in Hercules and Hercules Unchained, the Cascate di Montegelato is said to be reachable only by automobile. According to Fabrizio Balestra's article "The Hercules Tourist Map" (Classic Physique 5:1, Winter/Spring 1999), it can be reached thusly: "About 30 kilometers north of Rome on the Via Cassia going in the direction of Viterbo, go towards the small village of Settevene (before Marzano). Continue north on the small country road for about 5 kilometers, then turn right at the sign 'Cascate di Montegelato.' You'll be there in a couple of minutes."

Francisci's overlong film—110 minutes—was reduced in length for its exported versions; a 94-minute edition was distributed in France and in America. The American version was never distributed theatrically, but was sold directly to television in grossly cropped 16 mm prints that omitted nearly half the CinemaScope frame. Shot and processed in unstable Eastmancolor, the color of these prints has now faded, bringing injury with insult. Capturing the dead center of the widescreen at all times, Roland the Mighty actually features a conversation between two people during which the only thing onscreen is a horse's ass.

Husband, Father, & Artist

In his private life, Mario Bava was now the father of teenagers, a trying period of life for any parent. His daughter Elena, who turned 18 in 1956, is said to have had a very close and dependent relationship with her father. This view is supported by one of Mario's rare interviews, in which he mentioned taking his daughter to Tor Caldara in the hope that its sulphur springs might cure her acne. It is unusual—especially in the 1950s—to hear of a father, least of all a very busy one, taking time to shepherd his daughter through such a personal ordeal, which is traditionally the province of mothers. Elena inherited the artistic talent and temperament of her forefathers, but had difficulty in deciding which medium was the correct one for her to pursue. In the early 1960s, she spent a year or two in the set design department at the De Laurentiis Studio, then relocated to Venice where she studied to become an architect, finally achieving this goal in 1970.

A WONDERFUL photo of the Bava family dining out, circa 1951.

Just as Elena's teenage years were coming to a close, those of Mario's son Lamberto were coming into view. In 1956, Lamberto was 12 years old and prone to all the mischief and misbehavior one expects from a growing boy. Lamberto tells wonderful stories about how his father coped with his "season of rebellion," revealing Mario Bava to have been as innovative at parenthood as he was at his profession.

"Without a doubt, he was thirty years ahead of his contemporaries," Lamberto has declared. "Not just in terms of the cinema, but in terms of his personal approach to life. When I was a child, my friends and classmates lived in terror of their fathers in the usual way, but mine was more like a friend. Sometimes, when I came home from school, he would come to me and ask, 'Why do you go? What do you do there?' It wasn't his form of education. Later, when I got to the age when one experiments with smoking, about 13 years old, I bought the cigarettes which were least expensive and most popular at the time. I can remember one day taking my pack of cigarettes from the coat pocket where I hid them and finding written on the cellophane wrapper, 'You smoke these?' That was my father's form of humor; he didn't forbid me to smoke, but rather poked fun at me gently for doing so."[21]

In a separate interview with the author, Lamberto continued in this vein: "I remember my father as a really positive person who gave me all that he could, emotionally. He hardly ever shouted at me—or if he did, it was no more than any father would. I mostly remember his wonderful sense of humor . . . One day when I woke for school, he came into my room and said, 'Lamberto, it's such a horrible day—why should you have to go to school? You stay in bed!' He wasn't like other fathers, who are always worried about their children's grades. He hardly ever asked me about my school activities . . . Another time, when I was older, I was playing hooky from school with some friends of mine and suddenly, one of them came running and said, 'Run! Your father's coming!' I dived behind a bush. I heard a car stop nearby and my father's voice saying, 'Lamberto, with that big ass of yours, it's not hard to see you!' And later, when I was 14 or 15 years old, I had a teacher who was giving me a hard time, and my father advised me, 'Well, try and get along with him as best you can—though he seems a bit stuck-up to me!'"

21 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

IOLE BAVA takes the family dog—a Scottish terrier named Lili—for a walk on the beach.

When Lamberto turned 16, Mario initiated a series of lessons in musical appreciation, playing him recordings of the works of Beethoven, Chopin, and other classical masters, and discussing afterwards (and during) why they were great, why they were important. To Mario, a thorough grounding in the classics was essential to one's civility; he was providing his son with something not necessarily given in school: a cultural education.

Lamberto feels that some of Mario's unorthodox approach to parenthood may have come from his father Eugenio's unpredictable behavior. "My grandfather was also somewhat eccentric," he says, reaching back another generation. "I remember when he was about 60 or 65 years old, he was still getting around on his motorcycle. My grandmother used to say he'd go out to buy a pack of cigarettes and come back two months later!" The women in the Bava family tended to be as devoutly Catholic as the men were nonreligious and apolitical, and the influence of being around spiritually minded women bred a certain kind of superstition among the Bava men.

"Whenever I was out walking with my grandmother and we passed a church," Lamberto continues, "we always had to go inside. I wouldn't say that my father was superstitious, but he was fascinated by anything shocking or sinister. I remember when my grandfather died, my father—who was obviously upset—didn't want me to go to the funeral. He thought the ceremony itself was quite horrific. Whenever we found ourselves behind a funeral procession, he would try to distract me, or protect me, because even when I was 16 or 17, he still regarded me as a child. He thought the whole idea of a funeral was macabre . . . and yet, in all his films, there is usually some bloody great coffin!" [22]

When I asked Lamberto's daughter Georgia if she considered Mario (to whom she was very close) a superstitious man, she said, "No!"—in a way that gave me the impression that this was a preposterous charge. When I followed up by saying I'd heard from others that Mario had a dread of owls and regarded the color purple as a harbinger of disaster, she laughed, "Oh, but that's everybody!"

The dark turn taken by Mario's imagination can be attributed to many influences, including his memories of his father's workroom, of the horrors of war, of postwar malaise, and indeed the violent nature of much of classical Italian art. But another factor was surely the ways in which his wife Iole had changed since their marriage. As mentioned earlier, once the couple began their family, Iole dropped her earlier interests in the cinema and became entirely focused on her home and children. In itself, this is not so unusual, but in Iole's case, her withdrawal into private life made her increasingly fretful, hypochondriacal, morbid, and reclusive.

MARIO*'s sister Elena, young Lamberto Bava, and mother Iole enjoy a gondola ride.*

A CROWD of spectators looks on as Mario prepares an on-location shot for one of his 1950s films.

"It is a very strange story, because I know very many friends of Mario who never met his wife," says Andrea Piazzesi, one of the few family intimates who actually met Iole. "She became very fat and was always suffering from a dread of heart attacks. She was always saying that she was going to die, that she was afraid to die, and this affected his life very strongly. She was not an easy person to be with; she wasn't the kind of wife who could go places with him or help to promote him. She never wanted to travel—and she didn't want him to travel! He told me that this was a problem, but nevertheless, he stayed with this woman his whole life."

Obviously regarding this as a very personal subject, Lamberto Bava declined to speak about his mother for this book, but his children remember their grandmother fondly—while allowing in the same breath that their grandparents were anything but an ideal couple.

"My father [Lamberto] was very close to Mario, but not so close with his mother," Georgia Bava explains. "That's not because my grandmother had a strange character or anything—she was a very nice woman—but because she had no interest in cinema. She was interested in basic things, like cooking and her family. She didn't like to go out and meet people, to go to dinner parties or the theater; she stayed at home. [Her relationship with Mario] was very strained; I don't think he was all that happy, quite honestly. If he had met another woman, he would have been happier, and vice versa. They were quite different from one another in every way. He liked reading and the work he was doing, but around the house, he had to hide these interests."

Gustave Flaubert once advised that artists should be bourgeois and conservative in their personal lives, the better to be violent and daring in their art. Bava is the perfect exemplar of this philosophy.

"Mario was very reserved in his life, but he was attracted to extreme things," his grandson Roy suggests. "He was an observer, a voyeur really . . . and he was attracted to the strange, extreme side of human behavior. He was always telling me about this. For one of his early documentaries [probably Luigi Comencini's L'ospedale del delitto, 1950], he had to film inside a madhouse, and he remembered a person there who was a brutal murderer, who had spent the last twenty years of his life standing still and following the sun as it was moving. He said, 'This is unbelievable! This person, who is so quiet and does nothing all day but watch the sky, once annihilated his entire family?' He spent a whole day observing this man, and it began to haunt his imagination—why people did such things, how they can sometimes be moved to do something that extreme." [23]

Whatever the cause, as Mario Bava's cinematographic talent matured, it became more expressive of a dark sensibility. Certainly, he could fill the screen with images of fanciful, indelible beauty, but there was always a sense of falsity, of personal disbelief, when he was called upon to accentuate the positive. It was only when a story provided him with opportunities to explore the anguish of life—its melancholy, its violence, its despair and tragedy—that his work became most truthful and passionate: the apocalyptic climax of I pagliacci, the suicide of Tamara Lees' character in Miss Italia, the comic nightmare scene in La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna, the spectral "Motherless Child" sequence from Natale al Campo 119 and Gloria Swanson's imperious return from a watery grave in Mio figlio Nerone.

After fifteen years as a feature film cameraman, Bava had finally assimilated his influences and personal experience into a signature style. But, at this point in time, it still awaited its context.

22 Lamberto Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

23 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

More Than a Cameraman

"They snap, they break, they pop, they crackle!
And I'm the one who has to put them back together again!"
—Lisa and the Devil

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Arnaldo Putzu.

I VAMPIRI

The Devil's Commandment

THE HORROR FILM—prohibited in Italy during Mussolini's rule—remained out of general favor in the wake of the real life horrors of World War II. Science fiction—nowadays a cynical genre, but in the 1950s a vehicle for constructive optimism—was suddenly in vogue, showing audiences how the resilient human spirit could survive cataclysms of even cosmic proportions to rebuild society from the ground up, as in the case of the 1951 George Pal production When Worlds Collide. Between 1950 and 1956, there had been only one authentic success in the classic horror mode: Andre de Toth's House of Wax (1953)—a faithful remake of Michael Curtiz' Mystery of the Wax Museum (1933). The film's popularity was as rooted in the humorous novelty of its 3-D photography as in its hair-raising Grand Guignol thrills; it had wisely taken care to add fun to fright.

Unlike most active filmmaking countries, Italy had not produced a true horror film since Il mostro di Frankenstein (1920). The classic American horror films of the 1930s and '40s were not exhibited in Italy until the early 1950s, when the censors began to allow certain titles to filter through. Prior to this, the fantastic cinema had survived for Italian audiences of that period only in the form of fairy tale films (e.g., Walt Disney's animated features) and art films tinged with darkness like Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's The Tales of Hoffman (1951). As for Italian films, the fantastic had been diminished over the years to the romantic, light-hearted strain found in such popular fare as Miracolo a Milani/Miracle in Milan (1951) and Totò all'inferno ("Totò in Hell," 1954); there was always a comic, satirical or whimsical attachment.

While other countries had seemingly lost interest in producing horror movies, there was a groundswell of interest in Italy as Universal's classics Dracula and Frankenstein (both 1931) were shown there for the first time. The renaissance was somewhat thwarted by the Italian censors; as Giuseppe Tornatore's Nuovo Cinema Paradiso/Cinema Paradiso (1988) illustrates, it was a time when simple kissing was not permitted to be shown in some districts. Rare was the horror film that could be shown in Italy without extensive national and local censor cuts.

Mario Bava had kept up his friendship with Riccardo Freda, while moonlighting as a special effects day-worker on films like Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio (1954), the comedy Da qui all'eredità (1955, which was partly filmed at Istituto LUCE), and Beatrice Cenci (1956). At some point in the course of their conversations during this interval, they arrived at the crazy idea of making a horror film together. It was a crazy idea at the time; Hammer Films of Great Britain was still a year away from producing Terence Fisher's The Curse of Frankenstein (1957), the film whose fresh interpretation and international popularity would light the wick of the horror renaissance of the 1950s. It's possible that the subject came up as early as Freda's initial visit to Bava's home in 1953, when he first admired Eugenio's wax sculptures of the Saints. 1953 was also the year of House of Wax, which was making money in other countries and would soon be making money in Italy under the title La maschera di cera ("The Wax Mask"); its success, and the sculptures, would have been the perfect catalysts to such a discussion. Regardless of when their talks on the subject actually began, and whatever prompted them, Freda didn't get around to making a pitch until 1956.

Freda made an appointment with Ermanno Donati and Luigi Carpentieri—two gambling buddies, who also happened to be film producers—and told them he was interested in directing a horror film. They were intrigued, but also leery of losing their shirts by backing a film in an unproven genre. Knowing how quickly Bava worked at lighting and cinematography, Freda appealed to their gambling instincts. He bet them that he could complete such a picture in only twelve days.

"They asked if I had anything prepared," said Freda, describing the fateful session. "I said no, but I promised that I could cook something up by the next day. When I returned with my proposal, I brought it—not written on paper, but recorded on tape! I did the sound effects also, even the creakings of the door; it was very amusing!" [1]

Donati and Carpentieri were impressed by the novelty of Freda's "radio" presentation and took the reel to Goffredo Lombardo, the executive producer at Titanus. Lombardo felt likewise, and with Freda's avowed twelve-day schedule made a condition of the deal, he agreed to fund the production.

Freda's concept was built, like most of his films since the late 1940s, around his lover Gianna Maria Canale, whose flawless, mask-like

ITALIAN due-foglia for HOUSE OF WAX.

I vampiri

"The Vampires"
Filmed at Titanus Appia Studios (Scalera Film) and on location in Italy
Autumn 1956
First released: April 5, 1957
B&W, CinemaScope, 2.35:1, 85 minutes

Production: Titanus–L'Athena Cinematografica. Producers: Ermanno Donati, Luigi Carpentieri. Directors: Riccardo Freda, (uncredited) Mario Bava. Screenplay: Piero Regnoli, Rijk Sijöström. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Corrado Bartoloni. Art direction: Beni Montresor. Props: Mario Sertoli. Special effects: Mario Bava. Wardrobe: Beni Montresor. Wardrobe assistant: Adriana Berselli. Makeup: Franco Freda. Hairdresser: Ada Palombi. Production manager: Piero Donati. Production inspector: Claudio Agostinelli. Editor: Roberto Cinquini. Music: Roman Vlad, Franco Mannino (some sources). Distributor: Titanus.

Gianna Maria Canale (Gisèle Du Grand/Duchess Marguerite Du Grand), Dario Michaëlis (Pierre Lantin/LaSalle), Carlo D'Angelo (Inspector Santel/Mornier/Chantal), Wandisa Guida (Laurette Robert), Antoine Balpêtre (Prof. Julian Du Grand), Renato Tontini (Roland Fontaine), Paul Müller (Joseph Seignoret), Angiolo Galassi (assistant), Charles Fawcett, Gisela Mancinotti (Nora Duval), Miranda Campa, Emilio Petacci, Armando Annuale, Riccardo Freda (doctor, uncredited).

Additional US credits: Executive producers: Jonathan Daniels, Victor Purcell. Directors: Richard Freda, Ron Honthauer [Ron Honthaner]. Screenplay: J. V. Rhems. Cast: Gina Maria Canale [sic] (Duchess Marguerite Du Grand), Charles Fawcett (intruder), Barbara London (dancer), Ronny and Joy Holliday (nightclub dancers), Bert Goldstein (maitre d'), Barbara Wohl (girl in restaurant), Al Lewis (assistant—additional inserts).

Belgium: De Bloedzuigers, "The Bloodsuckers," Cosmopolis Films
Cuba: Los Vampiros, Películas Europeas, S.A.
France: Les Vampires, Les Films Marbeuf, 11/27/57
Germany: Der Vampir von Notre Dame, "The Vampire of Notre Dame," Prisma Film–Mueller, 11/28/58
UK: Lust of the Vampire, Gala Film Distributors Ltd., 65m 53s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts
US: The Devil's Commandment, RCIP, 73m

I VAMPIRI fotobusta: Dario Michaëlis, Renato Tontini. The photo of Gianna Maria Canale seen here was the work of famed fashion photographer Elio Luxardo (1908-69), the uncle of future director Dario Argento.

beauty projected an aura of imperious power and sensuality—the perfect vamp for a contemporary vampire film. "The undead creatures invented by Bram Stoker hold no interest for me," he said. "I believe that, if modern vampires exist, they must survive by stealing away the youth of others."[2]

His proposal—simply titled I vampiri—appears to have been studiously crafted to sidestep potential problems with the Italian censors. Despite the title, there would be no blood-drinking; despite the romantic aspects of the story, there would be no kissing; the story would take place in Paris, to keep the horror at a safe distance; and though the story necessitated violent death, it would always occur offscreen. Horror would be suggested entirely through the film's sepulchral decor and cinematography, one or two well-positioned feats of magic, and the unseen. Produced in 1956, released in 1957, it would be the first Italian horror film of the sound era.

Synopsis

In Paris, construction workers toiling on the edge of the Seine discover the dead body of Mireille, a teenage student at the Ecole du Jeanne d'Arc, floating in the river, drained of blood—the latest victim in a series of "vampire" murders. Pierre Lantin, a newspaper reporter, is taunting Inspector Santel of the Sureté, much to his irritation, for his inability to solve the case.[3] The next young woman to disappear is Nora Duval, a music hall showgirl of twenty, who is abducted from her dressing room by a tall, pale man wearing black gloves.

Though his editor shares Inspector Santel's displeasure over his theoretical "vampire" stories, Pierre continues to press on with his private investigation. At the office, visited by his photographer friend Roland Fontaine, Pierre tries to "picture the vampire," while Ronald becomes fascinated by a photo of Gisèle Du Grand—the astonishingly beautiful niece of the elderly and vastly wealthy Duchess Marguerite Du Grand. Gisèle has eyes for no one but Pierre, but he is too dedicated to solving the "vampire murders" to care. Besides, Pierre cannot overlook the fact that the Duchess, despite her advanced years, nearly destroyed his parents' marriage with her obsessive love for his father—which was based solely on his resemblance to her first love, Pierre's grandfather, a family trait that continues with the current generation.

On a street in Montmartre, Pierre interviews three girls who attended the Ecole du Jeanne d'Arc with Mireille. One of them, Laurette, recalls that Mireille was shadowed for several days prior to her disappearance by a tall, pale man. Gisèle drives by and summons Pierre, chastising him for ignoring her. Roland observes their meeting and, faced with this divine creature in the flesh, falls in love at first sight. Returning to work, Pierre examines a photo of the missing showgirl and notices a tall, pale man walking at a short distance behind her.

The abductor, Joseph Seignoret, writhes in pain in his darkened apartment until a stranger in black gloves arrives to administer a drug injection. He is shown a photograph of Laurette and told to abduct her if he wants another fix. Joseph does not know the identity of his administrator.

The next day, in Montmartre, Pierre notices Seignoret in the street and trails him to a second floor apartment, a location set apart from surrounding apartment buildings of the same type by a roadblock sign positioned in front. He verifies the man's residence, then makes a report to Santel; unfortunately, after dragging Santel to the apartment, they find a retired gendarme in residence. (Unknown to Pierre, the roadblock sign had been moved by workmen to the front of a different, outwardly identical apartment building farther down the block.)

Meanwhile, in his own apartment, Seignoret finds the ampule of the drug administered to him the night before lying on the floor. It is labelled with the address of the Clinica Salus, run by Prof. Julien Du Grand. He goes there, insists on seeing Du Grand and demands more drugs and money, otherwise he will expose him as the mastermind behind the "vampire" killings. Joseph is overcome by the Professor's burly henchman. At that moment, Du Grand's aged domineering wife—the Duchess Marguerite Du Grand, to whom he is married only in name—bursts into the room and declares that the Professor's sloppiness has endangered their operation, and that he must now protect their cover by staging his own death. Du Grand's death makes headlines (A GREAT LOSS TO MANKIND: THE UNEXPECTED DEATH OF PROF. JULIEN DU GRAND), and the unconscious body of Seignoret is interred in his place in the family tomb, then later removed for further experimentation in Du Grand's laboratory, which occupies the family chapel and connects with the Du Grand castle through a secret passage behind the main fireplace.

1 Emanuela Martini and Stefano Della Casa, eds., Freda (Bergamo, Italy: Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia Cineteca Nazionale, 1993), 53–61. It should be mentioned here that Goffredo Lombardo was a man of paramount importance to the history of the Italian horror film, because he not only green-lighted I vampiri, but also Dario Argento's L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage in 1970.

2 Michel Caen and J. C. Romer, "Entretien avec Riccardo Freda," Midi-Minuit Fantastique 7, September 1963, 1–6.

3 Pierre's surname is changed to "La Salle" in the American version, while the Inspector Santel is renamed "Mornier" in the French version and "Chantal" in the American version. Pierre's surname is given as "Valentin" in several published references, but this is evidently no more than an old and oft-repeated error, with no basis in any known version.

While walking to school one morning, Laurette passes a blind beggar, who asks if she would do him the great favor of delivering a letter to an apartment in Paris. She takes the letter to a cluttered but otherwise vacant apartment, where she is abducted by another of Du Grand's henchmen.

Pierre learns of Laurette's disappearance while paying a social call at the apartment of her parents. Pierre, who has begun to see Laurette socially, is distraught over her disappearance. Making matters worse, his editor forces him to forget the "vampire" murders for one night by attending a ball at the Du Grand chateau. Roland accompanies Pierre to the ball, where the reporter is quickly approached by Gisèle, who leads him to a private, moonlit balcony. There, she expresses her love for him and her equal hatred for her aunt's guests. When the couple hear a scream in the night—actually Laurette screaming from the room where Julien is holding her prisoner—Gisèle explains that it must be her aunt, suffering in seclusion from a painful disease. Pierre soon makes his apologies and leaves, but Roland stays behind. When all the guests have gone home and Gisèle retires to her bedroom, Roland romantically scales the wall to her quarters. Gisèle's anger at his presumptuous intrusion provokes a transformation. As Roland stands aghast before her, the woman's youth and beauty withers into the aged Duchess Marguerite Du Grand! She shoots Roland to death in anger.

The Duchess' youth is being maintained by Prof. Du Grand with the blood of young virgins, but the transformation is very tenuous and can be reversed by turbulent emotions. Using Laurette, Julien subjects the Duchess to a three-hour experimental ordeal, which restores her youth once again but leaves Laurette near death and the Duchess/Gisèle herself somewhat weakened.

Later, Pierre bumps into Gisèle, who drags him to an antiques store where she plans to acquire a painting on her aunt's behalf. She asks the dealer about the work's authenticity and he asserts that he would never cheat the Duchess. "To me," he says, "you and the Duchess are one and the same!" On a hunch, Pierre decides to return to the castle that night, and he flees after setting off a macabre security alarm, only to discover another escapee—a disoriented Joseph Seignoret—staggering on the grounds. Pierre takes Seignoret to be questioned by Inspector Santel, and the man admits to kidnapping the young women, but Santel discounts his claim that Prof. Du Grand—supposedly dead and buried—is still alive and masterminding the abductions. At the end of his confession, Seignoret collapses on the floor, dead.

Noting that Ronald has not been seen since the Du Grand ball, Pierre persuades Santel to search the castle. Though the police are mystified by the odd legend on the Du Grand family crest (Conquisterò Inferno, "I Shall Conquer Hell"), nothing incriminating is found. As Santel and his men prepare to withdraw, Gisèle's outrage triggers an unbidden reversion to her true age. Pierre and the authorities gape as the beautiful woman withers before their eyes, crumbling into a withered, staring shell. A scream in the cellar attracts the police to the underground laboratory, where Santel is amazed to find Prof. Du Grand still alive. But not for long: Du Grand and his burly associate are shot dead. Wondering who occupies Du Grand's tomb, Santel has it opened. Laurette is found inside—weak but still alive.

Freda's homemade radio play was fleshed-out on paper by Piero Regnoli (b. 1929), a young but accomplished screenwriter who had previously produced and co-authored Filippo Walter Ratti's Non è mai troppo tardi ("It's Never Too Late," 1953), a modern-day interpretation of Charles Dickens' A Christmas Carol. Regnoli also added some of his own commercial touches to the story, like having the women abducted and bled to death by the Du Grands include leggy chorus girls. A few years after I vampiri, Regnoli would direct his own elaboration on this theme, L'ultima preda del vampiro/ The Playgirls and the Vampire (1960), starring Helene Rémy and Walter Brandi.[4] Regnoli also served on the production as assistant director. One of the most important contributions to the screenplay, possibly owed to Bava, was inventing Pierre as the object of the 100-year-old Duchess' romantic obsession, due to his uncanny resemblance to his own grandfather, whom she had loved in her youth. The use of a family portrait to explain Gisèle's obsession—indeed, the whole concept of men and women doomed to replay the loves and hates of their ancestors—would become one of the key premises in Italian horror; indeed, both Regnoli and Bava would restate this theme prominently in their respective directorial debuts in 1960.

GIANNA MARIA CANALE strikes an iconic pose as s Gisèle Du Grand, amid the art direction of Beni Montresor.

Pre-production & Cast

Freda and Bava decided that the film should be photographed in black-and-white CinemaScope. Both men had been working in the anamorphic format—Freda's previous film Beatrice Cenci had been his first anamorphic film, and he was sufficiently enamored of the epic frame that he would use it more often than not for the rest of his career—but only in color. The decision to shoot in monochrome might seem an automatic choice at the time, insofar as filming horror was concerned, but in fact, color horror films had already come into vogue with House of Wax and Phantom of the Rue Morgue (1954). The decision to film in black-and-white was actually imposed on the production by the nature of the trick shots Bava had planned.

4 Piero Regnoli would remain a prominent screenwriter for the popular Italian cinema throughout the early 1990s, working mostly in spy thrillers and Spaghetti Westerns; his later horror scripts include Mino Guerrini's extraordinary Il terzo occhio ("The Third Eye," 1966; credited to "Dean Craig"), Mario Landi's Patrick vive ancora ("Patrick Lives Again," 1980), Andrea Bianchi's Le notti del terrore/ Burial Ground (1981), Umberto Lenzi's Incubo sulla citta contaminata/City of the Walking Dead (1980), and two films for Lucio Fulci, Demonia (1990) and Voci dal profondo/Voices From Beyond (1991).

After Bava, the production's most valuable asset was undoubtedly its chief designer. "We had an extraordinary art director, Beni Montresor, who worked hard without ever complaining," Freda praised. "The scene in which Gianna Maria Canale suddenly ages into an old woman seems successful to me, in part, because the look of his sets corresponds perfectly to the truth about her character." [5]

Born in Verona in 1933, Montresor was only 23 years old at the time of filming, but he threw himself into creating the world of the Duchess with a marvelously uninhibited flair for the macabre. The sets are a sumptuous feast of decadence, resplendent with a surface articulation of skulls, tall dripping candles, and sheer fabrics torn to sigh in the breeze like cobwebs. The Du Grand family crypt, reached via a secret passage behind the castle's main fireplace (the first of many such conveniences in the annals of Italian horror), contains a variety of ornamental femurs and skulls, one of which serves as a pre-Addams Family security alarm, with flashing eyes and an owl-like shriek. The entrance to the castle's main hall is couched in satin drapes folded into jagged points around the peaked arch, in a manner that recalls the outstretched wings of a bat or dragon. One of the most striking furnishings in the castle is a bronze sculpture found at the base of the main hall's stone balustrade: a swan-necked dragon with skeletal, upturned wings, bare female breasts, and the clawed feet of a griffin. Montresor's work is deliriously inspired, and some might argue that it's a bit overdone; during the ball sequence, none of the Duchess' high society guests take any notice of the bountifully morbid decor—nor do the police look askance at any of this horror show when they arrive to interrogate Gisèle late in the film. In fact, the sheer hyperbole of Montresor's work—its emphasis on atmospheric clutter over logic, the heaping-on of art for art's sake—would be one of the film's most lasting contributions to the character of the Italian horror film.

RICCARDO FREDA (seated) confers with Mario Bava (right) on the set of I VAMPIRI.

In the absence of an existing Italian horror film tradition, Freda and his chief collaborators were required to venture into virgin territory. The unique look of I vampiri was not necessarily decided, but more likely resulted from the amalgamation of available space and props, and the Italians' own limited knowledge of the evolution of the horror genre in the sound era. Consequently, I vampiri is less influenced by Universal's Dracula or Frankenstein than by silent French serials, neorealist drama, romantic melodrama, fairy tales and grand opera. In fact, one of its most noticeable stylistic influences is Walt Disney's Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1937)—one of the few American films of a macabre nature to play in Italy prior to the war years—with Gianna Maria Canale a formidable flesh-and-blood embodiment of the Disney classic's Evil Queen.

Canale is captured here at the height of her allure, her severe yet incandescent beauty refreshed by a smart, mannish coiffure. One of the film's missteps is that it doesn't quite provide her with an entrance worthy of her impact (she simply drives up and calls to Pierre from her car window); however, the first time her face appears in the movie is in the form of a glamorous Luxardo photograph that literally drew gasps from the theater audience of which I was part. Of course, it is the juxtaposition of Canale's beauty with the shrivelled ugliness of the Duchess Du Grand that is its locus of horror, and this establishes yet another of the film's enduring legacies: in the best Italian horror films, there can be no horror without the counterpoint of classical beauty.

Second-billed after Canale was Carlo D'Angelo, whose minor role of Inspector Santel was presumably more prominent in Freda's original script. Born in Milan on February 2, 1919, D'Angelo had been playing supporting roles in films since the late 1940s; his biggest exposure up to this time had been an uncredited role in Howard Hawks' Land of the Pharaohs (1955). In later years, he would continue to find work in costume pictures and assorted pepla, including Viktor Tourjansky's Erode il grande/Herod the Great (1958) and Ferdinando Baldi's David e Golia/David and Goliath (1960), and he would be photographed by Bava once again in Ercole e la regina di Lidia/Hercules Unchained (1959), in which he played an important secondary role. His later career included appearances for Antonio Margheriti (Il pianeta degli uomini spenti/Battle of the Worlds, 1961), Riccardo Freda (Giulietta e Romeo, 1964), Giorgio Ferroni (New York chiama Superdrago/Secret Agent Superdragon, 1966), and Sergio Corbucci (Il grand silenzio/The Great Silence, 1968). Sometimes billed as "Charles Angel" in his Western appearances, D'Angelo died in Bologna on June 9, 1973.

Billed below D'Angelo onscreen, but in effect the film's principal actor, was Dario Michaëlis. Born March 29, 1929, in Resistencia, Argentina, Michaëlis had previously appeared in minor roles for such prominent directors as Mario Bonnard and Christian-Jacque. His hair was dyed blonde for I vampiri, which was his first starring role. He would work with Bava again on La morte viene dalla spazio (1958), and continued to appear in Italian films through the early 1970s, but never succeeded in landing another leading role.

The role of Laurette was played by Wandisa Guida (b. 1937), making one of her earliest screen appearances. Guida—who was also known to act under the name "Wandisa Leigh"—would become especially prominent in peplum films of the 1960s, including La vendetta di Ercole/Goliath and the Dragon (1960), La vendetta di Ursus/The Revenge of Ursus (1961) and Antonio Margheriti's impressive I giganti di Roma/The Giants of Rome (1964), a thinly disguised sword-and-sandal rewrite of The Guns of Navarone. She later became the wife of producer Luciano Martino and has been retired from films for many years.

From a casting standpoint, Freda's greatest coup was signing French acting legend Antoine Balpêtre (1898–1963) for the role of Prof. Julien Du Grand. The renowned director of the Sociètaire de la Comèdie Française, the actor was so well-known in France that, as early as 1932, he was being billed onscreen simply (or grandly) as "Balpêtre." Among his cinematic triumphs were Maurice Tourneur's Le Main du Diable/Carnival of Sinners (1943), Henri-Georges Clouzot's Le Corbeau ("The Raven," 1943), Robert Vernay's Fantômas contra Fantômas (1949), and Robert Bresson's Journal d'un Curé Campagne/Diary of a Country Priest (1951). In 1955, Balpêtre branched out to star in his first Italian film, Il piccolo vetraio, made in Turin. Casting him in I vampiri was done partly to deceive audiences into thinking the film had been shot on location in Paris.

The film's most familiar face, to devotees of horror cinema anyway, belongs to Swiss actor Paul Müller (b. 1923). Müller had also been active in films since the late 1940s—he had a small but visible role in Fabiola, and worked with Gianna Maria Canale that same year (1949) in Il bacio di una morta. He has since achieved a cult following for his gallery of slimy, untrustworthy doctors, psychiatrists, and closet libertines in countless European exploitation films of the '50s, '60s, and '70s. Among his more conspicuous roles are the sadistic cuckold Dr. Arrowsmith in Amanti d'oltretomba/Nightmare Castle (1965, in which he is married to a faithless Barbara Steele), Dr. Seward in Jess Franco's Count Dracula (1970), Ewa Stroemberg's psychiatrist in Franco's Vampyros Lesbos (1970), Dr. Frankenstein's assistant—and brain donor—in Mel Welles' Lady Frankenstein (1971), the dead father's ghost in Franco's Une Vierge chez les Morts-Vivants/A Virgin Among the Living Dead (1971), and the tutor of the young Pharaoh in the TV miniseries Moses the Lawgiver (1975), for which Mario Bava provided the special effects.

Production

Though the main titles identify the studio location as Titanus Appia, the twelve-day production schedule commenced in the late autumn of 1956 at Scalera Film. The exterior view of the Castle Du Grand was filmed at a villa located on a Roman consular road called Cassia, known as Villa Mamzolin, which was owned at the time by an old woman of that family name. The location—exterior, interior, or both—was subsequently used in a number of Italian films, including Ernesto Gastaldi's directorial debut Libido (1966), which was filmed both inside and outside the premises.

"It was almost a castle, as you can see in Libido and many other movies that were filmed there, but it is not close to the sea, as it appears in my film," Gastaldi describes. "Behind the villa, there was a big space for horse races and green fields. Today, that area is almost completely covered with buildings, but I think the villa is still there."

Viewers familiar with Bava's earlier work may recognize the backstage theater area, where Joseph Seignoret stalks a chorus girl, from the early backstage scenes of Vita da cani. Judging from photographs taken on the set, the studio must have been ice cold—Freda can be seen wearing a three-piece pinstriped suit and gloves indoors, while Bava is bundled-up in two sweaters, a shirt, and a necktie. Despite the chill, a faux pas that survives in the finished film suggests that the studio ceiling was sometimes opened in the afternoons to bring in extra warmth from the sun. When Marguerite empties a revolver into her mirror in a fit of self-loathing, the pieces of broken glass settle to briefly reveal a couple of onlooking technicians, a stone chimney, and a bright sky—all reflected in the midst of a supposedly interior night scene.

There was considerable tension on the set, some of it caused by the imperative to work quickly, but much of it due to the imperious attitudes of the director. Freda comported himself tyranically on-set, barking his directions and handling his actors with equal measures of disregard and contempt.

"Freda knew his job very well, he was gifted," Bava allowed, "but his behavior was unacceptable. He was convinced, like Mario Soldati, that most actors have their heads up their asses. Maybe I agree, but Freda took this notion to extremes. Just imagine: he would only walk onto the set after each new scene had been completely blocked and rehearsed [by the cameraman]. Then he would arrive, sit down in his chair, turn his back to the cast and shout, 'Si gira!' ['Roll 'em!']! After the take was finished, he would turn to me and ask if we should print. Well, after a few days of that, the actors were at their wit's end!" [6]

5 Jacques Lourcelles and Simon Misrahi, "Entretien avec Riccardo Freda," Prèsence du Cinema 17, Spring 1963, 11–30.

THIS MARIO BAVA glass matte transformed the outer grounds of Scalera Film into an avenue in Montmartre.

If anything related to the production was commanding of Freda's complete attention and respect, it was Bava's special effects photography. Typically in Italian films of this station and period, special effects filming was always reserved for the final week of production, but Freda was so eager to get to these scenes, they were evidently scheduled early.

Freda praised Bava as "a master of special effects . . . able to solve any problem, regardless of its difficulty. When we were making I vampiri, we worked together to recreate the streets of Paris in the stately courtyard of Scalera Film. In Paris, they refused to believe that Montmartre and Lungosenna had been shot in a courtyard with the help of a simple sheet of glass!" [7]

Freda is referring to two exterior shots—Pierre's first meeting with Laurette and two other chorus girls, and his later shadowing of Joseph Seignoret, whom he sees reading a newspaper while getting a shoeshine—which appear to have been shot on a street in Montmartre, with the twin towers of Notre Dame du Paris visible in the distance. This scene was actually filmed on the street outside the offices of Scalera Film, which happened to be located in a Roman apartment building. Bava created the illusion by affixing a convincing collage of large clipped photographs to a sheet of glass placed between the camera and the action. In the establishing shot of the street, everything you see in the top half of the frame was put there by Bava. His facility with this kind of illusion astounded Freda, but to Bava himself, it was old hat; in fact, he had previously done the same trick on the same location—in 1948's Follie per l'opera, using a glass matte to redress this same Roman street as a road in London.

The very first shot in I vampiri is also a trick, with Bava using the same means to insert the Eiffel Tower into the background as a group of workmen discover the corpse of a young woman (supposedly) floating in the Seine. Another glass matte suggesting the Montmartre district accompanies the street scene where Laurette meets the blind man and kindly agrees to deliver a letter for him. In the exterior shot of Pierre meeting Gisèle, prior to the scene in the antiques shop, actor Dario Michaëlis occupies the extreme left of frame while the remaining three-fourths of the frame is occupied by a photographic matte. (The source photograph is also seen during the main titles, under Paul Müller's screen credit.) Bava sells the illusion with a couple of leafy branches, which overhang the extreme right of the matte, lending movement to the foreground of the foliage collected there. This is a signature trait of Bava's trick cinematography: the placement of real foregrounded objects to lend verisimilitude to an illusory underlayer of the composition.

In contrast to the film's moodily lit interiors, the quality of these exterior shots may look somewhat crude to a contemporary viewer, but they are in keeping with the overexposed look of the neorealist films still being produced in Italy at the time. It may also have been necessary for Bava to deliberately overexpose these shots in order to persuasively blend his Roman locations and the French scenery he had clipped from magazines and postcards. At any rate, the look of I vampiri is the quintessential bridge between Rossellini's Roma città aperta and Bava's own La maschera del demonio, and whatever technical shortcomings its cinematography may have illustrate perfectly the enormous creative leap of faith involved in trying to launch a horror tradition in Italy at this moment in history.

However, Freda was most awestruck by the ingenious technique Bava employed to transform the beautiful, brunette Gianna Maria Canale into a withered hag with white hair, and back again, without the benefit of cutaways. Freda at least pretended to be under the impression that this effect was being done in his film "for the first time in the history of cinema," but in fact, the illusion dates back at least as far as 1925, when the American cinematographer Karl Struss used it in MGM's Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ—for the scene in which Ben-Hur's leprous mother and sister are cured by the touch of Jesus' hand. Some years later, Struss used the same technique even more famously to film the transformation scenes of MGM's Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1931), directed by Rouben Mamoulian. Critics and audiences were astounded by these shots, which helped Struss to win that year's Academy Award for Best Photography, but despite the public's intense curiosity about how the effect was achieved, both Struss and Mamoulian kept the explanation a closely guarded secret—until the late 1960s, when the cameraman finally spilled the beans to an audience of film students:

RICCARDO FREDA touches up the multi-plane glass matte on-set.

GISÈLE transforms into the aged Duchess Marguerite Du Grand (left sequence), and later admires her rejuvenated beauty.

"It was done by using a red filter on a strong red makeup," Struss explained, "so that when you photographed red with a red filter the object was white. In front of the lens you put a two-inch red square 'A' filter that had the same speed as a green 'B' filter so that when you went from one exposure to the other, the density remained the same . . . When the transition started, it would slowly change and with the green filter you could see the image, the face, become quite dark, with lines and so forth, depending on how much makeup we had put on in the first place."[8]

Struss may well have derived the trick from the world of stage lighting. Some descriptions of Richard Mansfield's turn-of-the-century performances in a famous stage play adaptation of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde—in which the actor executed his on stage transformation in full view of the audience—suggest that he may well have accomplished this feat with colored lighting effects. Nevertheless, at least a decade before Struss let the cat out of the bag publicly, Mario Bava used the same principles to effect Gianna Maria Canale's aging and rejuvenation scenes in I vampiri. It's possible that he cajoled the secret out of Struss while working with him on Francisci's Attila in 1954, but I suspect that Bava was such a born technician that he could have looked at the Mamoulian film and figured out the trick with his own two eyes. It is also possible that Eugenio Bava was present on the set of the 1925 Ben-Hur for the filming of the healing of the lepers (either as a visitor or as a secondary cameraman), and later shared the secret of its execution with his son.

What is significant about Bava's approach to these sequences is that he didn't simply copy Struss' technique; he managed to simplify it, and also take it a step or two further. Wrinkles were drawn on Canale's face in red grease pencil, which were then rendered invisible on the black-and-white film stock with red lighting. Old age makeup was applied to her hands, which the actress kept below the frame until the green lighting became dominant. (In a gaffe during the first transformation, which was inadvertently left in the picture, the makeup on Canale's hands leaves powdery traces on the front of her robe as she clutches at her throat.) As the scene was performed, the red light was manually dimmed while a green light was simultaneously raised, which caused the red makeup to photograph as black. Red makeup was also applied to Canale's teeth, making them look more discolored and rotten as the green light became more pronounced. But perhaps the most dramatic addition was having Canale fitted with a special wig whose artificial filaments looked dark under normal, indirect lighting conditions, but reflected light, photographing as white, when bombarded with direct illumination. By intensifying the light on the wig during the transformation, Bava was able to show her hair literally turn white on

6 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

7 Riccardo Freda, Divoratori di celluloide—50 anni di memorie cinematografiche e non (Milan, Italy: Emme Edizione–Il Formichiere, 1981), 80–130.

8 Karl Struss, as quoted in Susan and John Harvith, Karl Struss: Man With a Camera (Bloomfield Hills MI: Cranbrook Academy of Art Museum, 1976) in Gregory William Mank, Hollywood Cauldron (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co.), 15.

JOSEPH SEIGNORET (Paul Müller) is walked to the guillotine in the discarded prologue of I VAMPIRI.

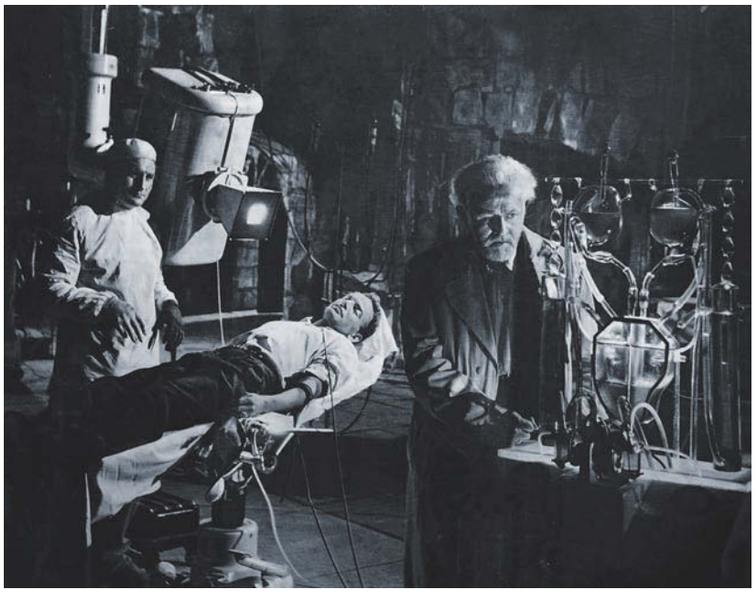
cue. Even when seen today, the effect—especially during the rejuvenation sequence—remains uncannily smooth and effective, so much so that one could slap editor Roberto Cinquini for interrupting the flawless process of the effect with needless cutaways to flashing laboratory equipment. Bava was so fond of this effect, he would repeat it in his directorial debut La maschera del demonio with Barbara Steele (where it doesn't work quite as impressively) and reveal the principles of its execution on a TV talk show in the early 1970s.

Corrado Bartoloni, who served as camera operator on the shot, remembers that it impressed everyone who saw it, including their fellow professionals. "Everybody started asking Bava how he did this—not only in Italy, but also people from the United States!" he laughs. "Mario told me, 'Corrado, I recommend that you do not say a single word about this. Let's keep it our little secret.'"

Bava's camera trickery in I vampiri also extends to the power of visual suggestion, as in the scene of Joseph Seignoret's visit to the Clinica Salus. The set itself appears to be nothing but three white walls, one of them with a door and an opaque, sheet-paper window displaying shadows of the medical world within. Seignoret sits and waits, the shadow of a non-existent "fourth wall" window projected on the wall behind him, while the shadows of doctors and nurses move about amid various pieces of vaguely delineated medical equipment, wheeling a patient out of the area on a gurney. Close attention to the shot reveals that the "medical apparatus" is actually a clever arrangement of surplus camera equipment; to the left is some kind of stage light, and the thing on the right that looks like an iron lung also looks like a combination of a swinging keylight, another stage light, and some "barn door" light shutters.



Unfortunately, even these triumphs of ingenuity were not enough to keep the production on schedule. After ten days of shooting fraught with mix-ups, setbacks, and temperamental outbursts, Freda managed to film only half of the shooting script. Freda appealed to Donati and Carpentieri for an extension, and when they reminded him of their bet, he angrily folded his cards and went home. As he later explained to Luigi Cozzi, "I quit working on the film due to an argument between myself and the producers, and they had to complete what little bit remained to be done in two days."

Donati and Carpentieri assessed the situation and it was decided by all concerned that it would be impossible to complete the film as it was written in this allotted time. However, being attracted to problem-solving, Bava put his head together with Piero Regnoli to rework the script, adapting the footage Freda had shot into a new, simplified storyline that could be brought in on schedule. The new directions of the script were apparently dictated by the availability of the actors—thus, Antoine Balpêtre's character (originally the lead role) was bumped down to secondary status, while Dario Michaëlis—whose Pierre Lantin was evidently no more than a supporting character in Freda's original treatment—was rewritten as the film's lead. As these final changes were imposed without Freda's involvement, Regnoli shares credit for the final screenplay with the fictitious "Rijk Sijöström." As usual, Bava took no credit, though the initiative and corrective concepts were entirely his. Against all odds, the mad scheme worked: Mario Bava completed I vampiri in two days.

It is interesting to ponder the ways in which Freda's original conception might have differed from I vampiri as we know it today. One thing we know for certain is that Freda's approach would have been more horrific, focusing more on Julien Du Grand's experiments with synthetic blood and reanimating the dead. It may well have been intended to reserve the secret of Gisèle's true identity till much later in the story. Freda delineated some of his unused story concepts in interviews. When the French periodical Présence du Cinema asked him about his problems with censorship, Freda mentioned a scene that was forfeited from the final cut of I vampiri: "There was a sequence which was particularly dear to me, which I had placed before the main titles. One saw the execution of Paul Müller on the guillotine. It was a short but very effective scene."

In a subsequent interview, Freda elaborated: "There was a prison yard with a guillotine and people dressed in black, accompanying the man who was to be executed. He was in fact guillotined, and his head was shown dropping into the basket, which was then carried away by the doctor. He took the head to his laboratory, and there—like Dr. Frankenstein—he attached it to another body and brought the resulting creature to life. When the journalist discovers that this man was responsible for the abductions of the girls, he takes him to the police station. The inspector interrogates this guy, trying to make him confess, but suddenly this creature, feeling disoriented, falls to the ground, devoid of energy. At that point, his head disconnects from his body, rolling away, because it wasn't really his body. He was an artificially reconstructed man."[9]

Freda's account of his intentions is impressive, as pre-credits sequences were still uncommon in 1956, particularly in Italian films. His description of the lost sequence is also a startling precognition of the approach that would soon be taken by Hammer's Frankenstein films, particularly their second such production, The Revenge of Frankenstein (1958), which opens at the guillotine of a prison yard. Remarkably, though the entire scene was consigned to the cutting room floor while the film was still in production, excerpts of three shots—an impressive descending crane shot as Seignoret is walked to the guillotine by prison guards, the prison yard peopled with witnesses huddled under black umbrellas, and another shot of the blade dropping—appeared in the trailer for its German release version, Die Vampire von Notre Dame.[10] Unfortunately, the trailer cuts away from the second shot before the blade decapitates Seignoret. The severed head used in the filming was very likely provided by Bava's father, Eugenio, who sculpted a number of similar props for some of his son's later films as a director.

EVIDENCE of Freda's original re-animation storyline. Above: Prof. Julien Du Grand (Antoine Balpêtre) and his assistant (Angiolo Galassi) restore life to a dead body recapitated with the head of Joseph Seignoret; Seignoret (Paul Müller) is interrogated by Pierre Lantin (Dario Michaëlis) and Inspector Santel (Carlo D'Angelo)—note the neckline scar denoting his re-attached head. Left: Deprived of his reanimation drug, Seignoret perishes on the floor of Police Headquarters.

Freda's character of Joseph Seignoret was likely inspired by a scene in Karl Freund's MGM release Mad Love (1935), in which Dr. Gogol (Peter Lorre) persuades Stephen Orlac (Colin Clive) that he (Gogol) is a similar, *re*capitated, neck-braced horror. During Seignoret's interrogation at police headquarters, the scar encircling his neck is plainly visible as he becomes dazed and loosens his collar—the only surviving remnant of Freda's concept—but the scene fades out before he literally loses his head. Another source of inspiration may have been H. P. Lovecraft's short story Herbert West—Reanimator, about the discovery of a serum capable of reactivating the dead and dismembered.

Looking at I vampiri with Freda's original concept in mind, it seems plausible that the scenes of Joseph Seignoret were originally filmed with the idea that he was being kept alive with regular ministrations of a Lovecraftian reanimation drug, which was withheld from him—causing agonizing pain—until he performed the abductions necessary to Julien Du Grand's development of "synthetic blood." Freda's comments about the loss of the scene suggest that the censors wouldn't pass it, but the censor board would not have been shown the film until it was completed. The record shows that I vampiri was presented to the Italian censor board on April 3, 1957, and passed two days later. The fact that it breezed through with approval lends credence to the theory that Bava himself made the difficult decision to drop the pre-credits scene, after Freda's departure—simplifying the plot in an all-out effort to bring the picture in on time.

Under Bava's direction, I vampiri became more grounded in reality, romance, and humor. Formerly a reanimated zombie that defied credibility, Joseph Seignoret was reconceived by Bava as a common heroin addict rewarded with fixes after abducting young women for the Du Grands' experiments. (The inspiration may well have come from the junkie character played by Arthur Edmund Carewe in the Michael Curtiz film Mystery of the Wax Museum, or Ned Young in House of Wax.) However, most of Bava's amendments to the film concerned the character of Pierre Lantin. Among the more obvious late additions to the picture were the scenes of Pierre at the newspaper office, ranting to Roland about his determination to capture "il vampiro"; waiting for Laurette at the home of her parents, where her late arrival suggests that something has gone wrong; the entire ball sequence; an extended scene of Pierre entering the castle unannounced and prowling around for clues to Laurette's and Roland's whereabouts, until his presence is noted and he is chased by marauding shadows onto the grounds, where he discovers the disoriented Seignoret; and the penultimate scene of him comforting the recovered Laurette in the bed of the Duchess. [11]

9 Stefano Piselli and Riccardo Morrocchi, eds., Bizarre Sinema! Horror all'italiana 1957–1979 (Firenze, Italy: Glittering Images, 1996), 21. Translation revised for clarity by the author.

10 This trailer can be accessed on the German DVD of Blutige Seide/Sei donne per l'assassino released by Hände Weg! and Buio Omega. It is hidden in the Mario Bava filmography, along with many other Bava-related trailers. The German trailer raises the interesting question of whether this footage might have somehow turned up in the German print, but no copies of Die Vampire von Notre Dame are known to exist, either in German archives or private collections; it has also never been shown on German television. Because trailers are often assembled while a film is still in production, or being edited, they often (especially in this period) utilize rejected "takes" which happened to have been printed and other footage that was not being used to assemble the final cut.

We may assume that Bava also introduced the budding love story between Pierre and Laurette because there is no apparent attraction involved in their initial encounter, and when she is abducted, the news of her disappearance doesn't seem to add anything to his concerns; he seems to regard her as just another missing girl. However, by inserting the scene with Pierre waiting for Laurette with her parents, a step toward intimacy is established and this also gives Laurette a more important place in the scenario. As Pierre's "true love" (as opposed to Gisèle), the dramatic imperative for her rescue is increased. The scene of her abduction—and Santel's later investigation of the scene—also appears to have been directed by Bava, as the abductor is played by someone other than Paul Müller or Angiolo Galassi, who plays Du Grand's burly, scar-faced henchman.

In some of the dialogue scenes directed by Bava—notably the balcony scene, and the later antiques shop scene—there are some very clever double entendres that have no counterpart in Freda's humorless oeuvre. For instance, at the office, when Pierre scowls at his talkative friend Roland that he is "trying to picture the vampire," the photographer picks up a photograph of Gisèle which happens to by lying around. On the balcony during the ball, when Pierre suggests to Gisèle that she is ignoring her other guests, she rants, "My guests! I hate them! A bunch of dried-up mummies is what they are! I despise the idea of becoming like them someday . . . You have no idea what a woman goes through!" And later, in the antiques store, when Gisèle questions the authenticity of a painting being offered to her, the elderly dealer avers that he knows better than try to deceive the Duchess. He explains his remark by saying, with their great likeness in mind, "To me, you and the Duchess are one and the same!" To which Gisèle replies, "I didn't realize you were such a perceptive man!" On first viewing, only the last of these lines provokes a knowing laugh, because the first two scenes occur before Gisèle is unmasked as the "vampire"; they are planted as a reward for those who see the film a second time.

TWO EXAMPLES of Beni Montresor's superbly sepulchral art direction. Roland (Renato Tontini) bursts into Gisèle's bedroom to confess his infatuation in this scene, filmed by Freda but later reshot to appease Italian censors. Opposite: Marguerite Du Grand visits the family crypt.

I vampiri also contains some loose threads that probably would have found fulfillment in scenes planned, though never filmed, by Freda. For instance, when Marguerite suggests that Joseph Seignoret has blown the cover for the Clinica Salus, why does Prof. Du Grand respond by faking his own death? The film contains no scene with Balpêtre that directly refers to this convolution; in the scene in question, the dialogue is spoken entirely by the silhouetted Marguerite and Du Grand, whose back is turned to the camera—these characters, dubbed even in the Italian version, could be saying anything. A stock footage shot and a mock-up headline announcing Du Grand's death bridge the action to a scene in a cemetery, where the aged Duchess is clearly mourning someone. Who is being carried in the casket to the Du Grand family tomb? After the funeral, a couple of henchmen arrive to remove the body from the crypt; we don't see the face of the body being lifted out of the tomb in the master shot, but there is an insert (obviously shot later by Bava) of Joseph Seignoret being dropped comatose to the ground. (Given Freda's description of his intentions, Seignoret would have been in Du Grand's laboratory all along.) To confuse matters further, when the tomb is opened at the end of the film, there is another isolated shot revealing Laurette inside, supposedly concealed there by Du Grand.

Other clues to possible dropped scenes can be found among the film's publicity stills, but one must be careful in speculating which were actually filmed and which were no more than posed publicity shots. One still shows Pierre's lovestruck friend Roland entering Gisèle's bedchamber after she has already undressed and climbed into bed for the evening. We know that this is not just a posed shot because the aforementioned German trailer for the film includes footage from this rescripted sequence, which was evidently first shot to show Roland invading the Duchess' privacy after she had retired—but, one presumes, had to be reshot when the Italian censor objected to such an intimate intrusion. Another still shows the abducted Laurette cowering as the aged Duchess prepares to spoonfeed her from what appears to be a bowl of soup, while Prof. Du Grand looks on. What is remarkable about this shot is that the Duchess' veil is pulled back to reveal the face of a real old woman, not Canale in aged makeup! This same old woman's face can be glimpsed through her black veil once in the movie, as the Duchess visits her husband's tomb and opens it like a door to access a hidden passage. Naturally, another actress' face could never be shown, as it is in this photographed scene, if Canale had played both roles—unless it was considered, at some point, to dissolve from the lighting trick transformation to an aged stand-in.

Bava's efforts to fill out the running time included various shots of black-gloved hands rifling through file cabinets, turning doorknobs and gnarling menacingly at the camera, as well as Istituto LUCE stock footage of rolling newspaper presses, Parisian landmarks, and so forth. Here, the decision to shoot the film in CinemaScope worked to its ultimate disadvantage, as the stock footage was all in standard ratio, and stretched like a Silly Putty impression by the process.

Music

I vampiri was scored by Roman Vlad, who had been active as a film composer since the mid-1940s. Vlad was born in Cernauti, Romania—formerly Cernovsty, Ukraine—on December 29, 1919. He moved to Rome in 1938 and recorded his earliest movie music for documentary shorts, one of which was photographed by Mario Bava: Carlo Castelli Gattinara's Il demoniaco nell'arte (1949). By the mid-1950s, Vlad had composed successful operas (Storia di una mamma) and ballets (La strada sul caffé), and had become one of Italy's most respected film composers, working not only for distinguished Italian directors like Mario Soldati and Luciano Emmer, but for French productions as well. One of his best-known early scores was written for René Clair's similarly themed La Beauté du Diable/ The Beauty of the Devil (1950), an 18th century updating of the Faust legend about an aged scientist (Michel Simon) who makes a deal with the Devil (also Simon) for restored youth (in the form of Gérard Philippe). At the time of scoring I vampiri, Vlad was working as the artistic director of the Accademia Filarmonica Romana and writing a book about Igor Stravinski (which was published the following year, and translated into English in 1967).

Stravinski's influence, particularly that of Le Sacre du Printemps, can plainly be heard in Vlad's main theme for I vampiri: a barnstorming cue in which the orchestra alternately lurks and swoops, with a glacial undertow of strings. It might as easily be the accompaniment to a storm at sea, or a heroine's trip toward a buzzsaw at the old sawmill; this cue is reprised throughout the film whenever action kicks in, when a scene changes, or when the narrative is punctuated with cutaways to urgent newspaper headlines rolling off the press. The same basic theme is reworked throughout the picture as a leitmotif, slowed down and sometimes highlighting worrying strings, a dolorous oboe or other instrumentation. For example, in the first scene, the theme is somewhat reprised but reduced to a simmer, with fluttering clarinets, as the dead woman's body is found in the Seine. When Gisèle is introduced, a cloying string quartet is played; as an accompaniment to the scene, it seems ill-chosen, but in retrospect, the antiquated music signifies Gisèle as essentially belonging to another era. Seignoret's cold turkey sweat is played out against an echo-treated vibraphone, giving the scene an added dimension of delirium. The funeral scene contains one of the most haunting cues: a progressively dissonant 2/4 dirge characterized by a call-and-answer dialogue between a chiming bell and a piano-dominant orchestra that is ultimately assumed by the string section; the cue is reprised when 11 This last scene also offers an amusing retrospective glimpse at how long some of the stage props in Italian horror films remained in service. The ornately carved headboard of Gisèle's bed would reappear in other Bava films over the next fifteen years, belonging to Michèle Mercier in I tre volti della paura/ Black Sabbath and to Stephen Forsyth in 1970's Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon, and also furnishing a room in Alida Valli's villa in Lisa and the Devil (1973).

GISÈLE tries to attract Pierre on the balcony. Right: a view of the elderly actress who played Marguerite in scenes later cut from the film, including this one, in which she tries to spoonfeed soup to the abducted Laurette (Wandisa Guida). Bottom: a rare Cuban lobby card depicting Du Grand's mute assistant's attack on Laurette.

Marguerite visits the family crypt. In the next scene, Marguerite's impressive emergence from the fireplace, the theme assumed by the strings is transferred to deep brass, infusing this frail yet frightening apparition with an aura of formidable power. When Laurette takes the blind man's letter to the apartment, the score finds its greatest moment of inspiration: as she steps inside its rooms, an hypnotic piano/vibraphone ostinato, played over suspenseful strings, seems to take her into another dimension, divorced from reality, while the curious furnishings of the place—particularly its spinning, glittering birdcage and playful kitten—are accentuated by bright, irregular trills from the flute section.

While a derivative score in some respects, Vlad's music for I vampiri contains moments of brilliance which have stood the test of time; indeed, some of its cues would enjoy a life well beyond the film for which they were written. Published by CAM and made available to filmmakers on albums of miscellaneous library music, various cues from I vampiri reverberate throughout various Italian productions of the 1960s, including Bava's own Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill! (1966).

After scoring I vampiri, Vlad continued as artistic director of the Accademia Filarmonica Romana through 1958, moving on to the Maggio Musicale in Florence (1964) and the same city's Teatro Communale (1968–72), while also teaching composition at the Perugia Conservatory from 1968. His career in the realm of Italian classical music is so accomplished, it is impractical to list all of Vlad's many accomplishments, awards, and honors here; suffice to say, in the 1990s, the French bestowed upon him the honor of being named a Commandeur des Arts et des Lettres, and in recent years, he has served as the artistic director of the Teatro alla Scala in Milan. Vlad's career as a film composer is actually secondary to his more formal musical achievements, though he has written over 100 film scores.

Commentary

Though Mio figlio Nerone marks the moment when Mario Bava truly came into his own as a cameraman, I vampiri is an even more decisive chapter in his self-discovery as an artist. Before this film, Bava's particular talent—as we have seen—was most frequently matched with what might be termed the "outsized" genres: comedy, epic adventures, and high drama. There was no horror genre in Italy, and no way of telling if Bava would have a better or worse aptitude for its milieux than any other, but I vampiri finds him perfectly and immediately at home. Everything that will follow in Bava's oeuvre as a director can be found here in embryo: the contrasts of the new and the old, of beauty and its destruction, of romance and morbidity. Admirers of La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday are often surprised to discover so much of its achievement already present in I vampiri, made four years earlier. If all roads lead to Rome, all roads in Italian horror lead to I vampiri.

Freda's intended escape-from-the-guillotine opening indicates—as does his title—that his chief inspiration did not come from the classic Universal horror films (which had been, after all, unavailable in Rome for many years) but from the Fantômas novels of Pierre Souvestre and Marcel Allain, which had provided the grist for the earliest movie serials produced for Gaumont by Louis Feuillade. (The first Fantômas novel and serial end with the eponymous master criminal cheating death by substituting a lookalike actor in his place for his date with the guillotine.) After making four Fantômas serials between 1913–14, Feuillade made a crime epic of his own devise, Les Vampires (1915–16), which sported several of the trappings found in its Italian namesake: a prominent member of society who is revealed to be the mastermind of a criminal ring; the frightening yet alluring woman who is his mistress, also a master of disguise and ultimately the more resourceful fiend; a crusading reporter hero, a dour police inspector, and an abducted heroine; the publicized "death" of the male criminal figure—and so on. These aspects make sense not only of the film's seemingly arbitrary decision to locate its story in France, but also of the pulpish, barnstorming verve exhibited by the film. I vampiri could be easily adapted into a chapterplay format. The title which Freda gave to his film was hardly coincidental, though the resulting work can hardly be described as an adaptation—better to call it "a variation on a theme."

LAURETTE is held captive by Prof. Du Grand in this shot, later adapted to create the Italian poster art. Above: Inspector Santel shoots Du Grand dead during the final reel. Bottom: Pierre consoles Laurette following her rescue, as she rests in a bed whose headboard would continue to appear in Bava films for the next twenty years.

The effectiveness of the transposition of action from Rome to Paris and Montmartre is sometimes criticized today by a generation of film buffs raised on CGI, but for their time and place, Bava's glass mattes are better than serviceable. The opening shot, which pans from a glass matte of the Eiffel Tower to a ravine located not far from Scalera Film (doubling as the Seine), remains a convincing blur of the real and imaginary. Despite its attempts to look French, most everything about I vampiri remains certifiably Italian: its baroque approach to the Gothic, its bizarre amalgam of science and magic, its use of family portraits to bridge generations, its subtle sketching of the social gulf separating the upper and working classes, and the neorealist atmosphere surrounding the location scenes at Seignoret's apartment and the peeling building where Laurette is abducted, whose postwar dereliction parallel the ambient decay common to so many of Bava's later works.

One of the film's most lasting contributions to the continuum of Italian horror is the chillingly imperious figure of Marguerite Du Grand. Frail yet secretly indomitable, veiled yet assertive, hideous and hoary-voiced with age yet still invested with the secret of youth and eternal sexual power, Marguerite—appearing under many names—has become one of the archetypes peculiar to the Italian horror film. Her own name resonates throughout Riccardo Freda's own filmography; Margarethe is the name shared by the supposedly dead wife of the necrophile in L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/ The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962) and of the supposedly dead but still-active spouse of a blackmailed industrialist in A doppia faccia/Double Face (1969). Other variations on the name are accorded to vindictive female characters in nearly all of Freda's other films, beginning as early as Gianna Maria Canale's Marisa in Vedi Napoli e poi muori/ See Naples Then Die (1951). [12]

12 Also to be found in Freda's catalog are Claudine Dupuis' Martinal in Beatrice Cenci (1956), Geneviève Page's Mary in Agguato a Tangeri (1957), and Scilla Gabel's Princess Maria in Agi Murad il diavolo bianco (1959).

Marguerite would leave her macabre impression on other directors as well. She would be the obvious blueprint for the monstrous old woman played by Sarah Ferretti, who becomes her own younger daughter (Rosanna Schiaffino) in Damiano Damiani's La strega in amore/The Witch in Love (1966, an adaptation of Carlos Fuentes' classic story "Aura"), an inarguable source of inspiration for Dario Argento's diabolical Mater Suspiriorum in Suspiria (1977) and of course, the obvious genesis for the twin characters of Princesses Asa and Katia in Bava's La maschera del demonio.

Another element introduced by I vampiri and shared by other Italian horror films is the central emphasis on the fireplace of the Castle Du Grand, which secretly communicates with the family crypt. This depiction of the family hearth as a passage to family secrets (as also seen in the contemporaneous The Black Sleep, 1956) would be most prominently reprised in La maschera del demonio, and again by Bava in La frusta e il corpo, but it also appears in many other Italian horror films, including Massimo Pupillo's Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror (1965). The dominant use of such a fixture takes on a special significance in Bava's hands when one remembers that his father Eugenio (and therefore, the Bava family) first became involved in the cinema when he was recruited by Pathé Frères to sculpt a fireplace frame for a silent movie. Therefore, in a sense, the centrality of the fireplace in this and many other Italian horror films might be read as a tribute to Eugenio Bava—consciously by his son, and unconsciously by his imitators.

Had Freda directed the entire film as planned, or had Bava directed from the outset of filming, I vampiri would surely have become a more consistent viewing experience. Instead, it is more of a successful rescue than a successful film, wherein evidence of competent haste and above-average ingenuity is indistinguishable from attractive, yet erratic and occasionally sloppy filmmaking. Scenes of stately, elegiac pacing are bridged by hyper-accelerated shots of newspaper presses and spinning headlines, the musical accompaniment kicked up from nocturne mode to over-the-top "heroine at the sawmill" braying in the blink of an eye. At times, the combination of the two directors' respective visions works—if not necessarily to the film's advantage, at least as a boon to its complexity. Had I vampiri focused solely on the relationship between Pierre and Gisèle (as was evidently Freda's intention), or on Bava's more desperately contrived relationship between Pierre and Laurette, it would have lost some valuable dimensionality. Likewise, the combination of their respectively sentimental and sensational tendencies result in a few pleasantly jarring frissons, as when Roland's expression of his rapturous infatuation with Gisèle climaxes not only with her transformation, but with the withered crone pulling out a pistol and firing it first at Roland, and then—in a frenzy of self-hatred—blasting away quite a few more times at her own mirrored reflection.

ITALIAN quattro-foglia, art by Arnaldo Putzu.

Despite Bava's penchant for illusion and visual deceptions, the film's most powerful sequence is one of its most straightforward. It begins with a medium shot of the blazing fireplace in the main hall of Castle Du Grand, beneath the family crest and its Conquisterò Inferno motto, as a secret passage behind the flames creaks open to reveal the emerging figure of the decrepit, black-veiled Duchess Du Grand. As she walks with advanced age around the flame, the camera cuts to a long-shot of the main hall, its stone columns punctuated with sheer curtains that flail in the air like the hems of ghosts as the dark, forbidding figure advances closer and closer. The Duchess ascends the staircase, turns abruptly and shouts out to a servant (who pops in and out at her command) to ready the car, before continuing her ascent. What makes the scene so impressive is how the filmmakers rally in support of a passage that might have accomplished nothing; here the art direction, lighting, and baleful musical score take center stage, to do nothing more than provide an indelible illustration of their combined power.

After nearly a half century, there is a good deal of I vampiri that looks dated today—even when it was new, coming as it did after opulent color productions like Teodora l'imperatrice di Bisanzio and La donna più bella del mondo, it must have looked older than it was—but this one moment, with its emphasis of atmosphere over content, of environment over the human element, remains a key example of all that is best about Italian horror. Given the background story of the production, it's possible that the scene was added with no other imperative than to fill time, yet it conveys the sense of something new in the horror genre, something distinctly Italian, and of a filmmaker who had finally discovered his true calling.

Release / Variants

Despite the best efforts of all involved, I vampiri was not a commercial success. Riccardo Freda explained why: "In Italy, a very peculiar thing happened that I would never have expected. I happened to be in Sanremo, a town not unlike Cannes, and I decided to visit a theater that was showing I vampiri. I sometimes do this, stand around the lobby to eavesdrop on the reactions of the public. As time went on, I noticed there were very few paying customers. I couldn't understand why, but the theater was almost vacant for every performance, though many passersby had been attracted by the posters, which were indeed very beautiful. They would stop and look: 'I vampiri . . . I vampiri . . .' This seemed to intrigue them, but then at the last moment they saw Freda. Their reaction was automatic: 'Freda?' Seeing an Italian name, they all made faces, because they found the idea preposterous. They assumed that Italians didn't know how to make films of this kind." [13]

Mario Bava had an explanation for this biased way of thinking: "In our country, the sun drives everything away . . . this is how I explain to myself why my films are successful in America and the Northern countries, but never in Italy. The Calabrese workman only goes to the movies to laugh or to cry. He doesn't want to see blood; he has the sunshine and doesn't care about such things." [14] Or, as Freda bitterly expressed on another occasion, "Italians won't accept anything from their fellow countrymen but fettucine!" [15]

The film did not fare much better in France, where its faux Frenchness translated into something of a laughing stock. The French version, Les Vampires, differs from the Italian edition in some curious ways. I vampiri's main titles unfold over various postcard views of Paris, a somewhat exotic montage for Roman audiences, but of no particular interest to the French moviegoing public. Therefore, Les Vampires flashes its main titles over a spooky, monochromatic painting of a dank crypt. Curiously, Bava's name appears nowhere in the credits of the French version; the cinematography is mistakenly credited to his assistant, Corrado Bartoloni. The French version also alters the film's opening shot—a pan shot from the Eiffel Tower to the discovery of a dead woman's body in the Seine—by fading-in only after the Eiffel Tower is out of sight, probably because the shot looked patently phony to French eyes. The only other evident change was the reshooting of the door identifying Julien Du Grand's Clinica Salus, which is here replaced by a shot of an outdoor plaque labelled "Institute pour le Médicine Expérimentale."

I vampiri would not be acquired for release in the United States until 1960, when it was picked up by Jonathan Daniels and Victor Purcell of Releasing Corporation of Independent Producers (RCIP), a low-level distributor of "Adults Only" fare. They covered their bases by distributing the picture in two different editions: an "All Audiences" version called The Devil's Commandment and an "Adults Only" version titled Lust of the Vampire. A literal translation of the original title was declined to avoid confusion with the Paul Landres film The Vampire, given wide release in 1957.

It was the habit of RCIP to buy foreign films and exploit their saucy allure, spicing them up with nude inserts photographed on the cheap in New York. Several such inserts were also written and filmed for I vampiri, which forfeited some of its most important scenes in the bargain. This new material was scripted by the pseudonymous-sounding J. V. Rhems and filmed under the supervision of Ronald Honthauer. "Honthauer" was actually Ron Honthaner, who had recently worked as an assistant editor on Robert Clarke's The Hideous Sun Demon (1959), in which he also played a bit part as a policeman. Honthaner spent the early 1960s working as a sound editor, and later worked on the CBS-TV series Gunsmoke in various production capacities from 1968 to 1972. He made his only film as a director in 1974: The House on Skull Mountain, a dreadful, independently produced "blaxploitation" horror film that was unaccountably picked up for distribution by 20th Century-Fox.

Totalling 11 minutes in length, Honthaner's inserts are easy to identify, even for viewers unfamiliar with the original cut of I vampiri. They are photographed with the flattest, crudest lighting techniques imaginable on small sets cobbled together from white-washed walls and found furniture—quite the opposite of Beni Montresor's resplendently baroque decadence and Bava's misterioso lighting.

• The first insert is the very first scene, which opens on a lamppost and a man watching an illuminated window from the street below. Inside, a young brunette (Barbara London) plays a record of French concertina music while undressing for a bubble bath. As she removes her stockings and bustier, we cut away to a gloved hand sliding up the downstairs bannister to her room. The woman does not realize until it is too late that a 13 Caen and Romer.

14 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

15 Martini and Della Casa.

RONNY and Joy Holiday's supper club entertainment in THE DEVIL'S COMMANDMENT.

male stranger with wild eyes (presumably Joseph Seignoret) is standing over her. His gloved hands grab her by the throat and force her underwater. (Lust of the Vampire offered its audience a token glimpse of the actress' bare breasts through the soap suds during the struggle.)

• A brief scene in I vampiri, in which a flashlight beam locates a file cabinet drawer and a pair of gloved hands remove a file marked "Nora Duval," was replaced by a shot filmed by Honthaner.

• During Pierre's questioning of a police surgeon (a cameo by none other than Riccardo Freda), the American version underlines an obvious point of conversation by having a hand—supposedly the doctor's—scribble on a convenient notepad: "Blood Types A-B-O." He underlines the "O."

• The longest of the inserts opens in broad daylight, in an alley off the streets of . . . (beats me—Queens?), where a young woman (Barbara Wohl) is being pursued by a man in a dark suit and hat. She ducks inside an underground restaurant, where a floor show is in progress. Entertainer Ronny Holiday is balancing his wife Joy one hand above his head, tossing and spinning her for the amusement of the dining hall. The woman takes a seat, nervously pulls a cigarette from her handbag, and a rotund maitre d' appears to light it for her.

"Good evening, Madamzelle [sic]," he welcomes her, apparently unaware that she has stepped inside from broad daylight. "I would suggest our poulet au grat. It is magnificent, made from the finest chicken. I had it for supper myself."

"A double Scotch, please," repondres le petit madamoiselle.

"A Scahtch!" the maitre d' objects, in perfect Brooklynese. "We're famous in Paris for our food!"

"A double Scotch—please!" she insists.

She borrows a piece of paper from the maitre d', and we overhear the content of her letter. She is writing to her boyfriend Phillip, apologizing for running away from an overheated romantic session. "I couldn't," she writes, "I couldn't."

The maitre d' returns with her drink and, as if he too has overheard what she has written, he advises her to call her boyfriend and explain. He offers her the use of a private upstairs telephone. She runs toward the stairwell as Ronny and Joy Holiday's pointless acrobatics climax to deafening applause.

Upstairs, the young woman locates the telephone and dials Phillip's number. "I'm sorry," she says. "I wanted to be married first . . . but if that's the way you want it, it's okay with me!" Abruptly, her call is interrupted. Her black-gloved pursuant enters the room and strangles her, then removes the blood from her body with a gleaming, hypodermic pump apparatus.

This preposterous sequence alone runs nearly 6 minutes.

• The scene of Laurette exploring a room adjoining the area where she is held hostage, and discovering the skeletons of various women, was supplemented with various inserts of rats. Honthaner filmed a rat crawling into the jaws of a skull, and then springing forth from its open mouth toward the camera (the sight that supposedly prompts Laurette to faint). A final shot of a blonde stand-in, lying on the floor as a rat crawls toward her, was also added.

THE MAITRE D' lights a customer's cigarette in THE DEVIL'S COMMANDMENT.

• Near the film's climax, as Inspector Santel and his men search the castle, Du Grand's assistant is shown entering the room in which Laurette is imprisoned. In I vampiri, he takes her in his arms, chloroforms her, and conceals her in Julien Du Grand's empty tomb.

In the American versions, Angiolo Galassi's subduing of Wandisa Guida match-cuts to an overlit insert of Al Lewis (later the vampiric "Grandpa" on TV's The Munsters), dressed as the assistant, manhandling a blonde stand-in, tearing her blouse open, and pushing her onto a cheap-looking bed. As her brassière is exposed, the blonde scratches at his leering face. What better time for sexual assault than when the police are banging down the door? This particular insert may have been inspired by a publicity still that pictured Galassi and Guida tussling on the bed, the actress playfully fighting him off—a promotional gag shot that had no true counterpart in the original film.

To make matters worse, the American versions deleted a number of scenes and elements important to the narrative, including Pierre's loss of face after dragging Santel to the wrong apartment in search of Joseph Seignoret, and Gisèle's revealing visit to the antiques shop. All references to Gisèle's unrequited love for Pierre originating in the Duchess' love for Pierre's late lookalike father were also dropped; The Devil's Commandment deletes the short bit in which Gisèle obsessively contemplates the father's portrait. Also omitted were some interesting directorial "buses," such as the moment prior to showgirl Nora Duval's abduction, when a sudden, violent gust of wind blows open a window at her side.

For all the damage it does, The Devil's Commandment nevertheless rewards attention by presenting Gianna Maria Canale's death scene—suppressed by the Italian censors—in full. In both I vampiri and Les Vampires, Gisèle's final aging sequence ends with Canale simply falling out of camera range. The American version follows this with a shot of her wrinkled, taloned hands sliding off the balustrade and, after a beat, a shock cut to the Duchess' white-haired, semi-skeletal remains—upside-down, staring directly into the camera, effectively scored with a brief trumpet blast of shock. Though the hair-raising prop has survived only in the American versions of the film, and is therefore easily mistaken for another of Honthaner's domestic additions, Riccardo Freda claimed its paternity to Stefano Della Casa in 1993: "The horrific special effect shown after her aging was my invention."

US one-sheet poster, top-lining the Lollobrigidian "Gina Maria Canale."

The end titles of The Devil's Commandment do not roll over a cue from Roman Vlad's original score, but over a library track of presumably British origin. This mystery cue can also be heard in the original BBC television production of Nigel Kneale's Quatermass and the Pit (1958).

The uncut, original version of I vampiri would not have its American premiere until August 4, 1993, when it closed a triumphant, two-week retrospective of Mario Bava's work at New York's Film Forum. On July 3, 2001, the film was given its first authorized video release anywhere in the world when Image Entertainment issued an anamorphically enhanced DVD as part of their "Mario Bava Collection." After almost forty years, I vampiri is now recognized as a seminal event in the 1950s rebirth of the horror genre. At the time of its original release, however, it was merely another disappointment for the struggling Italian film industry.

Though I vampiri, for all intents and purposes, signals the birth of the Italian horror film, it was a false start, commercially speaking. There were no further attempts to bring vampires to the screen in Italy until 1959, when Steno went halfway with the appropriately named comedy Tempi duri per i vampiri ("Hard Times for Vampires"), starring Renato Rascel, Sylva Koscina, and Christopher Lee. This film, which spawned a hit single in Italy with Bruno Martino's "Dracula Cha-Cha-Cha," was later released in America as Uncle Was a Vampire. The return of serious Italian horror would not occur until a year after that.

The economic crunch being suffered by the Italian cinema reached a point of crisis in 1956. Mario Bava—who had photographed only two features and the last of his short films that year—was forced to sell a number of family treasures and personal belongings, just to make ends meet. He had no way of knowing it, but the lightning bolt that would change everything was just around the corner.

BAVA'S cinematography at its most iconic: Steve Reeves as Hercules, preparing to topple the columns at Jolco in LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE.

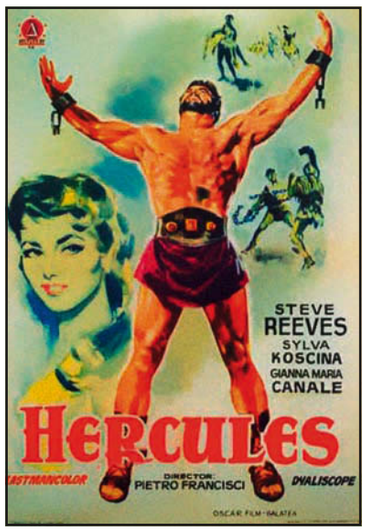
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE



Hercules

ALL OF THE HOPES held by Riccardo Freda and Mario Bava for I vampiri—that it would mine infinite new territory for Italian filmmaking, and perhaps make them a nice little nest egg in the process—would be realized instead by Pietro Francisci's next production, a colorful, Hollywood-style spectacle based on the Greek myths of the labors of Herakles.

When one refers back to the original myths of Hercules (the Roman form of his name), those who know the character only from his filmed exploits may be startled by the dark anguish of his story—it's not unlike comparing Disney's Snow White to the grisly folk tale recorded for posterity by Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm.

The demigod son of immortal Zeus and the human Alcmene, Hercules grew to manhood under the spiteful gaze of Zeus' wife Hera, who, being immortal, could bear her husband no children. Even as an infant, Hercules' prodigious strength enabled him to overcome two large vipers sent into his cradle at Hera's command, but she had her vengeance many years later, maddening the hero so that he murdered his own wife (Megara, daughter of King Creon) and children. This cataclysm of horror restored his sanity and, in penitence, he spent the next twelve years living a humble life of servitude to King Eurystheus of Tiryns. During that period, Hercules demonstrated his loyalty by performing a dozen impossible tasks, his legendary "labors": he killed the Nemean lion and slew the Hydra, a many-headed monster born of dragon's teeth; he captured the Erymanthian boar and the Cerynean hind with his bare hands; he repelled the harpies of Stymphalia; he cleaned the stables of Augeas; he captured the Cretan bull and reined in the horses of Diomed; he stole the fabled girdle of the Amazon queen Hippolyte; he ended the life of the three-bodied monster Geryon and stole its cattle; he captured Cerberus, the three-headed dog guarding the gates of Hades (and while there, freed his young admirer Theseus, who had been trapped in Hades since trying to abduct his beloved Persephone, the daughter of Pluto); and finally, he robbed the Hesperides of their Golden Apples.

The list of Hercules' labors differs slightly from account to account. Another of his accolades was the defeat of the god Anteus, who gained his formidable strength from the earth itself and had to be strangled by the demigod while held above his head. These murderous feats behind him, Hercules went in search of new adventures, joining the crew of Jason aboard the ship Argos in pursuit of the Golden Fleece. (As played by Nigel Green, Hercules is among the crewmen in Don Chaffey's 1963 film Jason and the Argonauts, in which Jason is given the tasks of slaying the Hydra and quelling the Harpies.) But after this adventure, madness seized the hero once again: Hercules took the life of Iphitos, son of the king of Oichalia, when his request for the hand of the King's daughter Iole in marriage was denied. Refused clemency by King Neleus of Pylos, Hercules looted the liege of his wealth and left his young princes lying in pools of their own royal blood. He was later punished for his crimes by the Oracle at Delphi, who sold him as a slave to Omphale, Queen of Lydia. She, in turn, punished him with the indignity of serving her while dressed in women's clothes.

Hercules later wed King Aeneus' daughter Deianira, who was kidnapped by Nessus, a centaur who loved her from afar. Hercules struck back fatally, firing at the amorous creature with arrows steeped in the blood of the Hydra. With his dying, treacherous breath, Nessus bade Deianira to collect his spilled blood, which would have the power to restore her husband's love should it ever wane. In later years, Hercules brought his strength against an army which had abducted the lost love of his life—Iole—and his caring for this liberated hostage aroused Deianira's jealousy. She stained a robe with the collected blood of Nessus—itself contaminated by the blood of the Hydra—and tricked Hercules into wearing it. The garment fastened about him like a second skin and burned deep into his flesh. In his dying agonies, the demigod hastily built a funeral pyre for himself at the peak of Mt. Etna, which was set ablaze at his command by a torch applied by his friend Philoctetes, whereupon the hero's immortal self was freed from his mortal, troubled shell and raised to the heights of Olympus.

THREE POSTERS: Italian due-foglia (by A. Piovano), Turkish one-sheet and a Spanish one-sheet (by Macario Gomez), based on the Italian poster by A. Piovano (opposite).

Le fatiche di Ercole

"The Labors of Hercules"
Filmed at Titanus Studios and on location
June – August 1957
First released: February 20, 1958
Eastmancolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 107 minutes

Production: OSCAR Film (Organizzazione Sociale Cinematografica Artistica Rome), Galatea (Milan), Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris). Producers: Lionello Santi, Renato Giuliano, Federico Teti. Director: Pietro Francisci. Assistant director: Pietro Nuccorini. Assistant to the director: Ettore G. Mattia. Screenplay: Pietro Francisci, Ennio De Concini, Gaio Frattini. Story: Pietro Francisci. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Corrado Bartoloni. Camera assistants: Ubaldo Terzano, Silvio Fraschetti. Art direction: Flavio Mogherini, assisted by Gianni D'Aloisio. Set decoration: Massimo Tavazzi. Special effects: Mario Bava. Wardrobe: Assanta Lazzazera. Costume design: Giulio Coltellacci of Casa d'Arte Peruzza (Firenze), assisted by Paolo Tomassi. Makeup: Euclide Santoli. Hairdresser: Mara Rocchetti. Footwear: Pompei. Weapons: Rancati. Production inspector: Mario Pisani. Production secretary: Spartaco Conversi. Editor: Mario Serandrei, assisted by Tito Perozzi. Editorial secretary: Gigliola Rosmino. Music: Enzo Masetti, conducted by Carlo Savina (Nord-Sud). Distributor: Lux Film, Regina Film (1959 reissue).

Steve Reeves (Hercules), Sylva Koscina (Iole), Gianna Maria Canale (Antea), Fabrizio Mioni (Jason), Ivo Garrani (King Pelias), Arturo Dominici (Eurysteus), Mimmo Palmara (Iphitos), Lidia Alfonsi (the Sibyl), Gina Rovere (Amazon), Gabriele Antonini (Ulysses), Andrea Fantasia (Laertes), Afro Poli (Chironi/Chiron), Aldo Fiorelli (Argos), Gino Mattera (Orpheus), Gian Paolo Rosmino (Esculapeus), Willy Colombini (Pollux), Fulvio Carrara (Castor), Luciana Paoluzzi (Iole's handmaiden), Aldo Pini (Tifi), Guido Martuffi (Iphitos as a child), Paola Quattrini (Iole as a child), Giovanni Cianfriglia (Reeves' stuntman).

Denmark: Herkules og hans Fantastiske Bedrifter
France: Les Travaux d'Hercule, Lux Film
Germany: Die Unglaublichen Abenteuer des Herakles, "The Incredible Adventures of Hercules," Constantin-AB Film, 1/13/59
Spain: Hércules, 1/4/60
Turkey: Herkul
UK: Hercules, Archway Film Distribution Ltd., 5/8/59, Certificate "U," passed without cuts
US: Hercules, Warner Bros., 7/22/59. Reissue: Embassy Pictures Corporation, 6/75

Clearly, Pietro Francisci had been moving toward a film about Hercules since his 1951 costume adventure La meravigliose avventure di Guerrin Meschino. This film, along with the subsequent La regina di Saba/The Queen of Sheba (1952), Attila (1954), and Orlando e i paladini di Francia (1956), illustrate a definite evolution toward a more fantastical representation of the distant past built around a charismatic, larger-than-life, central figure.

But why Hercules? First of all, the character had been the subject of plays by Sophocles and Seneca (to name only two), so he was equally classical and dramatically tried-and-true. More to the point, Francisci was conscious of his country's need for a new Maciste—a symbol of strength rooted in Roman tradition without being besmirched by remorseful ties to Mussolini and the Duce image. Hercules had also been the subject of many famous Italian sculptures, as well as at least one significant opera (Francesco Cavalli's Ercole amante ["Hercules in Love," 1659]). The character was also nominally tied to one of Italy's most picturesque seaports, the Porto Ercole ("The Port of Hercules"), one of the supposed "true locations of Homer's The Odyssey" where parts of Mario Camerini's Ulisse had been filmed.

Francisci (according to his own version of events) wrote a screen treatment using the epic poem Argonautica by Apollonius Rhodius as his template; it was then turned over to Gaio Frattini (who had previously contributed to Domenico Paolella's Totò comedy, Destinazione Piovarolo, 1955) and the ubiquitous Ennio De Concini to be embellished into a shooting script. But De Concini remembers differently: "In a moment of crisis, I invented the so-called sandaloni, the Hercules picture," he boasted. "It was a period in which the Italian cinema seemed dead. And so I said, 'Why not make a fiction using a character from fables?' . . . However, when the idea came to me for this character who was good and strong, for Hercules, one whom all men in their hearts dream of resembling, none of the producers were inclined to make it; everybody turned up their noses. The one person who had the balls to take the leap and make it was Nello Santi, perhaps because Francisci had kept him going, because they were both veterans of other successful films like Orlando e i paladini di Francia. Those films were more straightforward adventure films, while here there was a fable for children proposed in a manner more elementary and simple, to serve as escapism for adults."[1]

ITALIAN locandina, art by A. Piovano (Studio Paradiso).

Regardless of whomever was truly responsible for the idea, the final screenplay narrowed the hero's dozen labors down to two that could be affordably staged (the Cretan bull and the Nemean lion), and revised mythology to show Hercules plagued not by hateful Hera, but by the burden of his own immortality. Fashioned in the shadow of Marlon Brando's tragic performances for Elia Kazan, Francisci's Hercules was wracked by self-consciousness and self-doubt, a demigod who yearns "to live and love like other men." He was a denial of the Ubermensch; he was Mussolini rescinded, a new and cleansing symbol of the recuperative powers of humility and righteousness.

Synopsis

A scream. A beautiful young woman has lost control of her chariot, until a muscular stranger uproots a tree, halting the charging horses by hurling it into their path. The woman recognizes her savior as Hercules of Thebes—and he recognizes her from the royal crest on her chariot as Iole, daughter of King Pelias, who has summoned him to the kingdom of Jolco to work as a Master of Arms, educating his son Iphitos in the ways of war.

As they make their way to Jolco, Iole confides to Hercules a disturbing childhood memory. One day, ten years ago, she was out riding with her father, her uncle King Aeson, his son Jason, and her brother Iphitos, when they came across a condemned man (found guilty of robbing and killing a woman) who had been captured by soldiers. She remembers that Pelias had a word with the criminal ("You like to kill, eh?") and whispered something to the King before they continued home. That night, Iole awoke screaming from a nightmare of the murderer's impending execution and found her screams merging with others echoing throughout the palace. Following the clamor, she saw the bloody corpse of King Aeson being carried out by soldiers, her own father Pelias standing near a pool of blood, and the Golden Fleece that formerly flanked the throne missing. Accused of the murder was Chironi, who fled the kingdom with Jason (fearing for the life of this true heir to the throne) and the Fleece, the pelt of a fabled winged ram that is synonymous with kingdom and prosperity. King Pelias blamed Chiron for murdering the King, says Iole, but Hercules tells her that Chiron was his best friend, and that the common people believe King Pelias to have been the real culprit. Iole denies her father's guilt vehemently, and Hercules rejoins, "Why do you relive the story if it's not true?"—to which she has no answer. The hero assures Iole of his protection and swears to clear Chiron's good name.

1 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers, Part Two: Maciste Rights the Wrongs," Spaghetti Cinema 74, March 2003, 2-12. Translated from the Italian by Mike Eustace.

When they arrive at the palace, Jolco stands literally under a dark cloud, and the interior of the palace is no less haunted. The doors of the rooms where King Aeson was murdered, and the adjoining doors of the rooms where Chiron and Jason slept, are guarded by sentries and are barred with crossed wooden beams covered in chains. King Pelias, a troubled and guilt-ridden man, is warned by a Sibyl to beware the arrival of a man wearing a single sandal; he promptly issues the command that anyone found in Jolco wearing a single sandal shall be put immediately to death. No one knows, but Jolco is not truly being ruled by King Pelias, but from the shadows by Eurysteus—the condemned man Iole remembers from her childhood—who carried out Pelias' orders to slay his brother and was rewarded with clemency and a place in the palace.

Hercules takes his place as the head of war training, and the young men of Jolco do their best to please him—especially Ulysses, the son of Laertes. Not so eager is the spoiled Iphitos, who arrives late and is publicly embarrassed when Hercules guides the young Ulysses to outperform him as an archer. When Hercules himself bests Iphitos' discus throw by hurling a disc into orbit (!), the Prince rides away in terror and even Ulysses regards this inhuman demigod with fear. Only Iole looks on with a smile.

ITALIAN due-foglia, "style B," art by A. Piovano (Studio Paradiso).

When a local family is killed by the Nemean lion, Hercules determines to rid Jolco of this threat and rides off in pursuit. Iphitos follows, hoping to outshine Hercules in this contest, but is killed himself instead. Hercules slays the lion, but King Pelias banishes him from Jolco for not preventing the death of his son: "May the curse of the Gods be upon you, until you have paid for the blood of Iphitos!" He further commands him to the task of slaying the Cretan bull. Hercules appeals to Iole, but after the loss of her brother, even she flees in tears from his protestations.

Feeling that his own immortality is responsible for his alienation from mankind, Hercules ventures to the house of the Sibyl and pleads to Jupiter, through her, to be made mortal like other men. His wish is granted, in a torrential rain.

Riding away from Jolco in search of the Cretan bull, Hercules sees a mortally wounded man, gored by this creature. He jumps from his mount onto his bull's back, wrestling with it. Mortal but apparently still possessed of immortal strength, Hercules kills the bull with a single blow. He notices a young man rowing the victim across a lake toward a cave, and follows them on foot. There, he discovers that the victim is none other than his old friend Chiron, now dying. With him is Jason, whom Chiron has raised in the hope of someday returning him to the throne that is rightfully his. Chiron explains with his dying breath that the proof of Jason's identity can be established with the Golden Fleece, which he hid in an oak tree on the isle of Colchides many years ago, while fleeing angry villagers with the boy. He also asserts that Jason must reclaim the throne without violence, to keep a promise Chiron made to the dying King Aeson.

Hercules takes Jason directly to Jolco, but while helping a woman and children across a lake, Jason loses a sandal to the currents. Frightened into submission by the arrival of the foreseen challenger to his throne, King Pelias grants Jason three months to prove his identity by recovering the Fleece. A crew is assembled for the ship Argos, and the craven Eurysteus finagles his way aboard, determined to thwart the mission in order to claim the throne himself, with Iole as his queen. Though Iole has given Hercules no sign of encouragement ("Your destiny is not mine!"), she misses him and confides to her handmaidens her secret hope that he will not forget her.

The voyage to Colchides is threatened by a tempestuous storm, loss of fresh food and water, and then by an attempted mutiny instigated by Eurysteus. Hercules suspects him, as he's the only unseasoned sailor among them, and orders Eurysteus to stay aboard as other crewman go ashore an island for provisions. The island is ruled by Amazon women—initially a notion of delight ("It's unbelievable that, at 60, I'm taking part in an adventure like this. Thank you, Aphrodite!" beams the giddy Esculapeus), until a cemetery consisting only of men is discovered. Queen Antea explains that all of the men died during a volcanic eruption over 100 years ago, but after their female society was raped and abandoned by other male visitors some years later, they have adopted a "black widow" philosophy of loving and slaying their suitors. Jason falls

SIX FOTOBUSTE from the film that put Italy back on the map of commercial world cinema. ▶

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

STEVE REEVES · SYLVA KOSCINA
LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE
GIANNA MARIA CANALE
PIETRO FRANCISCI
EASTMANCOLOR - DYALISCOPE

in love with Antea, who tries to renege on tradition but is obliged by her elders to follow through with the seduction and slaughter of the Argonauts. Fortunately, Ulysses overhears the plan and arranges to drug the wine of their evening revels with opiates from the poppies blooming on the island. With the Amazons unconscious, Hercules (who has remained aboard ship) carries the drugged suitors back to safety on the Argos.

Arriving on the isle of Colchides, the Argonauts are attacked by a race of ape men, who are soon repelled by Hercules' strength. During the battle, Jason goes in search of the Fleece, which is protected by a dragon (or, more accurately, a Tyrannosaurus rex) that he defeats with a well-aimed arrow. Recognizing this as "the act of a King," the Argonauts take the Fleece—which is inscribed with Aeson's incrimination of Pelias and his insistence that no vengeance be taken in reclaiming the throne—and sail to Jolco. When they arrive, Hercules discovers the Fleece missing, stolen by Eurysteus. Outraged, he storms into King Pelias' throne room, finds Eurysteus there, and demands the return of the Fleece—but they trick him into chains in the royal dungeon. Pelias refuses to hand over the throne on the Argonauts' word alone, and turns his army against them. As swords cross, Iole revives Hercules, who rips his chains from the wall and uses them as a bolo-like weapon against the King's guards. Eurysteus is also strangled with the chains, which Hercules then uses to bring down the columns outside the palace, falling on other armed troops arriving as reinforcements. Iole runs to her father, who has set fire to the Fleece and taken poison ("All men are liable to make mistakes and now mine have caught up with me"). With his last words, he recommends her to Hercules, and prays that the world will forgive and forget him.

Under the rule of Jason, truth and justice are restored to Jolco, and Hercules and Iole sail away with the crew of the Argos, bound for adventure in a new life together.

STEVE REEVES struts his stuff for admirers in a publicity shot taken after his arrival in Rome.

Cast

The most imposing problem encountered by Pietro Francisci in mounting a production about Hercules was finding an actor worthy of such a larger-than-life role. At a time when movies were casting the muscle men of legend with the likes of Victor Mature, Francisci despaired of ever finding an actor with a believably immortal physique. However, Francisci's fortunes changed—along with those of the Italian cinema—in 1956, when his teenage daughter went to the movies and saw a new MGM musical, Athena (1954), starring Debbie Reynolds, Jane Powell, and Edmond Purdom. Given a small role in the picture was a 28-year-old bodybuilder from Glasgow, Montana, named Steve Reeves, who had reached the screen after being named Mr. America in 1947, Mr. World in 1948, and Mr. Universe in 1950.

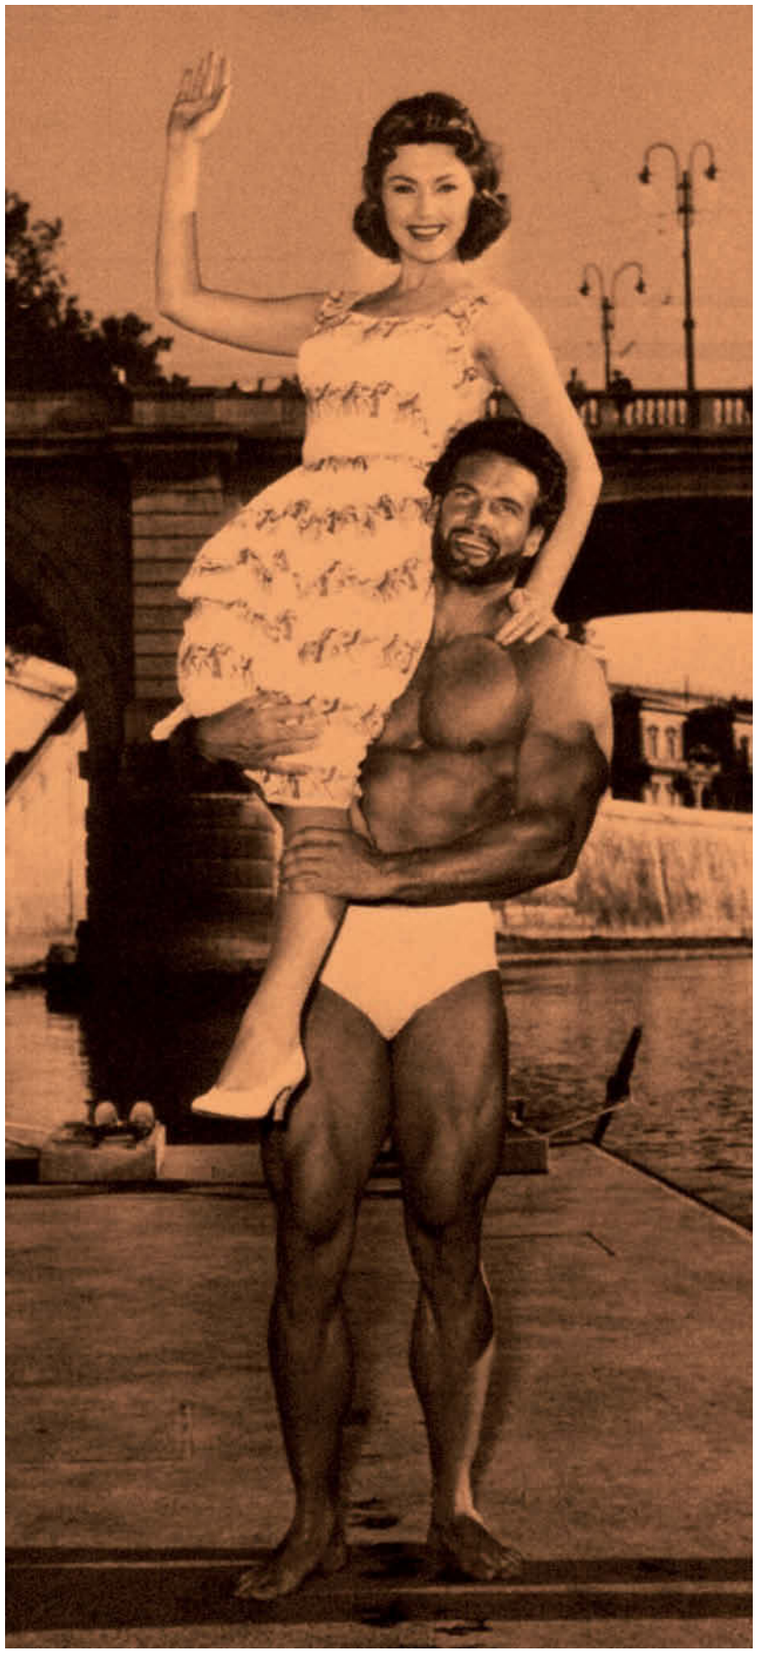
"[Francisci's] daughter took one look at me and cried, 'Hey Daddy, there's your Hercules!'" Reeves recalled. "Francisci immediately sent me a telegram inviting me to Rome, but I was hesitant . . . Then he sent me a preliminary contract with a sizeable [$5,000] advance. I wired him back, saying 'Okay, I'll come.'" [2]

Francisci's own recollection of Reeves' casting was somewhat more pretentious. "Being myself a painter and sculptor, my qualifications governing the selection of the man to play Hercules were taken from Michelangelo, in my subconscious," he claimed. "Consequently, I chose Steve because he had an alarmingly handsome face that blended perfectly with history's most spectacular physique. Through the expression of his face, he could communicate to audiences that his mind was deep in thought and far away from the events occurring around him. He seemed at times to be contemplating things beyond the comprehension of ordinary individuals, as a god . . ." Francisci had an equally lofty opinion of his adaptation and the achievement of Reeves' performance: "The background for my Hercules films were the ancient Greek poems, Le Argonauti by Rodio [Apollonius Rhodus] and I Sette Atebe by Aeschylus. Without the presence of Steve Reeves, the translation of these poems into film . . . would have been vital and relevant only to a meager, scholarly audience. However, Steve Reeves gave the Greek poems the extra dimension they needed to animate and popularize them for everyone on all continents, and through Steve, millions of people received this culture without even realizing it." [3]

Born January 21, 1926, Steve Reeves was the son of a Montana farmer and contractor who died in a work-related accident at the age of 28, when his only child was little more than a year old. As Lester Reeves, Steve's father, was rushing to help a neighbor who was trying to salvage a pitchfork caught in a thresher, the machine chewed through the fork's prongs and spat them out like a rain of spikes. One of them impaled Lester through his abdomen and he died en route to the hospital. Steve, raised by his widowed mother Goldie, started bodybuilding at age 16, served two years in the US Army during World War II, and entered his first bodybuilding competition in 1946. Handsome enough to be mistaken for a movie star long before he became a celebrity, Reeves was encouraged by his admirers to aim for a show business career. He worked with various muscle magazine photographers on a number of promotional shots, including a series entitled "The Twelve Labors of Hercules," the original negatives of which were later bought by admirer–collector J. Paul Getty III.

When one of these publicity photos came to the attention of legendary director Cecil B. DeMille, Reeves was summoned to the great man's office. DeMille was preparing Samson and Delilah and was convinced that Reeves would be ideal for the lead. However, after seeing Reeves in person and worrying that the motion picture camera would add twenty pounds to his onscreen appearance, DeMille insisted that he lose that much weight before he would sign him for the part. Reeves reluctantly agreed, but it soon became apparent that even a marginal weight loss such as five pounds was damaging to his physique. Before even half the requested weight loss was complete, DeMille declared that Reeves' diminished physique no longer impressed him and the role was given instead to that man among men, Victor Mature.

Reeves licked his wounds with his unprecedented, three-title sweep of the world's top body-building honors. (At 21, he was the youngest contestant ever to win the coveted Mr. America title.) After starring in a failed TV pilot called Kimbar, Lord of the Jungle, the world's Number One bodybuilder won a recurring role on TV's The Ralph Edwards Show and made his first billed screen appearance in Edward D. Wood Jr.'s cheap film noir Jail Bait (1954). Here he played police lieutenant Bob Lawrence, an inappropriately common role that kept him clothed throughout, except for an amusingly gratuitous, shirt-changing scene. After that came the role in Athena. Despite his extraordinary good looks and magnetic charisma, Reeves' performance in both films was wooden, and based on their evidence, it is doubtful that he could have sustained an acting career in America. In Italy, however—where his dialogue could be looped by actors with a greater range of emotion and inflection—Steve Reeves could not only be an actor, he could become a star.



At the time of Francisci's offer, Reeves was working full-time in California as a public relations spokesman

DIRECTOR Pietro Francisci, Sylva Koscina, and Steve Reeves go to work.

2 Carlo Piazza, "Entrentien avec Steve Reeves," Ciné-Zine-Zone 36/37, September/October 1989, 5-22.

3 Milton T. Moore Jr., Steve Reeves: One of a Kind (Dallas TX: Milton T. Moore Jr., 1983), 51.

STEVE REEVES sweeps lovely co-star Sylva Koscina off her feet prior to filming.

for Ray Wilson's American Health Studios—having assured Wilson in advance that he was settling down, that his career in motion pictures and television was over. The call from Rome therefore came as a great surprise to both men. Reeves was hesitant to trust it, until the advance check was in his hand. He told Wilson that this opportunity might be his big chance, and it was helpfully pointed out to him that it also might not. Reeves admitted this possibility, but he felt he had to take the risk. Wilson was unwilling to give his star employee a leave of absence, especially so soon after taking him on, so the two men agreed to go their separate ways.

With Reeves in pocket, Pietro Francisci was able to launch Le fatiche di Ercole as a co-production between Lux Film and Galatea, a fledgling Milanese production company formed by Lionello "Nello" Santi (1918–95, not to be confused with the famous Italian opera conductor of the same name), a short, bald, stocky man with an incandescent smile. Galatea was bankrolled by Santi's wife Franca Invernizi, the heiress of Egidio Galbani, Italy's largest dairy company, renowned for their "Bel Paese" brand of soft cheese. Remarkably, the epic was budgeted at no more than $110,000.

Francisci assembled a truly mythic crew: Mario Serandrei, Italy's premier film editor; Giulio Coltellacci, designer of the costumes for Ulisse; Enzo Masetti, composer for Fabiola and Attila; Flavio Mogherini, whose art direction for Il leone di Amalfi and Attila had contributed so much to Francisci's current standing as a director of adventure pictures; and of course, his right hand man, Mario Bava, to photograph the film and supervise its special effects unit. Bava photographed the film in Dyaliscope, a French-patented anamorphic (2.35:1) process akin to CinemaScope.

English-language prints of the film mysteriously credit Bava only with "Lighting and Special Effects," but his contribution was actually much broader. Bava was literally the director of photography, supervising his usual team of Corrado Bartoloni (camera operator) and Ubaldo Terzano (camera assistant)—as well as Silvio Fraschetti, who shot second unit exteriors (including the underwater shots) according to Bava's storyboards—and masterminding the look of the film in concert with the art and makeup departments.

In preproduction for this assignment, Bava studied photographs of Reeves and found something lacking in the culturist's clean-shaven appearance. Reeves' body was ideal, but his face lacked the earthiness and character of Hercules as he was known to every Roman school child from the world of sculpture. Bava suggested the added touch of a trim, face-framing beard, which gave Reeves the air of a noble savage and added celestial fire to his deep blue eyes.

Bava later said, "I owe the style of beard that became Hercules' trademark to a show about [playwright Eugène] Labiche, set in 1890, which I saw on television. The fellow with the beard was Nino Pavese, and I found his beard and mustache to be very, very handsome. Reeves was perfect for the part, but Hercules had to have a beard, so we sent Reeves a telegram telling him to grow one. He arrived wearing it and became the hit of the Italian cinema."[4]

Reeves' appearance in this film established him as an international phenomenon. Though his onscreen mannerisms are sometimes too obviously coached, stiff and overemphatic, one never doubts for a moment that Reeves is Hercules. He used the role to emphasize his personal credo that the strength of the body should be used only as an extension of one's intelligence—a point which the film makes more than once. Bava had his own invisible techniques for making Reeves an even more impressive sight onscreen; he blocked the scenes so that the 6' 1" Reeves always appeared to be the tallest person onscreen, and his body was lightly oiled for most shots, helping the light to cling to his muscles. With Steve Reeves, Bava was finally placed in charge with an actor who was the equivalent of a classic piece of sculpture, and being his father's son, he had an innate knowledge of how to light the human body to depict it as a work of art. Mogherini's set designs relied heavily on backgrounds of bas-reliefs, depicting ancient Grecian dramas, and Bava lighted these as he lighted Reeves—suggesting at a glance that this immortal was as one with the figures participating in those ancient, decorative friezes. The physique of Reeves also gifted Bava with amazing new possibilities for widescreen composition; his outstretched arms alone qualified as spectacle. The climactic shot of Hercules using the chains of slavery to topple a kingdom is not only thematically resonant and highly satisfying dramatically. The widescreen image itself is a masterpiece of iconic screen imagery—unquestionably, one of the most famous shots in film history. It may have been inspired by DeMille, but it outclasses DeMille's own execution of a similar moment in Samson and Delilah and must have tasted like sweet revenge to Reeves.

A RUNAWAY CHARIOT facilitates the first meeting of Iole and Hercules.

Casting such an extraordinary specimen as Steve Reeves created another mammoth casting problem: where to find an actress who could play opposite him without being overwhelmed by him? Who could seem his equal while still embodying an ideal of femininity? Francisci reportedly made his selection by showing the photos of several contenders to a panel of artists and sculptors. They all agreed that the actress with the most picturesque figure was Sylva Koscina, a Yugoslav actress of tender aspect and Amazonian presence, who was cast as Iole.

Koscina was born in Zagreb on August 22, 1933, and moved with her family to Italy at the age of 8. She attended the University of Naples, where she majored in mathematics and physics until the temptations of a modelling career stole her away from academia. Her fashion photographs led to her being named Miss Tappa at the 1954 Tour of Italy bicycle race, and she made the jump into films with a brief appearance in Siamo uomini o caporali? (1955). Before Le fatiche di Ercole, she worked in films for distinguished directors Pietro Germi and Alberto Lattuada. Auburn-haired, curvaceous and possessed of gentle, wistful features, Koscina was reportedly voted "the possessor of the finest breasts in the history of Italian cinema."[5] Her perfectly proportioned torso is apparent throughout Le fatiche di Ercole, in which she wears a sheer peplum dress without a bra—and without the slightest need for one. Aside from her physical attributes, she was a talented and instinctive performer, one of the few actresses primarily active in Italian films who successfully pursued stardom in other countries, including the United States. She would work again with Mario Bava, many years later, in Lisa and the Devil (1973).

Just as Italian films of this period were sometimes scripted around leftover sets and available props, it would seem that characters were sometimes tailor-written to the screen personae of actors under contract. As King Pelias, Ivo Garrani was cast once again as a guilt-ridden, compromised noble—an ongoing stereotype he would replay again and again, notably in La battaglia di Maratona (1959) and La maschera del demonio (1960). Asked if he felt stereotyped during this period, Garrani responded: "I took it as a simple job, my career in cinema—I mean, I had quite a different attitude about my parallel career in stage acting! I went on the set to shoot Ercole and other similar movies in the most professional way possible, but I never thought of it as anything other than just a job. Maybe I was stereotyped during that period, but I was much more interested in my theater career and, in any case, I always kept working in the cinema and on television. By the way, I think I was much more stereotyped by the character I played later in Carlo Lizzani's Il gobbo/The Hunchback of Rome (1960), as far as my career in movies is concerned."

THE MURDERER Eurysteus (Arturo Dominici) controls the throne of guilt-ridden King Pelias (Ivo Garrani), seen here with the Golden Fleece—a scene not included in the final cut.

Garrani reflects on his co-stars: "Reeves was a gentle guy. He used to receive regular shipments of . . . you know . . . special products, to keep his muscles up. I remember that those products, for some reason, got lost on one occasion, so he really began getting weaker and weaker while waiting for the next shipment to arrive—and the kids started telling jokes, saying that Reeves was, you know, like a flying balloon with no gas.[6] As far as Sylva Koscina is concerned, I really don't have too much to say. I can tell you that she was very good on the set, and I enjoyed acting with her. I remember she was always with her mother on the set at that time. Her mother was her agent, or something like an agent for her, and she never left her alone—on or off the set!"

4 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

5 Moore, 101.

Given a full-screen credit for her "special participation" is Gianna Maria Canale, who plays a variation on I vampiri's Duchess Du Grand as the black widow-like Queen Antea. It is frankly not one of her best performances; Antea is a poorly written, overly passive character (the Queen, yet she rules under the thumbs of her veiled priestesses), primarily decorative, and given no opportunities to interact with Reeves, or to be truly villainous. However, considering the commercial failure of I vampiri, Antea is perhaps a more seminal figure in the history of Italian horror. Like the Duchess Du Grand and also the Circe of Ulisse, she embodies Man's schismatic fear and desire of Woman, and perpetuates the split image of female potential that persists throughout the Golden Age of the film dell'orrore.

Antea's lover Jason was played by Fabrizio Mioni. Born in Rome in 1930, Mioni previously appeared in a minor role in Orlando e i paladini di Francia, and he would take advantage of the international success of Le fatiche di Ercole by relocating to Los Angeles. He played one of Curd Jurgens' errant, nightclubbing students in 20th Century-Fox's remake of The Blue Angel (1959), and moved on to young "Latin Lover" type parts in Get Yourself a College Girl (1964) and the Elvis Presley vehicle Girl Happy (1965). His numerous US television appearances paid off in a theatrical feature assembled from a two-part episode of NBC's The Man From U.N.C.L.E. series, The Spy With My Face (1965), which led in turn to his casting in another Robert Vaughn feature, The Venetian Affair (1967), which also starred Boris Karloff and Elke Sommer, who would someday have their own important encounters with Mario Bava. Mioni continues to make his home in Los Angeles today.

GIANNA MARIA CANALE as the Amazonian queen, Antea.

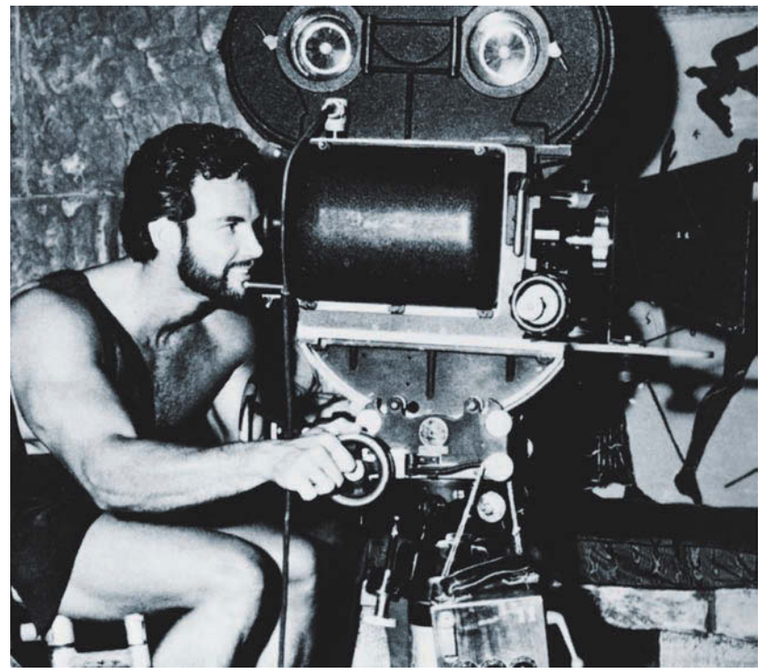
Cast as the young Ulysses was Gabriele Antonini, born in Rome in 1938. The 19-year-old was a newcomer to films, having only previously appeared in Mario Monicelli's Padri e figli ("Fathers and Sons," 1957), given a US release in 1959 as A Tailor's Maid. Antonini's nimble, animated performance as Ulysses was a boon to both of Francisci's Hercules films, and he would subsequently appear in several pepla of the 1950s and '60s, including Ferdinando Cerchio's Giudetta e Oloferne/Head of a Tyrant (1958), Riccardo Freda's Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan/Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World (1961), Primo Zeglio's Le sette sfide/The Seven Revenges (1961, co-scripted by Sergio Leone), and Andre de Toth's I Mongoli/The Mongols (1961). He would also play Alexander the Great in Mario Caiano's Goliath e la schiava ribelle/Goliath and the Rebel Slave (1963).

Also noticeable in a few scenes is Luciana Paluzzi (credited under her true surname of Paoluzzi) in one of her earliest roles, as one of Iole's handmaidens. Born in 1931 in Rome, Paluzzi made her first (uncredited) screen appearance in Jean Negulesco's Three Coins in a Fountain (1954) and was given her first substantial role in Marc Allégret's En Effeuillant la Marguerite/Please, Mr. Balzac (1956). After Le fatiche di Ercole, she was featured in Fritz Lang's German-made Indian diptych Der Tiger von Eschnapur and Das Indische Grabmal (1959), and met and married future Bava actor Brett Halsey while acting in her first American Film, Return to Peyton Place (1961). They had a son togther and divorced in 1962. After a memorable guest role on an episode of TV's The Man From U.N.C.L.E., Paluzzi attained international celebrity in the role of the ill-fated Fiona Volpe in the James Bond blockbuster, Thunderball (1965). Pert, Titian-haired, and voluptuous, she became one of the best-known Italian actresses of the 1960s and '70s, ultimately retiring from the screen after a series of increasingly erotic roles in 1979. Today she resides with her husband in Bel Air, California.



Two of the film's most striking presences are Lidia Alfonsi as the Sybil and Arturo Dominici as Eurysteus—who, moreso than any of the other supporting characters in the film, are presented by Bava with exquisite visual emphasis.

Born April 28, 1928, Lidia Alfonsi made her screen debut in a small role in Vita da cani, which Bava had photographed. It appears that she spent some interim time working in Spanish films, but Le fatiche di Ercole would influence the future course of her career; she would became a recurring figure in the many peplum films it spawned, including Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia's Gli amori di Ercole/The Loves of Hercules (1960) and two other Steve Reeves vehicles, Andre de Toth's Morgan il pirata/Morgan the Pirate (1960) and Giorgio Ferroni's La guerra di Troia/The Trojan Horse (1962), in which she gives a standout performance as another visionary, Cassandra. Alfonsi would work again with Bava in "Il telefono" ("The Telephone"), the opening segment of his omnibus film I tre volti della paura (1963), in which she played a predatory lesbian bent on avenging her rejection by a former lover.

6 I don't know what kind of "special products" Garrani observed Reeves using, but in all fairness, it should be mentioned that Steve Reeves was one of the most vocal opponents to the use of steroids in bodybuilding. He prided himself on maintaining his physique solely through the use of proper diet, vitamins, and concentrated exercise.

The actor who plays Eurysteus, Arturo Dominici, would work again and again with Bava over the next several years and would become, in essence, his definitive male villain. Born January 2, 1918, in Palermo, Dominici was encouraged to go into films by friends and family who told him that he looked like American actor Robert Taylor. He played an official in Giuseppe Amato's Yvonne la nuit/Yvonne of the Night (1949), starring Totò and Frank Latimore (one of the first American actors to seek Italian stardom), but it was not until the role of Eurysteus that he truly found his niche—not as a leading man, but as a figure of regal evil and duplicity. After Le fatiche di Ercole, Dominici was hired to appear in scenes that Bava directed for Nel segno di Roma/Sign of the Gladiator, Caltiki il mostro immortale, La battaglia di Maratona and Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad. His greatest role, unquestionably, would be Javutich in Bava's directorial debut, La maschera del demonio (1960). After that production, Bava and Dominici inexplicably stopped working together, but the actor continued to rack up a fine assortment of performances in his classic mold, in such important pepla as Perseo l'invincibile/Medusa Against the Son of Hercules, Ercole contro Moloch/The Conquest of Mycenae, and Golia alla conquista di Baghdad/Goliath at the Conquest of Damascus. By his family's count, Dominici made approximately 160 Italian films, but he concentrated primarily on television and dubbing assignments after 1973. He died of throat cancer on September 7, 1992, after spending most of his autumnal years dubbing the lead role in Taggert, a popular German TV import.

STEVE REEVES takes an opportunity to play with the tools of Bava's trade.

REEVES teases script girl Gigliola Rosmino as Mario Bava (behind clapboard) does his best to avoid being photographed.

Production

The set of Le fatiche di Ercole was something of a circus, judging from surviving publicity photos. Steve Reeves was a media sensation from the moment he landed in Rome. As filming proceeded at Cinecittà, the set was regularly invaded by celebrity guests, such as singer Mario Lanza and his wife Betty. When the production went on location, it was impossible to keep the locals—especially women and children—away. Reeves was happy to "be Hercules" for them, visiting with them during his breaks, flexing his muscles, signing autographs, posing for photos.

"I told the rookies never to forget those days," Bava said. "We were at the beach all summer, getting suntans, and we were never bored because we were working all day long. If you're out in the sun too long, you can grow lazy, so our lunches were brought to us in baskets, and we were all given chairs to sit in. I said many times that we would never see days like those again, and I was right." [7]

Seldom had there been such a buzz about an Italian film, and Pietro Francisci wisely stayed as close to the center of this interest—his star—as possible. At the end of his career, after eighteen pictures, Steve Reeves still spoke of Pietro Francisci as his favorite director. Considering how much of Bava's stylistic signature is evident in the picture, Reeves' devotion to Francisci may seem odd, but there is a good explanation for it. According to actor Ivo Garrani: "They used to share the responsibilities of directing. Francisci was a good director; he knew his job very well. He was not, however, a great technician—but he knew how to work with actors, and in a sense, he completed himself when he started working with Bava. Francisci's relationship with Bava was like a symbiosis; each one of them took their specific part in the making of the movie. Bava was, of course, the one who had to take care of the technical side of the job; Francisci devoted himself to actors' direction—well, the actresses especially [laughs]—but together, they formed an incredible directing team."

Francisci played director whenever a scene was built around his stars; it is appropriate, then, that Reeves never credited Bava with directing him in anything. However, it is not Reeves' line readings that people remember about this film, but the iconography of his physique in relation to its imagery. The job of directing actors' performances is almost unimportant in a film shot without live sound, where the only record of what really took place on the set is visual. Francisci may have directed the actors, but Bava blocked and lighted their scenes. He also was entirely responsible for directing those scenes which were built on technique rather than dialogue—most notably, the wonderfully eerie flashback to Iole's childhood, whose delirious shadowplay and depictions of the young heroine's fright make the sequence a concise preview of Bava's future horror innovations in color. He was also at the helm for some second-unit stuntwork with Reeves' stand-in Giovanni Cianfriglia, an Italian bodybuilder who wore a Reeves-like wig as he wrestled with a drugged lion and grappled with a horned, imitation bull's head covered in brown shag carpeting. [8]

COAXED OUT from behind the clapboard, Bava reluctantly poses with the man whose star he placed in the ascendant.

As always, Bava was willing to do whatever was necessary to benefit the picture. He was content to assist Francisci, but also quietly annoyed to be performing so many of the director's duties, while Francisci was away posing with Reeves and Koscina—sometimes pretending to block their scenes—in staged publicity photos. It also didn't help that Francisci was too bent on self-promotion to acknowledge, or even to privately thank, Bava for going the extra mile. It was one thing to not wish to draw attention to oneself—Bava dodged the production's still photographer as best he could, appearing in one publicity photo only as a pair of "Kilroy" eyes peering over a clapperboard that does not even bear his name as cameraman—but it was something else to see Francisci taking all the bows for his hard work.

Bava's confidant during this period of growing discontent was Riccardo Freda. "It was Bava's work that was responsible for Francisci's success," Freda declared, "because he would sit on the set and fall asleep, while Bava would set to work creating the special effects shots, blocking the scenes, and rehearsing the actors. If that wasn't bad enough, I later found out that Francisci was being abusive of Bava, saying nasty things about him behind his back and humiliating him . . ." [9]

Bava was not happy about his souring working relationship with Francisci, but he consoled himself by taking advantage of the creative latitude he was given, and was of course very happy to be working on such a conspicuous project.

The filming was completed ahead of schedule. Reeves personally hated wearing a beard and shaved it off right away, arriving barefaced when he showed up at Francisci's villa to collect the balance of his payment. Francisci was outraged by the change of appearance, as Reeves was still technically under contract to the picture until the end of the week.

"If you were really my friend, you wouldn't ask me to keep it!" Reeves said.

"And you," Francisci shot back, "if you were a true friend, you would never have done such a thing!"

Reeves planned to vacation briefly in Majorca before returning to work in California. On the morning of his departure, while packing his bags, he received a frantic call from Francisci, asking him to report back to the set for an extra day of reshoots. The actor was willing to shave a day off his vacation plans, but of course, he noted, they would have to agree to terms for his extra time. "If you were my friend, you would do it for nothing!" Francisci argued. "If you were my friend, you wouldn't ask me to do it for nothing!" Reeves countered. [10]

Francisci promised that he would be paid somehow, so Reeves went to the location, where his clean-shaved face was covered with a painstakingly applied false beard. When Francisci arrived, he didn't have the money with him; Reeves smelled a rat. Noting that the sky was overcast, too dark to shoot what was needed, the actor looked firmly at his director and decreed, "Until you pay me, those clouds will not go away." Reeves sat in a chair and, true enough, the sky remained stubbornly dark until noon, when a messenger arrived with half his promised amount. "Okay—half the money for half a day's work," Reeves said. At that moment, the clouds parted and the crew was able to get the additional shots in the can. By the end of the day, everyone was half-convinced that Reeves really was the son of Jupiter.

HERCULES seeks counsel with a Sibyl (Lidia Alfonsi), one of Bava's most eye-popping color compositions.

Commentary

Over the years, the once-respectable stature of Le fatiche di Ercole has been dulled and eroded by the absurd extremes of the countless "sword and sandal" films that followed in its wake. Some of the criticism the film has received is warranted, but one must remember that it, more than any other single film, was responsible for returning Italy to its earlier standing as a major filmmaking capital of the world. It was made, however, before that recovery took place and therefore embodies some inevitable flaws in keeping with the circumstances of its filming. The opening shots, for example, are now risible to the sophisticated moviegoing eye, with an obvious male stunt man standing in for Sylva Koscina as her chariot races out of control, and it features a rather sorry-looking dinosaur, but in most ways it remains a rousing entertainment, impressive for the sheer spectacle of Reeves' unparalleled physique and endlessly fascinating for the pictorial contributions of Mario Bava and art director Flavio Mogherini.

In a dubbed film without a native language, the weight of the storyteller's responsibility falls on the shoulders of the cameraman. In Le fatiche di Ercole, the performances of Alfonsi and Dominici, in particular, illustrate Mario Bava's ability to elucidate character in visual/symbolic terms, sometimes at a glance. In his present tense scenes, Eurysteus is introduced as a hand reaching from the shadows to pour himself a goblet of the King's own wine; the shot is pregnant with clandestine intrigue, but his action also shows in a single, distilled image his intoxication with power and his intimate standing with the King. When he finally turns to face the camera, Eurysteus hovers on the edge of visibility, never venturing completely forth from the shadows that are his natural element; the one time he does wholly step into the light—to whisper his plan to Pelias—his words recede into mystery, unheard. Consequently, for much of the film, his visual rendering makes Eurysteus less a character in his own right than a slimy personification of King Pelias' own dark side.

Adding further comment to his scenes is the way the bas-relief murals adorning the walls behind him, telling stories of past dynasties, are lighted in sympathetic shadowplay, some figures standing out while others recede. One gets the impression from Bava's lighting scheme that this is not the first time in history when a King has been so advised. In this context, Dominici's performance is actually secondary to the way it is supported by the mise-en-scène.

While Eurysteus is introduced as a creature of twilight caught between light and shadow, the Sibyl is introduced as a shock of color. Forecasting to King Pelias the coming of the challenger wearing one sandal, the Sibyl is first seen in long-shot as a somber figure, darkly draped in a hood and cloak of midnight blue. Advancing into medium shot, she throws back her hood and cloak in an abrupt movement, which redresses her completely in its scarlet lining, as she thrusts forth a cautioning hand. (The effect is further enhanced by red gel lighting that blasts her from stage left, at the signal of her dramatic gesture, and another red gel light from stage right as she advances another step closer to the camera.) Bava had done something like this previously to introduce Gloria Swanson in Mio figlio Nerone but he perfects the idea here. He almost certainly got the idea from a similar shot in Vincente Minnelli's MGM musical The Band Wagon (1953, photographed by Harry Jackson), where slinky Cyd Charisse changes her entire color scheme by opening her coat during the "Girl Hunt" dance sequence with Gene Kelly. In the context of a musical fantasy sequence, this jolt is only one of a myriad dazzles aimed at the eye, but in the context of a straightforward story (however fanciful), where bold strokes of purely visual effect are not anticipated, it discharges an almost supernatural frisson.

Nearly all of the film's characters are introduced with a dramatic shock, meant to impress the viewer while also identifying them subliminally with their major emotion: Iole on a runaway chariot (helplessness); Hercules uprooting a heavy tree from the ground (dutiful heroism); Ulysses vaulting himself over a large hill to land at Hercules' feet (plucky ambition); Iphitos charging his chariot into the midst of the training field, late in the day (laziness and arrogance); Jason as

7 Abruzzese.

8 In the 1960s and '70s, Cianfriglia graduated to starring roles in minor Italian cult films; he is best known for playing the masked superhero Superargo (in two films), the spy Agent Z-55, and the Western hero Johnny Oro. He later returned to stuntwork, contributing to such international productions as Martin Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ (1988) and John Frankenheimer's The Year of the Gun (1991). In addition to doubling for Steve Reeves in Le fatiche di Ercole, he can also be seen doubling for Sylva Koscina—in drag—in an early high angle shot of Iole's runaway coach riding very close to the edge of a precipice.

9 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 251.

10 Chris LeClaire, Worlds to Conquer: An Authorized Biography of Steve Reeves (South Chatham MA: Monomoy Books, 1999), 174.

a mysterious figure fleeing the site where Hercules slays the Cretan bull (furtive valor); the Sibyl with the startling revelation of her "inner flame" (illumination); and Eurysteus as a wicked claw reaching out of the darkness to help itself to a cup of regal wine (covert power). The only exception is King Pelias, who is perhaps living too much with the ghosts of the past to ingratiate himself into the present. The visual schemes heralding the introductions of these characters also reverberate wittily throughout the picture in other forms. For instance, just as the Sybil advises Pelias, Antea (another monarch with blood on her hands) is shown being ordered to slay the Argonauts according to Amazon tradition by a group of priestesses who wear a reversed color scheme: bright red outside, dark blue inside, the chromatic inversion making a sly remark about how the Amazons' flaunted sex appeal serves as a bright, attractive cover to their dark and murderous creed.

Alfonsi's second scene, as the Sibyl acts as an intermediary between Jupiter and Hercules, who wishes to "live and love like other men," is the most artfully composed shot in the entire picture. Viewed over Hercules' rippling shoulder, itself limned in deep blue light, the Sibyl stands on the other side of a large stone vat of open flame with the poise of a ship's figurehead, her red gown standing out in stark relief against a night-blue cyclorama bisected by a diagonal ray of light—the listening ear of Jupiter. Seen in its original widescreen splendor, on the big screen, this image ranks high among the most breathtaking to be found in Bava's work. It's more than a great shot; it's a great painting.

As attested by this scene, and many others, climaxing with Reeves' iconic toppling of the pillars at Jolco, Le fatiche di Ercole is one of Bava's definitive works as a cinematographer. Any credit for the film's remarkable beauty must be shared with Flavio Mogherini, not to mention Reeves and Koscina, but here Bava's images attain both a classical grandeur and a casual grace that his previous films, however accomplished, could only approach. This is not due simply to Bava's peaking skills as a lighting cameraman, but to the material itself being uncommonly well suited to his visual imagination; a mastery of color and lighting, a background in sculpture and painting, and the ability to evoke the demonic as well as the heroic. Even when photographing a familiar location, such as the Cascate di Montegelato (previously seen in Francisci's Orlando e i paladini di Francia, which appears here as a backdrop to the Argonauts' frolic with the Amazons), there is an opulence to the scenery that feels fresh and definitive—and also pure, not yet subject to the baroque overstatements of its 1959 sequel, Ercole e la regina di Lidia/ Hercules Unchained.

Bava's special effects contributions to the film are also notable. In addition to supervising the miniature shots of the Argos being tossed on a stormy sea (more acceptable than those staged by Eugen Schüfftan for Ulisse), he created a number of special mattes for the production. These include the establishing exterior of Jolco, the exterior of the Amazons' cave, the Argos anchored at sea, and the columned buildings huddled on a hillside as the Argos returns to Jolco.

The Jolco exterior seen in the film consists mostly of a large scale set constructed outdoors at Cinecittà: the palace stairs and columns to the left of frame, a papier-maché stone wall in the center background, and a stone gate to the right of frame—these were all real. Bava completed this shot with a sheet of glass, to which he added a roof to the palace (replaced later in the film with a collapsible section of papier-maché stone blocks), and an entire town of columned buildings that seemed to crown the plateau in the middle field.

Ivo Garrani remembers well the day these shots were filmed: "I have great memories of Le fatiche di Ercole, when we were taken to act on a set with fake temples that were only half-built, only the lower half. Those temples ended right above our heads, but Bava had these glass paintings where all the upper parts of the temples had been painted by hand. He positioned the glass midway between the scene and the camera, and the painted part matched the sets exactly! It was amazing to see it in the printed shot."

Likewise, the dark clouds shown hovering over Jolco were air-brushed on a separate plane of glass, positioned to be out of focus in relation to the buildings in the "distance."

The exterior of the Amazon's cave was a combination of an actual location and a matte painting executed by Bava.

For the scenes of the men aboard the Argos, the ship's façade was constructed over the surface and one side of a rented oil freighter. The movie also contains two shots of the Argos moored at some distance from shore, and these shared a glass matte painting of the ship, with a light skirt of sea foam around its edges. Bava took care to paint the ship with a black, shaded midsection. For one of the two matte shots, the ship appears to have working oars; for this shot, using careful measurements, Bava rewound the film in his camera, masked all of the screen area except the unexposed black area of the midsection, and inserted there a new exposure of a group of oars being rowed. Whether the oars were rowed by real people in a dim setting and photographed from a distance—or part of a miniature, mechanized model, we can only guess.

JASON (Fabrizio Mioni) finds love in the arms of monstrous Queen Antea, in this scene photographed at the Cascate di Montegelato.

The huddled buildings at Jolco were also painted on glass; the illusion was further sold by cutting out the spaces between the columns in the photos and positioning waving extras "inside" these structures, shading them with screens blocked from view by the clippings to provide the illusion of shelter. The same matte was used for the exterior shot of Hercules signalling the Argos crew by waving a torch from the palace window.

Le fatiche di Ercole also contains some impressive optical work, notably the twin-arced fountain which provides an Elysian backdrop to the farewell scene between Hercules and Iole. The fountain was a real one, called simply La Fontana, which Bava found outside a building on the Viale dell' Agricoltura. He photographed a plate of the fountain from the side (it stands lengthwise in front of the building) and augmented it with a matte painting of trees to eliminate the building from view. Reeves and Koscina played the scene in front of a blue screen, allowing the optical plate to be inserted later as a background. Looking much larger onscreen than it is in reality, La Fontana provides one of the loveliest moments in the picture, evoking the airy, azure atmosphere of a Maxfield Parrish painting.

The weak link among the film's many special effects is undoubtedly the shabby dinosaur that arises to contest Jason's right to the Golden Fleece. Not resembling a dragon in the slightest, this wretched costume (not Bava's work, incidentally) was given its illusion of immense size by the simplest means possible: forced perspective. The actor in the dinosaur costume was positioned much closer to the camera than Fabrizio Mioni (Jason), and the use of a deep focus lens kept the two planes of depth in equal focus, providing the illusion of the scene unfolding at the same distance. A "lifesize" prop was also built, and maneuvered from inside by a couple of technicians, to react when Jason climbs atop its sleeping form to reach the Fleece, and to fling its tail defensively. If anything, this scene shows how desperately the talents of an artisan like Carlo Rambaldi were needed by the Italian film community at this time.

The film's faults also extend to a screenplay that—at least in its English versions (there are more than one, as will be explained later)—seems hastily written, to the point of occasionally contradicting itself. When Hercules first arrives in Jolco, King Pelias announces that "I want to give the throne up, because each year I grow more anxious"—yet for the remainder of the film, he challenges Jason's right to the throne with the rigor of a zealot who refuses to surrender what is wrongfully his. When Iole shows Hercules to his room, she describes how the sun doesn't reach it until noon, which will allow him to sleep late. The hero is grateful for this consideration, but the very next scene on the training field depicts Hercules as an early riser. He criticizes Iphitos' late arrival for the athletic trials by saying, "You sleep too much." Yet these inconsistencies are nothing when compared to the film's handling of what should have been its pivotal event: Hercules' voluntary shedding of his immortality.

When Hercules bests Iphitos' excellent discus throw by hurling a discus literally into orbit, the onlookers regard him with fright, backing fearfully away and fleeing the scene in their chariots; only Iole continues to regard him without fear. This scene, and the unhappy aftermath of his heroic act against the Nemean lion that results in Iphitos' death, cause Hercules to damn his immortality as a curse, something that distances him from other people and will prevent him from ever being truly happy. Le fatiche di Ercole could have been more powerful, dramatically, had it chronicled either the story of Hercules' alienation from mankind as a demigod, or the story of his coming to terms with his chosen mortality—discovering pain, love, even the sting of defeat. However, BAVA shooting a tracking shot (Steve Reeves and Fabrizio Mioni on horseback) from the rear of a truck. Camera assistant Ubaldo Terzano holds the clapboard.

Francisci tries to have it both ways, by having Hercules shed his immortality, yet without suffering any consequences. Despite his great sacrifice, Hercules lives out the rest of the picture as he did before, prevailing over every conflict, still possessed of a superhuman strength that far exceeds his musculature.

Duccio Tessari observed that this conflict may have arisen from a conflict of creative opinion between Francisci and Ennio De Concini: "Francisci had been thinking about using Mr. Muscle [Steve Reeves] as a Hercules with real limitations of strength. De Concini instead had the stroke of genius to make a Hercules beyond all the limits—a Hercules that, if he hurled a discus, the discus truly became a flying saucer that never stopped!" [11]

It is also bewildering that Hercules is ostracized by the King and people of Jolco, after ridding them of the Nemean lion, after being held to blame for the death of Iphitos—who was clearly at fault himself, for following Hercules into the lion's den, armed with little more than his own arrogance. Pelias is depicted as being fully aware of his son's faults (Hercules has been summoned, in essence, to make a man of him), which makes it all the more confounding that he would be blind to the real cause of Iphitos' death, even in grief. (According to one version of the Greek myths, Iphitos was a friend of Hercules, murdered by his strong hands under a spell of madness sent by Hera. Had the film been dubbed so that Hercules was mistaken as the murderer of Iphitos, the accompanying images and subsequent turn of events would make considerably more sense.) Equally perplexing, in context, is Pelias' order to Hercules to destroy the Cretan Bull as part of the burden he must carry in penitence. It seems a gratuity to carry the story from one point to the next, and further weakened by having the scene of Hercules' disavowal of his immortality precede the all-too-easy slaying of the mythic bull.

De Concini admitted to writing the screenplay somewhat whimsically: "It had occurred to me to write [the Hercules films] in a very simple way, because the idea of distorting Hercules in an ironic key amused me very much. In fact, these films were very ironic, for example in dialogue like this: 'Esculapeus, get moving, swim across the river and come here!' 'I can't; they haven't invented a cure for rheumatism yet!' Or 'Hey, you handsome youth with the cunning expression—what do they call you?' 'Ulysses!' 'Ah! So, when you're older, they will call you the astute Ulysses!' In short, these films were made with humor, and by a director who believed in them and loved them very much, and it was certainly this factor that made them so successful." [12]

11 Faldini and Fofi. Translation amended for clarity.

Music

Le fatiche di Ercole was scored by Enzo Masetti (1893–1961), a Bolognese composer active in the Italian film industry since the mid-1930s. After more than a decade of predominantly romantic, adventure and (later) tortured neorealist scores—including William Dieterle's Vulcano/Volcano (1949) and G. W. Pabst's La voce del silenzio (1953)—Masetti's career as a film composer reached its defining moment with Fabiola, which revealed him to be particularly eloquent with heroic themes. (Perhaps because heroic themes are most expressive when they bring together the strains of romanticism, adventure, and anguish that he had previously mined separately.) He pursued this genre further with Pietro Francisci on Attila in 1954, and after a brief detour to Guido Brignone's La schiave di Catagine/The Sword and the Cross (1956, also featuring Gianna Maria Canale), reunited with Francisci to produce his final two scores for Le fatiche di Ercole and its sequel. His was that rare and fortunate career that ended with its best and most beloved music.

"We know all too little about ancient Greek music, but we do know that the Greeks loved the art of song and valued it highly," Masetti said at the time. "Their musical notation was entirely different to ours, but they knew the power of vocal and instrumental melody and harmony, and in my score . . . I have tried to capture something of the old Greek spirit as it was expressed when the world was young." [13]

HERCULES poses with Ulysses (Gabriele Antonini) on the demigod's first day as Jolco's new Master of Arms.

Masetti's main theme is a musical marriage between the leitmotifs of Hercules and Iole, the former being a French horn section "fox call" that sounds remarkably appropriate, robust and heroic, which segues into a lyrical, romantic theme. The training sequence opens with a playful, prancing, light-hearted cue that graduates into a theme with undercurrents of "Pomp and Circumstance," evoking a spirit of achievement in the groves of education, before it finally takes an abrupt, darkening turn with the arrival of Iphitos. For the flashback sequence, Masetti scores Iole's extended flashback with the earlier playful theme, which darkens more prominently with the encounter with the condemned man, and gives way to scintillating finger-cymbals as she strokes the Golden Fleece, emphasizing her recollection that it was a magical object that seemed to respond and vibrate to the touch. Masetti also contributed a piece of vocal music to the film, a fine heroic song sung by Orpheus and the other Argonauts to help pace their rowing. The music, mostly of a noble and adventuresome character, softens dramatically for the sequences among the Amazons, with avian flutes flying high over an underwash of orchestra that sometimes churns and eddies, as if lending voice to the sailors' emotional confusion and temptation. There is also a sprightly piccolo theme, usually accompanying the elderly sailor Esculapeus, which helps to accent his contributions of spry humor to the storyline. On the whole, it's a remarkably colorful and well-rounded score, with one or two unforgettable themes, which perfectly reflects and enhances the personalities of its characters. The only musical misstep in the picture is the reprisal of the aforementioned "prancing, lighthearted" cue immediately following the death of Chiron, as Hercules and Jason ride to Jolco, which trivializes the gravity of what has just occurred—but this was Francisci's misstep, not Masetti's.

Masetti was likewise not responsible for the addition of various electronic sound effects, which were used to underscore—and overstate—the heroic feats of Hercules and also various moments of supernatural currency, like the appearance of the Cretan Bull, or the moment when Hercules notices that Jason has fulfilled the Sibyl's prophecy by losing his sandal. (When Hercules throws the discus, it really sounds like a flying saucer!) These electronic cues, similar to the "space-age" music composed for Fred M. Wilcox's Forbidden Planet (1956), were library tracks that found their way into several other films, and in fact were later used to entirely rescore Bava's Planet of the Vampires (the American International recut of Terrore nello spazio, 1965).

Release

When Le fatiche di Ercole was released in Rome in the early months of 1958, it grossed 887.5 million lire [$553,000]—an almost unheard-of success for an Italian picture, though still not quite in the same league as Gina Lollobrigida's La donne più bella del mondo. But Francisci's humble epic had a greater destiny in store on the world market, whereas La Lollo's film had failed to achieve global success.

That destiny began to be fulfilled in 1959 when the film's success in Italy was repeated resoundingly in France and Germany, attracting the interest of American film distributor–independent producer Joseph E. Levine (1905–87). Born in Boston, Massachusetts, Levine had worked his way up the social ladder from shoeshine boy to dress manufacturer to restauranteur, before finally settling into the film distribution business in the 1940s. He ran a successful Boston-based distribution office that booked films into theaters on behalf of many different independent companies, including James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff's American Releasing Corporation, which later became American International Pictures. In 1955, Levine took a gamble by purchasing the US theatrical rights to Toho's Gojira (1954) for $25,000. The art of motion picture dubbing was then still in its infancy, especially where Japanese films were concerned, so an ingenious scheme was hatched to make the film playable for American audiences. Working with writer–editor–director Terry O. Morse (1906–84), Levine and co-producer Richard Kay bankrolled the filming of a fair amount of replacement footage featuring Raymond Burr (prior to the success of Perry Mason) as American news correspondent Steve Martin, who is shown almost seamlessly interacting with Japanese co-stars he never met and commenting on the eponymous creature's devastation of Tokyo. The re-edited film, titled Godzilla—King of the Monsters!, was distributed by TransWorld Corporation in 1956. It was a success, but it was not until after the advent of the film called Hercules that Levine adopted his personal catch-phrase, "And the rest is history."

By early 1959, Le fatiche di Ercole was well on its way to becoming the most successful film of the year. According to Steve Reeves: "In Calcutta, India, it played four showings a day, 365 days a year, for two years. It was also a huge success in Japan and throughout Asia. I had no idea; if I would have had that knowledge, I would have cashed-in on it. I would have gone to Japan and done commercials like Stallone and those guys do today." [14]

THIS FULL-COLOR magazine ad was one of many placed by Joseph E. Levine in his massive promotional campaign for HERCULES.

Observing the film's popularity, Levine resolved to buy the rights for all of North America, but Nello Santi's asking price was too high. Instead, he worked out an acceptable deal for the US distribution rights only, for which he paid $125,000. "I had no misgivings about Hercules," Levine told Esquire magazine. "It had something for everybody. It had a dragon for kids, muscle men for the growing boys; a shipwreck scene for waiters and clerks, and a guy tearing a goddamn building apart! Who doesn't dream of getting stuck on some island with some broads? And where do you ever see a guy with a body like Reeves has?" [15]

Levine staked his faith in the picture on the gamble of his life, spending an unprecedented $1,200,000 on publicity—advertisements (many of them full page and color) were placed in more than 130 different publications, and blocks of television advertising time were bought, saturating the airwaves with eight different TV spots, promoting Hercules in all its aspects of fantasy, adventure, romance, and spear-bending strength. The film opened simultaneously on 600 American screens in the summer of 1959, and when the dust settled, Levine had grossed over $4,000,000 on his investment.

"Definitely, Levine made more money off my films than anybody," said Reeves, who pocketed only his initial salaries from the two Hercules films. "Other people made money also, but Levine made more money than anyone else on the first two films. I made very little money." [16] Reeves' entire salary for the film was $10,000—half up front, the other half at the end of the shoot. Levine spent four times as much on a single promotional luncheon for the film's exhibitors, held at New York's Waldorf Astoria Hotel.

Ivo Garrani remains thunderstruck by the film's popularity to this day. "Ercole was just a job for me," he admits. "I had no idea of the international success that those movies would have eventually, while I was shooting them. When I was told about the American success of the movie, I heard that it was due to a comedy-styled dubbing!"

Variants

Because of Joseph E. Levine, two different English versions of Hercules exist. When he bought the film for America, it was equipped with an English soundtrack prepared in Rome by the English Language Dubbers Association (ELDA), with veteran radio actor Brett Morrison (1912–78, best-known for playing the role of Lamont Cranston/The Shadow from 1945–54) providing the voice of Hercules—and several other voices besides. Though limited in variety and timber, the dialogue had a certain literary quality that was perhaps truer to the musical complexity of the Italian dialogue, but little care was taken to match it to the lip movements of the actors.

When Levine bought the American rights, he found this soundtrack unacceptable, claiming that the crash was always heard 10 seconds after something fell. He had the film entirely redubbed at a company that would play an increasingly important role in the Americanization of Italian popular cinema: Titra Sound Corporation, located on the fourth floor at 1600 Broadway in New York City.

"It was owned by two men whose first names I'm unsure of, as we always addressed them as 'Mr. Opachinsky' and 'Mr. Rozenfeld,'" notes voice actor Peter Fernandez, who did extensive dubbing, script writing and—later—directing for the company. "They were both from Europe. Mr. Rozenfeld's son Steve sort of managed the studio part of the operation."

12 Ibid.

13 This quote appears in slightly different form in the Warner Bros. pressbook for Hercules Unchained, and it has the ring of authenticity. I have made some minor adjustments to what appears to have been an awkward translation from the Italian.

14 George Helmer, "Steve Reeves Speaks!" Cult Movies 18, 1996, 44–45.

15 Esquire 326, January 1961.

16 Helmer.

Titra wasn't the first company to specialize in recording English dub tracks for foreign films, but they became the pre-eminent one, giving employment to actors who found themselves out-of-work due to the decline of radio, or because of Senator Joseph McCarthy's blacklist. Directing the new soundtrack was George Gonneau (1924–97), a deep-voiced American actor who also took over the role of Hercules. His virile timber was so ideally matched to Reeves' ripe physique (and also somewhat true to Reeves' own voice) that Gonneau would provide his voice in many later films, as well. The former voice of Hercules, Brett Morrison, had by this time relocated to New York City and took the role of King Pelias, while the evil Eurysteus was voiced by that unmistakable star of radio, advertisements and cartoons, Paul Frees.

Peter Fernandez describes the setup at Titra: "In the beginning there were two studios and a small complex of offices, all on the fourth floor at 1600 Broadway. The smaller of the two studios was strictly for dubbing. The larger studio was used for final mixing of the converted films, and when that was not being done, was also available for dubbing. Additional studios were added later, one on the fifth floor of 1600 and one, a small one, on the second floor. Once a dubbing script was written and cued for loops, auditions would be held for the principal roles, with no more than three actors considered for each role. Often an audition was unnecessary, if the client (a distributor or his representative) kept a hands-off policy and just wanted the job done. Casting was left up to the dubbing director. The principal voice actors would work alone. When their roles were completed, a handful of other actors would be called in for a day or two's work. Then there would be a 'crowd day' where as many as a dozen actors would fill-in the very minor parts and all of the background ad-libs. A film would take from 5–12 days to be dubbed, depending on its complexity and amount of dialogue. Seldom did an actor work on more than one film in a day, but sometimes there were night sessions. A work day, without overtime, was from 9:30 to 5:30 with a one-hour lunch break. One's brain was scrambled at the end of a day."

FRENCH reissue affiche, circa 1960s.

In the case of Hercules, an English copy of the shooting script was used to rerecord the dialogue as it had originally been spoken on camera. Reeves had spoken his own lines in English, of course, as did his co-stars (either naturally or phonetically) while sharing scenes with him. Whenever Reeves was not onscreen, as during the love scenes between Jason and Antea, the actors played their scenes in Italian. There are some imperfections, naturally, caused when the actors onscreen substituted words or stumbled over their lines, but on the whole, the Titra redub of Hercules is more flattering to the film; its improved matching of words and lip movements restore the performances to their correct register and make them easier to appreciate and enjoy.

The two versions are immediately distinguished by their main titles. The ELDA dub (which runs 104:09) opens with a thorough presentation of credits, in white letters on a red background bordered with Grecian-style illustrations of Hercules' various labors. The Titra redub (103:11) opens with an animated title sequence of the eponymous constellation, a lightning bolt, and very, very few credits (no mention of Mario Bava, for example). To illustrate the difference between these two versions, here is the first dialogue scene between Hercules and Iole, after he rescues her from the runaway chariot. First, the English dialogue as it is heard in the ELDA dub:

IOLE
I thank you. And I thank the Gods for having brought you here today, and for saving me.

HERCULES
I must admit I was frightened for you, watching those runaway horses. How do you feel?

IOLE
[Rising] Better! [Falters] I'm still trembling, I guess . . . [Looks at Hercules] What's the matter? Why do you sit and stare at me like that?

HERCULES
I don't know. So few women come this way.

IOLE
And so?

HERCULES
As long as you're here, I might as well. I've never seen a girl more beautiful.

IOLE
Oh . . .

HERCULES
I've come a long way. Seeing you was worth it!

IOLE
How simple men are—as if I were a plant or an animal! And still, I thank you, you know.

HERCULES
I'm telling the truth; don't thank me for it.

And now the same scene, as it was revoiced at Titra:

IOLE
Thank you! And I thank the Gods for providing me with such a strong man when I needed him!

HERCULES
I'll admit that the sight of those runaway horses had me worried about you. Are you all right?

IOLE
[Rising] Better! [Falters] Ohhh . . . My legs are still quite weak! [Looks at Hercules] Why do you stare at me? Is it so strange that a girl couldn't manage those horses?

HERCULES
Not in the least! I doubt if anyone could have controlled them.

IOLE
Then why stare?

HERCULES
I was looking at you. It's very difficult to find a girl as beautiful as you are.

IOLE
Oh. You say it so very simply—as if you were speaking of a plant or an animal. I almost think you're sincere!

HERCULES
I am sincere. I always speak the truth.

While the more literate qualities of the original dub cannot be discerned from this sample, this comparison does illustrate how well the Titra redub worked to emphasize traits of character in both Hercules and Iole, and made their rapport less stilted and more conversational. Hercules being an unemotional immortal, the earlier dub's characterization of him as "frightened" doesn't quite jibe, nor does it flatter him. Likewise, in contrast to the earlier dub's presentation of Iole as a dizzy girl grateful for compliments, the redub brings out her fire ("Is it so strange that a girl couldn't manage those horses?"), and she responds to Hercules' earnest appreciation of her beauty by teasing his sincerity. Even more impressive about the Titra dub is how well the rewritten English dialogue matches the lip movements of Sylva Koscina because, according to Reeves, the actress (who later learned to speak English quite well) spoke her lines on the set entirely in Italian. One would never guess this from the evidence onscreen.

Unfortunately, while preparing his version of Hercules, Levine failed to include his copyright notice in the animated title sequence, and the film fell into public domain in America after his death.

When Hercules and Hercules Unchained were reissued to American theaters in 1975 as a double feature, new 35 mm anamorphic prints were struck—from the negatives of the original ELDA dub. When the films were given their first home video release by Embassy in 1985, after Levine's retirement from the company, it was this original, imperfect dub of Hercules that found its way back into release. The Titra redub was legally available to any company with a presentable print, and it turned up on video a few years later, courtesy of VidAmerica. When VidAmerica and Image Entertainment joined forces to release Hercules as a widescreen LaserDisc—following the dissolution of Embassy Pictures in the late 1980s—the uncopyrighted, badly cropped, animated title sequence (evidently derived from a scratchy, warbly, 16 mm source) was combined with a sterling, letterboxed presentation of the ELDA dub, resulting in a third variant.

STEVE REEVES demonstrates the gulf between reality and publicity while vacationing in France, 1958.

Reverberations

"Pietro Francisci saved the Italian cinema with Le fatiche di Ercole, but nobody gives him credit for anything," Mario Bava later said, showing commendable loyalty. "Once the Americans saw it, they ordered 600 prints—30 for Chicago alone—and we had only 30 prints to our name!" [17]

When Bava claimed that Francisci "saved the Italian cinema" with Le fatiche di Ercole, he wasn't only speaking in terms of its commercial rewards. True, in terms of worldwide revenues, it became one of the most commercially successful Italian films of all time, earning more than $5,000,000 in the United States alone in its first release. Originally distributed by Warner Bros., Hercules would be subsequently reissued in America in 1964 by Levine's own company Embassy Pictures on a double bill with its sequel Hercules Unchained; and, as mentioned earlier, it was reissued again by Avco-Embassy in 1975—each time generating millions of new dollars. But most of that new money went to Levine.

Hercules brought an heroic end to the struggles of the Italian cinema by opening the floodgates to an endless number of cheaply made, highly profitable imitation films—"pepla," as the French critics called them, referring to the short, pleat-skirted adornments favored by their heroes. Hercules pushed the first domino in a chain that would allow the Italian cinema to survive, even thrive, well into the mid-1960s.

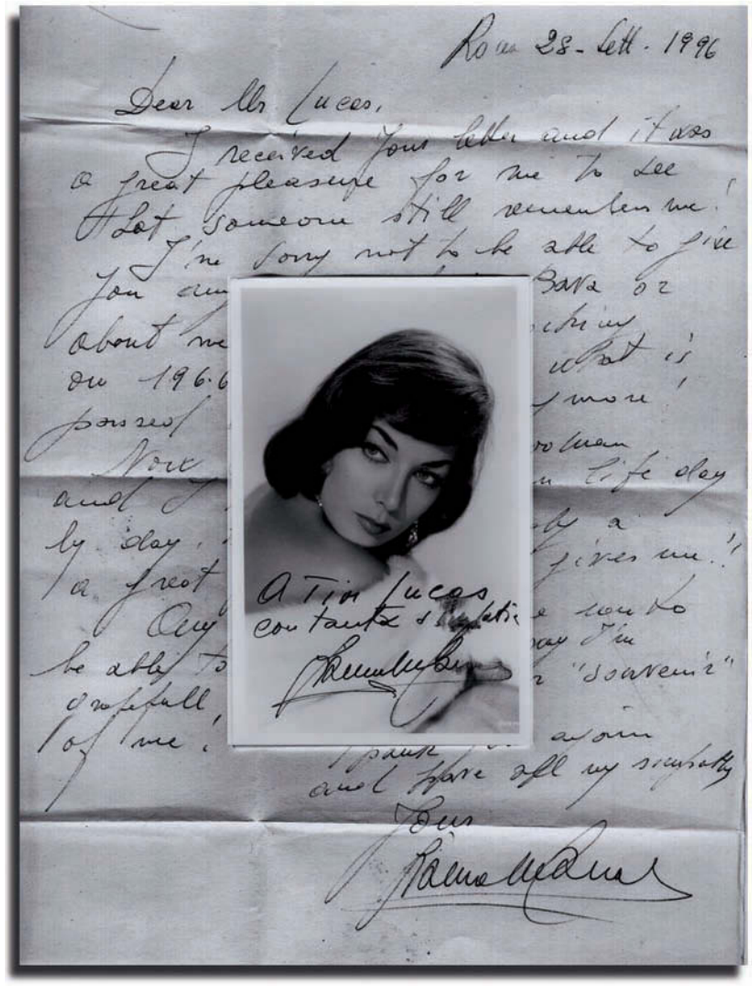
The film's success soon attracted other kinds of producers and productions to Italy. "Soon the Americans understood that it behooved them to come here and make films for a quarter of what it cost back there," Bava reflected. "Such were the fortunes of the Italian cinema for the next fifteen years so that, in that period, thousands of people—stagehands, technicians, and actors—found steady work." [18]

In time, Le fatiche di Ercole began to be knocked by critics who conveniently lumped it together with all the pepla of increasing strangeness and decreasing quality that followed. But the colossal success of Hercules was not entirely due to Joseph E. Levine's inescapable showmanship; he was also selling one hell of a product. Forty years after its initial release, it's unimaginable that anyone could fail to appreciate the picture's style and polish and charm, or the fact that it puts considerably more than its meager budget onscreen. It is the definitive peplum, and Steve Reeves is the genre's definitive hero, and arguably one of the last actors of his generation to achieve the kind of "matinee idol" stardom that was falling out of favor in Hollywood and becoming the 20th century equivalent of myth.

Reeves may have been lifting hollow trees and bending rubber spears, but there was so much about his screen persona that clearly wasn't (and couldn't be) faked, that he had a unique and unmatchable quality as a screen hero. Women swooned as he extended his arms in widescreen supplication to Jupiter, and he also impressed a whole generation of children in ways that would have a far-reaching effect.

Interviewed by Playboy, Sylvester Stallone later reflected: "I remember seeing things like On the Waterfront and I'd always end up in a deep snore. But one day I saw Steve Reeves in Hercules and I thought, 'Hey, it's one thing for Brando to stand up to the union, but this weirdo with the beard and the big calves can pull down a temple all by himself. He's able to take on the entire Roman army using only the jawbone of an idiot, and I'd like to do that too!" [19]

Lou Ferrigno, who followed Reeves in the role of Hercules in a 1983 film directed by Luigi Cozzi, experienced a similar epiphany: "Steve Reeves was my childhood idol. I was terribly lonely and didn't have any friends. Watching films like Hercules was an escape for me. I longed to be just like him, and I used to sit for hours watching Steve Reeves play



17 Abruzzese.

18 Ibid.

19 "The Playboy Interview: Sylvester Stallone," Playboy, September 1978.

[Hercules] on the screen. I started bodybuilding when I was 16 years old, because Reeves was a bodybuilder before he became an actor, and I wanted to be just like him. After emulating my hero, I became more self-confident . . . I was transformed from a skinny, lonely kid with a huge inferiority complex into a mature man with muscles and an acting career."

Reeves, of course, was only the nucleus of this transformative spark. He appeared in many competitions, many magazines, and many other films—sometimes with a more accentuated, fine-tuned physique, and sometimes in better-scripted pictures—but he would never equal the same inspirational effect that he would achieve in Le fatiche di Ercole. Certainly Pietro Francisci deserves credit for conceiving the film and co-scripting its highlights, but the co-author (with Reeves) of the images that define Hercules in the collective consciousness of our culture was Mario Bava. Without his peerless eye for phantasmagorical color and epic imagery, Le fatiche di Ercole might well have gone as unnoted by history as . . . Athena. Deep-down, Reeves (who remembered Bava as "a great cameraman and good for special effects")[20] must have understood this, because he kept Bava professionally close to him for as long as possible.

Roma 28-Sett.-1996

Dear Mr Lucas,

I received your letter and it was a great pleasure for me to see that someone still remembers me!

I'm sorry not to be able to give you any news of Mr. Bava or about me. I stopped working in 1966 and, for me, what is passed doesn't exist any more!

Now I am an old woman and I try to go on in life day by day, which is already a great gift that God gives me!

Anyway, forgive me for not being able to help you . . . I am grateful to you for your 'souvenirs' of me! Thank you again, and have all my sympathy.

Yours,

Gianna Maria Canale.

SIGNED PHOTO and letter to the author from Gianna Maria Canale.

Le fatiche di Ercole marked the last collaboration—at least the last official collaboration—of Mario Bava and Gianna Maria Canale. One of the most beautiful stars of the Italian cinema, Canale could almost have been the Galatea for which Lionello Santi's production company was later named; she would appear in a number of their pictures. In the hands of her Svengali, Riccardo Freda, she had risen to starring roles almost overnight, and by the time of I vampiri, she had known the pleasure of seeing her name above the title. But she separated from Freda in 1959 and apparently retired from the screen in 1964, never to be heard from again.

There were published reports that her retirement was forced by an automobile accident that left her partially disfigured, but these are disproved by the testimony of producer Alfredo Leone. According to Leone, Canale was still a striking beauty when she and Freda, and their daughter Jacqueline (nicknamed "Rusty" for her auburn hair), invited him to join them for dinner at a Spanish restaurant in the early 1970s.

"Ah, she was beautiful," Leone marvels at the memory of Canale, more than thirty years later. "They were separated, I guess, but still friendly. I'll never forget, she came to the table wearing a see-through blouse—without a bra. Freda seated her across the table from me—directly in my line of vision, you know?—and he spent the whole dinner watching me like a hawk, daring me to take even one look at her! But how could you help it? They had an 8-year-old daughter, Rusty, whom they raised as a boy. She was an equestrienne, I remember; had a lot of talent in that area—a beautiful little girl too, with hair like her mother's. But they raised her as a boy, dressed her like a boy. I'd ask him, 'Riccardo, why do you treat this beautiful little girl like a boy?' He turned to her and said, 'Tell him, Rusty: Are you a boy or a girl?' And she would answer, 'I'm a boy!' On another occasion, I visited one of Freda's sets, when he was filming in Spain, and he actually let his daughter direct! He hated actors; he would turn his back to them during a take. He was this terrible authority figure on the set, showing everyone this great contempt, but then Gianna Maria would come to the set and slap him right across the face!"

While researching this book, I was able to trace Gianna Maria Canale to an address in Rome. I wrote to her, requesting an interview about her years as Italy's reigning Queen of High Drama. Some time later, after enough time had passed for me to forget that I was awaiting a reply, I received the following letter, handwritten in red ink, dated September 28, 1996:

"Dear Mr. Lucas,

I received your letter and it was a great pleasure for me to see that someone still remembers me!

I'm sorry not to be able to give you any news of Mr. Bava or about me. I stopped working in 1966 and, for me, what is passed doesn't exist any more!

Now I am an old woman and I try to go on in life day by day, which is already a great gift that God gives me!

Anyway, forgive me for not being able to help you . . . I am grateful to you for your 'souvenirs' of me! Thank you again, and have all my sympathy.

Yours,

Gianna Maria Canale."

Città di notte

First released: March 6, 1958
B&W, 1.66:1, 110 minutes

Production: Trionfalcine. Distributor: Titanus. Germany: Ein Mädchen aus Rom, "A Girl From Rome," German TV, 9/11/62.

The Golden Age of Italian Fantasy had begun, but the general public had yet to realize it. I vampiri had not been a commercial success, and Le fatiche di Ercole was taking shape in the cutting room of Mario Serandrei. In the meantime, the popular essence of the Italian cinema was composed of the genres which had taken root in the postwar years: neorealism and romantic melodrama. Bava's next film as a cameraman would represent a vacation of sorts from the realms of horror and mythology, but like Natale al campo 119 and Il viale della speranza, it would be a neorealistic study of people's lives as lived on the plane of dreams.

On two of the films which Bava had photographed for director Giorgio Bianchi earlier in the decade, the assistant director had been Leopoldo Trieste (1917–2003), a young writer whose charismatic personality had led to acting roles in Lo sceicco bianco/ The White Sheik (1952) and I vitelloni (1953) for his friend, Federico Fellini.[21] Bava's next invitation to work came from Trieste, who was about to direct his first feature film for Trionfalcine producer Giovanni Addessi. Partly in response to what he could see happening in America, with a new generation of young stars like Marlon Brando, James Dean, Natalie Wood and Sandra Dee staking out their territory onscreen and winning international stardom, Trieste had the hope of inspiring renewed interest among young Italian moviegoers in their national cinema by making a film that more specifically addressed their obstacles and frustrations, as well as their ambitions, a film set in a town they would recognize as their own.

20 Helmer.

21 Leopoldo Trieste also appeared, years later, as the ill-fated entomologist Paolo Fosatti in Bava's Ecologia del delitto/A Bay of Blood (1971).

22 Fábio Vellozo, email to the author, January 6, 2006.

Based on Trieste's original story and screenplay, Città di notte ("City of Night") is the story of a group of young existentialists determined to break into the world of theater—not so much out of personal ambition or talent, but to win independence from their parents, who are inattentive or indifferent to them when not being openly antagonistic. Not all of the picture's "new faces" went on to a lasting career in the cinema. One exception was Antonio De Teffé (1929–2004), who starred in many Italian and Spanish horror films, Westerns, and thrillers during the 1960s and '70s under the pseudonym "Anthony Steffen."

Interviewed by Brazilian journalist Fábio Vellozo, De Teffé remembered Bava as "simpatico, molto simpatico," and spoke with enthusiasm about his facility with the camera and how Bava—unlike the nervous Trieste—would tell jokes all the time to calm the rather unexperienced cast and keep the mood on the set light. Vellozo also made a point of asking De Teffé if Bava ever took over the direction of certain scenes for Leopoldo Trieste, as he had done for many other directors. The actor's response was "Probably, yes." Vellozo stressed to me, while offering these quotes, that De Teffé's fond remarks about Bava were "incredible, as he wasn't very keen on making compliments."[22]

MARIO BAVA photographs a theater audience watching a performance by the young leads of CITTÀ DI NOTTE.

PATRIZIA BINI is scolded by Antonio De Teffè in CITTÀ DI NOTTE, Leopoldo Trieste's drama of Italian youth aiming for success on stage.

Corrado Bartoloni remembers Leopoldo Trieste as a perfectionist: "We had to shoot 12–13 takes of every scene; everything had to be just right. For this movie, Bava invented a round light that fit onto the camera, in order to take away all the shadows, even when the camera dollied. Anyway, the movie was not a success . . ."

Indeed, Trieste's directorial debut fared poorly at the Italian boxoffice, earning only 31 million lire [$19,300]. He would direct only one other feature (1959's Il peccato degli anni verdi with Alida Valli and Sergio Fantoni) before turning exclusively to acting. Though Città di notte was seen by relatively few people and is quite difficult to see today, it is said to have been the most decisive influence on the film then taking shape in Fellini's mind: the epoch-making La dolce vita (1960).

Though Bava likely accepted this assignment with the notion that it was a "serious" picture of some probable consequence, unlike his other recent jobs, and thus probably a good career movie, the inverse proved to be true. The classy Città di notte was destined to become a footnote in his career of demigods and monsters, while his next film, another descent into the pulp pits and not a particularly good one, would introduce an entirely new genre of Roman filmmaking. Mario Bava was about to launch the Italian science fiction film.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by A. Biffignandi (Studio Favalli).

LA MORTE VIENE DALLO SPAZIO

The Day the Sky Exploded

LIKE STEVE REEVES, Mario Bava was rewarded for his work on Le fatiche di Ercole with a simple paycheck. There would be no future dividends from its success, only the possibility that its popularity would bring him more opportunities to work. At this stage of his career, however, Bava's range of talents was already so well-known within the industry that he was always working, always in demand—it was the Italian cinema itself that continued to inhabit a twilight of uncertainty.

In late 1957 and early 1958, Pietro Francisci's Hercules film was being shaped in the editing room by Mario Serandrei, still six months away from its world-shaking success. Likewise, I vampiri's disappointing performance at the Italian boxoffice had not resulted in a demand for imitations; the horror genre remained as moribund in Italy as it had always been. It was an in-between time when Italian production companies were scrambling madly about looking for the next escapist trend.

Strange as it may seem, in 1958—more than half a century since Georges Méliès took movie audiences on their first trip to the moon—the Italian cinema had yet to produce a science fiction film.[1] William Cameron Menzies' 1953 film Invaders From Mars had not been released in Rome until 1957, when the retitled Gli invasori spaziali ("The Space Invaders") met with considerable success. Consequently, Italian screens ran riot with such fabulous titles as Meteora infernale ("The Hellish Meteor"), Assalto della terra ("Assault on the Earth"), and La cosa da un altro mondo—or, as they are better known in their native America, It Came From Outer Space (1953), Them! (1954), and The Thing From Another World (1951). It was also in September of that year that the first Italian science fiction journal, Oltre il Cielo, published its premiere issue. And so it was that, in the midst of this explosion of newfound Italian interest in science fiction subjects, Mario Bava came to make a desperate little movie entitled La morte viene dallo spazio.

MISSION Control at Cape Shark.

Synopsis

In response to Russia's 1957 launching of the Sputnik satellite, the world's first manned space flight is quickly mounted at Cape Shark. From a pool of candidates from different world countries, American pilot John MacLaren is chosen to become the first man in space.[2] The object of his six-day mission is to orbit the moon, while attended by twenty-five monitoring stations around the world. After a tearful separation from his wife Mary ("We'll be in different worlds, John") and young son Dennis, MacLaren climbs aboard his X-Z rocket and blasts off at 3:00 a.m. After exiting the Earth's atmosphere, something strange occurs inside John's capsule: unknown forces interfere with the astronaut's consciousness. The scientists at Mission Control, beginning to lose visual contact, advise him to eject. He does so, but on his own initiative—he has already lost contact with Earth. Unfortunately, in his disoriented state, MacLaren ejects before defusing the rocket's atomic power source, which has left the equivalent of an atomic bomb speeding out into space toward a collision with . . . what?

Shortly after John's successful return to Earth, the deadly answer becomes apparent. The rocket has exploded in a belt of asteroids, fusing them together into one great mass that is now hurtling towards planet Earth! Animals of all kinds, wild and domestic (including Mission Control's mascot, a dog named Geiger), begin to run in migratory packs. A large sphere appears in the sky, surrounded by a gigantic halo, in the hours before sundown. In time, other bright spheres are manifest in the sky. As the time of ultimate collision draws near, the governments of the world force their populations into subterranean shelters . . . but the intense heat of the nearing threat creates spontaneous combustions that force the hysterical masses to spill back into the streets.

After tussling with guilt over starting the whole mess, John conceives the notion of calculating the asteroid's coordinates and firing explosive missiles at it from various continents while it remains outside the Earth's atmosphere. One of the Mission Control scientists, Dr. Randowsky, is driven to religious zealotry under pressure and kills two of his colleagues, while spouting Holy Scripture. The missiles are fired and John's plan succeeds.

The asteroid mass is decimated.

Earth is saved.

Even Geiger comes home.[3]

La morte viene dallo spazio

"Death Comes From Outer Space"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
Early 1958
First released: September 4, 1958
B&W, 1.66:1, 82 minutes

Production: Royal Film, Lux Film (Rome), Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris). Producer: Guido Giambartolomei. Directors: Paolo Heusch, (uncredited) Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Franco Rosetti, Alain Roux. Screenplay: Marcello Coscia, Sandro Continenza, based on a story by Virgilio Sabel. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Corrado Bartoloni. Camera assistants: Uraldo [Ubaldo] Terzano, Luigi Giorgio. Art direction: Beni Montresor. Special effects: Mario Baja [Mario Bava], A.I.C. Makeup: Angelo Malandruco. Hairdresser: Ada Palombi. Production managers: Armando Morani, Ione Tuzi. Editor: Otello Colangeli. Music: Carlo Rustichelli, conducted by Pier Luigi Urbini. Sound: Alain Roux. Sound effects: Venanzio Biraschi, Oscar Archangelis, (uncredited) Carlo Rustichelli. Distributor: Lux Film.

Additional Credits: English dubbing: William De Lane Lea.

Paul Hubschmid (John MacLaren), Madeline Fischer (Katy Dandridge), Fiorelli Mari (Mary), Ivo Garrani (Herbert Weisser), Darrio [sic] Michaëlis (Peter LaDuc/Pierre LeDucq), Sam Galter (Randowsky), Jean-Jacques Delbo (Sergei Boetnikov), Peter Meersman (Gen. Wandorf), Massimo Zeppieri (Dennis), Giacomo Rossi-Stuart (Stewart), Mario Merlini, Anne Berval, Richard McNamara.

Belgium: Het Gavaar Komt Uitt de Ruimte
France: Le Danger vient de l'Espace, Lux Cinématographique, 7/15/59
UK: Death Comes From Outer Space, Archway Film Distribution Ltd., 1960
US: The Day the Sky Exploded, Excelsior Pictures Corporation, 9/27/61

Production

In some respects, La morte viene dallo spazio is a blatant copy of Hammer's feature-length adaptations of Nigel Kneale's celebrated "Quatermass" BBC teleplays: The Quatermass Xperiment/The Creeping Unknown (1955) and Quatermass 2/Enemy From Space (1957). The synopsis shows that screenwriters Marcello Coscia and Alessandro Continenza were familiar with both films; The Quatermass Xperiment told the story of the world's first manned space flight, focusing on an astronaut's metamorphosis into an alien species after his rocket returns to Earth following exposure to strange waves in space; its sequel, Quatermass 2 (to simplify its plot wildly) involved the threat of small missile-shaped meteors falling to Earth. The climax, in which Gérard Landry's Dr. Randowsky succumbs to a last-minute outburst of murderous, religious mania, is equally derivative, based on Walter Brooke's similar breakdown in Byron Haskin's George Pal production, Conquest of Space (1955).

These borrowings aside, La morte viene dallo spazio was also undertaken in the spirit of originality and opportunism. The film was also primarily motivated, as the synopsis immediately implies, by the international sense of crisis which followed the Russian launchings of Sputnik I and II (in October and November 1957, respectively) and that of the first American satellite, Explorer I (on January 31, 1958)—one of the first international crises to be felt around the world through the immediacy of live broadcast television. The same impetus inspired American producer–director Roger Corman to prep his own treatment of the theme, War of the Satellites, which began shooting on December 9, 1957. La morte viene dallo spazio went into production around the same time, and the role that television played in its conception is apparent from the very first scene, imitating a live newscast from "Cape Shark."

Whose idea it was to make this film remains a mystery, but since the script was based on a story by Virgilio Sabel, he is the most logical candidate. One of the leading directors of Italian documentary shorts during the postwar years, Sabel had previously worked with Mario Bava on some important occasions. He was the screenwriter of Arturo Gemmiti's Montecassino nel cerchio di fuoco (1946, Bava's first work as a cameraman after the war), but more importantly, he was the director of Una lezione di geometria ("A Lesson in Geometry"), a 1948 documentary which had showcased the full range of Bava's genius as a cameraman, special effects artist, and animator. This short had proved so popular that Sabel was prompted to make another short in the same mold, Una lezione di acustica ("A Lesson in Acoustics," 1951), but it is not known whether or not Bava also contributed to it; it certainly covered some of the same ground as Bava's own L'orrecchio (1946). With a science fiction idea in mind, Sabel certainly would have taken it to Bava before anyone else, because only he had the special effects know-how to determine whether or not such a concept was possible to film in Italy.

The film's principal screenwriter also had previous working experience with Bava and his closest professional allies. Alessandro "Sandro" Continenza (1920–96) was a prolific scenarist who had written principally for Totò, Steno, and Riccardo Freda. After contributing to three Totò scripts, working his way up from dialogue to story to screenplay credit, Continenza scripted La vendetta di Aquila Nera/Revenge of the Black Eagle (1951) for Freda and Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (1955) for Steno, which Bava photographed. At the time La morte viene dallo spazio was made, Continenza had recently scripted Agguato a Tangeri/Trapped in Tangiers (1957) for Freda; since we know that Freda and Bava were sharing confidences at this time, it is feasible that Freda could have recommended Continenza, had Bava mentioned his involvement in a production that was seeking a screenwriter. In the years following this film, Continenza wrote the Steno horror comedy Tempi duri per i vampiri (1959), numerous pepla in the early 1960s (including Bava's own Ercole al centro della terra, 1961), various spy and Spaghetti Western films of the later '60s, and some well-regarded Spanish exploitation items of the early 1970s, including Jorge Grau's Ceremonia Sangrienta/Legend of Blood Castle (1973) and No profanar nel sueño de los muertos/Let Sleeping Corpses Lie (1974). On many of these films, Continenza's writing partner was Marcello Coscia, who made his screenwriting debut with La morte viene dallo spazio.

Credited with the film's direction was Paolo Heusch (b. 1926, Rome), who had made his directorial debut the previous year with L'uomo facile ("A Simple Man," released 1958), a boxing drama starring Maurizio Arena. Heusch's varied career would continue with Lycanthropus (1961, credited to "Richard Benson" and released in the US and UK, respectively, as Werewolf in a Girl's Dormitory and I Married a Werewolf); a film of Pier Paolo Pasolini's novel Una vita violenta ("A Violent Life," 1962); the

JOHN MACLAREN (Paul Hubschmid, center) is summoned to become the first man in space.

1 In 1939, Mario Mattoli made a comedy entitled 1,000 chilometri al minuto ["1,000 Kilometers per Minute"], which featured scientists involved in early space research, but this aspect had little bearing on the actual plot.

2 The first man in space is generally accepted to be the Russian cosmonaut Yuri Alekseyevich Gagarin, who was launched into orbit around the Earth on April 12, 1961.

3 As film historian Tom Weaver noted upon reading this synopsis, "Heat belt, Earth threatened, religious nut, missles fired skyward to put out the fire . . . This is Voyage to the Bottom of the Sea (1961) to a T!"

A BAVA matte shot tracks the rocket as it leaves Earth's atmosphere.

Totò comedy Il Comandante ("The Commander," 1963); Una raffica di piombo ("A Shower of Lead," 1965), and others. Ernesto Gastaldi, the screenwriter of Lycanthropus, remembers Heusch in colorful terms: "Paolo was a very nice man . . . homosexual, very sweet, and fond of reclining on sofas in the same position as the famous portrait of Paolina Borghese—so everyone called him 'Paolina.' He was a diligent director." I have not been able to determine whether or not Paolo Heusch is still living; he has not directed a film since Un colpo da mille miliardi ("A Billion Dollar Heist," 1966).

However, according to cast member Ivo Garrani, "That movie [La morte viena dallo spazio] was completely directed by Bava. Really, Paolo Heusch didn't do very much on that set. I can say that I am in the three movies that launched all three of the genres of Italian fantastic cinema: La morte viene dallo spazio, Le fatiche di Ercole and La maschera del demonio—and they all owe their success to Mario Bava!"

Thus, while La maschera del demonio and even Caltiki il mostro immortale have been declared as Bava's first work as a director, that distinction—given Garrani's testimony—actually belongs to this movie, making Mario Bava the true father of Italian science fiction cinema. Bava's control over this picture was apparently well-known within the Italian film industry; when I referred to La maschera del demonio as Bava's directorial debut while interviewing production assistant Armando Govoni, he emphatically corrected me: "La maschera was not Bava's first film as a director; he had already directed a picture for Paolo Heusch."

It would appear, then, that Bava was always intended to serve as the film's actual director, with Heusch—a man of greater official experience in the position—hired to serve as a "beard" or a "front," because the production required the participation of a proven director to attract funding.

Cast & Crew

Cast in the lead role of astronaut John MacLaren was Swiss-born actor Paul Hubschmid. Born in Schoenenwerd in 1917, Hubschmid was active in Swiss and German films since 1938; he enjoyed a moderate success in Hollywood films in the late 1940s and early 1950s under the name Paul Christian, starring in one of the key science fiction films of that period, The Beast From 20,000 Fathoms (1953). Under his own name, Hubschmid was subsequently featured as the lead in Fritz Lang's Indian diptych, The Tiger of Eschnapur and The Indian Tomb (1959), and he made a rare return to American films in 1970's Skullduggery. He retired from acting in 1992. He and his ex-wife, actress Eva Renzi (the co-star of Dario Argento's L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage, 1970), are the parents of actress Anouschka Renzi. Hubschmid later remarried to Swiss actress Irene Scheisser. He died on December 31, 2001 of a pulmonary embolism.

HERBERT WEISSER (Ivo Garrani, center) stays in communication with MacLaren as his rocket penetrates the veil of space.

INTRIGUINGLY designed fotobuste from the Italian release.

BELGIAN affiche, art by Georges Allard.

Familiar from earlier work with Bava are the aforementioned Ivo Garrani (his only contemporary role in a Bava film) and Dario Michaëlis, the Argentinian actor who had played the dashing young hero of I vampiri, seen here with his natural, darker hair color.

La morte viene dallo spazio was also the first of several Bava films to feature British-Italian actor Giacomo Rossi-Stuart. Born August 25, 1931, the handsome, jut-jawed Rossi-Stuart entered the cinema through modelling and appearances in fotoromanzi publications. Prior to this screen appearance, he had small roles in Roy Ward Baker's Morning Departure (1950, a veritable remake of Francesco De Robertis' Uomini sul fondo, about the attempts to rescue a manned submarine trapped on the ocean floor), King Vidor's War and Peace (1956), and William Fairchild's war drama The Silent Enemy (1958).

The most complete cast listings for this film also include the name of Richard McNamara, who would later establish himself as one of the pre-eminent Rome-based directors of English-dubbed film soundtracks. It's anyone's guess which character he plays, or if he appears only as a voice on the dubbed soundtrack. The English version of this film, The Day the Sky Exploded, was not dubbed at Titra in America and the difference in quality is sometimes painful to hear. For example, the apocalyptic crowd scenes of the film's climax are made risible by a recurring tape loop of a woman's panicked cry of "My baby! My baby!"

US half-sheet.

La morte viene dallo spazio also marked Bava's second and final collaboration with the gifted young art director of I vampiri, Beni Montresor. Montresor would continue to work intermittently in motion pictures as an art director, but in 1961, he launched a successful second career as an award-winning illustrator (and sometimes author) of children's books. Among his books are House of Flowers House of Stars, Bedtime! (the story of a child who must learn to cope with his nighttime fears), and a collection of Neapolitan fairy tales. In 1965, his illustrations for Beatrice Schenk de Regnier's book May I Bring a Friend? were awarded the prestigious Caldecott Medal. In the 1970s, he wrote and directed two independent features: Pilgrimage (1972, starring Cliff De Young) and La messe dorée/The Golden Mass (1975, starring Lucia Bosé). In later years, Montresor ascended to outstanding acclaim in the world of opera—directing (and also designing sets and costumes for) countless productions at La Scala, the New York Metropolitan Opera, and other famous theaters throughout the world. He died on October 11, 2001 at the age of 75.

Photography & Special Effects

Bava's true status as director of La morte viene dallo spazio should be obvious to anyone who sees it. If we subtract its stock footage and special effects sequences, there is very little is left to support Heusch's signature—just the melodramatic dialogue scenes, most of which take place in a claustrophobic control room barely large enough to accommodate ten people, and an impoverished exterior scene of a group of the same thirty people running repeatedly through a single alley. Bava's moody, chiaroscuro lighting notwithstanding, these dramatic scenes are pretty miserable, borrowing every possible cliché from American romance pictures to prod the story along; in the worst case, Peter makes a bet that he can thaw frigid co-worker Katie with a kiss within six days, not realizing that she has overheard the bet on the office intercom, seriously complicating their genuine feelings for one another. ("You know something," he purrs to her, "when you're not immersed in mathematics, Katie, the metamorphosis is staggering!")

Bava was not only the cameraman and special effects designer, but he was also responsible for the film's most impressive achievement: the manipulation of existing newsreel footage to tell the story of an imminent global catastrophe that never took place—a task very much akin to the fake WWII newsreels he had concocted with his father at the Istituto LUCE. Nearly 60% of La morte viene dallo spazio consists of stock footage documenting dozens of completely unrelated events, originating from different time frames and countries: shots of Jeeps, mobilized troops, control towers, revolving antennae, rockets, technicians from various countries pushing buttons and speaking into microphones, explosions, animal migrations, elephant stampedes, gigantic blazes, and endless shots of test missile launches—Atlases, Little Joes, Thors, Redstones, and Vanguards. The material was expertly edited together by Bava and Otello Colangeli. [4]

Michael Lennick, a Canadian special effects designer and producer–director of the Discovery Channel series Rocket Science, comments on this stock footage: "Most of those early launches tended to blow up on the pad or shortly after liftoff—especially the Vanguards, the tall, skinny, dark rockets that figure so prominently here. It was a Vanguard that blew up quite spectacularly on live TV in late 1957, during the US attempt to match Sputnik. (That was also the first live launch—well, near-launch—I ever saw. It could only go up, so to speak, from there.) And the Atlas? Don't even talk about the Atlas. The first US intercontinental missile, and the first one to be man-rated for orbital missions, the Atlas suffered something like fourteen catastrophic failures in twenty test launches, including one during which the first guy to ride one, John Glenn, was in the viewing stand along with the other Mercury astronauts. In other words, I've never seen so many stock shots of the very few successful launches—especially the Vanguards—collected in one place. Cool and ironic."

The anonymous critic for Britain's Monthly Film Bulletin was so impressed by the film's utilization of found footage that he hailed Death Comes From Outer Space (the literal British release title) as "the stock-shot film par excellence."

The special effects Bava created for the film are modest, but nevertheless impressive, especially in contrast with the shoddy production values that glower from the film's non-illusory passages. Bava executed a number of glass shots for the film, including one of Moscow (using a minaret clipped from the pages of National Geographic), the "Mt. Hula" observatory (a massive telescope clipped from Popular Science), and various shots of the X-Z in flight.

The blast-off sequence was achieved with almost pathetic simplicity: a stationary shot of the rocket (another magazine clipping glass matte) was overlapped with a strobing semi-sphere of light via double-exposure. After a cutaway to a reaction shot of the Mission Control scientists, the same shot of the rocket was combined with a billowing smoke effect conjured by pouring a bucket of white leaded powder into an aquarium.

To place the "large sphere surrounded by a massive halo" in the skies over various cities, Bava simply projected slides of world landmarks onto an opaque silk screen, with a brute light positioned behind it. The frightening asteroid mass that terrorizes Earth appears to have been nothing more threatening than a large sponge, with chunks torn out, silhouetted with backlighting. The truly impressive climactic scene—in which the threat is destroyed in space by the orchestrated bombardment of dozens of missiles—was achieved by overlaying a shot of the "asteroid" with multiple exposures. Bava took the footage of this shot, wound it back in his father's Mitchell camera (his preferred camera for effects shooting because it was "rock steady"), and shot numerous additional exposures of backyard/homemade rocket models (probably as few as one to three at a time, for greater control) launched on an arc away from the camera. By photographing the trajectories of these homemade missiles against a black surface, only the trails of their exhaust were picked up by the camera. The resulting spectacle resembles nothing less than the moment of conception, and it is most impressive when viewed on a big screen.

RANDOWSKY (Gérard Landry) and Maclaren attend the death of Weisser (Ivo Garrani).

Music

The film's urgent and progressive score, which utilized acoustic and electronic instruments as well as electric non-musical devices used to musical and ambient ends, was the work of composer Carlo Rustichelli (1916–2004). Born in Carpi, near Modena, on Christmas Eve, Rustichelli was the father of actress/singer Alida Chelli and best-known for his many film scores for Pietro Germi, including Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce Italian Style (1961), Sedotta e abbandonata/Seduced and Abandoned (1964), and Alfredo, Alfredo (1972), as well as Pier Paolo Pasolini's masterpiece Il vangelo secondo Matteo/The Gospel According to St. Matthew (1964). Riccardo Freda, whose films Le leggende di Piave (1952) and I giganti della Tessaglia/The Giants of Thessaly (1960) Rustichelli scored, once described him as, "the only true musician of the Italian cinema . . . a man of tremendous culture and sensibility . . . with an extraordinary sense of the cinema." [5]

Mario Bava agreed. In the 1960s, Rustichelli would score three of Bava's finest films—La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body (1963), Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace (1964), and Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill! (1966), as well as his episode of the TV miniseries Odissea (1968)—and stand out, above all the rest, as his definitive musical collaborator.

Rustichelli described how he was recruited into the ranks of motion picture composers: "I took my degree in piano at the Bologna Philharmonic Academy, and in 1940, I moved to Rome where I studied musical composition with Maestro Dobici. I worked as his assistant conductor, and one day, in 1947, two persons came to my dressing room at the theater in Terni. One of those two men was Luigi Rovere, a producer from Torino, and the other was the director Pietro Germi, all of whose films I would score beginning with Gioventù perduta in 1947. My life completely changed. I ruined a career that might have become very important!" In fact, Rustichelli had previously written the music for one other film, Marco Elter's Gli ultimi filibustieri/The Last Filibuster (1942), but it took Germi's appeal to rope him into the cinema as a career.

Bava and Rustichelli had previously worked together once before La morte viene dallo spazio, on Mario Costa's Perdonami!, which had yielded a chart-topping title song performed by Claudio Villa. "I don't remember exactly when I first met Bava, but it was probably on that occasion," Rustichelli supposed. "I must tell you that Bava was a good director, a great camera expert. Even Pietro Germi—who had a very difficult character and wasn't prone to giving praise—appreciated him a lot. He always told me, speaking about the directors who didn't know how the camera worked, that Bava and [Mauro] Bolognini were two good examples of the contrary, directors who knew the camera very well."

During the scoring of La morte viene dallo spazio, Rustichelli reported directly to Bava. He explains how composers were hired to score films in the Italian system: "Generally it was the director who chose the composer, in agreement with the music publishers—and sometimes with the producer, or the screenwriter. In a way, we composers of film soundtracks had to pass an exam for every film we did, throughout our careers. I must confess that it's easy to work with the good directors, but in my experience, it was crazy to work with the bad ones or the less important ones. They were always very conscious of their inferiority and, because they knew that I had worked with people like Pietro Germi, Mario Monicelli, and Nanni Loy, they presumed I would do a hasty, half-hearted job for them. They were wrong, because I always do my best. I worked on some pepla—historical movies—where I made a big contribution, because usually in those kinds of films, produced with low budgets, there were whole sequences that were saved by the music, because the music is like a narcotic, a drug; sometimes it diverts one's attention so that the audience doesn't notice the errors, or what is missing."

ITALIAN locandina, art by A. Biffignandi (Studio Favalli).

Rustichelli not only scored La morte viene dallo spazio but also improvised many of the space-age sound effects heard in the picture. "I went into the recording studio with a fire extinguisher, a blender, and a vacuum cleaner, to do those special sound effects, because there were asteroids, stars . . . I had to invent something new, I was a pioneer of this kind of music. Musically speaking, I must say that it's almost physiological for me to create music; I compose on impulse, shall we say, so I don't know if it's exactly my craft . . . When you study music, what you get is a technical knowledge, but at a certain point, besides having the necessary grounding in technique, there must also be something unexplainable, something personal. There are some very promising composers who stop at a certain time, because they don't have that certain 'something.' It was difficult to create a new sound for this particular genre; you must remember that this was very crude science fiction; it wasn't a 2001, or a Star Wars."

Distribution

La morte viene dallo spazio may be tatty entertainment, but it's hard not to respond with grudging admiration to its game creativity and industrious spirit. In a sense, it is the closest the cinema has come to forging a faux documentary space threat along the lines of Orson Welles' legendary 1938 radio broadcast, The War of the Worlds. Despite its more ambitious scale and spectacle, it looks far less expensive than the occasionally neorealistic I vampiri. Considering that Bava was able to complete half of that film in only two days, the mind boggles at how little time must have been invested in this production.

4 Bava and Colangeli would work together again, almost a decade later, on the Viking film I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger (1966).

5 Jacques Lourcelles and Simon Misrahi, "Entretien avec Riccardo Freda," Prèsence du Cinema 17, Spring 1963, 11-30.

FRENCH affiche, art by Georges Allard.

The picture opened in Italy on September 4, 1958, earning less than 150 million lire [$94,000], which undoubtedly recovered its production costs, but without adding enough to suggest much public interest in more of the same. Although art director Beni Montresor took the commercial precaution of printing every visible sign in English, the film languished on the shelf without an American release until September 27, 1961.

The US distributor, Excelsior Pictures Corporation, had only a small number of previous releases to its credit, none of them successful—so the company was not wealthy enough to make a large number of prints and get the film into many theaters before word-of-mouth could kill it. They did, however, go the extra mile by rewarding young ticket-buyers with non-functional red-and-yellow rockets stamped with the name of the movie.

The film's limited commercial prospects were unimportant; the important thing was that La morte viene dallo spazio made back its meager investment and planted an Italian flag, however humble, in the lunar soil of science fiction cinema.

Only two months after its theatrical release, Totò came along with the first Italian spoof of the science fiction craze: Totò nella luna ("Totò in the Moon"), released on November 28, 1958. I have not been able to screen this picture, but it was directed by Steno, and written by Steno with Lucio Fulci and La morte viene dallo spazio's Sandro Continenza—all friends of Bava. The likelihood of Bava's involvement is also stressed by the nature of Totò's previous picture, Totò a Parigi ("Totò in Paris," 1958), a "prince and the pauper" comedy starring the popular comic as a vagabond and as a wealthy Marquis. The film's twinning effects are said to be some of the most sophisticated of their kind, even by today's standards—and considering Bava's previous exemplary work of this nature in Mario Soldati's Quel bandito sono io!, he would have been the go-to technician to achieve such an effect. Considering Bava's comparatively relaxed shooting schedule in early 1958, and the fact that his matte paintings later complemented cameraman Marco Scarpelli's work on Giuseppe Vari's I normanni/The Normans (1962), Bava was almost certainly the artist recruited to execute the matte paintings and other trick shots required by both of these films.

According to film historian James Cheney, who wrote about the picture on the European Film Review website, [Totò nella luna] "works both as parody and commentary on sci-fi-horror stories and movies, and [as] a bona fide Italian example of the genre, complete with Bodysnatcher Pod people (brain damaged clones, mentally challenged doppelgängers who aren't quite capable of actually bodysnatching), death rays, giant cockroaches, mad scientists, an Ape Man, a sex change operation, and a trip to the moon (with a fairly impressive matte painting enhanced set and a cool alien higher intelligence). As in the best Totò movies, a huge amount of cultural ground gets trampled over, and we get very detailed subplots about the girly magazine industry (Totò is the director of a pin-up publishing outfit so cash strapped that he can only afford skimpy outfits for his models to fashion—half a bra, one stocking. He prophetically warns: "At this rate, we'll be photographing them completely nude by 1960!" This is the funniest historical explanation for how models eventually lost their clothes I've ever heard.), and science fiction comic book clichés (Ugo Tognazzi, an aspiring Amazing Stories writer, mercilessly critiques all the latest fumetti). The players are perfect with Tognazzi very likable in a dual role, and Sandra Milo extremely sexy as [an] enemy spy."

UK quad poster, art by A. Payne.

Given either de-emphasized credit or no credit at all for his contributions to these two pictures, Bava was not properly recognized as the creative spark behind Italy's science fiction movement and the genre did not get underway until Antonio Margheriti picked up the gauntlet in 1960 with his directorial debut, Space Men/Assignment Outer Space. Bava, taken away from his preferred genre by a years-long detour through Gothic horror, would only return to science fiction in the mid-1960s. His proposals for other science fiction subjects in the immediate wake of La morte viene dallo spazio were tabled for the moment, thwarted by the green-lighting of a more pressing project. Steve Reeves was flying back to Rome to appear in a sequel to the film that was bringing him international stardom.

ITALIAN photobusta.

ERCOLE E LA REGINA DI LIDIA

Hercules Unchained

WHEN STEVE REEVES returned to California after the completion of Le fatiche di Ercole, he was not greeted as a conquering hero. He had neither a contract for additional pictures nor the promise of a sequel to show for his efforts. Reeves went to Ray Wilson, his former employer at American Health Studios, to ask for his old public relations job back. Wilson rehired him, but with some wrist-slapping attached; he took him back at a reduced salary, and assigned him to less visible PR duties in San Diego. So, for the next six months, Reeves had nothing to show for having played Hercules but diminished means.

STEVE REEVES gamely hoists a TWA stewardess onto his shoulder upon his triumphal return to Rome's Fiumicino Airport.

The great Italian success of Le fatiche di Ercole in the summer of 1958 inevitably led to foreign sales and demand for a sequel. Far removed from the European film scene, Steve Reeves had no idea that his movie had been released in Italy or that it had been such a resounding success—until he received a call from Pietro Francisci, asking him to come back to Rome to star in a sequel. Reeves was wooed with the promise of a modestly increased salary, but more importantly, by a sense of occasion. The first film had been a test of his mettle—this time, Opportunity was officially knocking. Francisci's offer would force another leave of absence from American Health Studios, but when Reeves broke the news to his employer, Ray Wilson would have none of it. The two strong men had stronger words, and their affiliation came to a permanent end. Reeves was now in the movie business, sink or swim.

Fortunately, what awaited him on the other side of the world was the hottest kind of celebrity. It was pandemonium from the moment Reeves' TWA flight touched down at the airport in Rome. Egyptian-born producer Bruno Vailati (1919–90)—who had produced and co-authored Galatea's maiden production, Carlo Lizzani's Lo svitato (1955)—met Reeves with a production photographer in tow. Reeves had no trouble persuading TWA stewardesses to be hoisted onto his shoulders for publicity shots, and adults and children alike cheered him with chants of "Ercole! Ercole!"

Most of the original crew was corralled once again for the sequel, including Mimmo Palmara, Gabriele Antonini, Andrea Fantasi, and of course, Sylva Koscina. But Francisci's new screenplay, once again co-written by Ennio De Concini, had less to do with Hercules' continuing love affair with Iole than with his subsequent enslavement to Omphale, the Queen of Lydia. According to the original Greek myths, after Hercules murdered his friend Iphitos in a craze induced by the manipulative Hera, he was sentenced into slavery for three years, under Queen Omphale. During the period of his incarceration, a perverse symbiosis took place: Hercules became more feminine in his demeanor, while Omphale inherited his male characteristics. Hercules worked among Omphale's handmaidens, dressing as these women dressed, in gowns and veils, while spinning wool and working at looms, while the Queen took to wearing his discarded lion's skin!

The mind boggles at the film that might have resulted from a more faithful adaptation, but the presence of

Ercole e la regina di Lidia

"Hercules and the Queen of Lydia"
Filmed at Titanus Appia Studios (Cinecittà) and on location
June – August 1958.
First released: February 14, 1959
Eastmancolor by Pathé, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 105 minutes

Production: Galatea (Rome), Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris). Producer: Bruno Vailati. Directors: Pietro Francisci, (uncredited) Mario Bava. Assistant director: Pietro Nuccorini. Continuity: Barbara Fusch. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Ubaldo Terzano. Camera assistants: Mario Mancini, Danilo Desideri. Art direction: Flavio Mogherini, assisted by Giorgio Giovannini, Gianni D'Aloisio. Set construction: Ture Siciliano. Set decoration: Massimo Tavazzi. Special effects: Mario Bava. Costumes: Maria Baroni. Costumes furnished by Casa d'Arte Peruzza (Firenza). Dressmakers: Mimma Olivieri, Assunta Lazzazera. Makeup: Otello Fava. Hairdresser: Maria Miccinilli. Wigs: Rocchetti. Footwear: Pompei, Tani. Master of arms: Enzo Musumeci. Weapons: Rancati. Choreography: Johnny Blysdael. Ballet: "Florence and Frederick." Production manager: Feruccio de Martino, A.D.C. Production assistant: Massimo De Rita. Production secretaries: Spartaco Conversi, Dante Brini. Editor: Mario Serandrei, assisted by Misa Gabrini. Music: Enzo Masetti, conducted by Carlo Savina (Nord-Sud, "Per l'Eternita" sung by Marisa Del Frate). Sound: Giulio Tagliacozzo. Boom operator: Bruno Zanoli. Stills photographer: Aldo Galfano. Distributor: Lux Film.

Additional US credits: "Evening Star," sung by June Valli, lyrics by Mitchell Parrish.

Steve Reeves (Hercules), Sylva Koscina (Iole), Sylvia Lopez (Omphale), Gabriele Antonini (Ulysses), Primo Carnera (Anteus), Sergio Fantoni (Eteocles), Mimmo Palmara (Polonices), Patrizia Della Rovere (Penelope), Carlo D'Angelo (Creon), Andrea Fantasia (Laertes), Gino Mattera (Orpheus), Aldo Fiorelli (Argos), Gianni Loti (Sandon), Cesare Fantoni (Oedipus), Fulvia Franco (Antecleus), Daniele Varga (Anfiaro), Angelo Zanolli (Admeo), Colleen Bennet (solo ballerina), Ugo Sasso, Marisa Valenti, Elda Tattoli, Walter Grant, Sergio Ciani (Reeves' stunt double). Uncredited: Fulvio Carrara (Castor), Willy Columbini (Pollox), G. P. Rosmino (Esculapeus), Aldo Pini (Tifi), Nino Marchetti (Fossore).

Belgium: Herkules en die Koningen van Lydia, Ciné Vog Films S.A.
Denmark: Herkules og Amazonerne
Egypt: Herqol fi gazira al-mawt, 1960
France: Hercule et la Reine de Lydie, Lux Cinématographique, 9/4/59
Germany: Herkules und die Königin der Amazonen, "Hercules and the Queen of the Amazons," Constantin-AB Film, 3/29/60; Herkules im Reich der Amazonen, "Hercules in the Empire of the Amazons," TV title
Mexico: Hercules Sin Cadenas, Warner Bros., 1960
Spain: Hércules y la Reina de Lidia, 9/12/60
Turkey: Kahraman ve Melike, Has-Han Film, 1960, CinemaScope
UK: Hercules Unchained, Warner Pathé Ltd., 5/60, 96m 45s, Certificate "U," passed with no cuts
US: Hercules Unchained, Warner Bros., 7/13/60

DEJECTED but still lovely, Sylva Koscina returns as the vulnerable Iole.

Omphale would give the sequel the formidable female threat it would need to imitate, and improve upon, the Amazon sequences from the previous film. As much as Gianna Maria Canale's Duchess Du Grand and Queen Antea, or Barbara Steele's Princess Asa from La maschera del demonio, Omphale—as played by the remarkable newcomer Sylvia Lopez—is one of the archetypal femmes fatale of the Italian fantastic cinema.

Synopsis

A group of soldiers carry a handsome, unconscious young man on a stretcher through a jungle setting into a fabulous cave, announcing the arrival to Queen Omphale, interrupting her tryst with a nervous young lover. Kneeling for a better look at the new arrival, she signals with a wave of her hand for her present lover to be slain.

Having returned to Jolco from their previous adventure, Hercules and Iole set out by wagon to the hero's homeland of Thebes, accompanied by the young Ulysses. The boy's father, Laertes, gives his son a cage of carrier pigeons and instructs him to send messages with them, should they encounter danger. En route, Hercules praises Thebes ("Why, the manners and courtesy of the people alone!") but is immediately contradicted by Theban soldiers who ride brusquely past them, leaving their wagon in clouds of dust. After a brief, angry pursuit, the chase is dropped and Hercules decides to nap. Iole and Ulysses innocently ride into the valley of the god Anteus, who decides to claim Iole and the horses for his own. Roused from his slumbers, Hercules knocks Anteus down (and out) repeatedly, but he continually rebounds. Ulysses reminds the hero that Anteus gains his strength from the earth, and Hercules soon defeats him by raising him over his head and throwing him into the ocean.

They encounter the rude soldiers once again, further on, in a forest that is said to harbor the gates of Hell. Seeking shelter from a sudden storm, the trio discover the blinded, self-banished King of Thebes, Oedipus, and his son Polinices. After leaving Polinices and his brother Eteocles to rule together in his place, Oedipus has learned that the mad Eteocles banished his brother from Thebes to rule alone; Polinices is now mounting an invasion to reclaim his rule. Hercules appeals to Oedipus and requests six days in which to intercede and appeal to King Eteocles on his family's behalf. Damned with self-hatred, Oedipus decides not to await the outcome and descends through the gates into Hades.

Hercules arrives in Thebes and goes immediately to the palace, where he finds Eteocles—mad, effeminate, evil—being entertained by the spectacle of slaves being dropped into a pit of wild tigers. Iole is appalled. Eteocles is persuaded to send Hercules to Polinices with a peace treaty, and Iole is left in the care of his regent Creon ("the greatest and most intelligent man in Thebes—another Hercules, in his way"). Hercules and Ulysses ride off, but soon make the mistake of pausing for refreshment at a falls weeping the Waters of Forgetfulness. Disoriented and amnesiac, he (and Ulysses, who has not partaken and pretends to be mute) are overcome by soldiers, losing the peace treaty in the process.

SYLVIA LOPEZ as Omphale, preening amid the striking art direction of Flavio Mogherini.

Hercules is taken to a magnificent pagoda and presented to Queen Omphale, who is pleased by the looks of the newcomer and signals for her previous lover to be slain by her guards.

When Hercules wakes, Omphale tells him that he is King, yet still subservient to her every wish, and that his name is Love. They revel in their insatiable appetites for one another, while Iole—back in Thebes—passes the time by working on a tapestry. Meanwhile, Ulysses discovers a secret cavern wherein workers toil to embalm the dead bodies of Omphale's discarded lovers, who are then arranged on pedestals in a hideous wax museum. He sends a request for help to his father via carrier pigeon and slowly weans Hercules from the Waters of Forgetfulness, spilling the refreshments delivered to him and thus gradually restoring his strength and identity—which is fully recovered by the time Laertes arrives with the full Argos crew. Omphale curses the day that Hercules arrived, because she has fallen in love for the first time. She orders her soldiers to release the men—and then double crosses them with a surprise attack. After some difficulty, the Argonauts escape the island—and the heartbroken Omphale hurls herself into her own embalming chamber as the ship sets sail.

Twenty days have now passed without delivery or acknowledgment of the peace treaty, and the two sons of Oedipus are marshalling their forces against one another. Eteocles has barred the gates of Thebes and consigned Iole to his dungeons with other undesirables. Polinices and his soldiers ride to the city's gates, where Eteocles drops some captured women to their deaths from atop the city's battlements as a warning against the invasion. Iole, who barely misses being included, faints. Returning to Thebes, Hercules is shown the dead bodies of the women and is told that Eteocles, thinking him a traitor, has sworn to kill Iole at the first sight of him. Polinices later receives a message from the power-mad Eteocles, challenging him to an open duel outside the city gates. As the two brothers charge at one another with spears and axes, Hercules enters the palace stealthily, and finds himself trapped inside the tiger pit. With the help of Ulysses' expert bowmanship, the tigers are killed and a mauled Hercules arrives at the city gates in time to see Polinices slain by Eteocles, who then dies himself from loss of blood. Tifi, the general of Polinices' army, abducts Iole and tries to rape her; she scratches him, and he promises to return and complete the deed once Thebes has been reclaimed. As Tifi leads a charge against the walls of Thebes, the city gates open and Hercules leads a chariot assault, using grappling hooks to fell towers peopled with armed guards. One of the towers falls on Tifi, killing him instantly.

Hercules and Iole, both compromised, have a bittersweet reunion. "Somehow the Gods will be kind to us," says Iole, "as long as we love one another."

Production & Cast

The publicity photos taken of Steve Reeves and Sylva Koscina in the weeks preceding the production of Ercole e la regina di Lidia show two very happy young professionals, delighted by each other's company and their mutual success. Unfortunately, in later years, Koscina had a tendency to belittle her larger-than-life co-star in interviews.

"He was handsome and very muscular," she told Frassica, the Italian television host and comedian, "and so he had to be very strong—or so we thought. To tell you the truth, he was unable to carry me, and I weighed only 125 pounds! He couldn't carry me and speak his lines at the same time, because he was huffing and puffing with the effort of it! So they had two technicians kneel in front of him to support my weight!" [1]

Hearing these charges, Reeves responded, "If I could lift [Mimmo] Palmara, who weighed almost 200 pounds, why wouldn't I be able to lift Koscina?" [2]

In response to this mud-slinging: Reeves was a bodybuilder, not a weightlifter; he won national and international competitions for the perfect proportions of his physique and his ability to pose and flex—not for lifting weights. Secondly, the publicity photos contradict Koscina's account, who is seen happily riding one of Reeves' shoulders. The films offer their own testimony: in Le fatiche di Ercole, Reeves is shown carrying four grown men at once—two slung over his shoulders and one in each arm—and in Ercole e la regina di Lidia, he lifts former heavyweight wrestling champion Primo Carnera over his head. (He doesn't look like he's enjoying it, but he's doing it.) Therefore, Koscina's ungracious gossip must be discounted.

Even so, it must be admitted that Reeves' relationships with his Italian crews, due to limited language skills or for whatever reason, were never warm, and stories began to circulate about how he was dependent on health foods and needed to "blow up" his muscles like balloons with various exercises before filming a scene. The sheer perfection of Reeves' physique also seemed to invite punctures from the rumor mills. In America, it later became a popular misconception that Reeves had been dubbed in the films because his own voice was weak and high-pitched. In fact, Reeves had a very warm and virile speaking voice, not unlike the voice of George Gonneau heard in the English-dubbed release prints of the films—only drier, less theatrical, and more down-to-earth. Reeves did not dub his own performance because Italy's English Language Dubbers Association (ELDA) was highly unionized, and unless an actor's contract specified his right to dub his own performance, the union line wasn't crossed.

Koscina may have been embittered by the meager provisions made for her important character in the sequel. Iole is consigned to the sidelines for most of the picture, leaving Sylvia Lopez to become the film's foremost female presence. In some European territories, Lopez was accorded second billing while Koscina was reduced to an unflattering "and" credit, following Primo Carnera.

According to the Hercules Unchained pressbook, Sylvia Lopez was born Tatiana Sinclair, but she was actually born Tatjana Bernt in Austria, in 1936. She made her first movies in France in the mid-1950s, appearing as Tania Karen. After marrying composer Francisco Lopez (twenty years her senior) in 1956, she adopted the screen name she would make famous. Her first Italian film as Sylvia Lopez was Primo Zeglio's costume drama Il figlio del corsaro rosso/The Son of the Red Pirate (1958), which was not released until after audiences had seen her as Omphale. According to some filmographies, Ercole e la regina di Lidia was only the fourth film she made. Beautiful as she is, Sylva Koscina has no moment in either film that qualifies as the kind of iconic image that Reeves attained while toppling the columns at Jolco. Lopez wins just such a moment, late in the sequel, as the lovestruck Queen clamps onto one of Hercules' almighty legs and beseeches him not to leave her, a tear rolling down her cheek. Red-haired, ripely beautiful, and able to speak English, Lopez was very attracted to Reeves and sparks reportedly flew on-set between the two stars.

"I can remember doing a scene in which we had to kiss," Reeves recalled. "Francisci was shouting 'Stop, stop!' and we kept on kissing as if we were the only people there. Two technicians had to intervene to pull us apart!" [3]

Lopez next played the lead female role of Queen Miriam in Erode il grande/Herod the Great (also 1958); tragically, this would be her last film. It was reported on November 20, 1959—just a few months after the release of her greatest success—that Sylvia Lopez had died, a victim of leukemia. At the time of her death, she was acting in a new film, Michel Boisrond's Voulez-vous dancer avec moi?/Sexy Girl, starring Brigitte Bardot. All of Lopez' scenes had to be reshot with Dawn Addams in her role. Had she lived, she might have become an enormous star.

Giving another of the film's standout performances is Sergio Fantoni (b. 1930, Rome), as Eteocles. The son of Bolognese actor Cesare Fantoni (who plays the role of Oedipus, mostly in long-shot), Sergio had previously played supporting roles in Francisci's Il leone di Amalfi and Le meravigliose avventura di Guerrin Meschino, and more notably, in Luchino Visconti's Senso (1954). Like the Egyptian actor Alex D'Arcy, Fantoni had such extremely handsome features that he appeared narcissistic and insincere onscreen, and so was often cast in evil,

SPARKS flew between Steve Reeves and his co-star, Sylvia Lopez. ▶

1 Frassica contro Ercole, RAI 1-TV, April 26, 1989.

2 Ibid.

3 Carlo Piazza, "Entrentien avec Steve Reeves," Ciné-Zine-Zone 36/37, September/October, 1989, 5–22.

HERCULES grapples with the earth god Anteus (former world heavyweight boxing champion Primo Carnera).

decadent roles. He would work again with Bava on La battaglia di Maratona (1959) and Esther and the King (1960, one of his finest performances), and give a rare heroic performance in Anton Giulio Majano's horror film Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960). In the 1960s, he made a short, unsuccessful bid for American stardom, appearing in Von Ryan's Express, Do Not Disturb (both 1965), and What Did You Do in the War, Daddy? (1966). His later screen appearances include Peter Greenaway's The Belly of an Architect (1987) and the TV miniseries Charlemagne (1991).

Another standout in the cast was Venetian boxing/wrestling legend Primo Carnera (1907–67), as the earth god Anteus. Carnera had begun his career as a circus strong man, and his boxing career reached its apogee in 1933, when he was named Heavyweight Champion of the World. He made numerous film appearances, during and after his boxing and wrestling careers, including The Prizefighter and the Lady, Mighty Joe Young, The Harder They Fall, Prince Valiant, Casanova's Big Night, and La corona di ferro/The Iron Crown. He also appeared as the Creature in a live American television presentation of Frankenstein on a program called Matinee Theatre. Carnera's grappling with Reeves is an early highlight of the picture, as is his boorish, lusty portrayal of the earth god.

Bava later recalled that Carnera's ego got in the way during the filming of Antaeus' fight with Hercules: "Carnera didn't want to lose against 'that Yankee,' as he liked to say. We had to explain to him that it was essential that Antaeus lose the fight with Hercules!" [4]

Commentary

In some ways, Ercole e la regina di Lidia tells the same story as its predecessor: the throne of a kingdom is wrongly held; Hercules dedicates himself to the task of setting things right; through no real fault of his own, he and his men go astray and encounter a deadly seductress; Ulysses discovers her deadly plans for the hero and facilitates his escape; the Argonauts sail for home; the throne is not easily surrendered, and considerable blood must be shed before the evil King and his corrupt empire are brought down.

Working again with Ennio De Concini, Pietro Francisci "freely adapted" two acknowledged sources, the Greek tragedies Oedipus at Colunus by Sophocles and The Seven Against Thebes by Aeschylus. Actually, these plays have almost nothing to do with the script they turned out, other than a cameo by Oedipus (whose reasons for consigning himself to Hades are never specified, at least not in English), and the story of his two sons battling over the throne at Thebes. Other ideas were conveniently lifted from The Odyssey—Hercules and Ulysses trading roles as chief voyager and helpmate, leaving Iole to become the "Penelope" of the piece, passing her solitude with tapestry weaving as she inwardly frets over the possible sexual consequences of trading her status as guest for that of prisoner, should her husband not return by an agreed-upon time.

What makes Ercole e la regina di Lidia different, and in some ways more interesting, than its predecessor is the liberation of its visual imagination, which was inspired not by the Greek or Roman myths, but by another of the film's (surreptitiously) adapted sources: a 1935 storyline from Alex Raymond's King Features syndicated comic strip Flash Gordon.

In Raymond's story, the athletic hero Flash Gordon is captured by Azura the Witch Queen and drugged (by a potion called Lethum) into a state of adoring amnesia, while heroine Dale Arden and associate Dr. Zarkov are kept on display elsewhere in her castle in suspended animation chambers. Once Azura is certain of Flash's devotion, Dale is awakened from her sleep to work as a servant in the castle. While serving them one night at the dinner table, Dale deliberately spills the drug intended for Flash. This, and even Flash's earlier (1934) ordeal in Emperor Ming's pit of "tigrons," found their ways into the De Concini/Francisci screenplay, transposed from the planet Mongo to ancient Thebes.

DIRECTOR Pietro Francisci shows Steve Reeves how to bring Carnera down.

HERCULES proves himself in the tiger pit of the mad Eteocles.

If one consults the epic stories created by Alex Raymond in the ten years that he wrote and illustrated his Flash Gordon strip (1934–44), a far more accurate overview of the Italian peplum cycle is reflected than could possibly be derived from reading Greek mythology. In Raymond's stories, which were principally indebted to the knights and dragons and tournaments of Old English legends, we find all of the de rigueur trappings of the pepla: the evil sires and their luxurious palaces, the contests in the pit, the torture devices, the monsters, the tests of fealty, the surprise comrades recruited from the ranks of the alien and oppressed. In his introduction to Kitchen Sink Press' first volume of collected Flash Gordon stories, artist Al Williamson notes of Raymond's earliest work: "He is in control of his art, of course, but he is not yet so awe-inspiringly great that one ignores the story, which was going to happen in about 1937."[5] The pepla would also experience a period of style over slippery storytelling, which is perhaps best exemplified by Bava's own Ercole al centro della terra (1961), which was produced three years after Ercole e la regina di Lidia and thus precisely parallels the time frame measured by Williamson. This parallel relationship is further supported by the fact that, after more than a decade of inactivity, the Italian peplum cycle was reactivated in 1983 with Luigi Cozzi's Hercules (starring Lou Ferrigno), following the Italian release of the Dino De Laurentiis-produced revival of Flash Gordon (1980).

The Eteocles/Polonices portion of the film is fairly straightforward, very much in keeping with the classical approach taken by Francisci in Le fatiche di Ercole and his earlier works: heroic, political, full of good horsemanship and fluffy clouds in bright summer skies—but it accounts for less than half of the picture. This material is overwhelmed, visually and dramatically, by the Flash Gordon-influenced Omphale material, which is dark, erotic, fatalistic, and drenched in saturated gel lighting, and otherworldly atmosphere. Its guiding hand was clearly that of Mario Bava, who later confessed to being the de facto director of approximately 70% of the picture. Francisci's films sometimes touch on dark subjects, like Machiavellian politics and the conflicting tugs that can beset the human heart, but the darkness never gains a foothold, is never contaminating. This film is the exception to that rule; it's the darkest, and perhaps the most heartfelt film Francisci would ever sign as director.

From the very beginning, its prevalent theme is separation, as Hercules, Iole, and Ulysses part from family and friends on their journey to Thebes. Ostensibly moving toward a homecoming, Hercules finds himself alienated from his homeland, its gates open to him only on condition, and the mission he accepts in the name of home and country results in his unwitting betrayal of both. As Hercules is sexually compromised by his deluded dalliance with Omphale, so is Iole at least threatened with rape by Tifi. The way the scene is

LOPEZ AND REEVES hit the Roman nightclubs with Sylva Koscina, unhappily in tow.

4 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May, 1979.

5 Al Williamson, "On Mongo with Alex," introduction to Raymond Alex, Flash Gordon 1: Mongo, The Planet of Doom (Princeton WI: Kitchen Sink Press, 1990), 6-8.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by A. Biffignandi.

interrupted at the point of transgression with an arbitrary cutaway to trumpets sounding atop the gates of Thebes, and then cuts back to Tifi nursing scratches on his cheek while Iole pants decorously on the floor, one senses that the general's violation of our heroine might have been successful—at least by implication—in an earlier cut. But the ambiguity cuts deeper. Certainly, the final shot of Hercules and Iole reuniting is charged with mutual feelings of shame and sexual compromise, and Iole's closing words imply that they can only move ahead together by forgiving one another. Unlike Le fatiche di Ercole, which was primarily a rousing entertainment with some mild politico-sociological underpinnings, Ercole e la regina di Lidia has the feel of a deeply personal statement, as plaintive as a repentent adulterer's plea for forgiveness.

The film's dark edge is present from the very beginning, resulting from some unusual cinematographic choices made by Bava. The film's pre-credits sequence introduces Omphale and her unsentimental approach to sex while keeping her face averted throughout. We first see her sitting cross-legged on an ornate bed—sporting fine heels, black stockings, a tight-fitting black skirt and bodice, and a lacy cape that flounces as she passes a nameless lover who has outlived his usefulness and descends a stairwell to meet her returning guard and their latest male captive. The camera looks over her shoulder and a cascade of fiery red hair as she kneels over the stranger and raises her hand in a silent signal. The guards converge on her screaming lover and thrust a dozen swords into him; there is no blood, but as the soldiers form a wall of violence between the man's tender abdomen and the camera lens, their capes fill the screen with a scream of red. Omphale's face is withheld from our view, as is the meaning of this introductory scene, until she resurfaces in the narrative 20 minutes later. Audiences must have been confused, being thrust into a storyline with no Hercules in sight. Just as the villainess' identity has been kept from us, Hercules is also kept from view until he appears—almost like the punchline of a joke—at the end of the main titles. Only when Pietro Francisci's directorial credit spreads across the screen does the hero make his amusingly overstated entrance, carrying a massive boulder over his head and letting it plunge into the sea as an anchor for the Argos.

THE FILM'S most iconic moment, as Omphale pleads with Hercules not to leave her.

Apart from the sense of mystery that the film generates between these unrelated principal characters, what is immediately apparent is the new, no-holds-barred approach to the film's decor, overseen by Flavio Mogherini and his assistant Giorgio Giovannini, which is as indebted to Alex Raymond's Mongo as to ancient Greece. Omphale's bedchamber appears to be housed within the glacéed walls of a cave—blue, green, amber, lavender—but her bed is a plush canopy type from the 18th or 19th century, the doors are veiled in red velvet opera curtains, the floor is vast and scarlet and waxed to a high Hollywood polish, and this Queen's attire would not look at all out of place at the Foliés-Bergère. Eclipsing everything else, but having nothing directly to do with the narrative, an immense Indian head fashioned from metal or stone, roughly as large as the face of the Statue of Liberty, stares partially excavated from a wall. Any other art director would have constructed a simple falls to dispense the Waters of Forgetfulness, but Mogherini gives us a rock in whose tortured contours we can distinctly see the lines of an agonized human face. His work is a veritable fever dream, an outstanding chapter in the history of Italian production design that considerably predates Fellini's own turn toward the baroque.

Working in perfect concert with Mogherini, Bava produces some of the most memorable scenes of his career. A case in point is Hercules' first conscious encounter with Omphale. After seeing her bathe nude with a flock of swans (the Cascate di Montegelato once again providing the perfect Elysian setting), the amnesiac hero pursues the Queen of Lydia into her private sanctum by passing through the cleft in a pointedly Freudian waterfall, beyond which he finds a sugar-walled domain frosted with female flesh, tinsel and pageantry. The nymphomaniac Queen, decked out in Barbarella finery, reclines on a chaise longue in the shape of a swan (a favorite disguise of Jupiter/Zeus, when seducing mortals). Behind her, a wall of forget-me-nots forms a poignant, thematic drape. In a brilliant lighting adjustment, the flowers turn as blue as a wife's offended blood as Hercules bends over Omphale in a kiss.

WITH THE HELP of Ulysses (Gabriele Antonini), Hercules recovers his memory and legendary strength.

But as usually occurs in Italian fantasy, behind the mask of love lurks the skull of death. Like the early sequence of Iole's childhood flashback in the previous film, with its silhouetted nightmare decapitations, frightened faces, and pools of blood, Ercole e la regina di Lidia contains a sequence that shows Bava's affinity for horror in full bloom: Ulysses' discovery of Omphale's embalming chamber. As he enters the cavern area, Ulysses is started by the figure of a man aiming a spear, seemingly at him, and he recoils against a rocky wall painted in icy blue light. Realizing that the figure is immobile and poised on a pedestal, he regains his composure and presses on—until he sees, on a lower level, a group of men toiling around a vat brimming with undulating smoke and magically alternating washes of color, three flames dancing in the background. The workers then raise an inert figure from the vat, the motion of the upright body releasing a macabre aftergush of coiling, backlit smoke. The scene has tremendous impact, not only because of its masterful choreography of color, dry ice, fire, and shadowplay, but because it is at once so personalized and yet devoid of personality. By not showing us the faces of the workers, that of the body they are preserving, or that of the preserved exhibits of Omphale's museum, Bava pushes the impressionist qualities of the mise-en-scène to the fore, along with Ulysses' own sense of fright and discovery. There is nothing shown to distract us from the broadstrokes of horror; the subtleties are conveyed through the emotional values of color. Knowing what we do about Bava, the scene can also be read as autobiographical, based on his own childhood explorations of his father's workshop, an exotic and intimidating place of strange chemicals and beautiful colors and lifeless, lifesized bodies. In the context of another man's film, this is undoubtedly an auteur sequence.

In addition to the advancing complexity of its imagery, Ercole e la regina di Lidia exhibits a new sense of grace in its camera movements. This is partly due to the success of the previous film, which made certain new technical comforts possible, but it also pertains to an important change in Bava's camera team. After La morte viene dallo spazio (not a very smoothly operated film), Corrado Bartoloni—Bava's camera operator since 1949—decided to strike out on his own. Inheriting his position was graduating camera assistant Ubaldo Terzano. Terzano's work was immediately marked by a greater fluidity of movement, and in the eight years he had been part of Bava's camera team, he had also learned a great deal about lighting. When he found himself overwhelmed by fulfilling Francisci's and his own various duties on the set, Bava was now able to relegate some of his responsibilities to Terzano and accept the results with little or no personal modification.

Though Ercole e la regina di Lidia extends the visual and emotional vocabulary of the peplum to thrilling new heights, it is also a structural failure. The conflict between Eteocles and Polinices doesn't have the necessary dramatic authority to assert its primacy in the storyline; Palmara is miscast as Polinices and given very little screen time, and while Fantoni cuts a strikingly decadent figure as Eteocles, we never see him commit the kind of heinous act necessary for him to earn his stripes as a great villain. The diversion to Omphale's domain is so much more involving that, when Hercules and Ulysses are rescued and sail for home on the Argos, the movie feels prematurely primed for an end credits scroll . . . yet it continues for another 20 minutes, through the anticlimactic duel between the brothers and a confoundingly lame reunion for our hero and heroine, unimaginatively modelled on the last shot of the previous film.

Special Effects

It was during the filming of Ercole e la regina di Lidia that Bava made the acquaintance of Massimo De Rita, an associate producer at Galatea who would become an important ally in the years ahead. De Rita's earliest recollection of Bava involves his invisible ingenuity as a special effects artist on the picture: "When I arrived on the sound stage at Scalera, I came upon the following scene: a rather worn and patched-up blue screen and, positioned in front of it, a wagon carrying Steve Reeves and Sylva Koscina, who was pantomiming to a playback: 'For Iolco's civilization . . .' Really shitty! I looked at Bava, who smiled back and said, "We're in bad shape, aren't we?" But when I saw the scene in dailies, this scene seemed real, magical . . . everything had acquired a sense of realism and elegance."[6]

To an even greater extent than he had salvaged Le fatiche di Ercole, Mario Bava's uncanny talent for in-camera optical trickery made a sumptuous feast of its sequel. Omphale's pagoda-like dwelling was a glass matte built around a National Geographic-type clipping, with a blacked-out extension on the right—that was later filled-in with a silhouette pausing to peer from a bright yellow window. When Omphale walks down her impressive stairwell to meet the new arrival, Bava films the scene in long-shot through a glass matte that fills in the ceiling area of the studio with rock, and extends the set walls on either side with various Greek-styled bas-reliefs and adornments. Bava also added some columned buildings to the (extreme screen left) background of the scene of Laertes receiving the pigeon carrying Ulysses' call for help, and likewise painted the Argos anchored at a small distance from shore, visible through an opening in the cave wall (extreme screen right) as Hercules and the men flee Omphale's domain. (An inopportune splash of sea water gives away the shot, leaping into the air in front of the ship . . . only to be blocked from view behind it.) When Hercules is shown fighting the tiger in Eteocles' pit, Reeves (and his stunt double Sergio Ciani) grappled with a drugged animal as well as a stuffed one, but it proved impossible to use either of these to produce the necessary image of an alert tiger lunging through the air at the hero. To achieve this, Bava came up with a staggeringly simple trompe-l'oeil. Based on the evidence of the footage itself, he painted a speed-blurred tiger (not even a particularly good one) on a transparent disc of glass or plastic and rotated it manually in front of the camera lens, so that it appeared to dive from the upper left of frame. Examined frame-by-frame, the effect is almost laughable; it's more than half-sold by the surprise of the moment and the sound of the tiger's roar. Bava's genius was in knowing how little the eye needs to see, and how much of what we see is predicated in sound and assumption.

The film also includes some nearly flawless blue screen shots, allowing Bava to combine elements of two unrelated locations. One such instance can be seen after the Argos docks near Thebes; as his fellow warriors cross swords with the Theban guards, Hercules runs up a large white stairwell. The stairwell were an actual location, but the climb was half as long; Bava filmed the stairs twice, once nearby with the upper frame masked, and once again from a greater distance with the lower frame masked, each time with Reeves selling the illusion by racing stealthily up the steps on cue. (There is a short cutaway to the action below to conceal the lack of continuity from Reeves' ascent from one exposure to another.) The finished components were then used to fill in the background of the swordfight, which was filmed in the studio. Likewise, the scenes filmed outside the gate at Thebes were also an optical conglomeration of the real and unreal. In reality, the entrance to Thebes was a dirt road situated between two hills. The vertical sides of the gate were erected on location, while the whole parapet section holding the actors was shot in the studio and later optically joined to the location footage.

IOLE, held hostage by Eteocles and assaulted by Tifi, awaits her fate with other captive women.

Music

Much of Enzo Masetti's score for this sequel was carried over from Le fatiche di Ercole. Its memorable romantic theme was reorchestrated to deeper, richer effect under the main titles, and at the request of the producers, Masetti also wrote new lyrics to convert his melody into a popular song, which Iole sings early in the film. The original Italian vocal of "Per l'eternità"("For Eternity") was sung by Marisa Del Frate (b. 1931, herself an actress who appeared in Mario Costa's Addio per sempre!, 1958) and subsequently lip-synched by Sylva Koscina. When the film was dubbed into English, new lyrics were written around Koscina's lip movements by Mitchell Parrish (the lyricist of "Stardust"), and thus "Per l'Eternita" became "Evening Star." The voice on this version belonged to June Valli (1930–93), a Bronx-born singer who had started out in commercial jingles (she was the original voice of Chiquita Banana), before becoming a featured vocalist on television's Your Hit Parade in its 1952–53 season, and in 1957, the co-host of The Andy Williams & June Valli Show. The original song was issued in Italy as a 45 rpm single on the Cetra label.

6 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

The most important new piece of music in the film is a theme for Omphale, which opens ominously with soft pattering kettledrums, evoking a feeling of space and darkness, from which a spirit of hauteur is aroused, signalled by a fluttering murmur of woodwinds, and then a tense arpeggio for strings whose crescendo introduces a severe theme, played first by the strings and then by flaring flutes, that is distinctly Spanish in character. The theme, which underlies the pre-credits scene, is mysterious and provocative, full of exoticism, color, and dread; one couldn't ask for more appropriate music.

Release

First released on St. Valentine's Day 1959, Ercole e la regina di Lidia proved even more successful at the Italian boxoffice than its predecessor, earning almost 900 million lire—roughly, $560,000. That was just the beginning, but it was enough to elevate Nello Santi's Galatea to a new position as one of Italy's foremost production companies. Surprisingly, Santi celebrated his newfound success by announcing that he would undertake no more Hercules pictures.

Pietro Francisci made it known that he, too, wanted a vacation from Hercules. As for Hercules himself, Steve Reeves was perfectly willing to make a third film in the series, but he lost his enthusiasm when a new producer (Achille Piazzi) and director

TURKISH poster, art by Emal.

(Vittorio Cottafavi) were proposed.[7] "I wanted to make a third Hercules, but only with Francisci—not with another director," the actor stated. "When I refused to do another Hercules, I got a lot of different proposals. They asked me to play Maciste and Ursus. I turned them all down. I didn't want my public to see me doing second-rate imitations and parodies."[8]

Joseph E. Levine, who bought the United States theatrical rights to both Hercules films shortly after the second completed production, flew to Rome and met with his new star in the hopes of changing his mind, but Reeves stood firm in his resolve. When the sequel went through the roof in America, Levine would return to Rome and work with Reeves on his own terms.

Bava's long working relationship with Francisci was dealt a mortal blow by the experience of the Hercules films. While Bava would continue to accredit the 1950s Italian renaissance to Francisci for the rest of his life, Francisci never reciprocated by acknowledging the importance of Bava's contributions to his two Hercules triumphs. When the films had their premieres in Rome, Francisci basked entirely in the limelight, barely saying hello to Bava, refusing to introduce him to the film's investors, and arranging for him to be seated outside the "inner circle." It was during this period that Bava confided his feelings of hurt and neglect to Riccardo Freda.

BELGIAN poster.

"One day, Bava complained to me that, although he had devised the look of those movies, had staged them, and captured them on film to be shown in theaters, his director was getting all the glory," Freda remembered. "Then, at the film premiere, [the director] did everything possible to confine and isolate him in the balcony of the film theater, so that all the compliments and praises fell only on him, the director. I remember [Bava] telling me this at a bus stop, about the premiere of a film he had made for Francisci, 70% of which had been his doing. This made me angry, and I gave him an ultimatum: if he didn't stop collaborating with this so-called director, I would never work with him again. He listened to me, as always, with a slightly mocking smile. But he never worked with Francisci again, though he wanted him for Archimede. And God knows he needed him: the film was a frightful flop!"[9]

Bava was not the kind of man to take Freda's advice and break off with Francisci in any kind of or confrontational manner; instead, he passive-aggressively withdrew, managing to be busy whenever Francisci needed him. When Francisci approached Bava to shoot and provide special effects for Archimede—ultimately released under the title L'assedio di Siracusa/The Siege of Syracuse (1959)—Freda gave him the job, and distraction, of photographing his own next movie, Agi Murad il diavolo bianco/The White Warrior.

L'assedio di Siracusa—made with Carlo Carlini (I vitelloni) behind the camera and with Joseph Natanson[10] handling the trick shots—is in some ways the perfect proof of who contributed what to the Hercules films. It is a very lightweight film, with some pretty scenery and ideas, but it feels clumsy and half-baked. The principal actors (Rossano Brazzi, Tina Louise) are poorly suited to costume drama, and Louise is photographed like a tart. In a supporting role, the wondrous Sylva Koscina is rendered almost unrecognizable with a blonde dye-job and unflattering makeup. Natanson's mattes are either too rigid or transparent, and Carlini's photography has neither elegance nor muscle; it looks very chop-a-block, with no lighting continuity to blend the various scenes into a whole. The unsatisfying film was not released in the United States until 1962.

Without Bava functioning as his rod and staff, Pietro Francisci found himself working irregularly. After Saffo, venere di Lesbo/The Warrior Empress (1960), which Derek Elley aptly describes as "attractive fun," he would not direct another film for four years, at which time he made Ercole sfida Sansone/Hercules, Samson and Ulysses (1963), a failed attempt to reclaim the franchise he had started. His penultimate feature, the science

7 Cottafavi's film was eventually made with New York bodybuilder Lou Degni making his screen debut as Hercules, under the pseudonym of "Mark Forest." The full story will continue in this book's chapter on Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide/Hercules and the Captive Women and its sequel, Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World.

8 Piazza, 11.

9 Riccardo Freda, Divoratori di celluloide—50 anni di memorie cinematografiche e non (Milan, Italy: Emme Edizione–Il Formichiere, 1981), 80–130.

10 Joseph Natanson was, after Mario Bava, Italy's foremost matte painter of the 1950s and '60s. Born Joséf Natanson, he got his start in films as a key member of the "special painting" crew on Powell and Pressburger's The Red Shoes (1948), for which he executed numerous glass paintings and painted backdrops for the eponymous dance sequence. From there, Natanson relocated to Rome and availed his services as a matte painter to various Italian films, working at first on many films for director Carmine Gallone: Puccini (1952), Casta diva (1954), and Casa Ricordi (1954). His later assignments—sometimes credited to Josef Natansen or Joseph Nathanson—include Nel segno di Roma/Sign of the Gladiator (1959, indicating that he sometimes worked side-by-side with Bava), Vittorio Sala's La regina delle amazzoni/Colossus and the Amazon Queen (1960), Umberto Scarpelli's impressively designed science fiction peplum Il gigante di Metropolis/Giant of Metropolis (1961), Michael Curtiz' Francis of Assisi (1961), Edgar G. Ulmer's The Cavern (1964), and Federico Fellini's short film Toby Dammit (1967, for which he painted the impressive collapsed bridge). His last known screen credit for "optical effects and miniatures" appeared in Lucio Fulci's I guerrieri dell'anno 2072/The New Gladiators (1983). He died in Rome on September 13, 2003.

FRENCH affiche, art by Georges Allard.

fiction film 2+5: Missione Hydra (1966), was filmed using redressed sets and leftover costumes from Bava's Terrore nello spazio (1965), and it was not given an American release until 1977—three years after Francisci's death—at which time it was rechristened as Star Pilot, the first of the Star Wars rip-offs. Francisci evidently spent the last eight years of his life out of work; he returned to the director's chair one last time in 1973 with Simbad e il califfo di Bagdad ("Sinbad and the Caliph of Baghdad"), which featured Le fatiche di Ercole's Arturo Dominici in a supporting role.

Pietro Francisci died two years later, in 1975, but his death is not known to have been reported by any cinema publications at the time. Indeed, the fact of his death has not—until now—been recorded in any reference book about the Italian cinema, and my own research was unsuccessful in discovering the exact date of his passing. It should not be forgotten—as Mario Bava was always the first to admit—that Pietro Francisci was, in many ways, the man responsible for breathing commercial life back into Italy's national cinema, a breath that would sustain it for the better part of the coming decade.

Hercules Unchained

When Joseph E. Levine released this opulent sequel in America as Hercules Unchained, history was made. Warner Bros. once again handled the distribution, as Levine once again poured over $1,500,000 into a publicity engine of unprecedented range.

In theaters, audiences were treated to both teaser and production trailers. Stunning, full-page color ads were placed in mass-market publications like Life, Look and Ebony, as well as in the best-selling movie, romance, and adventure fan magazines. forty full-page color ads were placed in different daily and Sunday newspapers. Immense banners were made to hang from theater marquees, and Levine made deals with other companies to take pioneering steps in the direction of motion picture merchandising with Hercules bicycles, T-shirts, and even a Dell Comics "movie tie-in" adaptation.

However, Levine's greatest brainstorm in the promotion of Hercules Unchained was his unprecedented use of television advertising. 6,360 "TV spots" were booked on 212 different stations across America prior to the film's opening, so that it was virtually impossible to be unaware that "The Mightiest of Them All" was coming to your local theater. Prior to this, the motion picture industry had regarded television as a threat to its primacy in the entertainment world, but Levine showed the business how to take advantage of the new medium's popularity to generate interest and big profits. I've been unable to ascertain exactly how much money Hercules Unchained generated, but its social impact was unforgettable to those who witnessed it. It certainly made millions for Levine, who pooled a portion of its profits into the founding of his own distribution empire, Embassy Pictures—which, in time, financed such major motion pictures as The Graduate (1967), The Lion in Winter (1968) and Carnal Knowledge (1971).

Although Hercules and Hercules Unchained were booked together by enterprising local theaters across the country in the early 1960s, the two films were not officially combined on a double-bill until 1975, after Levine sold his interests in the company that subsequently became known as Avco-Embassy Pictures. Avco-Embassy decided to acquaint a new generation with the films that gave rise to the company by releasing the Reeves film together with an entirely new ad campaign ("It Took Two Colossal Movies to Tell the Whole Incredible Story!"). Unfortunately, the films had become overly familiar via television showings during the preceding decade, and it was not commonly understood as yet how much these widescreen epics lost when translated to the small screen, so the combo package did not perform well enough in its initial bookings to encourage a wider release. It was the beginning of the end for Avco-Embassy, which would not last another decade, succumbing to bankruptcy in 1982.

US half-sheet.

In subsequent years, with both Avco-Embassy and Galatea defunct, Hercules and Hercules Unchained fell into the public domain. While this is a good thing for some orphaned films, at least in terms of their continued availability, the Reeves films have not been so fortunate. Of the two, only Hercules has surfaced on the American market in a proper widescreen transfer, but even this edition is hardly definitive in terms of restoring the picture's former visual opulence. The more baroque Hercules Unchained benefits most from widescreen presentation, but for the two decades in which the home video business has been in full force, it has been available only in ruinous pan-and-scan transfers. Indeed, pan-and-scan transfers are, in some ways, the least of the problems faced by these important pulp adventures. In 1997, scenes from Le fatiche di Ercole and Ercole e la regina di Lidia were shuffled together and redubbed to create a comedic variant for the direct-to-video market, entitled Hercules Recycled. According to an online pitch, the plot is as follows: "After World War III, Herc must find a secret formula to restore the Earth to the more pleasant pre-WWIII condition, while battling a dinosaur, fast-food mutants, and an insurance man! You can get this $9.95 video by calling (800) 367–8437 . . ." Both films have also been held up as objects of ridicule on the cult television series Mystery Science Theater 3000.

If the mishandling of these films has resulted in their becoming something of a joke in camp-conscious America, they are still respected abroad as the beautiful mythological epics they are. When and if they become available for viewing again in their original widescreen ratios, with their color and sharpness digitally restored, with their dubbed soundtracks digitally synchronized, the Hercules films will be ripe for more sober rediscovery. As much as I vampiri would prophesy the Gothic chiaroscuro of La maschera del demonio, the Hercules films showcase the complete crystallization of Bava's unique conceptual approach to color—a personal style that would distinguish not only his later pepla, but also his greatest works of horror and science fiction. In terms of their combined impact on the basic characteristics of what would become known as Italian fantasy cinema, the value of Le fatiche di Ercole and, especially, Ercole e la regina di Lidia is impossible to overestimate.

SPANISH poster for AGI MURAD IL DIAVOLO BIANCO, art by Macario Gomez.

Back with Freda and Reeves

Nel segno di Roma
Agi Murad il diavolo bianco
Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei

THE FILMING OF Ercole e la regina di Lidia signalled a new era in Italian film production, as Steve Reeves himself noticed early in the shooting. "Just after I arrived in Italy to begin filming Hercules Unchained, we began noticing other crews like ours, two and three beaches down from us, setting up cameras and filming Hercules films just like ours," he told his biographer, Chris LeClaire. "It was unbelievable. They were using the same costumes, plots, and even [the same] ideas as Francisci. I guess it was like anything else in life: once someone gets a great idea, everyone wants in on it."[1]

As the official sequel to Pietro Francisci's hit went into production, the race was on—among other hopeful projects—to beat the sequel into the theaters the following summer. The need to work quickly may well have been the reason why Francisci had given his cameraman so much creative leverage with the sequel: to ensure its timely release.

Certainly the Hercules phenomenon also increased the demand for Mario Bava's services, and while Riccardo Freda was setting up his next production (which would also prove to be Steve Reeves' first post-Hercules movie), the cameraman kept himself busy with uncredited work.

Nel segno di Roma

In the autumn of 1958, Mario Bava came to the rescue of this troubled production, directed by his friend Guido Brignone—for whom Bava had anonymously photographed earlier films dating back to the late 1940s, whose titles have yet to come to light. It tells the story of Marcus Valerius (Georges Marchal), a consul of Rome and the most brilliant general of the Roman army, who is captured by the troops of Queen Zenobia of Palmyra (Anita Ekberg) and consigned to the dungeons. With the help of a secretly Christian guard, he escapes, but determines to return to Palmyra and arrange the enemy's downfall from within. He goes back and throws himself on the Queen's mercy, telling her that his previous capture has left him reviled in his homeland and that is now without a country. He promises to avail her of his military skills in exchange for refuge. To his surprise, he falls in love with the lonely and vulnerable Zenobia, and after discovering that her chief military advisor, Semanzio/Semantius (Folco Lulli), is planning to turn her kingdom over to King Sapur of Persia (I vampiri's Paul Müller), he becomes conflicted between his allegiances to heart and country.

The unspecial screenplay was credited to five different contributors, including an early byline for Sergio Leone. Late in the schedule, Brignone fell seriously ill and was replaced by Michelangelo Antonioni—who took no credit for the assignment, and in fact directed the remainder of the picture in strict accordance with Brignone's instructions, which Antonioni received at the end of each day while visiting his sick bed. Antonioni, however, was not up to the task of directing the masses of stunt riders and extras required to make a battle scene, so Riccardo Freda was hired to take charge of these. (Freda may have been suggested for these duties by Georges Marchal, who had starred opposite Gianna Maria Canale in his Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio.) At the time, Freda was in the process of setting up his next film in Yugoslavia, where the lira went a great deal further; it was therefore mutually convenient that he shoot the battle scenes there.

The credited cinematographer of Nel segno di Roma was Luciano Trasatti, A.I.C. (1921–99), but in a memoir written for the book La città del cinema, Bava made casual reference to shooting some scenes for the picture, saying that he used the same "banged-up" Ferraniacolor camera he had used to film Mio figlio Nerone—working here in Technirama, as apposed to the earlier production's CinemaScope. Bava may have photographed Freda's battle scenes, as some have speculated (their collaboration on Agi Murad il diavolo bianco took place during this same, approximate period), but if he did, there is nothing to distinguish them as Bava's work. Bava was only able to achieve work of signature quality in the studio, where he was in more complete control of light and atmosphere.

As one watches the film, some of Bava's contributions to other scenes are quite obvious and often feature actors with whom he had worked on Le fatiche di Ercole: the scene of Marcus Valerius, tied to a cross in the scorching sun, being tormented with a cup of cool water by a sadistic guard (Arturo Dominici)—which includes a delirious POV shot utilizing Bava's "water glass"; the sequence of the secretly Christian guard Lator (Mimmo Palmara) slipping Marcus the key to his chains, effecting his escape from Zenobia's dungeon—which opens with a fabulous shot of Lator emerging through a tell-tale whorl of emerald green smoke at the entrance, stepping into a hot-red cavern with a cool blue, barred window; the subsequent fire sequence, which provides cover for Marcus' escape—where the predominant reds are beautifully tempered with blue smoke, lime-green accents, and flames of luminous orange; another dungeon scene in which Semantius questions and punishes a soldier overcome by rebel forces—most of which is viewed from behind an ominously lit stone column, limned in lime-green light; insert shots during a banquet scene of Semantius, who is shown talking to Zenobia and Marcus (whose own close-ups and medium shots have a blander, contradictory lighting style and a completely different approach to color temperatures); a filler shot of Marcus reading a secret message fired at him on an arrow from the Romans; an insert showing Erika's horrified reaction to the stabbing death of Semantius as she cowers beside an idol, and so forth.

Trasatti's eye for color was not as skilled as Bava's, and his scenes have a tendency to pair pastel colors (sky blue and aqua, for example) that offer no contrast, only conflict, resulting at times in "vibrating" color combinations. In a critical scene staged in Zenobia's bedchamber, the eye is actually distracted from the bountiful Ekberg by a glaringly red coverlet that screams from the center of an otherwise pastel composition. The same thing occurs when the exotic dance of Erika (Foliés Bergère dancer Chelo Alonso in her first peplum role) at the banquet is initially upstaged by having the background dancers dressed in the same, overly assertive red. Fortunately, those other dancers leave the floor, granting Alonso our full attention as she erupts into a frenzied hula that lingers in the memory as one of the mostly lethargic film's best scenes.

Remarkably, Nel segno di Roma proved almost as popular at the Roman boxoffice as Le fatiche di Ercole, raking in nearly 715 million lire [$446,000] after its March 6 release. In 1959, it became the second Italian film acquired for US release by

Nel segno di Roma

"Under the Sign of Rome"
First released: March 6, 1959
Technicolor, Technirama, 2.35:1, 100 minutes

Production: Glomer Film (Rome), Societé Cinématographique Lyre, Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris), Telefilm (Monaco). Distributor: Cinemaproduzioni Astoria.

France: Sous le Signe de Rome, 5/18/60
Germany: Im Zeichen Roms, 10/2/59
Spain: Bajo el Signo de Roma, 4/2/62
UK: Sign of the Gladiator, Anglo Amalgamated via Warner Pathé Ltd., 5/60, 85m 15s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Sign of the Gladiator, American International Pictures, Colorscope, 9/23/59, 86m

Agi Murad il diavolo bianco

"Agi Murad, the White Devil"
First released: June 21, 1959
Eastmancolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 91 minutes

Production: Majestic Film (Rome), Lovcen Film (Bulgaria). Distributor: Lux Film.

Belgium: Die Kozakken vallen Aan
France: Les Cosaques Passent e l'Attaque
Germany: Hadschi Murad—Unter der Knute des Zaren, "Agi Murad—Under the Whip of the Tsar," Panorama, 1/15/60
Spain: El Diablo Blanco, 6/26/61
UK: The White Warrior, 1961, 85m 44s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: The White Warrior, Warner Bros., 2/10/61, Technicolor
Yugoslavia: Bijeli djavo, 12/11/59

Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei

"The Last Days of Pompeii"
First released: November 12, 1959
Eastmancolor, SuperTotalScope, 2.35:1, 100 minutes

Production: Cineproduzione Associate (Roma), Procusa Films (Madrid), Transocean-Film (Munich). Distributor: Filmar.

France: Les Jours Dernière de Pompei
Germany: Die Letzten Tage von Pompeji
Spain: Los Ultimos Dias de Pompeya, 2/29/60
UK: The Last Days of Pompeii, United Artists, 7/60, 94m 41s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: The Last Days of Pompeii, United Artists, 7/17/60, 95m

American International Pictures—making the company, for the first time, truly international. But the film's title posed some commercial problems for AIP's James H. Nicholson (1916–72) and Samuel Z. Arkoff (1918–2001).

Arkoff explained: "We didn't know what we were going to do with a title like [Under the Sign of Rome], so we dubbed a gladiator into the picture . . . and called it Sign of the Gladiator. The story of the piece was, originally, that back in the days of the Roman conquest, the Roman legions conquered a domain under the rule of Anita Ekberg and her big bosoms. At the same time she was sleeping with the Roman leader, she was leading a secret revolt against Rome! So we took basically the same story, but made the head of the Roman legion a former gladiator who, in the dying days of Rome, took the gladiators who survived their contests in the arena and put them into the Roman army, Roman blood getting thin as it were. The Roman marshall was a former gladiator and, if he didn't put down that revolt, he'd be sent back to his death in the arena—follow the pattern? In the ads we had this gladiator—even though in the picture there were no gladiators at all!"

Nel segno di Roma had been found and screened for Arkoff and Nicholson by an Italian agent, Fulvio Lucisano, (b. Rome, August 1, 1928)—"a man who looked exactly like Julius Caesar," in Arkoff's estimation—who became AIP's Roman contact, occasional co-producer, and later the president of his own production company, Italian International. Lucisano translated the film's Italian dialogue for them in the screening room as they watched. AIP bought the English-language rights to the film for twenty-five years, motivated by the success of the Hercules films, but also the even greater public reception accorded to William Wyler's Oscar-sweeping Ben-Hur (1959) and the high anticipation for Stanley Kubrick's recently announced Spartacus (1960).

The English version was created at Titra Sound Corporation in New York City, once again under the direction of George Gonneau. At Arkoff and Nicholson's insistence, Gonneau essentially junked the first reel, eliminating all the early dialogue scenes that saw Marcus delivered into Zenobia's custody, which were condensed under an umbrella of new narration, explaining that "officers and generals of the army were often recruited from the gladiators"—a preposterous idea, not unlike recruiting plantation owners from the ranks of slaves. Gonneau himself dubbed the role of Marcus Valerius, Paul Frees dubbed Folco Lulli's Semanzio, and a crooning theme song—"Xenobia" [sic], composed by Dominic Frontiere and Milton Raskin, sung by Bill Lee—was added to the end titles, which were reshot by AIP.

The "face lift" that was Sign of the Gladiator marked the beginning of a collaboration between AIP and Titra Sound that would last throughout the 1960s, exercising a near-total influence over the way the popular Italian cinema was perceived (and misperceived) in America and other English-speaking countries throughout its golden years.

Agi Murad il diavolo bianco

In later years, Mario Bava would develop a reputation as someone whose intense dislike of travel bordered on phobia. While this legend certainly adds color to his fearful character, his son Lamberto begs to differ: "My father actually loved to travel," he told the Italian magazine Nocturno. "He wasn't afraid to fly; it's just that he wasn't thrilled about spending six months in some foreign place."

Bava's next film assignment—as the cameraman of Riccardo Freda's Agi Murad il diavolo bianco ("Hadji Murad, the White Devil," 1959)—was one of his earliest assignments to require him to spend an extended period away from home and family. For this production, Bava agreed to cross the Adriatic Sea and spend the first three weeks in December 1958 near Zagreb, Yugoslavia (now Croatia). The bylaws of Italo/Yugoslav co-production required him to use two local camera assistants, Secula Banov and Kreso Grcev, but he was assisted by the steadfast Ubaldo Terzano when the production returned to Rome to shoot various interiors—notably those of Prince Sergei's palace; the climactic shots of Hadji Murad riding a stallion through a ballroom were filmed inside the same villa that provided the interiors of Cristiana Haute Couture in Bava's seminal giallo thriller of 1964, Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace. Frano Vodopivec (later the cinematographer of Fielder Cook's 1971 film Eagle in a Cage) headed the second unit camera crew, which was directed by Leopoldo Savona.

To Freda and Bava's mutual delight, the screenplay of Agi Murad had attracted Pietro Francisci's trump card to be its star. After the second Hercules film, Steve Reeves began to make known his interest in establishing his versatility onscreen as soon as possible. An expert horseman, Reeves was attracted to Freda's project because it would allow him to show how well he could ride, while the Russian setting made it necessary for him to remain not only clothed, but bundled-up for most of the picture, permitting him to flex his dramatic muscles for a change.

MARCUS VALERIUS gets the upper hand against a sadistic guard (Arturo Dominici) from a scene photographed by an uncredited Mario Bava.

1 Chris LeClaire, Worlds to Conquer: An Authorized Biography of Steve Reeves (South Chatham MA: Monomoy Books, 1999), 178.

STEVE REEVES as Hadji Murad, snuggling with his fiancee Sultanet, played by Giorgia Moll.

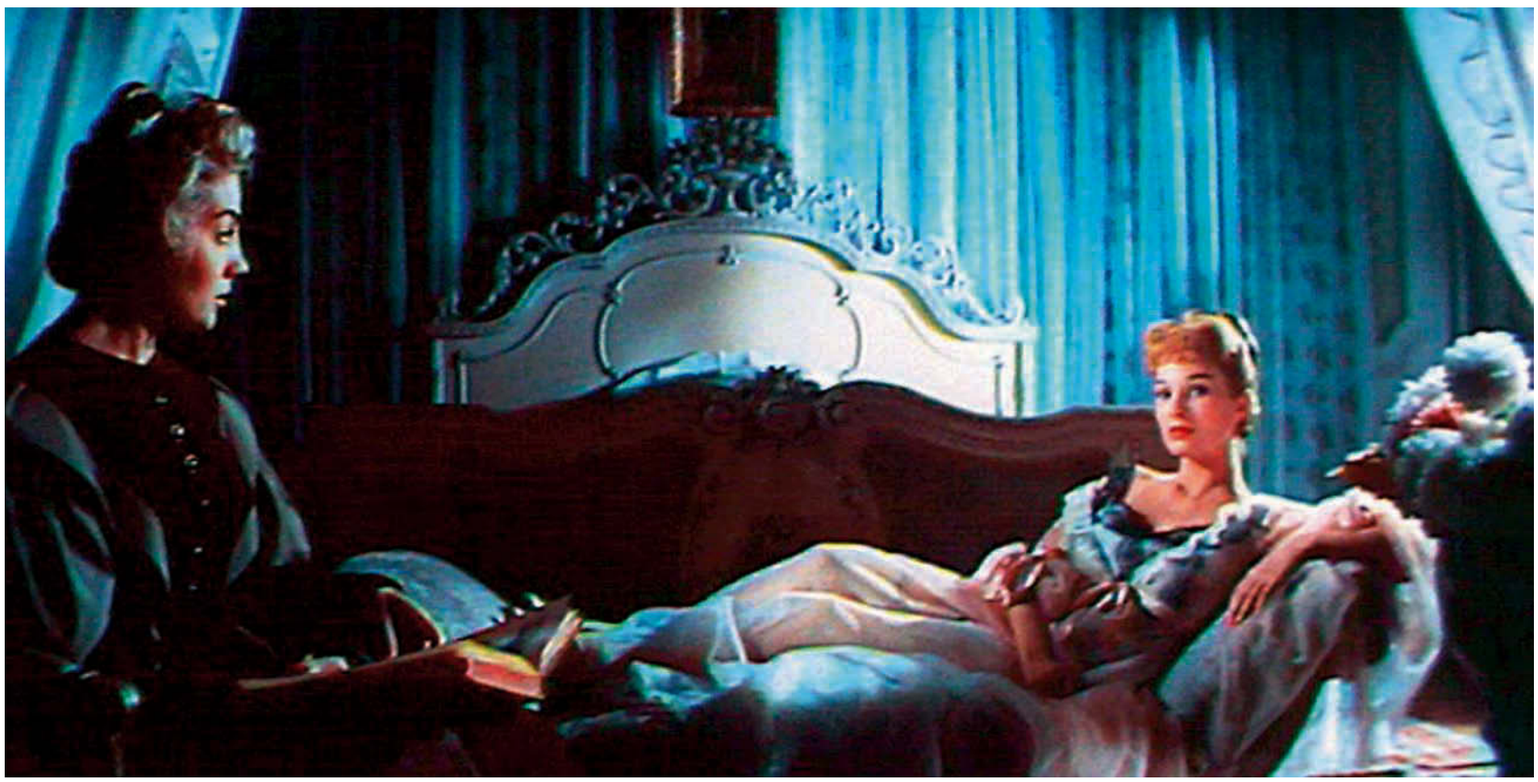
Completed in only eighteen days, Agi Murad il diavolo bianco is a handsome but overly dry adaptation of Leo Tolstoy's story "Hadji Murad" (written in 1904, following his conversion to Christianity), about the conflict between Tsar Nicholas I (Milivoje Zivanovic) and the mountain peasants of the Caucasus, circa 1850:

The mountain folk are ruled by the aging Prince Shamyl (Nikola Popovic), but it is to their rebel hero Hadji Murad (known as "The White Devil") whom they look for leadership. After the brutal and fiery raiding of a Caucasus village by Russian troops, the soldiers receive their comeuppance at the hands of Hadji Murad (Reeves) and his men. Nicholas I is so scandalized that his national defense has been bested by rural rebels that he fires all but one of his military advisors; the remaining one, Prince Sergei Vorontzov (Gérard Herter), is spared only because the Tsar lusts for his wife Princess Maria (Scilla Gabel), who has diplomatically deflected his advances. To spare himself continued humiliation, he sends the Prince and Princess to St. Petersburg, where the Prince is empowered to negotiate with the enemy. En route, Maria's coach is met by Cossack robbers, but Hadji Murad intercedes and has her jewels returned to her. They discuss their differences, which Hadji Murad boils down to this: "We only kill soldiers; they [the Russian soldiers] kill women and children."

Hadji Murad is the widower of a woman who died in childbirth. His young son, Yusep, is cared for by Sultanet (Giorgia Moll)—the daughter of Aslan Bey (Jovan Gec)—to whom Hadji Murad is engaged. His right to her hand is endangered by the attentions of the political scoundrel Akmet Khan (Renato Baldini), who seeks to take advantage of Hadji Murad's frequent absences by claiming Sultanet for his own. After scoring an important military coup by dynamiting the Russians' stronghold at Fort Tavarasan, Hadji Murad returns home triumphant, with a string of hostages, whose lives he promised would be spared. While distracted by the ensuing celebrations, Akmet Khan authorizes the killing of the prisoners, whose bodies are dragged into the midst of the festivities. Hadji Murad is expectedly outraged, which Akmet Khan uses to his advantage, suggesting that he must be in collusion with the Russians to want to spare their lives. The aging King Shamyl reluctantly agrees, and Hadji Murad criticizes him as old and feeble-minded if he can't recognize Akmet Khan's political maneuvering for what it is. Refusing to apologize for speaking the truth, the rebel leader rides out of town and elopes with Sultanet along the way.

They awake the next morning in the woods, surrounded by Russian soldiers. In an attempted escape, Hadji Murad is shot while Sultanet makes a successful getaway to the Caucasus. The hero is taken to hospital in St. Petersburg, where he is treated before meeting Prince Sergei—a wiry, monocled autocrat who takes sadistic pleasure in watching the truth being extracted from people. ("The King has lost all faith in humanity . . . he now believes only in me," he boasts.) Hadji Murad makes a nearly successful escape, but loses consciousness in the arms of Princess Maria, who comes to admire him. ("I believe you're a generous man, ready to sacrifice everything you believe in, and that," she sighs, resting her head on his massive chest, "is so fine . . .") Prince Sergei cruelly forces his captive to accept his terms by holding breakfast on a patio overlooking a firing squad trained on the hero's right hand man, Eldar (Mavid Popovic). Hadji Murad agrees to sign a peace treaty, but later reneges on his promise and is tortured—also because Sergei knows that his wife has fallen in love with the rebel leader. The hero agrees to sign the treaty, but only if Eldar is freed first. Prince Sergei agrees, but the two freedom fighters combine forces to make an escape on horseback—Hadji Murad heroically riding his stallion through the palace ballroom, where a party is in progress, to throw the tribute of a yellow rose into the hands of the surprised Princess Maria.



Meanwhile, back in the Caucasus, Akmet Khan has taken control after the death of King Shamyl. Sultanet has agreed to marry him in order to prevent the execution of Yusep, Hadji Murad's son. As the time of the ceremony nears, Hadji Murad rides into town with a small army he has gathered along the way. He slays Akmet Khan and the townsfolk gather around Hadji Murad and Sultanet in their moment of reunion and victory.

The screenplay of this lavish-looking production was written by Akos Tolnay and Gino De Santis. Tolnay was a Hungarian screenwriter of more than twenty years' experience, with such pictures as Zoltan Korda's Elephant Boy (1937), numerous 1940s films for director Ladislas Vajda, and G. W. Pabst's La concienca acusa (1952) among his credits. De Santis was newer at the job, but also had some fine accomplishments behind him, including Dino Risi's Viale della speranza (1953, which Bava had photographed) and Romolo Marcellini's Il tesoro di Rommel/ Rommel's Treasure (1955). De Santis would subsequently co-author Anton Giulio Majano's Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960), a film often incorrectly attributed to Mario Bava.

Tolnay and De Santis' script has only the broadest strokes in common with Tolstoy's novella, which was the renowned author's last work of fiction and his avowed favorite. The story opens with Hadji Murad already a fugitive from his homeland, a noble savage who prays regularly and swears vengeance on Shamil, an evil man closer to the character of Akmet Khan in the film, who has taken his wife and children hostage. Hadji Murad surrenders himself to Prince Vorontzov, and much of the story details the human relationship between the Cossack warrior and the Prince's family, which here includes a son. When the boy admires Hadji Murad's dagger, he makes an immediate gift of it to him. (In response, Princess Maria wittily observes that, if everyone were given what they expressed admiration for in St. Petersburg, the institution of marriage would be in a shambles.) There is no Sultanet, no romance angle, only a remarkable treatise on the horrors of war. It's easy to visualize Steve Reeves as the story's central character, and it would have been fascinating to see him portray the role as written, as someone savage and inarticulate, whose first request upon surrendering to the Prince is to be shown to someplace private where he may undress and pray—a sincere man trapped between the political intrigues of two warring countries, his intelligence and his fears expressed only through his eyes and through translators.

The story's most memorable scene occurs in the final chapter, as a pair of Cossacks arrive at Prince Vorontsov's fortress bearing a sack containing the severed head of Hadji Murad. As the head is lifted from the bag, Princess Maria runs in horror, while her young son insists on his right to kiss it, remembering the gift that Hadji Murad had once given him. The downbeat ending would have been considered unacceptable in the late 1950s, but Mario Bava may well have filed the scene away for his own future use, as it recalls an horrific highlight of his 1963 film I tre volti della paura.

Bava's admirers, and admirers of Steve Reeves, tend to dislike Agi Murad because it doesn't deliver very much of what we expect from these men. The film is colorful enough, if seen in a well-preserved print, but overly poised and restrained; it's a wedding cake of a movie—sweet, heavy, and ornately decorous, filling but unfulfilling. The assertive presence here is undeniably (and appropriately) Freda; Agi Murad is absolutely consistent with his other works, being a kind of outwardly formal, inwardly smoldering waxworks on the theme of thwarted desire. While not a correct adaptation of Tolstoy, it feels faithful simultaneously to the spirit of the author's writings and to the requirements of matinee entertainment; indeed, the only mistake it makes is trying to satisfy adult, rather than juvenile, audiences. There is far more talk than action, and seldom does Reeves strip down to flaunt his prize-winning physique. Despite Freda's renowned expertise with battle scenes, the ones found here have the impersonal feel of second-unit stuff, though Massimo De Rita confirms that Bava was behind the camera at all times during the Yugoslavian shoot. "Bava was extraordinary regarding the details," he enthuses. "He had a creative approach to the type of scene that he wanted to get. When these were complex, he showed us the way to realize them with storyboards. He was the first in Italy to work with storyboards, and they helped him determine precisely what he would need for the editing. When we were shooting battle scenes in Yugoslavia and there were [supposed to be] 500 horses, he drew exactly what he wanted; the black ones riding from left to right, the white ones from right to left. Everything was accurate. What a director usually did in ten days, Bava could give you in three. He used a very small quantity of film; all the directors at that time did an average of eight takes or more; Visconti sometimes shot as many as thirty, while Bava did four! He had an honest relationship with the producers, and didn't want them spending money that might be used for another film."[2]

BAVA helps actress Scilla Gabel to make the most of scope framing.

PRINCE SERGEI (Gérard Herter) asserts his cruel affections for wife Princess Maria (Scilla Gabel).

Though Bava was always on hand for the battle sequences, the film's star—though an able horseman—had little active participation in any of them. Reeves' stunts, including Agi Murad's climactic fight with Akmet Khan, were performed by his Ercole e la regina di Lidia stunt double, Sergio Ciani.

Reeves looks splendid in the picture, sporting a trimmed Van Dyke beard—and a healthy tan, which he attributed less to sunbathing than to his fondness for eating carrots and raisins, which gave him a naturally red/orange complexion—but his performance as Hadji Murad is smug and overly mannered. From Reeves' performance, one can easily believe Akmet Khan's accusation that Hadji Murad is less interested in fighting for freedom than in promoting his own legend. Watching a wrestling match held in his honor, he immediately challenges the victor and pins him down. As an actor, Reeves had not yet learned to modulate his performance between close-ups and long-shots, and much of his dialogue in close-up is delivered with far too much emphasis. Still, it's hard to imagine a presence that could have better represented this mythic character onscreen. Though he is given few opportunities to be his best, Reeves is probably more essential to this film than any of its other components, especially as Bava's camera ennobles him. Stanley Kubrick's Barry Lyndon (1975) may be the definitive example of this kind of adaptation, but for all his faults, Steve Reeves is a more compelling central figure than was Ryan O'Neal.

"Freda was a very good director," Reeves considered. "He explained every scene perfectly, like he was a friend instead of a director."[3] He liked working with Freda so well that, when he was organizing his first and only film as a producer, the Western Vivo per la tue morte/A Long Ride From Hell (1968), Reeves offered him the director's chair. Freda's asking price was reportedly too high, and the film was ultimately directed by Camillo Bazzoni.

Giorgia Moll (b. January 14, 1938) is well cast as Sultanet, her dark hair and eyes and pronounced cheekbones perfectly suiting the exotic geography of the story. Prior to this film, she had played a Vietnamese girl in Joseph L. Mankiewicz' film of Graham Greene's The Quiet American (1958). Moll's most indelible moment in Agi Murad is her donning of a wedding veil on the night that Hadji Murad has promised to elope with her, according to their people's custom; she wraps herself like a gift. She and Reeves worked so well together that they were later reteamed in Arthur Lubin's juvenile fantasy Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad (1961).

A more obvious attraction is represented by Scilla Gabel (born Scilla Gabellini in Rimini, ten days before Giorgia Moll, on January 4, 1938), who got her start in films as a swimming double for Sophia Loren in the ultimate "wet T-shirt" movie, Boy on a Dolphin (1957). One of the most haunting beauties of the Italian popular cinema of this period, Gabel had acted in a few earlier films, but Agi Murad was her first to gain a wide international release, and her performance helped her to gain sufficient recognition to be cast in John Guillermin's Tarzan's Greatest Adventure (1959), opposite Gordon Scott, Anthony Quayle, and newcomer Sean Connery. Though her screen career would ultimately encompass such films as Sodom and Gomorrah (1962), Modesty Blaise (1966), and a turn as Helen of Troy in Dino De Laurentiis' TV miniseries Odissea (1968, for which Bava would co-direct and design special effects sequences), her most impressive showcase was Giorgio Ferroni's delirious horror film Il mulino delle donne di pietra/Mill of the Stone Women (1960).

HADJI MURAD*'s strength is not enough to break the bonds that tie him to a Russian infirmary bed.*

FOREGROUNDING sells the illusion once again, as Reeves and other actors appear to ride toward this burning fortress—actually a glass matte construct of photography and painting, with smoke effects later added optically.

Stealing the film is Gérard Herter (real name: Gerhard Haerter) as Prince Sergei. Clearly Freda's favorite character, we understand Sergei even before we meet him, when his wife's beauty saves his status and position from utter ruin. In the next scene, he is introduced—in full uniform and monocle—trying to train a poodle by bullying it into obedience. He is an arch weakling, empowered by his wife and uniform, who lives to lord his ineffective power over the defenseless (his dog, the men in his torture chamber); indeed, he is aroused by weakness and suffering, as when he offers slimy comfort to his wife, who has fallen in love with Hadji Murad ("I envy him, he seems to have upset you . . ."), and in the final reel, he is deposed by a single punch. Freda was delighted by Herter's performance and would invite him back for a prime role in his next picture.

In his private life, Mario Bava was a bookish man, and an avid devotee of classic Russian literature, particularly the works of Dostoevsky and Gogol. At the time he shot Agi Murad, he had already read most of Leo Tolstoy's great works and clearly relished the opportunity to capture the pictorial essence of Tolstoy's clean, spartan yet scientifically precise prose. Agi Murad finds Bava moving resolutely toward the hyper-romantic Technicolor style he would perfect in 1963's La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, and delivering a picture that compares well even with Jack Cardiff's work on King Vidor's War and Peace (1956). He utilizes very little colored gel lighting—only indigo gels for studio night "exteriors," which he contrasts with soft amber gels to suggest the subtle tensions between coolth and warmth, harsh nature and comfortable shelter. He lights the actors principally from behind, from low angles, or from the side, limning them in strong white light and leaving their faces in some degree of sculpting shadow. Such chiaroscuro somehow heightens the film's heroic dimension, likening the characters to engravings, and his painterly application of strong delineating backlight and buttery, diffuse key lighting renders Scilla Gabel impossibly beautiful in her first scene, as Maria politely fends off the bearish advances of Nicholas I. An even more fascinating visual innovation here is Bava's use of ambient smoke to soften or diffuse the backgrounds of interior shots, in order to bring the actors into bolder relief compositionally. The use of smoke as a diffusion tool would not become widely embraced by other cameramen until the 1970s and '80s, when cameramen like Douglas Slocombe (Close Encounters of the Third Kind) and Jordan Cronenweth (Blade Runner) discovered how useful it could be in terms of defining beams of light. Today, after decades of running riot in music videos, ambient smoke diffusion has become a veritable cliché of cinematography, but this film identifies Bava as one of the technique's earliest innovators.

2 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

3 LeClaire, 190.

The film is well-stocked with widescreen shots of beautiful women in reclining poses, but the great cinematic setpiece is Hadji Murad and Sultanet's awakening in a woods teeming with Russian soldiers. Bava was usually at his weakest when shooting on location, but here he managed the unexpected, if not the impossible, by creating the film's most purely visual sequence out-of-doors. The scene opens with a shot of autumn leaves falling slowly to the ground, waking the two lovers as they settle softly on their faces. (In retrospect, the moment mildly recalls Elke Sommer's nude awakening under a blanket of leaves during the finale of Bava's 1973 film Lisa and the Devil.) Once the confrontation between the soldiers and the lovers begins, Hadji Murad's shooting of a Russian soldier is depicted with a very obvious nod to Sergei Eisenstein's Bronenosets Potyamkin/Battleship Potemkin (1925). When the camera pulls back far enough from the ensuing action to show tall, diagonal sheets of morning light shimmering through the trees, this background lighting effect—assisted once again with ambient smoke—remains constant for the duration of the sequence, which ends with the overcome Hadji Murad lying on the ground, surrounded by a circle of lowered bayonets—an image which quotes a shot found in Freda's Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio, a shot which Bava may have photographed. What is most fascinating about this image is not the coincidence that a similar composition appeared in an earlier Freda film, but with a scene that would take place in Bava's own life in the near future, during the filming of Le meraviglie di Aladino/The Wonders of Aladdin (1961)—his next trip out of town.

An important member of Freda's crew on this picture was Filippo Sanjust, an unusual case of a screenwriter who doubled as a costume designer. Sanjust started out in movies writing dialogue for Lionello de Felice's comedy I tre ladri ("The Three Thieves," 1954), starring Totò. That same year, he contributed to the script of Giacomo Gentilomo's Le due orfanelle ("The Two Little Orphans"), based on the novel by Alexandre Dumas, which Riccardo Freda would remake in 1965. Sanjust's wardrobe design for Agi Murad is truly eye-popping, and Steve Reeves—seen here in everything from sheepskin turbans to fur coats and black satin tunics—was also apparently impressed by the glamor and fit of his work; Sanjust would design the costumes for his next several pictures. In 1971, Sanjust illustrated an edition of W. H. Auden's Academic Graffiti, and today, he is regarded as one of the world's most admired visionaries in the field of opera. For over thirty years, he has directed, designed, and wardrobed over 100 productions, which have been presented on all the great opera stages of the world—including a number of historic collaborations with Luchino Visconti.

HADJI MURAD is captured by the Russian Army (above) in a composition that strongly recalls the climactic defeat of Theodora (Gianna Maria Canale) in Riccardo Freda's earlier TEODORA IMPERATRICE DI BISANZIO, a scene possibly photographed by Bava.

Agi Murad is also noteworthy for its bravura score by Roberto Nicolosi (credited in American prints as "Roberto Nicolsi"), who would later score Bava's first several films as a director. Nicolosi was born in Genoa, Italy, on November 16, 1914. As a boy, he studied piano and violin, and added trumpet to his repertoire in 1936. Breaking into the entertainment business as an arranger, Nicolosi made his first impressions as a member of a jazz trio that also featured Armando Trovajoli, and in the 1950s, he made a series of cool jazz and bop recordings based on his own arrangements for the Columbia label, including a 1953 recording entitled Morbido. He also made himself known as a music critic, documenting concerts and new recordings for the journals Illustrazione italiana and Settimo giorno. He started scoring motion pictures in 1954. At this point in his career, all of his previous films had featured actors with whom Bava had closely worked: Carlo Lizzani's Lo svitato (1955; Giorgia Moll), José Antonio de la Loma's La morte ha viaggiato con me (1957; Lidia Alfonsi), Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia's La Gerusalemme liberata/The Mighty Invaders (1957; Rik Battaglia, Gianna Maria Canale, Sylva Koscina), and La rivolta dei gladiatori/The Warrior and the Slave Girl (1958; Gianna Maria Canale, Georges Marchal). The last film, particularly, sharing two of Freda's recurring stars, indicates a sure path to Freda's attention and his subsequent hiring for this production.

Extravagantly budgeted at $500,000—nearly five times the cost of each of the Hercules pictures—Agi Murad il diavolo bianco earned less than half of the individual take of those blockbusters at the Italian boxoffice when it was released on June 21, 1959. It was not acquired for US release until Warner Bros. picked it up for off-season distribution in 1961; it also opened that same year in Great Britain and Spain. It performed extremely well in America, even without the involvement of Joseph E. Levine who was, by now, producing new Reeves films on his own. As The White Warrior, the film recouped $768,000 in domestic rentals—more than three times the profit it enjoyed elsewhere around the world. Contrary to the film's much faded reputation, it was a bigger US boxoffice hit than Bava's own directorial debut, Black Sunday, which earned slightly less when it opened in America that same year.

The English-language version of the film features many of the voices familiar from the Levine dubs of the Hercules pictures: Reeves is once again dubbed by George Gonneau (as is Prince Sergei), Brett Morrison dubs Akmet Khan and Prince Shamyl, and in a bit of unfortunate retrospective casting, the voice of Hadji Murad's young son Yusep is provided by June Foray, who uses the same voice she gave to Jay Ward's cartoon character Rocky the Flying Squirrel! Foray's instantly recognizable voice makes the scenes with the boy play to American audiences today as unintentionally comic—as does Reeves' unfortunate line, "We've been lucky . . . We've had several skirmishes with the Russians—and we've taken much booty."

Targeting young audiences with The White Warrior, Warners cut the film from its original length of 98 minutes to 86 minutes. Among the cuts were a good deal of historical exposition, some explicit brutalities during the opening village raid, some punishments in the torture chamber, and the decapitation of one of Hadji Murad's men. New inserts of handwritten letters and hand-drawn maps, both in the English-language, were also shot and added. In the hope of restoring (or imposing) some narrative clarity, recurring narration was added by Marvin Miller (1913–85), best remembered as the voice of Robby the Robot in Forbidden Planet (1956) and as the star of the US television series The Millionaire (1955). During his long and varied career, Miller provided narration for a number of movies, including such disparate works as Gerald McBoing-Boing (1951), Godzilla, King of the Monsters! (1956, the US version of Ishiro Honda's Gojira), The Day the Earth Froze (1959, the US version of Aleksandr Ptushko's Sampo), Walt Disney's Sleeping Beauty (1959), and the African adventure film Maya (1967).

US insert poster.

Agi Murad il diavolo bianco marked the onset of an identity crisis that would plague the rest of Steve Reeves' film career to some extent. He wanted to try his hand at other roles, but the fact that he followed Agi Murad with Carlo Campogalliani's Il terrore dei Barbari ("Terror of the Barbarians," 1959)—virtually a Hercules film, albeit set in a more down-to-earth, contemporary milieu (568 A.D. in Northern Italy)—suggests that there may have been something more to his break with Pietro Francisci and the character of Hercules than was ever admitted, possibly something to do with Bava's assumption of many of the directorial duties on Ercole e la regina di Lidia. The Italian release of Il terrore dei Barbari actually earned about 150 million lire [$94,000] less than Agi Murad, but it would enjoy a much greater success in the international market.

Il terrore dei Barbari was the first Italian film acquired for US distribution by American International Pictures, which they bought in a package with Nel segno di Roma/Sign of the Gladiator. The fact that Reeves played a character named "Emilio" had not prevented the film from being released in Germany as Herkules, die Schrecken der Hunnen ("Hercules, Terror of the Huns"), but AIP showed uncommon tact by not following suit. They certainly would have been within their rights to do so. "Hercules was a public domain figure," Arkoff acknowledged, "but we didn't want to come out with another Hercules picture with the same star," out of loyalty to AIP's former Boston office manager, Joseph E. Levine. Therefore, when Il terrore dei Barbari was delivered to Titra Sound Corporation in New York, it was decided that Reeves' character would be rechristened with the Biblical name "Goliath" and that the English version would be called Goliath and the Barbarians. My research was unable to uncover any evidence or suggestion of Bava's clandestine involvement in Il terrore dei Barbari, which would make it the first of Reeves' Italian films to be made without him.

Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei

After his Yugoslavian stint, Mario Bava returned to Rome in time to spend the holidays with his family. His next credited project would not begin shooting until the following summer, which leaves his first five months of 1959 officially unaccounted-for.

Considering the crucial role Bava had played in Steve Reeves' earlier Italian pictures, one naturally suspects that he must have played some covert role in the making of Reeves' next picture, Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei/The Last Days of Pompeii (1959). This was the latest film version of Edward Bulwer-Lytton's best-selling novel, which had been previously filmed in 1897 and 1900 (in Britain, as short films), 1913 (Italy, directed by Mario Caserini), 1926 (Italy, co-directed by Carmine Gallone and Amleto Palermi), and 1935 (US, by King Kong director Ernest B. Schoedsack). Reeves was cast as Glaucus, a centurion who returns from victorious battle to Pompeii, where he discovers his ancestral home ransacked and his father the latest of many Pompeiians murdered by masked assassins who sign the scenes of their crimes with Christian crosses. Subsequently, the government rounds up local Christians as lion fodder, including Ione (Christine Kaufmann), the beloved of Glaucus. With the help of a charming thief named Antonius (Angel Aranda), Glaucus discovers that the Christians have been framed for political reasons by Arbacès (Fernando Rey), the devious High Priest of Pompeii, who has been working in league with the ambitious Julia (Barbara Carroll). Glaucus escapes their death trap to defend the Christians against the lions in the arena, with some last minute help from Antonius and friends.

Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei was a transitional title in the history of the peplum because it was the first of the international co-productions to emerge in the genre, pooling monies and talent not only from Italy and America, but also from Spain, West Germany, France, and Monaco. This simplified the film's financing but complicated everything else about it. The direction was credited to Mario Bonnard, working from a script by Ennio De Concini,[4] Sergio Leone, Luigi Emmanuele, Duccio Tessari, and Sergio Corbucci. The script is very tired, a sort of compendium of scenes from other pepla written by these men, rather than a proper adaptation of the novel. The undisguised lifts from Reeves' own small body of work are particularly grating; to list the similarities to Le fatiche di Ercole alone, Glaucus meets Ione while rescuing her from a runaway chariot; the villainous Arbacès is in league with the thone; Glaucus is wounded and nursed back to health by a woman (Julia) later revealed as sinister; and the last reel finds Glaucus imprisoned in chains, which he manages to rip from the walls after intense effort to effect an escape and topple the idols of the evildoers High Priest. The picture was lensed by cameraman Antonio López Ballesteros mostly in Andalusia and Madrid, where troubles quickly set in. Bonnard fell ill shortly after filming began, leaving his assistant Sergio Leone to take over. Reeves did not appreciate Leone's argumentative, dictatorial approach to directing, and the two men did not get along. While Leone supervised the main unit in Spain, Sergio Corbucci was hired to direct second unit action scenes back in Rome at Cinecittà, with Enzo G. Barboni behind the camera. Reeves, accustomed to more genial directors, was offended by Leone's loudly autocratic, insistent style of directing; the two men did not get along, and the flustered Reeves also had to contend with the additional challenge of acting opposite German and French voices.

US insert poster.

POMPEII is seen intact at the foot of Mt. Vesuvius in this glass matte painting created for the film by Mario Bava.

To make matters worse, early in the filming, Reeves suffered an accident that limited the physicality of his performance and would indeed impact the future course of his movie career. While filming a scene in which he was required to jump from horseback onto a runaway chariot carrying co-star Christine Kaufmann and drive it to a safe halt, he dislocated a shoulder. Reeves snapped it back into place himself, hearing "a loud thump." Things were okay until the next day, which called for Reeves to swim twenty yards under water set aflame with diesel fuel.

"I used the breast stroke, but found halfway through the stunt that with each stroke I could hear shoulder ligaments crunching and ripping," he remembered. "For obvious reasons, I couldn't surface and couldn't stop, so I miraculously forced myself to complete the swim. The damage to my shoulder was massive." [5]

Such problems ran rampant behind the scenes, and it shows onscreen. Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei may be more superficially entertaining than the overly stoic Agi Murad il diavolo bianco, but the film has little other than familiarity going for it. It's neither particularly scenic nor well-designed, the voluptuous Barbara Carroll appears to have been cast solely for her ability to fill Anita Ekberg's old Nel segno di Roma wardrobe, and the movie has little truth to offer about life in ancient Pompeii or the full, horrific extent of its destruction. Instead, it plays like a daisy chain of archetypal scenes and characters reprised from earlier pepla, staged without any of the excitement, charm, or the soufflé-light pageantry of the Francisci-Bava collaborations.

Mario Bava's only contribution to the picture—probably no more than a day's work on location—is the matte painting of Pompeii that Glaucus and his fellow centurions view from a distance, about 7 minutes into the picture. "You would never think that a volcano would mean anything to a man," one of them says sentimentally, as the camera cuts away to a panoramic glass matte of the fabled city, nestled intact in the valley at the foot of Mt. Vesuvius. It's a brilliant collage effect—part painting, part clip-art, and part genuine foliage—occupying only the top half of the frame; the painting cleverly incorporates unpainted areas, allowing actual cypresses to spring up amid the brushwork, helping it to more convincingly inhabit the location. Would that the production had obtained Bava's services to supervise the climactic eruption of Mt. Vesuvius! As is, the much-awaited sequence is quite pathetic, consisting of stock footage of the actual location overlaid with a fireworks optical, followed by cutaways to hapless extras scurrying among toppling, obviously lightweight set pieces, as sparklers shower down upon their heads. There is only one token shot of what we assume to be lava, looking more like raw sewage as it feebly engulfs a fleeing man's dropped personal treasures.

The main titles on United Artists' English-language prints of The Last Days of Pompeii are a madhouse of misinformation, crediting Leone only with second unit direction, billing the assistant cameramen below the camera operators, and attributing the special effects to "Magasoli" and "Erasmo Bacci." The former likely refers to one of two Spanish cinematographers, Augustín or Antonio Macasoli, both of whom were active at the time of filming. The latter was surely Eros Bacciucchi, who specialized in weapons and pyrotechnic effects. The Dizionario del cinema italiano additionally credits Cataldo Galliano with the film's special effects. If the formally uncredited Galliano was involved, it would have been in a minor capacity, as he had no previous screen credits.

Throughout the shooting of his next picture, and for years to come, Steve Reeves would suffer chronic shoulder pain from the accident he suffered while making this picture. More in demand than ever, and poised to sign an important contract with Joseph E. Levine, Reeves was beginning to ask himself how much longer he would be able to continue as an action star.

4 De Concini's involvement in this, and many other scripts written in the wake of the worldwide success of Hercules and Hercules Unchained, may be merely figurative. He admitted: "I [later] became a kind of honorary signatory for these [peplum] films, because everyone who made these sandaloni came to me to sign their scripts. Even if I had not written them, they paid me to sign them since, in a certain sense, I was regarded as the father of this type of film." In the same article containing this quote is another from Duccio Tessari, who reveals that De Concini also actively worked on several scripts at once: "Ennio at that time was like a magician. In each room of his house there was a producer waiting for his scripts, and he would move from one room to another, with the greatest of ease, in order to sort out each of these projects in turn." [Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers," Spaghetti Cinema 72, July 2000, 2–12.]

5 LeClaire, 197.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Valcarenghi (Studio Favalli).

CALTIKI

IL MOSTRO IMMORTALE

Caltiki the Immortal Monster

JUST AS Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei ends with a cataclysmic volcanic eruption, so would Mario Bava's next project begin. Though less expensively achieved than the explosion that showered Pompeii in the Bonnard/Leone film, the eruption that opens Caltiki il mostro immortale is by far the more memorable spectacle—and it is but one facet of a masterful procession of pre-titles illusions.

The sequence begins with three panning (right to left) shots of three panoramic glass mattes, each filmed separately. They are: (1) a twilight view of a Mayan plaza with a pyramid and towering sculpted columns, rising against a secondary rear matte of cloudy, airbrushed sky; (2) a view of an abandoned Mayan temple, adorned with stone idols, all riotously overwhelmed by plant life, with a background of actual fronds visible through the bare portions of the glass, as well as a backdrop of airbrushed storm clouds; and (3) a deeper jungle view consisting of a static lizard, more dense wilderness, and a carved leonine idol, again with real plant life and painted storm clouds visible on a layer behind the glass.

NIETO (Arturo Dominici) startles John and Ellen Fielding (John Merivale, Didi Sullivan) with his sudden, hysterical return to their Mayan campsite.

These individual shots are followed by an astounding, deep-focus, multiplane arrangement of all three glass mattes, further amended by an actual foregrounded tree branch and a new glass matte in the far background depicting a mountain capped by an active volcano. Monstrous clouds of roiling smoke begin to gush from the crater—a "cloud tank" effect produced by releasing a steady flow of white leaded powder into a water-filled aquarium placed directly behind the volcano matte. Since the powder would be dropped into the water tank from above, this means that this shot had to be achieved either by (1) positioning the tank behind the glass mattes and photographing them with the mattes and camera upside-down, or (2) by photographing the water tank effect upside-down and using the footage as a background plate to be inserted behind the mattes optically. (A later shot will disprove the first explanation.) There is a quick cut to a closer view of the activity, replacing the other layers with a single new foreground, which frames the volcanic action with a photo clipping of a stone Mayan deity, while adding additional verisimilitude with a foregrounded plant frond; the volcano's anger is now at its height, with someone's offscreen hand (possibly Bava's) adding a sense of thunder to its effusions by waving madly between the cloud and its diffuse backlighting. On cue, the camera begins to zoom in, and the film's title appears, over a closer background shot of the volcano, its smoke allowed to retain its momentum by editing together a total of five different pieces of film, consisting of cycled footage and outtakes; the cuts are mostly concealed by the scrolling main titles.

If La morte viene dallo spazio was "the stock shot film par excellence," Caltiki il mostro immortale afforded Bava an almost unprecedented opportunity to carry a film almost entirely with his illusions—it is "the low-budget special effects film par excellence." Its eponymous, immortal monster was nothing more than a heap of tripe, animated by various crude means. "It was summertime," Bava remembered jovially, "so the big problem was keeping the flies away from it!" [1] (Flies would certainly have caused some problems with scale.)

Amorphous, protoplasmic monsters like Caltiki had become very popular in the 1950s. They seem to have come into fashion when the public's increasing demand for realism in their postwar entertainment caused classic monsters like Dracula and Frankenstein to be temporarily retired. These shapeless, shuffling horrors were an acceptable substitute because they resembled what people now knew to be the essence of humankind under the lens of a microscope; they were as without form as the things that lurked in our subconscious, and could be an expressive metaphor for our unresolved fears about space travel as well as more earthly concerns, such as atomic power and nuclear radiation.

Caltiki il mostro immortale

"Caltiki the Immortal Monster"
Filmed at Titanus Studios (Scalera Film) and on location
January? – June 1959
First released: August 8, 1959
B&W, 1.66:1, 76 minutes

Production: Galatea (Rome) and Climax Films (Paris). Director: Robert Hamton [Riccardo Freda] and Mario Bava (uncredited). Screenplay: Philip Just [Filippo Sanjust], "based on an ancient Mexican legend." Director of photography: John Foam [Mario Bava]. Special effects: Marie Foam [Mario Bava]. Costume design: Philip Just [Filippo Sanjust]. Choreography: Paolo Gozlino. Production supervisor: Max De Ryte [Massimo De Rita]. Editor: Sir Andrews [Mario Serandrei]. Music: Robert Nicholas [Roberto Nicolosi]. Sound Effects: Carlo Rustichelli (uncredited). Distributor: Lux Film.

John Merivale (John Fielding), Didi Sullivan [Didi Perego] (Ellen), Gérard Herter (Max Gunther), Daniela Rocca (Linda), Gay Pearl (the dancer), Daniel Vargas [Daniele Vargas] (Bob), G. R. Stuart [Giacomo Rossi-Stuart] (lab assistant), Victor André [Vittorio André] (Prof. Rodriguez), Black Bernard [Nero Bernardi] (police commissioner), Arthur Dominick [Arturo Dominici] (Nieto), Daniele Pitani, Rex Wood.

Additional US credits: Producer: Samuel Schneider.

Belgium: Het Onsterfelijk Monster, Cosmopolis–Melior Films, 1962
France: Caltiki, le Monstre Immortel, Les Films Marbeuf, 1960
Germany: Caltiki Rätsel des Grauens, "Caltiki—The Mysterious Horror," Constantin Film, 5/6/60
UK: Caltiki the Immortal Monster, Warner Pathé Ltd., 1962, Certificate "X," passed with cuts
US: Caltiki the Immortal Monster, Allied Artists Picture Corporation, 9/20/60, 76m

Blobs had been a recurring motif in science fiction literature since the early 1920s, when Anthony Melville Rud's novella "Ooze" was published as the cover story of the March 1923 issue of Weird Tales magazine. In the late 1940s, James Blish published the story "Surface Tension," in which a group of miniaturized humans find themselves under attack by swarming amoebas. This situation was later explored in more detail by the Richard Fleischer film Fantastic Voyage (1966, based on a story by It! The Terror From Beyond Space author Jerome Bixby). 1953 was the breakthrough year for blobs, as three different stories appeared coincidentally in three different media, each with its own memorable, amorphous threat. The first was Joseph Payne Brennan's novella "Slime" (another Weird Tales cover story), about an ocean-dwelling blob that launches a reign of terror on dry land, after being propelled there by an undersea earthquake. In Danse Macabre, his overview of horror in media, Stephen King praised "Slime" as one of the best short horror stories of all time. (Had Bava encountered this classic story in Italian translation, it might well have caught his attention by having his own name for a title, since "bava" is the Italian word for "slime" or "drool.") A short time later, a Bill Elder story called "Outer Sanctum" appeared in the fifth issue of EC Comics' Mad, about a crazed scientist who dumped all of his liquid experiments into the Okeefenokee Swamp until there emerged "a horrible standing glob of swamp thing" called Heap.[2] In Great Britain, the summer of 1953 witnessed the true moment of galvanization: the live BBC broadcast of a six-part teleplay by Manx writer Nigel Kneale entitled The Quatermass Experiment, about the disastrous effects of "waves in space" on the passenger of England's first manned experimental rocket. In Kneale's serial, the astronaut returned to Earth in human form, but possessed of a reconfigured alien intelligence and metabolism that, by the serial's climax, had him physically absorbing anything he touched. In the amazing final broadcast, the tragic hero was shown slithering into Westminster Abbey as an immense, tentacled hodge-podge of plant fronds and protoplasm.

The Quatermass Experiment had a profound cultural impact in Britain. As it aired live on the BBC each Saturday night of July and August 1953, it proved so popular that streets throughout England were all but vacant during each weekend broadcast. In retrospect, it seems a bit mad that the BBC would have undertaken such an elaborate story without a special effects budget—remember, this was still the dawn of television drama—but Kneale and Company made do with what few resources they had.

"The monster's appearance, swollen to a hundred-foot mass of undulating fronds, presented problems," Kneale confessed in his Foreword to the published teleplay. "In the end I had to do it myself. Stuck through holes in a [photographic] blow-up of Poets' Corner were my own two hands in rubber gloves liberally stuck over with vegetation. I had prepared this model the night before, with my girl friend's help, in the crumbling studio where rain water dripped on us through the ceiling. Against the odds, it worked. The fuzzy cameras helped and the audience's imagination did the rest."[3]

Mario Bava would have approved. In fact, he would imitate these same rudimentary techniques in Caltiki il mostro immortale, though Caltiki had actually been inspired by a somewhat more polished example: Hammer Films' 1955 feature film The Quatermass Xperiment,[4] which was released in Italy in early 1959 as L'astronave atomico del Dott. Quatermass ("The Atomic Spaceship of Dr. Quatermass").[5]

Bava admitted in later years that Caltiki had been deliberately undertaken as "a take-off on The Quatermass Experiment."[6] However, by the time it was made, the world had been engulfed by several other examples of blobbery, including Hammer's X the Unknown (1956) and Quatermass 2/Enemy From Space (1957), and also the American film that ITALIAN locandina, art by Valcarenghi (Studio Favalli).

1 Luigi Cozzi, as quoted in Mark Frank, "Emanations," Photon 26, 1975, 4.

2 Mad 5, EC Comics, June/July 1953, 1–8. Mad's very first issue (titled Tales Calculated to Drive You Mad) in October – November 1952 had sported a front cover showing a family with backs up against the wall of a castle, asking "That Thing! That slithering Blob coming toward us! What IS it?" The issue also contained a Wallace Wood comic story titled "Blobs," but its content does not pertain to the subject under discussion.

3 Nigel Kneale, The Quatermass Experiment, (London, UK: Arrow Books, 1979), 7.

4 After the film (originally titled The Quatermass Experiment) received X certification from the British Board of Film Censors, Hammer struck upon the publicity value of retitling the film The Quatermass Xperiment. Prints exist bearing both titles. The film was subsequently released in America by United Artists as The Creeping Unknown, minus some footage.

5 In later years, after the Italian horror boom, it was reissued there as I vampiri dello spazio ("The Vampires From Space").

6 Cozzi, as quoted in Frank, "Emanations."

introduced actor "Steven McQueen"—Irwin S. Yeaworth Jr.'s The Blob (1958), which received Italian distribution in 1959 under the provocative title Fluido mortale ("Liquid Death").

The title Caltiki may have been inspired by inverting the syllables of the story's chosen location of Tikal. Another source could be the name of the Mayan sun god whose name was borne on Thor Heyerdahl's best-selling book Kon-Tiki (1950); this story of Heyerdahl's 1947 voyage by raft across the Pacific, from Peru to Tahiti, was made into an Oscar-winning documentary in 1951.

Caltiki's grounding in a nonexistent "ancient Mexican legend" about the imminent awakening of a long-dormant, ancient monster god also suggests the partial influence of the writer whom Bava would later declare his favorite: H. P. Lovecraft. The first official film adaptation of a Lovecraft story would not occur until Roger Corman's The Haunted Palace (1963, adapted from "The Case of Charles Dexter Ward" by Charles Beaumont), but Lovecraft's influence was apparent in earlier films, notably in William Cameron Menzies' haunting 3-D horror film The Maze (1953), about a woman who unknowingly marries into a family whose shut-away patriarch was born a frog. As mentioned earlier, Lovecraft's influence was also apparent in I vampiri, so it may also be the doing of screenwriter Filippo Sanjust, who also scripted the earlier picture. It isn't known to what extent Bava contributed to the story and script, but considering his absolute lack of credit for the departments he is known to have supervised, it is possible that the story of Caltiki was developed by Freda and Bava before Filippo Sanjust was brought in to actually put it all down on paper.

DIDI SULLIVAN and Gérard Herter collaborated on a set of promotional photos for CALTIKI that attractively combined cheesecake and looming menace.

Synopsis

British archaeologist Dr. John Fielding organizes an expedition to Tikal—a once-great Mayan city whose entire population (a narrator informs us) fled it under mysterious circumstances, never to return, circa 607 A.D. Fielding's campsite is disrupted one evening when Nieto, one of the expedition members, returns from an exploratory visit to a nearby cave in an hysterical state, crying out the name "Caltiki!" He has returned without his partner, Ulmer, so Fielding—along with his associates Bob and Max—go to the cave in search of their missing colleague. They find no trace of Ulmer, but his movie camera is retrieved at the edge of a sacrificial pool, where—centuries before—the pre-Columbian inhabitants of Tikal were bludgeoned and drowned in sacrifice to their goddess Caltiki, a carved likeness of whom overlooks the site. The statue is accompanied by a tributary inscription that reads, "Caltiki is One—the only immortal god—and when her mate appears in the sky, her power will destroy the world!" On the ground, Max finds a priceless golden bracelet encrusted with jewels, and the team resolve to return the next day with diving equipment to explore the bottom of the pool in search of other treasures. They leave the cave without discovering the horribly mutilated body of Ulmer, which lies undetected behind a pile of rocks.

That night, as Nieto sinks further into delirium, John has an argument with his wife Ellen, who is feeling ignored and impatient with this "second honeymoon." Max later makes an unwelcome pass at her, which is noticed by his girlfiend, the lovesick "halfbreed" Linda. "I didn't think you set out to capture that poor little millionairess," she sulks, making the film's only reference to the Fielding fortune. Meanwhile, Bob follows the sound of voodoo-like drums to a secret Mayan ceremony and decides to tempt Linda's warnings of "bad fortune" by sneaking a photograph; at the height of the ritual, he is seen by the principal dancer, who screams in violation.

The next day, the team returns to the cave. Bob's brief exploratory dive to the bottom of the pool confirms that there is much more treasure below for the taking, scattered amid the skeletons of the dead Maya. Going back below to retrieve as much treasure as possible, Bob is frightened by something (bad fortune?) and hauled back to the surface—his face eaten away by intense radiation. At that moment, an enormous blob rises from the lake, frightening the men from the cave. Max drops the treasure collected by Bob; then, going back to retrieve it, his right arm is engulfed by the monster. Unable to extract Max, Fielding grabs an axe and hacks off that section of the creature, which remains tight around Max's arm like a corrosive cast. The monster follows the fleeing men outside, and Fielding succeeds in destroying it by driving a truckload of gasoline into it. The flames reduce it to nothing, as Fielding looks on, aghast.

Back in Mexico City, after the death of Nieto, the monster's flesh is surgically removed from what is left of Max's arm; its corrosive effect has left the tissues mummified, and something alien has been introduced into his bloodstream that slowly begins to affect his sanity. John takes the fragment of the monster to the scientific institute of Prof. Rodriguez, where it is determined to be a unicellular organism "approximately 20,000,000 years" of age. (The next day's newspaper headlines round off this figure to "Billion Year Beast Discovered in Tikal!") Further experimentation establishes that the flesh-eating tissue increases dramatically in size and activity when exposed to radiation, but these deadly changes can be reversed by removing the radiation. Feeling guilty over the death of Nieto and Max's disfigurement, John takes a portion of the fragment home, where he hopes his study of its apparent immortality will somehow benefit humankind. Meanwhile, at the hospital, madness begins to seep into Max's brain. His rantings, shared with the doting Linda, are only obliquely threatening at first ("We were crazy to enter that cave . . . and now we'll all have to pay for it. All of us!") but soon grow frighteningly direct ("Now there's a power in me . . . I want to hurt Ellen! The way she talked to me, like spitting at me! You'll be hurt too, if you tell her . . . My fate is to bring force into the world!") Seeing how upset she is, Ellen invites Linda to be a guest in the Fielding home, where she and John live with their young daughter, Jenny.

That night, Max's madness reaches a fever pitch. He bludgeons his attending nurse to death and escapes the hospital to commence his reign of terror. Before this is discovered, a quiet night at the Fieldings' is disrupted by a call from the Institute—reason unknown, the monster is growing to enormous proportions and destroying the lab! Prof. Rodriguez—recalling the inscription found near the statue of the goddess Caltiki—has formulated a theory about the identity of her "mate in the sky," which is confirmed by a visit to the local observatory. In an outrageous coincidence, Rodriguez is told by Mexico City's leading astronomer that the conditions of that evening's sky are identical to those in place in the year 607 A.D. when the population of Tikal abandoned their city en masse. Currently in its closest approximation to Earth is the comet Arsinoe, which attains this proximity every 1352 years (!), bombarding our outer atmosphere with its radiation. Arsinoe is the "bridegroom"—the catalyst—Rodriguez has been dreading. Bathed in radiation that cannot be dispersed, Caltiki is now on a rampage!

As John surveys the damage at the Institute, Max (on the run from police) arrives at the Fielding home and tears out their telephone connections. Unable to reach John by phone, Rodriguez drives back to the Institute and, distracted by his thoughts of Arsinoe, veers off a narrow road to his death. Meanwhile, Linda takes food to Max in the cellar, foolishly believing that her love for him will wean him away from his hateful threats. Across town, John is informed about Arsinoe by the Observatory, and he realizes that he has left samples of the monster in his home laboratory. As he races back home to save his family, Max confronts Ellen; when Linda intervenes, Max shoots her in the stomach. At that moment, a crash is heard from the lab—Caltiki is growing and dividing into an army of blobs! As Max makes his move on Ellen, one of the creatures bursts through the door and engulfs him, dissolving the flesh from his screaming skeleton.

Ellen grabs Jenny from her room and tries to escape the house but the multiplied creatures have blocked all exits. In his rush to get home, John has been arrested for speeding by the Mexican police, who do not put much stock in his story about needing to save his family from giant monsters. Locked in a room, he breaks a window and fights his way to freedom. He is pursued by the police to his home, where the situation is quickly assessed. The army is summoned with flame throwers, while John uses a ladder to retrieve his wife and daughter from a window ledge. Finding the bottom rungs quickly engulfed by Caltiki, he tips the ladder and the three of them tumble safely to freedom. The monsters are quickly cowed by the flames, and the danger is soon ended.

Production

Riccardo Freda acknowledges in his foreword to this book that Caltiki il mostro immortale "should be regarded as Bava's first true film as a director," but La morte viene dallo spazio aside—the truth is somewhat more complicated.

"It wasn't really my film," Freda insisted to Luigi Cozzi. "It was about monsters, Medusas from space, and that's Bava's line of work; it's his genre. The film was born almost by accident, to help Bava. You see, during that period, Mario was a director of photography, both for my films and those by Pietro Francisci. It was truly his work that made Francisci a success, because that director would sit on the set and fall asleep . . . I insisted to Bava, for the sake of our friendship, that he break off with Francisci—and he did . . . but times were tough. His dog was sick, there were terrible taxes due . . . In essence, he had to work in order to live. So I met with him at his father's house and I proposed that we make Caltiki together; he accepted. I abandoned the film a couple of days before it was finished. I directed it, but it was more typical of Bava; I don't claim it as my own. The only aspect I remember with any fondness were the statues on the set, which I sculpted myself."[7]

To clarify these remarks, Freda abandoned the film a couple of days before its dramatic scenes were completed; after this, there remained two or three weeks of filming devoted entirely to special effects, which in this case amounted to over 100 individual effects shots for the 76-minute production. Bava was responsible for directing some of the film's most memorable dramatic scenes—including the opening sequence with Nieto in the Mayan ruins, which is as finished and identifiable an example of Bava's directorial technique as anyone could hope to find. He also oversaw the final editing of the picture with Mario Serandrei, furthering a creative bond which had begun with the Hercules films and would continue for years yet to come.

7 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 251.

Contrary to Freda's account, most of the dramatic scenes in Caltiki are very much in tune with his other work. Caltiki is Bava's film, roughly, to the same extent that La morte viene dallo spazio was a Bava film; the two movies actually have a good deal in common, and even share some of the same glass mattes (the giant observatory telescope, for example), stock footage (newspaper presses and headlines, radio operators, soldiers being mobilized), and sound effects (courtesy of the uncredited Carlo Rustichelli). In both cases, another director was responsible for the bulk of the dramatic/dialogue scenes, while Bava mostly supervised the extensive special effects shooting, the overall look of the picture, and the final editing. Of the two movies, Caltiki is vastly superior; if we excuse some painfully contrived plot twists and unkept promises, it is a very good example of this kind of monster movie. It is also distinguished by some of Bava's most impressive in-camera special effects, and—unless I am mistaken—his earliest use of the zoom lens. Zoom lenses were first developed at the turn of the century, but they remained complicated and cumbersome devices ill-suited for easy on-set adjustment. Zoom shots can be found in movies dating back to the silents, but in many cases, they were achieved optically or with heavy camera accessorizing and tremendous difficulty. It was only in 1959 that a lightweight and easily manageable zoom was introduced for 35 mm use in Italy, and Bava made the most of it, so much so that it would become something of a signature (and often criticized) touch in his later work as a specialist in the horror genre. Bava used the zoom to make his camera eye literally flinch from the shocks he staged in front of it.

The exact circumstances of Caltiki's production have remained something of a mystery—perhaps because Freda, having learned from his mistake with I vampiri, was determined to give the film every opportunity to be mistaken for a British or American picture. Beginning with this film, Freda adopted the pseudonym of "Robert Hamton," which he would augment to "Robert Hampton" on such future films as L'orribile segreto dal Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962) and Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963). Only on his horror films did this pseudonym appear; Freda continued to direct swashbucklers and period dramas under his own name.

BRITISH actor John Merivale won star billing for the first and only time playing second fiddle to a heap of tripe.

Very few credits actually appear on prints of Caltiki, which only adds to the murkiness surrounding the production. For example, the film contains no producer's credit. European sources list the picture as a co-production of Galatea (Rome) and Climax (Paris), but on Italian prints, Galatea's company credit appears only at the very end, tacked-on as an afterthought—yet production assistant Massimo De Rita confirms that the film was principally produced by Nello Santi of Galatea. Some sources list Samuel Schneider as the Climax production executive, though his name does not appear on French prints. Only the American prints distributed by Allied Artists bear the additional credit "A Samuel Schneider Presentation," which is as it should be, because Schneider was not actively involved in the film's production; he was the Allied Artists executive who acquired Caltiki for US distribution. His presentational credit also appears on other Italian imports picked up by the company, including Herod the Great and Son of Samson.

Another mystery surrounds Mario Bava's credits on the picture—namely, the complete and utter lack of them. Whenever Caltiki is discussed in print, it is always mentioned that Bava was credited as "John Foam" (for his camerawork) and "Marie Foam" (for his special effects), that editor Mario Serandrei was credited as "Mark Sir Andrews," and so on; however, these departments receive no onscreen credit whatsoever in the Italian, French, or American prints, nor do they appear anywhere in Allied Artists' sparse press materials. I have been unable to determine where these pseudonyms originated, but they can be traced back to the cast/credit information that accompanied Monthly Film Bulletin's condescending review of the film (as distributed in the United Kingdom by Golden Era) in March 1962.

Another curiosity is that various sources have attributed the film's score to two different composers, both previously associated with Freda: Roman Vlad (who scored I vampiri) and Roberto Nicolosi (Agi Murad il diavolo bianco). Though it is possible that cues written by both composers are heard in Caltiki, the bulk of its music is clearly Nicolosi's. It is melodically and rhythmically consistent with the lumbering Hans J. Salter-inspired work he would soon pen for La maschera del demonio.

As the screenplay is credited to Filippo Sanjust, we can assume (from his previous credits) that he was also in charge of the wardrobe department, and perhaps even supervised the production design—which is also otherwise uncredited.

FIELDING prepares to loosen Caltiki's unrelenting grip on Max's (Gérard Herter) arm with a hatchet.

Another source of confusion is the true chronology of production. Bava personally recalled working on some of the special effects in the summertime, but in one exterior shot during the climax, actor John Merivale's breath is clearly visible in the chill of night. Therefore, the live action portions of the film may have been shot much earlier in the year, or even prior to Agi Murad il diavolo bianco in November 1958; the live action of Caltiki looks more closely allied to the vintage of La morte viene dallo spazio. What we know for certain is that, regardless of when it was undertaken, Caltiki was completed by August 4, 1959, when it was delivered to the Italian censor board, who approved it for release through Lux four days later.

Cast

The film's casting was certainly supervised by Riccardo Freda, and it follows his traditional pattern: an aloof leading man and a voluptuous starlet, surrounded by a mysterious cortége of grotesques.

Cast as Dr. John Fielding was Canadian actor John Merivale. Born in Toronto, Ontario, on December 1, 1917, Merivale moved with his family to Los Angeles as a youngster and began his movie career in James Whale's The Invisible Man (1933), playing a newsboy. He later resurfaced as the pilot of the HMNZS Achilles in Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's The Battle of the River Plate/The Pursuit of the Graf Spee (1956), and had his most memorable roles as Robbie Lucas in Roy Ward Baker's film of the Titanic disaster, A Night to Remember (1958), and as the eponymous character in John Huston's The List of Adrian Messenger (1963). His screen credits come to an end in the mid-'60s with Stanley Donen's Arabesque (1966). He died of kidney failure on February 6, 1990, in his adopted city of London, England.

Merivale's appearance in Caltiki il mostro immortale was a career anomaly; he made no other Italian pictures, and he doesn't particularly shine in this one. A competent actor though lacking charisma, he seems to fade into the woodwork even during his heroic scenes and takes no relish in his "love" scenes with co-star Didi Sullivan—young enough to be his daughter, actually—planting all of his kisses paternally on her cheek—even during their "second honeymoon."

Didi Sullivan was a pseudonym used by Italian actress Didi Perego in her earliest screen appearances. Born Aida Perego in Milan on April 13, 1937, Didi was a model before she turned to acting in 1959. In addition to Caltiki, she also made Jean Boyer's Le Confident de ces Dames (with Ugo Tognazzi and Sylva Koscina) and Gillo Pontecorvo's Kapo (with Emanuelle Riva and Susan Strasberg) that year, the latter marking her first appearance under her "serious" name. She had a long, low-profile yet notable career that managed to dodge "lower" Italian genres like the pepla and Spaghetti Westerns in favor of more "respectable" international cinema assignments. Among her films are such highlights as René Clement's Che gioia vivere/The Joy of Living (1960, with Alain Delon), Gianni Puccini's Amore facile (1964, with Barbara Steele), Steno's Diabolik spook Arriva Dorellik/How to Kill 400 Duponts (1967), Sidney Lumet's The Appointment (1968), and several films for French director Philippe De Broca in the early 1970s, beginning with Les Caprices de Marie/Give Her the Moon (1970, with Valentina Cortese). Her biggest film was Ettore Scola's international hit La Nuit de Varennes (1982), with Marcello Mastroianni, and her last was the horror-themed Cattiva/The Wicked (1991), with Erland Josephson and Julian Sands. She was later diagnosed with cancer, which claimed her life on June 28, 1993.

Perego isn't given much to do in Caltiki—other than to smoke petulantly, offer sisterly advice to Linda, and proffer her cheek dutifully to her husband—but she is undeniably fetching while dodging blobs in a transparent nightgown. She has much greater impact in a series of marvelous publicity poses that were included in the film's stills sets. These are a testament to Perego's modelling skills, and in their own way, classic examples of movie exploitation art.

As in Agi Murad il diavolo bianco, Gérard Herter steals Caltiki (from everyone but Bava) with an imposing, leering, malevolently cranked-up performance. His character of Max Gunther is obviously based, loosely, on the character of the alien-infected astronaut played by Richard Wordsworth in The Quatermass Xperiment. But whereas Wordsworth's performance seethes with evil in its insect-like poise and passivity, Herter becomes inflamed by his infection and becomes a combination of Richard Widmark on his maddest day, and the kind of crazed, railing German maniac that we associate with Peter Lorre, Martin Kosleck, or Klaus Kinski. One of Herter's greatest gifts as an actor, at least in the context of the films he made with Freda and Bava, was knowing how to relate to the camera, how to incorporate light and shadow into his performance. One of his most effective moments is the revelation, in his hospital bed, of the theretofore unknown damage to his neck and face—which is put before us at the precise moment he turns sharply toward Merivale and says the word "face."

Max's death was filmed with the same red/green makeup/lighting technique that Bava had used to age Gianna Maria Canale in I vampiri. As Caltiki's flesh-eating wattles enfold him, blood gushes from the edge of his mouth as his cheeks and eyes appear to sink in. It's a very brief glimpse, but more was apparently filmed, judging from a production still that shows Herter in an unused, intermediary pose, wearing more aged makeup and grimacing to accentuate the natural lines in his face and lips.

Caltiki also marked Bava's first experience of working with actress Daniela Rocca, with whom he would work several times on various Galatea productions. Born September 12, 1937, in Catania, Sicily, Rocca started acting in Franco Brusati's Il padrone sono me . . . and Giuseppe Vari's Addio sogni di gloria (both 1955), rose to main roles in Robert de Nesle's French production Marchands de Filles (1957), and played her first peplum role of Naomi in Fernando Cerchio's Giuditta e Oloferne/Head of a Tyrant (1958). In 1959, she made her first films for Galatea, Caltiki as well as Mario Mattoli's Non perdiamo la testa, and the affiliation would continue for most of her career. A very glamorous woman, Rocca would give her finest performance as the bovine, mustached wife of Marcello Mastroianni in Pietro Germi's Galatea-produced Divorzio all' italiana/Divorce Italian Style (1961). In Caltiki, Rocca is badly cast as the dejected Linda, and she responds to the role accordingly, looking appropriately bored and embarrassed throughout. Her only concessions to her character's heritage are a stereotypical, double-braided hairstyle and stoic attitude, and her prominence in the plot only serves to make her appear more ridiculous than the paunchy Italian extras darkened-up to play the Fielding expedition's native guides.

US one-sheet poster.

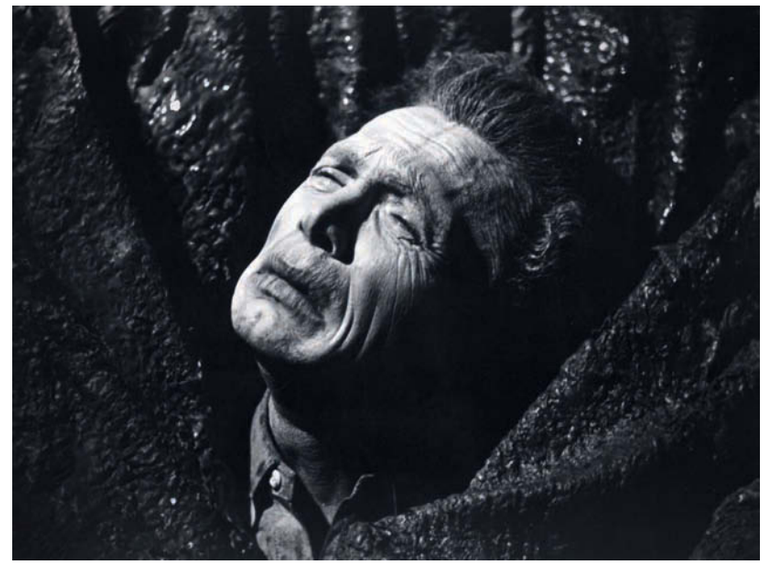
Vittorio André, who plays Prof. Rodriguez, had previously worked with Bava in Luciano Emmer's Terza liceo (1954). Sometimes credited as "Victor André," he also worked with Emmer in Il momento bello (1957), and later appeared in a select number of horror and fantasy films, including Giulio Questi's La morte ha fatto l'uovo/Plucked (1967), the Dario Argento-scripted Probabilità zero/Probability Zero (1968, directed by Maurizio Lucidi), and Antonio Margheriti's juvenile fantasy L'inafferrabile invincibile Mr. Invisibile/Mr. Superinvisible (1970). He has only a few scenes in Caltiki, and what is most mysterious about his participation is the extreme suddenness of his exit—one of the most abrupt dismissals of a character since Bela Lugosi walked offscreen into the path of an unseen car in Plan 9 From Outer Space. As we see Rodriguez' roadster take an unexplained swan dive off the shoulder of a narrow road, the viewer can only surmise that the actor was prevented from completing his role by illness, or lack of funds, and had to be removed from the story by drastic measures.



Also on hand are Giacomo Rossi-Stuart—still in the early "lab assistant" phase of his career, but handling his role with efficiency—and Arturo Dominici, whose opening scenes in the film are a tour de force demonstration of Bava's ability to create horror and spectacle with little more than an actor, a camera, and his own two hands.

Commentary

The first image in Caltiki il mostro immortale (after the volcanic prelude described above) shows Nieto's (Dominici's) hands reaching up—seemingly out of the ground, but actually scrabbling for a handhold to pull himself onto higher ground. This shock image was meaningful enough to Bava that he would quote it a few times in the course of his later career, most famously in the introduction of Dominici's character Javutich in La maschera del demonio. After a glimpse of Nieto's frightened face, we cut to a pyrotechnic explosion of showering sparks, followed by a backlit view of Nieto stumbling in silhouette over a few scattered rocks, enveloped in darkness. In the next shot, he is frightened by the sight of a human skull in his path, a large snake slithering through its open jaws. The cut-away shot is bracketed by a zoom out from Nieto's face and a zoom in, which perfectly imitates the involuntary tendency of the eye to leap toward a shocking image, to "capture" it, as the body simultaneously recoils. (This shot demonstrates Bava's remarkable mastery of his new zoom lens.) Nieto moves on, and there are two more brief shots of him, viewed from different angles, as he passes by an arrangement of rocks, piled and placed differently within the frame to suggest his progress; it seems like he's walking and walking for miles, but Dominici himself has scarcely taken more than a few steps in the entire sequence. Next, in a perfectly realized in-camera interfacing of actor and matte, we see Nieto stagger through the Mayan plaza that provided the first image in the movie; Dominici stays strictly below the matte line of Bava's impressive panoramic view, and with the two elements viewed through a common day-for-night filter, he is absolutely, convincingly there. Next, topping even this shot, we cut to Bava's multi-plane matte shot, and Dominici appears at a believable distance through an unpainted area of the matte; he moves on, disappearing, and then reappears in close-up—crossing the frame between the foremost layer of the matte and a bare, foregrounded tree, cleverly placed there to lend a persuasive dimension of reality. In the background of the shot, throughout the take, the volcano continues to spew a lazy plume of smoke from the cloud tank behind that rearmost matte, so that the entire shot consists of a total of six layers, spanning from the tree to the tank. This entire sequence depicts nothing that exists outside reality, but up to now, virtually all that we have seen has been an elaborately staged illusion.

MAX (Gérard Herter) corners Ellen (Didi Sullivan) alone at home, only to become engulfed in the radioactive folds of Caltiki.

CALTIKI: A sampling of Italian fotobuste.

Tikal (the supposed location of this sequence) is the oldest and largest of the ancient Mayan cities, located in north-central Petén, Guatemala—and an inspired choice of alternative location for an Italian horror movie. Like Rome, Tikal is an ancient city covering a hilly landscape with great monuments dating back to pre-history—temples, pyramids, palaces, and, above all, ruins. The difference is that, after 600 years of extraordinary advancement in the realms of mathematics, agriculture, astronomy, and art, 90% of Mayan civilization would abandon its major cities and die out by 1100 A.D. Caltiki speculates on the cause of this mass exodus, but it remains one of the world's great mysteries. The mystery appeals to us all, but particularly to a Roman sensibility, a ghost town like Tikal must embody the saying, "There but for the grace of God go I."

Caltiki might have had more resonance, in hindsight, had Dr. Fielding brought the living samples of the monster back to a home in Rome, rather than to Mexico City. As it is, one of the movie's great faults is that its later scenes in Mexico City in no way attempt to create an illusion of that metropolis that would match, or perhaps top, its early recreations of Tikal. Since the dawn of giant monster movies, beginning with Willis O'Brien's stop-motion brontosaurus raid on London in The Lost World (1925), audiences have been conditioned to expect an inevitable conflict between the respective collossi of antiquity (monster) and modern civilization (city). The American advertisements for Caltiki the Immortal Monster also actively encouraged such expectations, boasting a "Slimy Glob of Death Engulfs the World!" over artwork depicting skyscrapers being toppled and crushed by Caltiki's awful tumult. Instead, the movie gives us only the attack on the isolated Fielding home, which is nevertheless well-done. In their rush to an early ending, the filmmakers conveniently forgot to track the fate of the other blob that grew and broke free from the scientific institute, presumably somewhere near the heart of Mexico City. Perhaps it's just as well; as it is, the film reveals only the most cartoonish awareness of the reality of Mexican or even Mayan life in the 20th century (the Maya were not erased from the Earth, and still number over 4,000,000 people today). The "halfbreed" character of Linda is such a broad stereotype she might have been modelled on someone's doll of a Native American woman; the Mayan religious ceremony which Bob surreptitiously views is more akin to a Caribbean voodoo dance out of I Walked With a Zombie; and Fielding's arrest for speeding by the Mexican police is a TV sitcom cliché all the way.

Caltiki is also severely weakened by its penchant for soap opera, which is forever digressing from the increasingly cosmic problems at hand to ponder the dreary and unoriginal amatory lives of its principals. Regardless of the steps taken to dissociate the film from its Italian origins, these scenes betray the filmmakers' inescapable rooting in the tastes and traditions of their own national cinema. Caltiki may deny being Italian, but it is clearly reaching out to an Italian audience. Uncertain of winning them with its homespun science fiction, it also reaches out to them with the one-dimensional complexities of its cast of melodramatic stereotypes (the "distracted scientist," the "ignored wife," the "jealous rival," the "devoted, moping masochist," etc.), and in these departments, it fails miserably. Fortunately, the rest of the film has more than sufficient value to make the rest worth enduring.

When Bava referred to Caltiki il mostro immortale as a "take-off" of Hammer's The Quatermass Xperiment, he may have meant that it was literally written from the earlier film's template, because the two stories share a number of corresponding points in common. In most cases, such studied imitation would result in redundancy and tedium, but in this case, the filmmakers were inventive enough to build on the previous film's ideas with new twists of their own. Victor Caroon, the returning astronaut of The Quatermass Xperiment, is similar to Caltiki's Max Gunther: both are cold men doted over by women characters despite their lack of reciprocation; both are hospitalized after suffering injuries to their hands; both escape violently from hospital; and both elude manhunts by police to have close encounters with children that the audience worries will be fatal. Both men are subsumed into the ultimate horror that confronts the films' respective heroes, and whereas Caltiki opens in a temple, The Quatermass Xperiment concludes in one: Westminster Abbey. The most arresting of the films' similarities, however, is their shared use of faux documentary film footage to trace the moment of origin for their respective horrors.

In The Quatermass Xperiment, Dr. Bernard Quatermass (Brian Donlevy) learns what the sole survivor of his three-manned rocket flight is unable to tell him by viewing a silent filmed record of the voyage. Thus, documentary footage reveals that the rocket was bathed in a series of unexplained "space waves." In Caltiki, the untold story of Nieto and Ulmer's initial expedition to the cave is told when their 8 mm movie camera is found at the edge of the sacrificial pool. Once developed, the film (we're told that it was photographed by an Indian guide) shows the two men descending the hill from the encampment toward the cave, where they discover a priceless Mayan bracelet, and then react in horror to an offscreen threat that cuts the footage short. What is most impressive about these two sequences—the one in Caltiki especially—is that they represent possibly the earliest examples of faux documentary footage in the horror genre. Like the faked newsreels that open Orson Welles' Citizen Kane (1941, for which the original footage was deliberately scratched and abused to make it look more believable), Caltiki accentuates the "reality" of its monster's first appearance by depicting the event—not on film, but in a film-within-a-film, artlessly photographed with wobbly hand-held shots, imperfect focus, and other sly imitations of amateur handling.

This is a milestone sequence in the history of horror cinematography; with it, Bava founded a new, previously uncharted dimension in cinematic fright. Possibly rooted in literary antecedents like Daniel Defoe's "found manuscript" novel A Journal of the Plague Year, or Lovecraft's own apocryphal devilbook The Necronomicon—but most certainly informed by Bava's past experience in forging wartime newsreels at the Istituto LUCE—the deliberate "home movie" sloppiness of this sequence effectively removes the perceived barrier of safety which had always existed up to this moment between a horror film and its audience. Viewed in the context of Bava's always impeccably stylized black-and-white photography, the sheer artlessness of this 8 mm fragment catapults the film into an alarming tense of heightened reality. It's hard to convey to a contemporary reader the impact that this now-mild-looking sequence had when Caltiki was new; audiences had never before seen a movie lose control of itself, supposedly as the cameraman was being eaten alive—by something we hadn't seen yet! The footage isn't at all graphic—it offers far more fear than violence—but its abrupt violation of motion picture etiquette was a stunning visual coup. At the time, it was the closest thing to a snuff reel ever dared in a horror movie; even Michael Powell's Peeping Tom (1960) was still a year away. With this one sequence, Caltiki points the way to such celebrated later examples of faux horror documentary as Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust (1980) and Daniel Myrick and Eduardo Sanchez' shot-on-video phenomenon, The Blair Witch Project (1999).

Despite the restraint of this sequence, elsewhere Caltiki is surprisingly graphic. If one accepts the common wisdom that all that is needed to make a horror movie memorable are three good scares, Caltiki more than qualifies. The images of Bob being rescued from the sacrificial pool, his scuba mask pulled away from a fleshless face, its glistening skull with staring eyes still intact; the slow, sticky, surgical peeling of the blob's tissue from Max's arm, revealed as an ugly, mummified shrivel; and of course, Max's reduction to a struggling skeleton as he is enfolded one last time by the monster—these moments are as grisly as any attempted in horror movies up to this time. They showcase a level of special makeup effects expertise that would not begin to inform the horror cinema of other countries until the early 1970s. No makeup artist is credited, but considering the special effects nature of their application, it is almost certain that Bava supervised these illusions, as well.

Riccardo Freda also lent his sculpting skills to the production. He not only carved the idol of Caltiki found inside the cave, but also the mummified body of Ulmer glimpsed (only by the camera) behind a pile of rocks near the sacrificial pool—a construction of hair and papier maché, not unlike the deteriorated remains of the Duchess Du Grand seen at the climax of The Devil's Commandment, the US release version of I vampiri.

Special Effects

Lamberto Bava remembers that all of the miniature special effects sequences of the blobs attacking the Fielding house were shot in the house of his grandfather, Eugenio. These sequences, then, represent a new collaboration between Mario and his father, who was at the time preparing to retire from his long-held position at the Istituto LUCE. In recent years, Eugenio had not only been accepting occasional active jobs in the commercial cinema, but was going against his previous credo by accepting onscreen credit for them.

In 1957, Eugenio had accepted a rare screen credit as "technical consultant" to Giacomo Gentilomo's Sigfrido, an elaborate remake of Fritz Lang's Die Niebelungen diptych, whose fabulous dragon introduced to the world a new mechanical genius of Italian special effects: Carlo Rambaldi. Born in Vigarano Mainarda in 1925, Rambaldi's comparative youth and ambition would eventually present him with important invitations that Mario Bava refused, and his willingness to relocate to California in the 1970s allowed him to achieve the international recognition and high rewards that Bava reflexively shunned. But in 1957, though already in his early 30s, Rambaldi was still a tyro in the film business, regarded by many of his colleagues as a kind of mad scientist. Producers did not know what to make of his progressive ideas, without a track record of success to support them, and he was often forced to prove his abilities on less-than-supportive income.

"I met Eugenio Bava during the first two or three months of my stay in Rome," Rambaldi recalls. "I moved to Rome because of this project, Sigfrido, which involved the creation of a big dragon—the dragon Fafner, whose blood makes Siegfried invulnerable. The dragon was built at the Spes Studios of Catalucci, and Catalucci had given his personal assurance that this job would be carried out with the greatest professionalism. It was on that occasion that I met Eugenio Bava, who used to come on the set as production consultant to make sure that things were . . . [going well], because I was not known in Rome at that time. They didn't know what I could do. He would come every day to check how we were making molds, how we were planning the mechanics, and so forth. I saw at once that Eugenio, who was a very kind man, was very experienced in this field. Sometimes he would advise me about which materials to use, on the types of mechanics to adopt, on long distance transmission of movements, and so forth—and we became friends. He was always happy, always in a good mood, always ready to give advice. It was good to be in his company; in fact, the atmosphere would became cheerful during his visits."[8]

BELGIAN affiche.

Rambaldi's relationship with Eugenio continued after the completion of Sigfrido—which was later released in the United States under the title Dragon's Blood—when the elder Bava continued to drop by Rambaldi's workshop. "He would come, stay a couple of hours, and talk to me about his past. He used to tell me things about his life, about his youth . . . unfortunately, things which I don't remember any more. He told me that he had a son who was a director of photography, and later, that his son had started to work as a director."

During this period, Eugenio Bava's preferred mode of transportation was a beaten-up Topolino, a budget car manufactured by Fiat that resembled a smaller kind of Volkswagen with an elongated front. One of Eugenio's stories, which likely dates from the period when Mario was working on the Hercules films, involves the Topolino and sheds interesting light on the father–son relationship of Eugenio and Mario.

"Eugenio had a Topolino, which he used for his travels, to go with his wife to Frascati or the Castelli Romani," Rambaldi explains. "Once he said to me, 'I went to see my son at Cinecittà and when he saw me, he asked where I had parked the car.' And I said, 'Well, there was a free space near the studio, so I parked it there.' And my son told me, 'You mustn't come here with the car.' Do you know why, Carlo? Because my car has a fault: the back of the passenger seat collapses, so I have to prop it up with a plank. And my son says, 'It isn't very prestigious for me to have my father seen going around in a car with its seat propped up with a plank of wood!' But [Eugenio] just laughed about it," Rambaldi continues, "and said, 'I will go on just the same . . . even if he . . . [doesn't like it], and I will tell him, I parked it right out front!'"

In Caltiki, the special effects for the monster itself were impressively humble in origin. For most of its scenes, Caltiki (the name Bava used for the amorphous mass, though the film itself refers only to the idol of the Mayan goddess by this name) was composed of nothing more than tripe—the cheap kind sold as cat food in Italian markets. Bava later estimated that the production used 100 kilograms (roughly 220 pounds) of tripe, each and every day. "The guy whose job it was to buy the tripe once decided to save some money by reusing the same tripe over a span of three days," he winced. "After three days, that tripe was killing everybody for real, with its unbearable smell! [Gérard] Herter, the German actor who had to be engulfed by the monster, nearly died from it! When the movie was shown in Tunisia, the scene were Caltiki appears made such an impression on the audience that they literally ran out of the theater . . . and it was nothing but tripe!" [9]

Mario, who was prone to exaggeration in interviews, told Luigi Cozzi that the eponymous mostro immortale "was nothing more than a lot of cow's entrails with a man—poor man!—hidden inside to make them move." [10] A close study of Caltiki gives one reason to doubt that such a crude method of animating the monster was actually used. The largest form of Caltiki to interact onscreen with a live actor appears during the cave scene, when Max stumbles too near the monster and has to be cut free from its mass. The long and medium shots of this scene, and the pertinent still photos, appear to support the theory of Bill Warren, who—in his book Keep Watching the Skies!—points out that Caltiki looks more like heaps of wet canvas than tripe—though tripe was certainly used for the insert shots of the meat Fielding tries to hack away from Max's trapped arm. For the later shots of Max being eaten to death, various sheets of tripe appear to have been arranged in layers over some kind of frame, allowing actor Gérard Herter (who does look truly nauseated onscreen) to stand behind them and still appear to be surrounded. Caltiki's smaller incarnations, as seen in the glass box at the science institute, appear to be a mass of pulsing liver, pudding or polenta sewn inside cheesecloth, animated manually from below. Only in instances like this, or in the film's climactic moments, does the tripe appear to be covering a human element, but probably nothing more than a human hand. When they worked together in the late 1960s, Bava confided to actress Laura Betti that electrical current was also sometimes used to goad the organic matter through a labyrinth of scale model sets: "half a pound of tripe, animated at a distance by two electrical wires, resulted in the most terrifying monster climbing up model stairs and [bursting through] walls." [11]

Massimo De Rita, who by now had become a personal friend of Bava, remembers him filming some of the special effects at the Scalera Film studios, as well. "On the sound stages at Scalera, which were very small indeed, he had constructed the scale model of a house," De Rita describes. "Then the monster made of tripe reproduced and multiplied, came down the stairs, devoured people, was destroyed. Mario was limited in the way he could manipulate the tripe through holes that were cut into the floor beneath it, but he produced effects that were terrifying on screen. He could work only for 3–4 hours because [under the hot lights] the tripe began to stink. The miniature effects were extraordinary: [he would film the tripe], then rewind the camera and film the tiny flamethrowers, because the monster was destroyed by fire." [12]

De Rita's comments testify to the observation that Caltiki puppeteered by human hands secreted beneath its rancid flesh, making it pulse and throb, forcing it through miniature doors and up scale model stairwells. His recollection of the camera being rewound for double exposures points out the necessity of black (unexposed) areas of the frame, in which manipulating hands could have actually appeared on screen in black gloves, filmed against a black backdrop. (It was in this manner that the famous Italian mouse, Topo Gigio, was brought to life on stage.)

More remarkable than the monster itself are the various miniature sets to which Caltiki, and its divisions, lay waste. Not only are the miniature recreations of the sets flawless, but they are also perfectly lighted according to scale—the kind of detail that can make or break such shots, and one which the majority of miniature effects artists working in this period overlooked. The film also includes a briefly glimpsed miniature night shot of Fielding's car as he speeds toward home to save his family, but it is onscreen so briefly I am not convinced that it was created for this film. As with La morte viene dallo spazio, Bava cut some corners in Caltiki by using stock footage. For example, the inexplicably gratuitous accident that claims the life of Prof. Rodriguez—his car shown flying off the edge of a narrow road, sailing in a long, graceful arc to the rocks below, and exploding a second later into flames—was a miniature effects shot by Howard and Theodore Lydecker, culled from Chapter 1 of the 1946 Republic serial The Crimson Ghost!

Variants

The American version of the film, Caltiki the Immortal Monster, is basically identical to the Italian original with no missing scenes, despite its short "B-picture" running time. When I first saw the Italian version, I was struck by the superiority of the sound effects mix—particularly the ambient bat squeaks in the cave scenes, which make them much creepier—but I later discovered that the sound effects are basically the same on the English version, though you need a good print to hear them. (To date, Caltiki has not been given an authorized home video release in America, though it has been shown in an excellent print on cable's The Movie Channel.)

The English-dubbed version—released in America in 1960, and in Great Britain in 1962—was produced at Titra Sound Corporation in New York, and this time their work warranted onscreen credit for the English version's director (Lee Kresel), editor (Salvatore Billitteri) and sound recordist (Maurice Rosenbaum).

Lee Kresel (1918–80) was one of the first American actors to seek work in Italian films after the war; he played the role of King Louis XVI in Gregory Ratoff's Black Magic (1949). Kresel found more work offscreen than on, dubbing European films into English for export (Jean Renoir's Le Carrosse d'Or/The Golden Coach is one example), and he took this skill with him when he returned to New York in the late 1950s. Over the years, primarily at Titra, Kresel would write and direct a number of English versions of films produced in Italy and Japan, including such far-ranging titles as Yoshimitsu Banno's Gojira tai Hedorah/Godzilla vs. the Smog Monster and Vittorio De Sica's Il giardino dei Finzi-Contini/The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (both 1971). He would also direct the AIP-commissioned re-recording of an English-language soundtrack for Mario Bava's official directorial debut, Black Sunday. He worked as a film acquisitor in later years, "presenting" George A. Romero's Code Name: Trixie (1973) as The Crazies via Cambist Films. Caltiki the Immortal Monster features an opening narration by George Gonneau, who also provided other voices; Brett Morrison and Peter Fernandez are also heard on the track.

One of the common misconceptions about the origin of Italian horror is that I vampiri was unsuccessful because its Italian cast and crew were honestly identified, while Caltiki il mostro immortale—credited mostly to pseudonyms—was a popular success in Italy. On the contrary, the record shows that Caltiki earned less than 95 million lire [$59,000] upon its release—more than a quarter of a million less than I vampiri, and even more amazingly, nearly half a million less than La morte viene dallo spazio! It is unlikely that it made back its initial investment in domestic release. However, its roster of English names did make it an easier product to sell abroad, and being such an inexpensive production in the first place, Caltiki surely multiplied its original investment quite a few times over in international release.

Bava had made several resourceful attempts to extend the variety of the popular Italian cinema, but so far, the only sure-fire formula for boxoffice success continued to be Steve Reeves.

8 Carlo Rambaldi, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000. All Rambaldi quotes are from this source unless otherwise noted.

9 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

10 Cozzi, as quoted in Frank, "Emanations."

11 Laura Betti, letter to the author, April 23, 1985.

12 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

SPANISH poster, art by Macario Gomez.

La battaglia di Maratona

The Giant of Marathon

MARIO BAVA'S NEXT assignment was another Steve Reeves spectacle, this time entrusted to a director who, by all accounts, should have been a kindred spirit.

Born in Paris, France, on November 12, 1904, Jacques Tourneur was—like Bava—a son of a great luminary of the silent cinema. Tourneur's father was French producer–screenwriter–director Maurice Tourneur (1873–1961), who among many other accomplishments was responsible for early screen adaptations of the works of Edgar Allan Poe (Le Système du Docteur Goudron et du Professeur Plume, 1913), George Du Maurier (Trilby, 1915), and Jules Verne (The Mysterious Island, 1929). Before turning to the cinema, Maurice had been a hopeful young painter, and Jacques once reminisced (in terms that will sound very familiar to readers of this book) "His studio was a big, mysterious room that filled me with fear." [1]

In 1913, Jacques relocated from Paris to Los Angeles with his family, with whom he did not enjoy a very warm relationship; he stayed behind when his mother and father returned to France in 1928. He floundered as a bit player at MGM and rejoined his parents overseas, working for his father as assistant, script clerk, and finally editor. He edited eight of his father's pictures before directing his first movie in 1931. He directed four French films of no particular importance before returning to MGM, where he worked with Val Lewton in the staging of the French Revolution scenes of Jack Conway's A Tale of Two Cities (1935), and he directed second unit on Charles Reisner's A Winning Ticket (also 1935). MGM finally allowed him to direct a number of short films in his own right (under the name "Jack Turner"), including entries in the "Pete Smith Specialties," "A Historical Mystery," and "John Nesbitt's Passing Parade" series, some of which—"The Face Behind the Mask" (1938) and "The Incredible Stranger" (1942), in particular—featured elements of the strange and macabre. He directed his first feature They All Come Out for MGM in 1939, which was followed by two entries in the "Nick Carter" series starring Walter Pidgeon: Nick Carter, Master Detective (1939) and Phantom Raiders (1940).

Much as Mario Bava would do in later years, Jacques Tourneur found his creative niche in 1942 as a director of stylish, atmospheric, low-budget thrillers. His greatest films were made for RKO, including three classic horror films for his old colleague Val Lewton, who had become a B-level producer (Cat People, 1942, and I Walked With a Zombie and The Leopard Man, both 1943) and later, the evocative noir masterpiece, Out of the Past (1947). It took him ten years to achieve another film as memorable, Night of the Demon/ Curse of the Demon (1957), a suggestive occult chiller that was taken out of his hands and subjected to some (he thought) ruinously straightforward post-production inserts by its producer.

Tourneur's horror films were among the first films to portray scenes of horror and death in a subtle, poetic way, a method that Bava was later to make his own. In future years, Bava would direct several scenes that demonstrated a fond familiarity with Tourneur's oeuvre, notably the red carpet of blood that seeps out from under the door to herald the resurrection of Otto von Kleist in Baron Blood (1972), which quotes the most shattering moment of The Leopard Man.

STEVE REEVES receives a stereo kiss from co-stars Mylène Demongeot and Daniela Rocca.

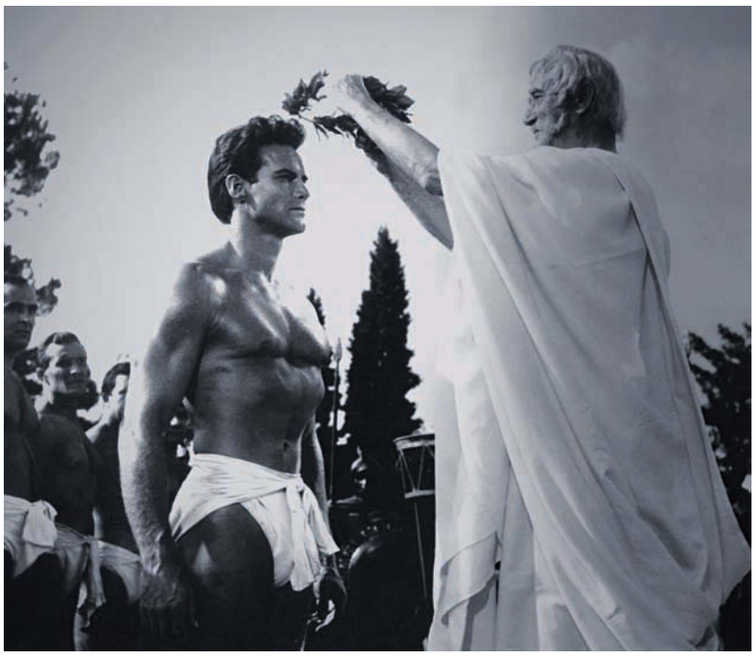
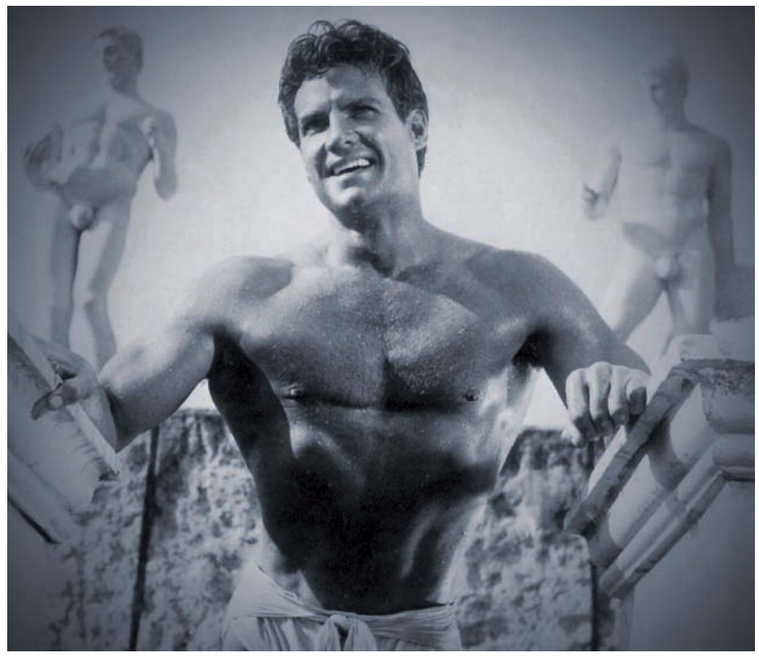
In 1959, Tourneur's best days were over. Disheartened, relegated all too often to a choice between trash and inactivity, obese and prematurely aged at 55, he eagerly accepted an invitation from Galatea producer Nello Santi to direct "a jock-strap and sandal thing" (as he termed it) called La battaglia di Maratona.

Tourneur, who had made films in Italy before, was hand-picked for the job by Steve Reeves himself. "You see, I had made a picture with Burt Lancaster called The Flame and the Arrow [1950]," the director explained. "It was filled with action and very exciting. Well, Reeves had done two Hercules pictures in Italy that were making all kinds of money. They



La battaglia di Maratona



"The Battle of Marathon"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location in Rome and Yugoslavia
September – October, 1959
First released: December 3, 1959
Eastmancolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 87 minutes

Production: Titanus, Galatea (Rome), Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France, Societé Cinématographique Lyre (Paris). Producer: Bruno Vailati. Director: Jacques Tourneur [also Mario Bava and Bruno Vailati]. Screenplay: Ennio De Concini, Augusto Frassinetti, Bruno Vailati, based on a story by Alberto Barsanti and Rafaello Pacini. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Additional photography: Massimo [Ubaldo] Terzano, Giulio Tagliaconi. Special effects: Mario Bava. Art direction: Mario Chiari, Marcello del Prato. Set decoration: Massimo Tavazzi. Costume design: Marisa Crimi. Master of arms: Enzo Musumeci Greco. Production manager: Renato Angiorno. Production assistant: Massimo De Rita. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Music: Roberto Nicolosi, conducted by Pier Luigi Urbini. Sound: Louis Kiefer.

Steve Reeves (Philippides), Mylène Demongeot (Andromeda), Sergio Fantoni (Theocritus), Alberto Lupo (Milciades), Daniele Varga (Darius), Daniela Rocca (Karisse), Ivo Garrani (Creusus), Gianni Loti (Teucros), Philippe Hersent (Gallimaco), Miranda Campa (Karisse's servant), Anita Tedesco (Andromeda's handmaiden), Arturo Dominici (councilman), Sergio Ciani (Huros), Franco Fantasia, Carlo Lombardi, Gian Paolo Rosmino, Ignazio Balsamo, Walter Grant.

France: La Bataille de Marathon, Lux Cinématographique, 9/9/60
Germany: Die Schlacht von Marathon, "The Battle of Marathon," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer; Die grosse Schlacht um Hellas, "The Great Battle for Hellas"; Die grosse Schlacht von Marathon, "The Great Battle of Marathon," Nobis Film, 6/14/60
Italy: La battaglia di Maratona, "The Battle of Marathon"
Spain: La Batalla del Marathon, Exclusivas Floralva Distribucíons, S.A., 11/20/61
UK: The Giant of Marathon, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 8/60, 81m 28s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: The Giant of Marathon, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 5/25/60

IN THE FILM*'s opening montage, Philippides excels at the Olympic games.*

wanted him to do another picture, but [this time] he insisted on an English-speaking director. He said, 'I can't speak Italian and they can't speak English, so I end up looking stupid.' Then he remembered The Flame and the Arrow and said, 'I want that director; I don't know who he is, but I want him.' I was in Europe anyway, so I took the job. The shooting went on and on . . . forever. I got a lot of money, but little satisfaction. We shot each scene four ways—in Italian, English, French, and German—and no two actors spoke the same language. One actor would have to scratch his ear to let the other one know he was finished with his lines! I had to shoot it all in code. It's unbearable to make pictures like this. The result was horrible. We went to Yugoslavia where we had 1,200 men on horseback fighting the battle of Marathon. Some of it was fun, but it was too slow. When a picture's slow, you lose enthusiasm. You lose élan."[2]

Tourneur's version of the story is colorful, but alas, it is no more than a story. The Flame and the Arrow is a terrific action-adventure and a perfect model for what Reeves' career might have achieved with more careful handling. It is certainly true that Reeves, having now achieved stardom and its attendant leverage, began to insist on directors fluent in English. From the time his star continued its ascent, he got them: Andre de Toth would direct Morgan il pirata/Morgan the Pirate (1960), Arthur Lubin would direct Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad (1961), and thereafter, he would work with bilingual Italian craftsmen like Sergio Corbucci and Duccio Tessari. Tourneur must have been a doubly attractive suggestion from the standpoint of the Italian producers, as his name would (and did) attract French co-production dollars.

Beyond this, Tourneur's account makes one wonder if he was actually present on the same set where the other crew were working. People who remember visiting the set to watch the filming of the Marathon battle sequence did not travel to Yugoslavia to do so, and a close examination of the shots composing that sequence reveal the number of actual extras to be closer to forty than 1,200. Furthermore, though actors of different nationalities did indeed share scenes together and spoke their native tongues onscreen, shooting scenes multiple times in multiple languages simply wasn't done—or necessary, given the expediency of dubbing. Having examined different versions of the film on videos from different countries, I can attest that the Italian, French, English, and German versions are basically identical, almost entirely composed of takes in which English was spoken—although the gallant Sergio Fantoni, who plays the film's villain, appears to have spoken Italian opposite Daniela Rocca and French opposite Mylène Demongeot.

Tourneur's comments are basically self-serving: he was in Europe anyway, the money was good, he was put in charge of a veritable army, he was used to doing things more professionally, it was beneath him. Fortunately, the film itself reveals some pride of craftsmanship that transcends Bava's own contribution. La battaglia di Maratona is one of the best examples of Italy's sword-and-sandal cycle, rich in spectacle and human convolutions, and pleasingly consistent with the prevailing themes and moods of Tourneur's own oeuvre.

Synopsis

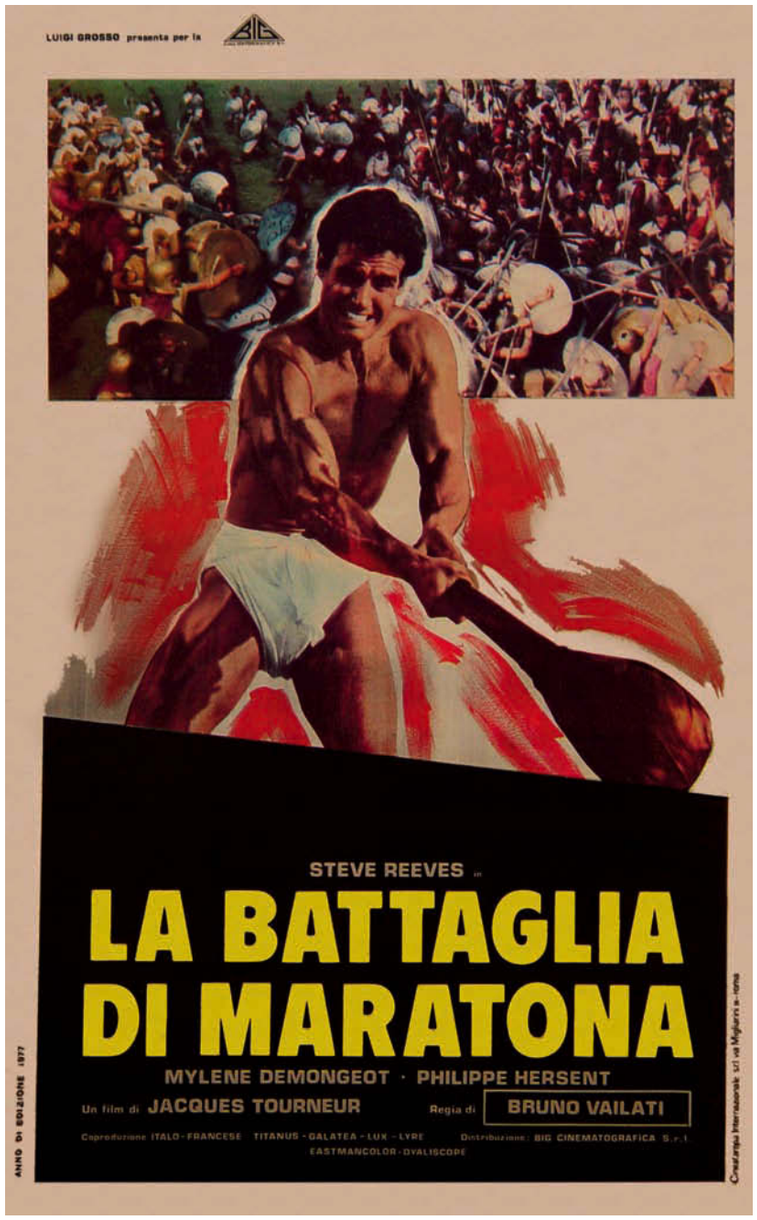
The year is 490 A.D.

A common farmer named Philippides is catapulted to national fame and honor when he triumphs in multiple competitions at the Olympic games. Creusus, the head of the council of Athens, rewards the hero by nominating him to soldierhood in the Sacred Guard, who have policed the city's democratic society since the banishment of its former dictatorship. Behind closed doors, Creusus allows himself to be influenced by his prospective son-in-law Theocritus, a traitor who seeks to make Athens politically vulnerable to an invasion by Persia. Theocritus convinces Creusus that they should corrupt Philippides, who, as Athens' national hero, could be used to sway the public mood. The athlete has a chance encounter with Creusus' doe-eyed daughter Andromeda, who has been betrothed to Theocritus in an arrangement between their parents ("You are as beautiful as the statue of a goddess"); she too is attracted, but knowing her obligation, refuses to encourage their mutual feelings by revealing her name. But one of her handmaidens informs the hero that he can see her dance at the Temple on the road to Pareus.

1 Chris Fujiwara, Jacques Tourneur: The Cinema of Nightfall (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1998), 20.

2 Joel E. Siegel, "Tourneur Remembers," Cinefantastique, 2:5, 1973, 25.

That night, while en route, Philippides is briefly shanghaied by Karisse, a dark-haired seductress in the employ of Theocritus. She attempts to amuse him with dancers and wrestlers, but he disapproves of the latter ("They're no more than animals . . . butchers, is what they are"). Noting the lateness of the hour, he prepares to leave, but is attacked by one of the insulted wrestlers. Philippides bests the brute in no time, but arrives at the Temple too late to meet the anonymous woman he loves.



Philippides begins his training for the Sacred Guard under the supervision of Milciades. When he chances to see Andromeda drive past in her chariot, he impulsively pursues her. She continues to discourage his interest without explanation, but she can no longer lie about her feelings when he kisses her. Theocritus accidentally witnesses their first embrace; he is not jealous, but instead sees an opportunity to exploit the situation. He arranges a meeting that reveals Andromeda's identity to Philippides, and offers her as a prize if the hero will enlist in their cause. Angered to think that the innocent Andromeda would consent to such an arrangement, Philippides strikes Theocritus and resigns from the Guard to return to farming, an embittered man.

The moping hero is visited by a conciliatory Milciades, whose pleas are without effect until a runner appears with the news that the Persian fleet, led by Darius and the Athenian traitor Hippaeus, has landed at Marathon. The two men return to Athens. The Athenian council meets to declare war on Persia, but with fewer than 100 soldiers on hand, they require help from Sparta to assemble an effective defense. Philippides is sent to appeal to the council at Sparta, where he finds valuable support from Huros, a talented wrestler whom he bested at the Olympic games. Sparta reluctantly agrees to assist Athens in their struggle, but cannot join them until the New Moon, for religious reasons. As Philippides prepares to leave for Marathon, Karisse kisses him farewell as broken-hearted Andromeda—who doesn't know the cause of his changed feelings for her—looks tearfully on. Creusus finds his daughter, recognizes her love for the good soldier, and realizes the wrong he has done.

On the first day of war, the Athens soldiers confront Darius' troops on the battlefield at Marathon without Spartan assistance and barely survive. At the Persian camp, Karisse overhears Darius and Theocritus discussing a surprise rear attack on the Athenians; she is discovered running away and shot in the back with an arrow. She manages to reach the Athenian camp in time to inform Philippides of Persia's surprise attack and Theocritus' treason before she dies. Without the Spartans, Athens has only one hope for victory: Philippides must run all the way from Marathon to Athens on foot and fetch the Sacred Guards of the Temple of Athena. He swims upstream (losing his horse over a waterfall), crosses mountainous terrain, cuts through forests, and finally arrives in Athens at daybreak on the point of physical collapse. Minutes earlier, Theocritus arrived at the Temple, found Creusus unwilling to advise his council to surrender to Persia, and kidnapped Andromeda after clubbing her father unconscious.

The Sacred Guard join Philippides in booby-trapping the floor of the Aegean Sea with spikes to ram the hulls of Persia's invading fleet. Many die gruesomely in the ensuing battle, but Philippides succeeds in rescuing his beloved Andromeda from the clutches of Theocritus, who plummets to his death from the prow of his ship before the Persians can reach the Athenian shore. The battle continues on land, but Spartan reinforcements—led by Huros—arrive in time to carry Athens to victory. The hero returns to private life on his farm with Andromeda by his side.

ITALIAN reissue locandina—"a film of Jacques Tourneur... directed by Bruno Vailati."

Cast & Commentary

After the unevenness of Agi Murad il diavolo bianco and Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei, La battaglia di Maratona represents a splendid return to form in the filmography of Steve Reeves. From the opening montage, which shows the clean-shaven Philippides emerging victorious from the varied competitions at the Olympic games and championed by the public and his opponents alike, the film exhibits a profound understanding of Reeves' persona—and the truism that a champion is not solely defined by victory, but also by the extent to which he/she is championed by others. The great appeal of Steve Reeves was that he embodied an ideal that few of us could match, but to which all of us aspired in our heart of hearts. Therefore, his triumphs onscreen were also ours, and by cheering for him, we cheered for what is best about ourselves as a species and what is possible for all of us, if we follow his example of vision, discipline, and hard work.

The screenplay by Ennio De Concini, Augusto Frassinetti, and Bruno Vailati takes the expected liberties with history. Philippides was not an Olympic athlete, but a professional runner who did indeed communicate Athens' pleas for military assistance to Sparta. Sparta's response was briefly postponed by a religious lunar observation, but they did ultimately manage to join Athens against the Persians at Marathon. The script's secondary "attack from the rear" is a confused reference to Persia's response, which was to double-back and sail south to conquer Athens before its male citizens could return. The Athenians managed to outrace the Persian fleet, which came, saw, and sailed away in defeat.

MYLÈNE DEMONGEOT as Andromeda in a lovely shot very expressive of Bava's contribution to LA BATTAGLIA DI MARATONA.

In rewriting the character, the script tailors the lead role specifically to the personal mythology of Steve Reeves. Philippides is a farmer (Reeves was born and raised on a farm in Glasgow, Montana) who wins a series of athletic contests (Reeves was a former Mr. America, Mr. World, and Mr. Universe) and achieves the kind of fame that can be manipulated to influence others. (Unlike Charles Atlas, his most famous predecessor, Reeves became an international movie star—an unparalleled success that encouraged more men to enter the world of body-building than ever done before.) The film can therefore be interpreted as a response, reward, and genuflection to the man whose image had saved the Italian film industry.

Throughout the making of La battaglia di Maratona, the 33-year-old Reeves was still suffering from a painful shoulder injury incurred during the filming of Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei, but it doesn't show at all in his work. Knowing of his injury makes his stunt swim across the rapids, in the early stages of Philippides' run, agonizing to watch—and the production is even more merciless to its horses, which are tripped, dropped into pits, crashed into chariots, and seemingly allowed to drift downstream to be flung over waterfalls. Working with a director of his own choosing, and one at ease with communicating in English, also seems to benefit Reeves' performance; he is still a bit wooden, especially when gestures are called for, but it's one of his most natural screen appearances and, considering its close ties to his personal life, probably also one of his most heartfelt. Appropriately, his physique is pared down quite a bit from its supernaturally outsized dimensions in the Hercules films, but he is still in superb condition; the scene in which Philippides commences his run, after surviving the rapids, by tearing off his breastplate and revealing his powerful physique in resolute preparation for the task ahead, was met with resounding cheers when the film played in American theaters.

Andromeda, Philippides' blonde and innocent love interest, was played by Mylène Demongeot, a French actress approximately ten years younger than her leading man. After making her acting debut in Les Enfants de l'Amour (1953), Demongeot participated equally in French and English productions, including It's A Wonderful World (1956, as "Mylène-Nicole") and Bonjour Tristesse (1958). La battaglia di Maratona was the actress' eleventh film—making her already a more experienced performer than Reeves—and her previous experience with English dialogue was no doubt as instrumental in landing her the role as were her beauty and French citizenry. Demongeot brings a subtle, tender, yet conflicted dimension to Andromeda that humanizes her character, and her slender vulnerability complements Reeves' strength in ways that more Amazonian co-stars like Sylva Koscina and Scilla Gabel could not. The only trivializing aspect of her performance is a tendency—surely encouraged by her director or cameraman—to show a little leg whenever she's in danger. On the whole, though, the love story between Philippides and Andromeda is one of the sweeter and most sincere relationships to be found in the Italian pepla.

ANDROMEDA lends comfort to her conflicted father Creusus (Ivo Garrani).

KARISSE (Daniela Rocca) is prepared for her assignation with Philippides.

Of the Galatea regulars, Sergio Fantoni gives his usual strong villainous performance as Theocritus, but the film curiously divests him of opportunities that could have given his role greater impact. His quest is more intellectual than sadistic, and though we see him slap Karisse repeatedly in one scene, she is a character written to take such abuse; the script doesn't present the necessary opportunities for him to tease Andromeda cruelly. Even her abduction seems cut-and-dried. Theocritus is also deprived of a memorable death, though he is certainly set up for one; riding the pincered prow of his warship, he is ultimately toppled overboard by Philippides into the waiting jaws of his own secret weapon—but falls across them, not into them. Consequently, Theocritus' stance in the material is weakened by an equal lack of demonstration and comeuppance.

As Creusus, Ivo Garrani is cast in the latest reprisal of his trademark role: a misguided politician whose opportunism and self-absorption have left his family and country vulnerable to danger. An unbilled Arturo Dominici appears as an Athenian council member in a scene filmed so hastily that it consists of a single extended take in long-shot. The hissable villain of Le fatiche di Ercole, the most commercially successful Italian film of the decade, stands to deliver a single line ("If we cannot live for freedom, we will die for freedom"), but his loyalty to Galatea would soon be rewarded with the role of his career.

A limited actress of opulent beauty, Daniela Rocca gives one of her best performances in the sympathetically written role of Karisse. It isn't known whether the part was written with her specifically in mind—considering her personal relationship with producer Nello Santi, this is certainly possible—but the scene in which Karisse is shot in the back with an arrow must have carried personal associations for the actress. Harriet White Medin, who worked as Rocca's dialogue coach on Esther and the King (1960), explained: "I'll never forget one day when Daniela and I were going over her lines together in her dressing room. She was getting into costume for the next scene, and of course, she didn't think anything of undressing in front of me. Anyway, as she was changing, I happened to notice this terrible hole in her back! When I asked about it, she invited me to take a closer look. She told me that it was a souvenir from an old flame, some man she had made jealous when she was a teenager. I was horrified, but she seemed quite proud of the fact that someone had once loved her enough to shoot her!"

The warmly written, pivotal role of Huros is played by Sergio Ciani, who had worked as Reeves' stunt double since Ercole e la regina di Lidia. He would continue to accept stunt work a short while longer, but as more and more bodybuilding ambassadors came to Italy from America in the hope of duplicating Reeves' success, Ciani decided to throw his own hat into the ring. In 1961, he adopted the nom d'ècran "Alan Steel" for a supporting role in Gianfranco Parolini's La furia di Ercole/The Fury of Hercules, in which Brad Harris played the character Reeves (and in some scenes, he) had made famous. He would play Hercules himself in Giorgio Capitani's Ercole, Sansone, Maciste e Ursus gli invincibile/Samson and the Mighty Challenge and Piero Pierotti's Ercole contro Roma/Hercules Against Rome (both 1964), and Maciste in Maciste e la regina di Samar/Hercules Against the Moon Men (1964, which featured some uncredited work by Mario Bava). Sometimes acting under the name "John Wyler," Ciani continued to star in miscellaneous thrillers, Westerns and softcore erotic films through the late 1970s.

Though Jacques Tourneur did not speak entirely well of his experience directing La battaglia di Maratona, it retains a healthy share of his personal style. While it is primarily an action film, the characters are frequently delineated through moments of introspection and intimacy, or in the gentle notation of intangible places where characters almost meet.

One of the most arresting images of the opening montage shows Philippides besting another man in a wrestling competition; in a later, intimate conversation with Milciades, the hero refers to his former opponent in surprisingly sympathetic terms: "Huros . . . a good man; he might have won." A simple statement, but it throws an entirely unexpected light on Philippides' personal ethic, which takes a pure and uncomplicated approach to competition. Unlike Theocritus, he is not a man who would trade on his personal relationships in pursuit of a goal, or permit ambition to cloud his sensibilities with frustration and hatred. A very complex human dimension, and Tourneur is able to probe it with a simple line of dialogue.

Tourneur also embraces an almost mystical sense of symbolism, which relies heavily on Bava's unique cinematographic sense. For example, after their first accidental meeting in a playing field, Philippides arranges to see Andromeda again that night at the temple where she and her female companions will be dancing and paying tribute to Venus. Philippides is sidetracked from keeping that important appointment by Karisse, an intervening stranger to whom he is bound by nothing more than courtesy. We cut away from this awkward social predicament to Andromeda and her handmaidens burning an offering to the Goddess of Love, in the hope she will send them their soul mates; against the opulent backdrop of a weeping tree and a hazy moon, a plume of smoke rises high to hang wistfully in the air. By the time Philippides reaches the temple, the women are gone—only the last remnants of that plume hang in the air, an unnoticed (except by us) symbol/confirmation of Andromeda's longing for him and an opportunity gone up in smoke.

The film also contains a moment that strongly recalls the penchant for epigrammatic asides found in Tourneur's work for producer Val Lewton in the 1940s. When an unsuspecting Philippides joins Creusus, Theocritus—and Andromeda—for a meal, Creusus orders music, adding, "They say music is very good for the digestion." At this point, Bava's camera pans back to a few humble musicians, one of whom stands to make a recital as the camera rises above them to rest on a mosaic mural of a Greek banquet scene: "Fine be the pleasures of wine and drown the sorrows of life. Fine be the pleasure of company and know the beauty of life." This moment—its sweetly unexpected adjustment from the matter-of-fact to the eternal, from the commonplace to the blessed—is the kind of aside one finds only in the work of Jacques Tourneur.

In his fine book Jacques Tourneur: The Cinema of Nightfall, Chris Fujiwara points out these other germane points of reference to Tourneur's earlier work: "Philippides' disillusioned retirement from Athens to the country recalls Jeff's [Robert Mitchum's] withdrawal to Bridgeport in Out of the Past; Karisse is functionally the same character as Boston [Ruth Roman] in Great Day in the Morning; the jaws of the Persian ship bear inexorably down on the camera like the teeth of the snowplow in Nightfall; like Molly [Debra Paget] in Anne of the Indies,

THE FORTY or so extras with whom Mario Bava desperately staged the reshot battle of Marathon.

BETROTHED to Theocritus by her parents when she was still a child, Andromeda experiences true love for the first time upon meeting Philippides.

Andromeda is tied to the prow of the ship."[3]

La battaglia di Maratona was very nearly the end of Tourneur's distinguished career. In addition to some excellent television drama, he would preside over only two more features, both produced by American International Pictures: the uproariously funny The Comedy of Terrors (1964, written by Richard Matheson) and the handsome but badly written War-Gods of the Deep (1964), which is redeemed only by some Bava-quality visual effects by Les Bowie. Jacques Tourneur died on December 19, 1977, in Bergerac, France, after more than a decade of professional inactivity.

Tourneur was always outspoken about his dislike for second unit reliance, which to him represented a loss of personal involvement, as well as creative control. "I've always fought second units," he once said. "Whenever I have any authority at all, I just don't have them."

Tourneur was engaged to direct La battaglia di Maratona for a period of eight weeks, but for some reason—which he chose to blame on the fictional rigors of having to shoot each scene four ways, in different languages—he failed to complete the movie in this allotted time. Part of the problem was the decision to shoot partially in Yugoslavia. "It was a big disaster," complains Massimo De Rita, the film's production assistant. "We could not find qualified set workers, and it eventually became too expensive for us to continue there."[4] Tourneur evidently railed against unacceptable working conditions and abandoned the picture, leaving the balance to be completed by Mario Bava and producer Bruno Vailati (who had co-written the screenplay with the ubiquitous Ennio De Concini and others, and was ultimately credited as director of La battaglia di Maratona on its Italian posters).[5]

Tourneur later explained the situation, as he saw it. "At the end of eight weeks, I had shot all of the dramatic scenes, but there still remained the underwater scenes to do. (For me, going underwater is impossible!) And there was also the run, the famous run which gave us the word 'marathon' to describe a long-distance race. In effect, none of those scenes were dialogue scenes, so the producers re-examined my contract and discovered that they had no obligation to keep me on, and therefore, no need to pay through the nose for me to do any further days of work. The run ended up being shot by Vailati, and all of the finale by Vailati and Bava. Why should they be obliged to hang onto me for filming those disputed underwater or running sequences? Anybody could do it."[6]

3 Fujiwara, 268.

4 Simone Venturini, Galatea S.p.A. (1952–65) storia di una casa di produzione cinematografica (Rome, Italy: Associazione Italiana per le Richerche di Storia del Cinema, 2001), 206. Translated by Christopher Sven Dietrich.

5 Like Mario Bava, Bruno Vailati took his first directorial steps as documentary filmmaker. Bava had been the first Italian cameraman to shoot film underwater aboard an actual submarine, but Vailati was the first director to do the job in color with the Red Sea documentary The Sixth Continent (1954). He subsequently co-directed Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad (1961) with Arthur Lubin and, singlehandedly, directed the costume drama Finché dura le tempesta ("After the Storm is Over," 1963), as well as the documentary Andrea Doria—74 (1968).

6 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers," Spaghetti Cinema 72, July 2000, 2–12.

7 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, L'avventurosa storia del cinema italiano—raccontata dai suoi protagonisti (Milan, Italy: Feltrinelli Edizione, 1980).

8 Ibid.

It would take a blind admirer of Tourneur not to flinch at the self-serving bravado of his remarks. More likely, the production was slowed down by his refusal to assign work to a second unit, which he would have had to do at any rate with the underwater sequences, by his own admission. As for "anybody could do it," anybody didn't—Mario Bava did.

Asked if he remembers the circumstances under which Tourneur left the picture, Ivo Garrani responds: "Honestly, I don't—and, I must tell you, I really have no memories at all about Tourneur! I can't even tell you what he looked like! I just remember Bava literally taking a compromised movie onto his shoulders and saving it in just a few days of incredible, concentrated work."[7]

Bava described his rescue efforts on the film—which began with having to fix an unacceptable battle sequence Tourneur had supervised in Yugoslavia—in a comic tense: "I didn't want to go [to Yugoslavia]; I preferred to stay in Ponza with my home-made devices. They sent me the dailies of the big battle sequence, which I had to review and cut together. Well, there were moments when I could have passed out from laughter, the footage was so ridiculous! Four thousand extras from the Yugoslav army—wearing their sandals over their boots! The charioteers of the King's army driving their wagons with cigarettes hanging off their lips, followed by packs of stray dogs, which always abounded on the film sets in Yugoslavia. All useless! The producer wanted to commit suicide. He put the film in my hands. We had only ten days to finish. First, we went to Rome, where I shot 287 set-ups in a single week, working only with my grips. Then to Grottarossa with a hundred extras who almost died from the chill of the North wind, who I made to appear like an army of 20,000. The hand-to-hand combat, which looked more like the soldiers were hugging each other because the Yugoslav extras were so afraid of getting hurt? This I fixed by running the footage at 5 frames per second rather than the normal 24. From desperate measures like these, the battle was realized."[8]

PROMOTIONAL shot of Steve Reeves and Mylène Demongeot.

DETERMINED to have Andromeda one way or another, Theocritus abducts her—but finds Philippides to be even more determined to get her back.

There may be a hint of color in Bava's account, but what he says is essentially true. There is no question that the film's centerpiece—the battle of Marathon (which lends a title to all but the American version)—was a triumph of Bava's technical ingenuity over considerable odds. Visiting the location on the day this sequence was filmed was Ernesto Gastaldi, a young screenwriting graduate of the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica who would later write the screenplay for Bava's La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body (1963).

"I first met Bava when he was shooting La battaglia di Maratona," Gastaldi remembers. "I was occasionally on the set because my friend Armando Govoni was working there, and I liked to watch the filming of special effects. Bava put a glass in front of the camera, completely covered by twelve black squares of paper. He removed the first square on the left and thirty soldiers formed a line on the top of the hill, exactly within this exposed square. Then Bava rewound the film, covered the first square and removed the second square of black paper; the same thirty soldiers formed another line on the top of the hill, but shifted twenty meters to the right. One after another, Bava uncovered and covered the glass, shifting the same thirty extras from one position to another, until he had a big army!"

US half-sheet poster.

A close examination of the scene in question shows that Bava was supplied with approximately forty (not thirty, and certainly not Bava's avowed 100) extras. After Darius shouts "To your posts!" (with about forty spear-carrying extras lining the hill behind him), five horsemen ride onto the empty battlefield in fanning directions. Bava follows this with a long-shot of the entire battlefield, covered in the background by hundreds of guards, as each of the horsemen is followed into the open by crowds of soldiers. The shot seems to feature well over 300 extras. The illusion is flawed—apparently the wind on the battlefield picked up as the day wore on, because the black paper Bava was using fluttered in some places, resulting in visible matte lines, cropped shadows, and other imperfections. The exposed matte lines indicate that the frame was divided into approximately eight or nine (not twelve) portions: two exposures for the horizon, two exposures for the ground level background, and five exposures for the battlefield itself, which was divided into a sunbeam arrangement. For each exposure, the extras were arranged on the field in triangular formation, giving their numbers the additional illusion of receding multitudinously into the distance. For the closer shots that follow, the same plan was followed: a crowd of charging soldiers up front, the numbers seeming to trail away in numbers equally vast.

Elsewhere, Bava used mirrors and multiple exposures to create the illusion of Persians riding their horses fearlessly onto the spears of a barrier of Athenian soldiers and shields. Low-angle shots of the horses charging and rearing was married to over-the-shoulder shots of the Athenian soldiers with the camera truca, creating believable shots of unbelievable danger. The sequence is quite spectacular, with several tracking shots (some photographed from specially dug trenches) emulating the exciting war scenes of Bava's favorite film, All Quiet on the Western Front.

A veteran of such sea-faring pictures as Uomini e squali ("Men and Sharks") and Pericolo negli abissi ("Peril in the Deep"), producer Bruno Vailati took charge of directing his primary contribution to the screenplay, namely Theocritus' naval assault on the Athenian fleet. Though Bava is frequently credited with photographing the violent, surreal underwater combat scenes—in which swimming soldiers are shown being graphically lanced through the neck, eye, and chest with arrows and spears—these vicious submarine tableaux were actually photographed by Masino Manunza. Bava did, however, storyboard the entire sequence and may have been the first to suggest some of its more outlandishly imaginative details—like the hull-crunching "jaws" of Theocritus' ship. As it appears in the finished film, this sequence is an inspired marriage of lyrical, balletic imagery and startling violence.

There is no or supernatural dimension to La battaglia di Maratona, and since its villain is not allowed to present himself openly as such until late in the game, it also afforded few opportunities for menacing shadowplay. Accordingly, many of the usual traits of Bava's cinematography are held in check throughout, yet the film contains some of his loveliest work. The opening Olympics montage is refreshing in the austerity of its images; its brisk procession of friezes of Philippides excelling in competition go a long way toward reclaiming, at once, the heroic charisma that faltered in Reeves' work since the Hercules films. The location footage also conveys a verdant freshness, despite the reuse of familiar locations, and the studio "exteriors" filmed at Cinecittà have an indigo-tinged opulence that never fails to remind me of a line remembered from Joyce's Ulysses: "The sky was hung with humid night-blue fruit." The sequence in which Karisse diverts Philippides from his assignation with Andromeda is particularly delicious, with the camera snaking sensuously around the scantily clad "entertainment" on a crane.

It is to Tourneur's credit that Bava's visual imagination was never more indulged than when he was at the helm. As a result, the film looks most elegant when it is most banal—for example, as a queue of horsemen ride along the edge of a river, blocked from view by the silhouetted mountainside beyond them, so that their passage is visible only in the reflection of their own inverted silhouettes on the water. [9] When the film arrives at its "big action scenes," the results attest that Vailati and Bava were forced to produce results faster and without the same degree of finesse; consequently, the images that should have been the film's most remarkable (the trick shot of the Athenian hordes, for example) sometimes come across as rough sketches of what they might have been.

Bava's hand can also be seen in a variety of glass matte paintings: the flame-capped columns that frame the cheering crowd as Philippides is honored at the Olympic games, as well as the Olympian statue at the center of the composition; the exterior of the Temple where Philippides goes to pay his tribute to Athena, with its vast staircase crowded with onlookers, and columned structures crowning the hills in the distance on either side; the secondary ships in the Athenian fleet, augmented by foregrounded, working miniatures; and a deceptive shot of Philippides riding behind a boulder en route to Sparta, the background of which was extended by Bava's paintbrush from a small rocky hillside into a believable mountain.

In the most satisfying action films, the dramatic climax usually coincides with the death of the villain. In this case, the battle continues well past the death of Theocritus, only to fade-out after the arrival of the Spartans, accompanied by the surprise return of Huros. A flurry of crossed swords on a beachfront languidly dissolves to a subtle, bittersweet finale that once again suggests the touch of Tourneur. Philippides, dressed in a dark peplum, plants a sword up to its hilt in the soil of his farm, as Andromeda solemnly watches. Then they walk away, in silhouette, toward a farmhouse in the distance as the setting sun gleams on the handle of the planted sword with golden significance. Philippides is putting his life as a warrior to rest, to enjoy life as a man. The shot is so striking, so unusual a resolution and so rich in symbolism, that one can overlook the badly staged death of Theocritus and the fact that the final battle has not been won in any visually cemented way. Indeed, this final scene would play the same whether Philippides had emerged victorious, or had simply survived defeat. As he very likely did with Caltiki il mostro immortale and as he would certainly do again, editor Mario Serandrei does an exceptional job of organizing the unfinished fragments into an effective whole. We fill in the ellipses with ease, and finish the picture feeling unusually satisfied.

Aftermath

Throughout the filming of La battaglia di Maratona, Steve Reeves was giving one of his best performances offscreen. The damage inflicted to his shoulder muscles during the making of Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei caused him tremendous pain during Maratona, which he endured on principle without the aid of prescription drugs. He performed all of the stunts asked of him, including Philippides' agonizing swim across the rapids, and confided the facts of his condition to no one but his fiancee—Aline Czartjarwitz, a legal secretary in the European film industry whom he had met after the completion of Le fatiche di Ercole. (They would eventually marry in June 1963, and stay together until Aline's death in 1989.) He celebrated the completion of Maratona by signing an exclusive two-picture contract with American producer Joseph E. Levine, who was then pouring a fortune into the US promotion of Hercules and Hercules Unchained.

The troubled production of La battaglia di Maratona had encouraged producer Nello Santi to expect the worst, but such was the craft and vitality of the picture that, when it was released in Rome over the Christmas holiday, it re-energized the waning "sword and sandal" market in Europe, just when North America was about to discover Hercules and Hercules Unchained in a big way. These combined events had such impact that Steve Reeves won another competition that must have taken even him by surprise: he became the world's biggest boxoffice attraction of 1959. Grossing 690.5 million lire [$430,000] during its initial Italian release, La battaglia di Maratona earned a good deal more than Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei, and a great deal more than Agi Murad il diavolo bianco. Thanks to the combined efforts of Bruno Vailati and (especially) Mario Bava, Galatea had another hit on its hands.

Warner Bros.—the US distributor of both Hercules films, as well as The White Warrior—decided not to handle Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei or Maratona, perhaps dissuaded by the losses incurred by the Freda film. Quick to step in was Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, who, remembering Steve Reeves' cameo appearance in Athena, proclaimed The Giant of Marathon as Reeves' triumphal return to his "home" on the Metro lot. It is exceedingly difficult to locate boxoffice results for films of this vintage, but The Giant of Marathon accrued domestic rentals of $1,300,000 and international rentals of $1,600,000 for a total first annual revenue of $2,900,000—a tremendous success.

MGM also thought enough of Bava's Marathon sequence to cannibalize it, making it, and its trims, available for resale as stock footage. In the early 1960s, shortly before their lives were changed forever by Star Trek and Batman, William Shatner and Adam West costarred in an unsold TV pilot called Alexander the Great. All of the battlefield scenes in that pilot episode were culled from The Giant of Marathon.

Legend has it that, after Mario Bava had saved the abandoned La battaglia di Maratona for Galatea, Nello Santi rewarded the resourceful cameraman by offering him any property of his choosing for his directorial debut. It's a great story, but as it goes with most stories, the truth was probably more complicated.

According to Massimo De Rita, Santi was principally a money man and never took an active interest in production. "He never helped in the production process," he said. "Sometimes we would invite him to the set; he might come, just once, and it would be great, but he was a very busy man. It was better for him to have people like me on the set instead, otherwise everything to do with the production would come to a dead halt. He invested a great deal of trust in me, in all of us . . . I never had a problem with him. He was like a father to me—a mentor, really—and I always regarded him as a prince." [10]

De Rita—who regarded Bava as "a dear friend, and also a genius"—remembered playing an important role in bringing Bava to Santi's recognition. "Bava had worked on a few different things for us; he had been the director of photography for Francisci. So I convinced Santi to give [Bava] a chance to direct for us. He began with Caltiki il mostro immortale . . . he worked for a month on the special effects for that movie. Afterwards, we convinced Santi to let him take charge of a bigger movie, La maschera del demonio. We wanted to make this a more lavish production, so we asked Santi for a budget of 107 million lire [$67,000], but he said he was only going to grant us 100 million lire [$62,000]—and that much only if he was convinced the picture could make back more than that figure at the boxoffice!" [11]

When one realizes how much money La battaglia di Maratona had bagged for Santi and his partners, the budget he allotted for Bava's official debut seems a bit parsimonious—and, as De Rita indicates, he had to be persuaded to allot even that much. This account has the unromantic ring of real business, so it probably is the more accurate of the two stories. Bava was not one to boast about how he'd had to cover for other, lazier Galatea directors, and he was not the kind of individual who would go over the heads of his directors to blow the whistle on them to the studio boss. By the same token, as an executive primarily interested in the bottom line, Nello Santi makes a far more believable boss than a creative equal. Santi had certainly seen and approved Bava's work in the past, but he left creative decisions to people like De Rita and may not have even been able, at this point, to connect Bava's name to specific work he had done for the company without someone else, like De Rita, to jog his memory.

Regardless of how these bothersome details complicate a story that has become a recognized legend in horror film circles, it was indeed Nello Santi who ultimately approved Bava's chance to direct—officially—for the first time. The result was not in the same league as Hercules at the boxoffice, but it has lingered a good deal longer in the memories of many movie-goers. To this day, it is a film that is remembered, loved, feared, and revered as one of the best horror films of the 20th century, and arguably the most stunning directorial debut the genre has ever hosted.

9 Bava would later reprise this shot on the same location while directing second unit photography for the miniseries Odissea in 1968.

10 Venturini.

11 Ibid.

Monsters and Heroes

"I have never taken advantage of a psychiatrist's couch—nor crucifixes, rosary beads or cloves of garlic.
Instead, I rely on fog machines, colored filters, and objects of deformity."
—Mario Bava

MARIO BAVA and Arturo Dominici joke on the set of LA MASCHERA DEL DEMONIO.

BARBARA STEELE, the dark madonna of the Italian horror film, turns her face to the camera in a never-before-seen color shot.

La maschera del demonio

Black Sunday

ONE OF AMERICAN International Pictures' horror hits of the 1950s, the Herman Cohen production How to Make a Monster (1958), was a darkly comic reflection on the waning popularity of the horror genre. In this movie, "Old Pete" (Robert H. Harris), a Hollywood makeup man specializing in movie monsters, is fired from "American International Studios" when the "studio" is taken over by new management. In a telling scene, Pete's laments about the fading genre are shrugged-off by a sympathetic director (Thomas B. Henry), who explains that it wouldn't take very much to turn the trend around: "One picture can do it—maybe one of those foreign imports—and the whole monster cycle is on its way again!"

This dialogue is prescient, not only because this is indeed what soon happened, but because the tide was turned, in no small part, by a foreign import released under the banner of American International: Black Sunday. Made in Italy as La maschera del demonio, it marked Mario Bava's official debut as a motion picture director.

Bava was 45 years old and had already spent a quarter of a century as a cameraman as he stepped onto the proving ground. It was an opportunity of which most people in his business would have been highly envious, but there is some controversy about whether or not it was an opportunity Bava had coveted for himself. "I felt I had no business becoming a director," Bava explained, "because, in my opinion, a director must be a true genius. Besides, I was quite content to be a cameraman. I made good money and, by this time, I had learned all the tricks of my trade." [1]

For his part, Mario's son Lamberto remembers that his father "was virtually forced to become a director by [Galatea producer] Nello Santi. My father told him that he had no such ambition."

Lamberto's view is somewhat contradicted by Bava's erstwhile camera operator Corrado Bartoloni, who recalls that Mario's ambitions sometimes surfaced in the form of self-reproach. "He was very shy and modest, but in truth, he was somewhat ambitious too, like anybody else," Bartoloni offers. "He often said to me, 'Why should I make entire movies for other directors and not be a director myself?'"

Ivo Garrani, who had acted in several films photographed by Bava, was one of the main cast members of this important first—did he notice any change in Bava's on-set behavior, as he made the transition from cameraman to director? "Not too much," he says, "because Mario was already a director. He had proven this in the movies we had made together before, since he always found himself directing and saving other people's movies. So it was just a natural thing to see him in the director's chair at last. But Mario was also very shy; he always tended to undervalue himself. You could never pay him a compliment. He would always say, 'C'mon, Ivo, what the hell are you saying? Be serious.' But he was unique, and we all knew it."

Here Garrani touches on the real issue. It was against the grain of Bava's character to draw attention to himself, least of all on a film set. "The truth is," Bava once admitted, "when I'm making a movie, I feel good. But I don't like to be observed while I am doing it, even if I don't happen to be aware of being watched. It also bothers me to be photographed and, as a general rule, I avoid it. When I was a cameraman, I used to hide under the black cloth of the old DeBrie model camera . . . When I am filming on location, I rope-off the area to keep onlookers away and I turn floodlights on them, so they can't possibly see anything. It's for the same reason, probably, that I use so much fog in my films! Not for the sake of style or atmosphere, but so that I won't have people gawking at me while I'm shooting . . ." [2]

This orientation might well be traceable to the incident in Mario's childhood, when his father Eugenio slapped him for proudly signing his name to a drawing. It was ingrained in his adult character to resist identification with his work, so it is hardly surprising that he found his greatest success behind the camera and designing effects whose success was qualified by how little they were noticed. Bava had worn a kind of matinee idol mustache from the early 1940s until the late 1950s, perhaps because it gave him something physical to hide behind. Some of Bava's

ONE of the ragazzi. Bava amuses his co-workers between set-ups on one of his early 1960s assignments.

La maschera del demonio

"The Mask of the Demon"
Filmed at Titanus Appia Studios (Scalera Film) and on location
March 28 – May 7, 1960
First released: August 11, 1960
B&W, 1.66:1, 87 minutes

Production: Galatea, Jolly Film. Producer: Massimo De Rita. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Vana Caruso. Screenplay: Ennio De Concini, Mario Serandrei, Mario Bava, Marcello Coscia, based on Nikolaj Gogol's story "Viy." Continuity: Bona Magrini. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Ubaldo Terzano. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini, Mario Bava. Wardrobe: Tina Loriedo Grani. Production assistants: Paolo Mercuri, Armando Govoni. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Music: Roberto Nicolosi, conducted by Pier Luigi Urbini. Distributor: Unidis.

Barbara Steele (Asa/Katia), John Richardson (Andrej/Andreas Gorobec), Andrea Checchi (Dr. Choma/Chomas Kruvajan), Ivo Garrani (Prince Vajda), Arturo Dominici (Javutich/Javuto), Enrico Olivieri (Constantine), Antonio Pierfederici (priest), Tino Bianchi (Ivan), Clara Bindi (innkeeper), Mario Passante (coachman), Germana Dominici (innkeeper's daughter), Renato Terra.

Belgium: Het Duivels-Masker, Optima Films, 1961
Denmark: Djævelens Maske, 12/17/1962
France: Le Masque du Démon, Comptoir Française du Film Production, 1960. Reissue: Les Grands Films Classiques, 1979
Finland: Paholaisen naamio, Lii-Filmi o/y
Germany: Die Stunde Venn Dracula Kommt, "The Hour When Dracula Arrives," Panorama (35 mm), Atlas (16 mm), 9/29/61, 85m
Mexico: La Máscara del Demonio, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 84m
Spain: La Máscara del Demonio, Ismael González Diáz, 85m Sweden: Djävulsmasken
Turkey: Seytanin Maskesi, Ceylan Film
UK: Revenge of the Vampire, Border Films, 6/68, 85m 55s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts
US: Black Sunday, American International Pictures, 2/15/61, 83m closest friends remember that he was insecure about his looks, and sometimes referred to himself as a faccia stronza ("shit face"). Some photographs indicate that he had a "lazy eye" or astigmatism that made his gaze uneven; he was far-sighted and had to wear glasses when he wrote, painted or storyboarded, but he was sufficiently vain to go without them the rest of the time. Whenever someone pointed a camera in his direction, he hexed the result by twisting his face into a comic or ironic caricature.

"My father hated having his photograph taken," Lamberto Bava emphasizes. "He preferred to be the one taking the photographs. If he had his photo taken, he liked to dress up as a mad woman or an old woman or a Turkish man. If you look at photographs of him, it is very difficult to find a 'normal' one, where he isn't pretending to be someone else."

Bava creeping lasciviously toward an amused starlet . . . wearing a footman's powdered wig . . . glowering furiously . . . smiling demurely as he stands beside a pretty girl . . . wearing a woman's nightcap and dress, as he sits covered up to his chest in a sickbed . . . wearing a fez and extending a limp wrist . . . standing in front of a round diffusion screen that forms an ironic halo behind his head, his hands crossed before him in a parody of iconic rigor—these are just a few photos that exist of Mario Bava. Looking at them now, one is impressed not only by the consistency of his subterfuge, but by what an untapped source of personality and entertainment they represent. In these poses, Bava is not unlike the "Alfred Hitchcock" that director Alfred Hitchcock became for his appearances on weekly television. These photos prove that it was not only within Bava's scope to become a major genre director, but also an engaging, tongue-in-cheek frontman for his often violent art, in the same style as Hitchcock or his downmarket impersonator at Columbia, William Castle. Unfortunately, there was no one around Bava who took note of this untapped potential, and if there had been, it is quite possible that Bava might not have been willing or able to bring that side of himself before a wider public.

"Bava had no interest in being a director, even when I was working with him," laughs Alfredo Leone, the producer of Four Times That Night, Baron Blood, and Lisa and the Devil. "He used to say to me, 'Leone, why don't we stop this? You can direct, and I will be your cameraman . . .'" Bava may have felt he deserved the chance to direct, but when the opportunity finally presented itself, he was reluctant to embrace it. He loved being a member of a film crew, and knew all too well that an invisible wall of status stands between even the most welcoming, good-natured director and his crew. There was also the question of failure. Bava had been in the film business long enough to know that, if he did not make the most of this opportunity, it could adversely affect the career in which he had built his success. "I knew that I had to do a good job," he said, "because, if I bungled it, I would be finished as a director . . . and as a cameraman!"[3]

MARIO (with unidentified friend) in another gag shot, dating from the filming of LA FAMIGLIA PASSAGUAI (1951).

The only way to get past his hesitancy was to plunge in straight ahead, so Bava turned his thoughts to the story he was going to tell. It wasn't always his intention to make a horror picture, but it is likely that he was persuaded to move in this direction by his affinity for special effects. "Bava had worked extensively in the field of special effects, especially visual effects," notes his friend and colleague, Oscar-winning special effects designer Carlo Rambaldi. "Obviously, this helped him to determine to continue in the field of horror films. After all, a horror film is a kind of fantasy film. It is fantasy, above all else."[4]

Bava's choice of property for his directorial debut was ultimately decided by the serendipitous arrival in Roman theaters of Dracula il vampiro—the Italian version of Hammer Films' Dracula/Horror of Dracula (1958). Under the careful direction of Terence Fisher, Christopher Lee's commanding performance as Count Dracula revolutionized audience perceptions of Bram Stoker's immortal character, which had not changed in the quarter-century since Bela Lugosi had essayed the role for Universal. Just as Fisher toyed brilliantly with his audience by alternating long sequences of calm with sudden outbursts of staccato speed and fury, Lee was introduced onscreen as a tall, urbane, civilized gentleman who could turn, with a spin of his cape, into a vicious, hissing animal with blood-gouted fangs—and just as quickly into a highly romantic, yet equally animalistic figure: a vampire movie first. Italian audiences loved the film's alternating currents of sanguinary sin and Christian purity, the latter personified by the equally authoritative Peter Cushing as Dr. Van Helsing.

"Since Dracula il vampiro was popular at the time, I began to think of making a horror movie," Bava later recalled. "Years earlier, I had read Gogol's 'Viy'—a stupendous tale and a film that has yet to be properly made. In the days before television, I read it to my children at bedtime. It frightened them so badly, they ended up sleeping together in the middle of my bed!"[5]

1 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

2 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

3 Abruzzese.

4 Carlo Rambaldi, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

5 Volta.

Viy

Ukrainian author Nikolai Vasilyevich Gogol (1809–52) wrote "Viy" in 1833, at the age of 24. It first appeared in his 1842 story collection Mirgorod, published ten short years before his death from anemia, a condition brought on by fasting. (Something of a religious zealot in his later years, Gogol had stopped eating in an effort to purge the Devil from his being.) The story's enigmatic title refers to the iron-faced "chief of the gnomes, whose eyelids reach down to the ground," and which, when raised, expose unholy eyes capable of peering through any barrier. According to Gogol translator and biographer David Magarshack, there are no grounds for the author's introductory assertion that "Viy" was based on a Ukrainian folk legend, unchanged and "told almost in the simple way I first heard it."[6]

Considered a minor work and mentioned only in passing by most Gogol studies, "Viy" warrants a detailed synopsis to help us determine how freely it was adapted by Bava and his fellow screenwriters.

After an introductory description of the Bratsky Monastery in Kiev and the rollicking crudities that distinguish its playful seminary students, Gogol isolates three of these scoundrels as his protagonists. They are Khalyava the theologian, Khoma Brut the philosopher, and the rhetorician (and kleptomaniac) Tibory Gorobets. The trio are returning on foot to their homes for summer vacation, hiking along the open highway and enjoining villagers for handouts of food and drink along the way. Night falls swiftly over the roads and they entertain the thought of camping in the open air only briefly, as late night hunger, increasing sobriety, and fear of wolves compel them to continue walking till the next cottage appears. This is owned by an old woman who, knowing of the loutish and drunkenly ways of young students, refuses them hospitality. The three comrades swear through her bolted door that there will be no mischief and, should there be, "then may our arms be withered and may God punish us as only He knows how." At this oath, the crone lets them in, but only on the condition that they sleep apart to insure that no schemes will be concocted between them.

PRINCESS ASA is fitted with the Mask of Satan in this Italian fotobusta.

The rhetorician is roomed in the cottage, the theologian is locked in a closet, and the philosopher is bedded down in the barn among the sheep. (This is the last we hear of Khalyava and Gorobets until the tale's final paragraph, some thirty-five pages later.) The philosopher, Khoma Brut, is soon joined in the barn by the old hag, who initially seems determined to rape him, but then leaps onto his back and, in a nightmarish scene, rides him like a pony to the edge of her haunted forest. There, on its outskirts, the aged witch collapses from apparent exhaustion and, before Khoma's eyes, becomes a beautiful young corpse. The philosopher wastes no time in putting as many miles as possible between himself, the corpse, and the episode.

Continuing on his merry way, Khoma Brut soon overhears that a wealthy Cossack captain is searching for him, as his dying daughter has requested him by name to "read the prayer of the dying over her and the psalms for three days after her death." The philosopher, tempted by thoughts of a handsome wage, allows the captain's coachman—Yavtukh—to escort him to where he is needed. Upon his arrival, the Cossack captain announces that his daughter has already died, but that her final wish—that the psalms be read over her coffin for three nights—must be fulfilled. As the reader already suspects, the daughter is indeed the lovely corpse of the withered hag from the earlier episode and also, according to the gossip of the local serfs, a "bloodsucker." Khoma Brut is sent to the side of her coffin for the first night's reading, in the decaying vaults of the family's private chapel, the wasting of which "showed how little the owner of the estate cared for God and his own soul."

In this damned and derelict place, for the next three nights, the philosopher is subjected to visions and antics of the undead. The beautiful corpse sits upright in her coffin and reaches out to him; she pilots her coffin through the air like a macabre aircraft; and she chants into existence demonic, otherworldly familiars, from whom Khoma Brut shields himself by drawing a circle of chalk around his feet, rendering himself invisible to them. As a last resort, on the final night, the daughter summons the dreaded Viy, an earth-clotted gnome with iron arms and heavy eyelids that droop to the floor. The impish familiars hoist its eyelids up and the eyes of the Viy penetrate the chalk barrier. Discovered, the soul of Khoma Brut flees his mortal body in terror. A droll epilogue presents Khalyava and Gorobets drinking to the memory of their comrade, philosophizing that his peculiar fate was God's Will.

Adaptation

Bava's first step toward his directorial debut has been preserved in the form of a 4-page treatment, dated September 1, 1959. This date places the composition of this document in the immediate wake of his completing the principal photography for La battaglia di Maratona.

"Viy"[7]
Story by Mario Bava

This treatment is based on a short story by Nikolai Gogol.

It's about a young married couple. They embark in their car on a country trip. They find themselves lost in the woods as the sky is getting dark and a thunderstorm is approaching. The trees of the woods are ominous-looking, with big, black, and convoluted trunks. While walking around, they find a barren clearing with a few old cabins, deserted, charred and half in ruins. At the edge of the clearing, there's an old church, also in ruins, from which a faint pipe-organ sound is heard. The couple, intrigued, enters the church. The doors and stained-glass windows are literally covered in a frieze of petrified monsters.

We hear some footsteps . . . A little man appears, entirely dressed in black, with thin ankles sticking out from large, worn-out shoes. Next to him there's a shaggy, messy, black dog. The little man has impressive, red-ringed eyes, revealing all the white in the cornea. His beard is white and flowing. Sensing the couple's trepidation, he welcomes them to the Land of the Dead, and tells them not to fear. When questioned by them, he embarks on a long story.

In those same houses once lived people ruled by a centurion. He had a daughter, who was blonde and beautiful. During the night, however, this lovely girl took the form and the character of a witch and went out performing all kinds of spells, harassing many people. Once, she met a philosopher seminarian: Chomà. Well, since then, that poor philosopher never knew a moment's peace: she used him as a horse at night to go to the most horrible places and terrorized him as best as she could. But, in time, the philosopher rebelled and started beating her so hard that she died. After dying, the witch recovered the aspect of the beautiful blonde daughter of the centurion. The centurion was deeply saddened by her loss. He called Chomà, according to his daughter's last will, telling him that he must perform a service over her body for three successive nights. Chomà knew that the centurion was deeply saddened by the loss of his daughter, and he also knew that he would die of a horrible death if the centurion ever found out he was responsible for beating his daughter to death. There is also the question of why the girl specifically asked for Chomà to oversee this ritual. Why him? The centurion wants to know, but Chomà is very careful to say nothing. Anyway, he is astonished and doesn't want to perform the service, but the centurion forces him, threatening him with a flogging if he refuses.

The services became nights of terror for poor Chomà, since the dead girl, resuming her form as a witch, rose from her coffin each night and tried to get close to him, but she was never able to cross the magic circle which he had drawn around himself in chalk, activated by a special incantation.

But on the third night, the witch conjured up all the monsters under her power. They came into the church and tried to cross the aforementioned magic circle, but couldn't do it. In the end, the witch summoned the Viy, an enormous and awful monster, hulking and crooked, completely filthy with black soil. Its arms and legs were knotty and brawny like roots. It moved forward heavily, stumbling. The monsters held it by its arms to help it, taking it right to the place where Chomà stood. It had an iron face with eyelids that reached all the way down to its feet. "Lift my eyelids; I can't see," it said, and all the monsters hurried to lift its eyelids. "There he is!" cried the Viy, pointing its iron finger at Chomà. Stunned, Chomà slumped to the ground and his soul fled from his body, from sheer fright.

The cockcrow had already resonated once, but, in the mayhem, the goblins had not heard it. The second time, they tried to flee, but remained jammed in the space of the doors and windows, their eyes wide open, stunned. Now the time is up.

No priest ever dared to serve mass in that place again, and so, as time went by, the church became covered in a forest of plants, roots, weeds, blackthorns, so dense that no one could find there way back there till now.

As the old man ends his tale, the young man realizes that his wife has changed. Her blonde hair has turned black; she stares at him harshly, her teeth chattering. She tells him: "You are Chomà . . . Chomà, aren't you?" The young man recoils, terrified. And she says, "I will haunt you forever and ever, you won't have a moment's peace in all your future lives. Now you can't draw magic circles . . . you can't even pray!" That said, she throws herself at him and bites him on the throat.

In the church, the petrified monsters come back to life and it's once again a horrible bedlam. The little man, crouched in a corner with his dog, which is whining near him, draws a magic circle.

Outside the noise of a car.

The witch throws the lifeless body into the casket.

Now the car isn't there anymore, but there are clearly visible tracks left by its wheels. They lead towards an abyss from which it's coming a rumbling and a big smoke.

The dog looks and whines, and then, as if driven mad, it runs far away.

6 David Magarshack, Gogol, A Life (New York: Grove Press, 1957); 124–25.

7 Translated by Daniela Catelli.

ANDREJ (John Richardson) and Kruvajan (Andrea Checchi) visit the crypt of the Vajda family.

This is a remarkable document, not only because it differs so radically from the film Bava would ultimately create, but because it contains images and situations destined to resurface in Bava's later work. The decision to tell Gogol's dark fable within a contemporary framing story shows Bava already contemplating the uncanny juxtaposition of past and present, as modern-day people become lost in ancient and unfamiliar surroundings and find themselves caught up in the past history of an abandoned ruin. This will later happen in Lisa and the Devil (1973) with its single protagonist. The petrified monsters, first seen as a decorative frieze inside the derelict church, look forward to the concept of Anomalia, an unrealized science fiction project from the late 1970s, written with Dardano Sacchetti. The "I wurdalak" episode of I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath (1963) concludes with a horse galloping away as though driven mad.

The fact that "Viy" was a classic literary property—that is, in the public domain—made it an agreeable choice to Nello Santi. But the treatment was unacceptable, as written. Bava may have been a compulsive reader, but he was above all an instinctive artist, unable to express himself in words as well as he could communicate emotion through images. Therefore, Galatea's resident screenwriter Ennio De Concini was brought in to meet with Bava and develop a more suitable basis for a screenplay. Chances are, however, that their talents were more similar than complementary. As Sergio Leone once said of De Concini, "He was far better at improvising stories, live, in front of producers, than at writing them down . . ."[8] With this in mind—and the fact that De Concini's name appears on more than twenty films produced between 1958 and 1960, more than is likely for anyone to have actually written in full—it seems probable that his involvement in the screenplay was mostly conceptual, while the actual writing was entrusted to another credited writer, Marcello Coscia (with whom Bava had previously worked on La morte viene dallo spazio and Caltiki il mostro immortale). That said, it would be wrong to underestimate De Concini's contribution, as Bava's directorial debut shares a number of elements often found in earlier films bearing his byline: sovereign decadence, the defiling of holy places, the fall of corrupt empires, and most significantly, the casting of a single actress in dual roles embodying Good and Evil (as was done with Silvana Mangano in Ulisse). Also credited with the screenplay is the film's editor, Mario Serandrei, who wasn't a writer at all. As we will see, Serandrei was likely awarded credit by Bava for "rewriting" the story—and saving the movie—in the editing room.

ANDREJ returns to the Vajda crypt (below) with the priest (Antonio Pierfederici), where they discover the reactivated evil of Princess Asa.

"SADNESS in Her Eyes": Princess Katia memorably appears at the entrance of the Vajda chapel ruins.

The title concocted for the film was La maschera del demonio (literally, "The Demon's Mask"), chosen to suggest a relationship in the minds of audiences with two other horror films which had met with successful receptions in Italy: La maschera di cera and La maschera di Frankenstein—respectively, Andre de Toth's House of Wax (1953) and Terence Fisher's Hammer production The Curse of Frankenstein (1957). This practice would become a tradition-of-sorts with Bava's future films as a director, whose titles frequently served as ironic "tweaks" of other popular film titles dating from the same period. Whether this began as a commercial decision (based on the producers' notion of making a success by impersonating success) or an artistic one (owing to Bava's own ironic sensibilities, and his view of his own movies as a kind of sub-cinema) is anyone's guess.

8 Christopher Frayling: Sergio Leone: Something To Do With Death (Gordonsville VA: Faber & Faber, 2000), 94.

By comparing the synopses of Gogol's story with that of La maschera del demonio, we can appreciate Bava's observation that "Such was the genius of the screenwriters—myself included—that absolutely nothing remained of Gogol's tale." [9]

Synopsis

The film opens in the year 1630, in a bleak Moldavian forest in the dead of night, where a group of black-robed Inquisitors are enacting the ritual execution of Princess Asa of Vajda. Asa has been accused of witchcraft and vampirism, along with her accomplice, Prince Javutich—already slain. The Grand Inquisitor—Asa's younger brother, Griabi [10]—denounces her and approves the branding of her back with the "sign of Satan." Before the final tortures, Asa pronounces a curse on her brother and his fellow Inquisitors and "their sons and their sons." Griabi finally decrees that Asa will wear the Mask of Satan—a heavy bronze mask with leonine features, its interior lined with thick spikes—which is brutally hammered onto her face by a hooded executioner. As blood spurts behind the mask, Asa's body is set ablaze, but the flames are mysteriously quenched by a sudden rainfall. As her body is conveyed to the Vajda family crypt, Javutich is buried in the local cemetery, in unconsecrated ground, among the unmarked graves of murderers and suicides.

Two hundred years later, two doctors—Chomas Kruvajan and his protegé Andrej Gorobec—travel by coach through Moldavia en route to a medical convention in Mirgorod. Their coach loses a wheel and, while their superstitious and vodka-tippling driver attends to repairs, the two men pass the time by investigating a weird hum emanating from some abandoned ruins. They trace the hum to a broken pipe organ in an abandoned chapel ruin. [11] Kruvajan soon identifies the ruins as the property of the once-regal Vajda family and discovers, in the midst of the rubble, the cause of the Vajdas' fall from grace: the tomb of Princess Asa, the witch. A customized creation, Asa's resting place has been provided with a window through which she must gaze for eternity upon an upright crucifix carved into the stone of its heavy lid.

ANDREJ drowns his infatuation for the Princess to the amusement of the more worldly Kruvajan.

As Andrej helps the coachman with his repairs, a large bat attacks Kruvajan. In the midst of battle, both the crucifix and the tomb's window are shattered. After beating the creature to death with his cane, Kruvajan cannot resist examining the contents of the violated tomb, removing the Mask of Satan from Asa's face (scorpions and spiders scramble from its empty eyes) and studying a triptychal Cyrillic icon of St. George, the sainted dragon slayer, containing the laws of how to return a vampire to its rest. Andrej returns and discovers that Kruvajan has cut himself on the jagged glass still framed in the coffin's shattered window. Together they exit the crypt, unaware that droplets of Kruvajan's blood have been left to drip into the gaping eye socket of the dead Princess.

While returning to their coach, Andrej and Kruvajan encounter a woman whom we recognize as Princess Asa—has Kruvajan's blood reanimated her so quickly?—flanked by two large, intimidating Great Danes. This is, in fact, Asa's lookalike descendant Princess Katia, with whom Andrej falls in love at first sight. As the younger man gapes at her beauty, Kruvajan extends his apology to the Princess for trespassing on her family's property, and begs her to excuse him and his young colleague. "If you don't mind, I won't say goodbye," Andrej adds, "because perhaps we will meet again." As they drive away, Andrej discovers that he has absent-mindedly taken the protective icon with him . . . In the dark of the Vajda crypt, Kruvajan's blood initiates the unthinkable.

Katia returns to Castle Vajda, where her father Prince Vajda is troubled by spiritual unrest. It is the Feast of St. George, the bicentennial of Asa's death and the curse she placed on their family. When the Prince, Katia and her younger brother Constantine notice an uncanny change in a portrait of Asa, Prince Vajda remembers that an earthquake all but destroyed their family chapel a century ago, leading to the death of another lookalike descendent, the 21-year-old Princess Masha. He frets that his daughter Katia also resembles Asa, whose painting hangs in the castle ("It's as if the witch tormented her victims with her own beauty before killing them"), and that she too has now reached the 9 Volta.

10 The name is given as "Guerogui" by some sources.

11 The same explanation is given for an eerie ambient sound that accompanies William Holden's arrival at Gloria Swanson's house in Billy Wilder's 1950 film Sunset Blvd.

KRUVAJAN falls under the spell of the reawakened Princess Asa.

age of 21, the same age at which Asa was put to death. Upon seeing an apparition of the Mask of Satan in his hot toddy, Prince Vajda has a breakdown and is sent to bed, tightly gripping a crucifix. His stable groom Boris is sent to fetch the two doctors Katia met outside the family crypt as night was falling.

Meanwhile, the doctors have arrived at a tavern in neighboring Mirgorod. Andrej retires early, high on wine and romance, but Kruvajan decides to take a stroll and enjoy a pipe before retiring. Back in the crypt, Asa has been rematerialized by Kruvajan's blood, but not fully; she uses her only strength to summon Prince Javutich from his grave. At her psychic command, he rises from the damp clay covering his coffin and pulls the spiked mask from his face. He staggers down the road to Castle Vajda, but his unwelcome appearance in the room of BARBARA STEELE's stand-in, used as a model for lighting the set, is glimpsed in this frame from an RAI newsreel devoted to the making of the film.

Prince Vajda is foiled by the Prince's bedside crucifix.

Kruvajan is enjoying a pipe in the evening air when Javutich soundlessly appears in a coach to take him to the ailing Prince. (The encounter is witnessed by the innkeeper's young daughter, who watches in astonishment as the coach gallops through the night in silent spectral slow motion, while Javutich thrashes his ghost mares like a team of furies.) Kruvajan is taken to Castle Vajda, where he is led through subterranean tunnels back to Asa's graveside, which suddenly explodes as if through an exertion of sheer will. The cadaverous, spike-punctured beauty of the undead Princess proves irresistible as Kruvajan is drawn toward her to sacrifice his life essence through a kiss. The life Katia drains from Kruvajan's lips is sufficient to restore her beauty fully, and to render the good doctor her soulless slave. A seedy, dishevelled version of Kruvajan appears at the castle to treat the Prince. Remembering him from their earlier encounter, Katia pleads with him to save her father.

The next morning, as some servants are washing clothes in the river, they discover the corpse of the Vajda coachman, Boris, lying in the water, drained of blood. Katia and her brother Constantine awaken to discover their father dead, his face ravaged with infection and contorted with terror. Kruvajan is nowhere to be found. Andrej awakens to find his mentor missing from the inn, but the innkeeper informs him that he was summoned to Castle Vajda in the middle of the night. (Evidently, Boris made it to the inn before Javutich killed him.) Andrej is received courteously but coldly by Constantine, who holds Kruvajan's abandonment of his father responsible for his sudden death. Some villagers arrive to inform the Vajdas of Boris' death, and much is explained when the innkeeper's daughter sees a portrait of Javutich—dead 200 years—and identifies him as the coachman who took the doctor to the castle the previous night. Andrej is invited by Constantine and Katia to stay with them at the Castle.

In search of information, Andrej visits a local Orthodox priest, who translates the writing on the ancient Cyrillic icon, which explains the laws governing the existence and elimination of vampires.

That afternoon, Andrej finds an opportunity to express his devotion to the Princess, which she receives gratefully. As if generated from the positive energies of their new love, a breeze spreads from the garden where they stand embracing and starts a fire, which reveals a secret passage behind the fireplace of the main hall. The passage leads Andrej and Constantine to the crypt, where they find Asa's restored corpse at rest. Understanding what is at work here, Andrej and the priest locate Kruvajan's body in the abandoned coffin of Javutich, where they use the icon's directives and impale the screaming vampire through the eye to ensure his eternal rest.

Meanwhile, Castle Vajda is engulfed in a private historical nightmare as an older generation stages its attack on the new. Katia discovers Ivan (the Vajda family manservant) hanged by the neck, and as she kneels by her father's dead body and appeals to his spirit for protection, Prince Vajda awakens, hungry for blood. He stalks his daughter until an outraged Javutich intervenes, hurling the Prince into the flaming fireplace and carrying Katia to the crypt, where her ancestor usurps all of her youth and vitality with a mere handclasp. Javutich materializes before Constantine out of thin air and hurls him into a pit of spikes, but the young Prince later rises during a fight between Andrej and Javutich and pulls the latter into the pit with him. When Andrej returns to the crypt, Asa poses as Katia and encourages him to destroy the "vampire." Before he can impale her, he notices an impossibility . . . a crucifix strung about the gaunt witch's neck! Removing it, he tries to return it to his beautiful companion, whose cloak is flung aside to reveal the torso of a rotted corpse. The priest arrives with some torch-bearing villagers, and Andrej identifies the real witch to her persecutors. They promptly restage the burning of two centuries before. As Asa withers and burns, Katia's beauty is restored and she awakens to Andrej's loving embrace.

ANDREJ carries the fainted Katia to her bed.

There are common points shared by Gogol's story and La maschera del demonio, but they are mostly superficial. The name of the young hero, Andrej Gorobec, owes something to the rhetorician Gorobets, and the Christian name of Dr. Kruvajan—Chomas—was plainly derived from Khoma Brut. The character of Asa's evil serf Javutich grew out of Yavtukh, a coachman who appears only fleetingly in the tale; his occupation likely suggested the spectral coach sequence. The decaying village overlorded by the Vajdas is given the name of Mirgorod, the title of the story collection in which "Viy" was first published. The decrepit chapel figures prominently in the story too, as does the unexpected rejuvenation of the hag into a beautiful woman. The concept of the bronze "Mask of Satan" was perhaps inspired by Gogol's description of the Viy's heavy, iron eyelids, which only the amassed legions of Hell can lift from its all-seeing eyes.

"My father was extremely fond of Russian literature," says Lamberto Bava, "especially the works of Gogol, Leo Tolstoy, and Fyodor Dostoevsky, whose collected works he prided himself on having read four times." With this in mind, though La maschera del demonio does not credit Bava with contributing to its screenplay, his grasp of Russian literature identifies him as an important—possibly the main—conceptualist behind the screenplay. The film's use of the Grand Inquisition and its contemplation of the metaphysics of twinship are evocative of Dostoevsky's novels The Brothers Karamazov and The Double, respectively; in fact, La maschera del demonio is more evocative of Dostoevsky's somber ruminations and Tolstoy's troubled family sagas than of anything in Gogol's merrily lunatic universe. The scene introducing Princess Katia also draws inspiration from Ivan Turgenev's story "Kasyan From the Beautiful Lands," whose author/narrator encounters a wise, wizened dwarf named Kasyan while exploring a strange woods as his coachman tends to the broken axle of his carriage. The two men walk through the forest together, until their mutual reveries of the strangeness inherent in nature are interrupted by the sudden appearance of a beautiful, young, mushroom-gathering girl, who is revealed to be the perfectly formed daughter of the misshapen Kasyan.

Empowered by his new position to do so, Bava took it upon himself to storyboard the entire script, working into his maiden feature a visual emphasis that was quite unusual for its time. As in I vampiri, ancestral portraits figure prominently in the story, and Bava makes the characters in them—Asa and Javutich—more real and forbidding by framing a good deal of the present tense action with arched doorways, vaulted ceilings, windows, even a missing plank in the wall of a barn. In death, Asa is compelled to remain in her tomb by visual means, as she is held in place for all eternity by a cross carved atop the stone lid, which she must gaze upon through a window built into her resting place—making her means of incapacitation a form of cinema.

Given equal prominence in relation to these cinematic/painterly conceits is a recurring use of circular imagery that sometimes explicitly reminds us of the preciousness of the human eye. The film opens by plunging its audience into a sustained spell of darkness that lasts exactly 13 seconds, finally fading-in on a close shot of silvery, flickering flames—which is also the last image in the picture, lending the entire movie a certain circularity. Bava forces us to share Asa's point of view as the spike-lined mask is carried nearer to her face by her inquisitioners (whose dark hoods reveal only their eyes), and cuts from the subjective to the objective action in such a way that the camera appears to pass through the eyehole of the mask itself. When Andrej and Kruvajan later enter the Vajda family crypt, the camera executes a stunning 360° turn (as Bava did on his first assignment as a cameraman, Rossellini's short Il tacchino prepotente) to convince us of the reality of this setting; as they pry the mask from Asa's face, scorpions rush out from her hollow eye sockets ("Those empty eyes seem to be looking out at us," Kruvajan notes), and as they ride away—while droplets of Kruvajan's blood drip from a shard of broken glass into one of those ghastly cavities—Andrej explains why he has fallen in love with Katia ("at first sight") by remarking on the "sadness in her eyes." There is later a rhyming or mocking cutaway from Asa's hollow eyes to the bell of a horn being played in the tavern at Mirgorod. As Kruvajan steps outside to smoke a before-bed pipe at the side of a pond, he casually shatters its stillness with a stone, and the image of Asa emerges from the ripples radiating from the stone's throw—circle within circle within circle. The twinship of Asa and Katia is itself an optical effect. Katia is later saved from an attempted abduction by Javutich by glimpsing his reflection in a mirror, and as she prays for safety beside her dead father's coffin, Bava shoots the awakening of the undead Prince Vajda through the fingers shielding the disbelieving eyes of the Princess—forcing the viewer to share her dread of seeing, and to feel, no matter what their age, like a child hiding his eyes at the movies. Several of the film's most chilling images involve the sudden, shocking sight of the dead suddenly opening their eyes, or the recently living being found dead with eyes bulging wide with terror, and Bava's breed of vampire can only be put to rest by staking them—where else?—through the eye. With such an elaborate network of references, the film's emphatic attention to visual splendor doesn't seem at all excessive, but rather perfectly and intricately measured.

As with I vampiri's unrequited love story between the Duchess Du Grand and the grandfather of Pierre Lantin, and the found documentary film footage in Caltiki il mostro immortale, Bava enriched the verisimilitude of the script by including some backstory—that is, scripted references to events which took place before the story being told. At one point, Prince Vajda recalls that, on the first centenary of Asa's execution, Princess Masha (who, like Katia, was also Asa's twin, and also age 21) was killed when an earthquake all but destroyed the family chapel. With a simple throwaway line of dialogue, Bava extends the scope of his narrative by an additional century, makes sense of the chapel's disrepair, establishes that Asa's curse has already proven effective against one generation, and pinpoints the face shared by Asa, Masha, and Katia as the locus of the witch's power and the vulnerability of the Vajda women of later generations. Nearly all of Bava's subsequent work as a director would also involve some element of backstory, which not only gave his horror films an aspect of superstitious dread and its eventual fulfillment, but also acted as a narrative counterpart to visual devices he had been employing for most of his career. Backstory is comparable, in some ways, to Bava's cinematographic penchant for projecting "fourth wall" impressions onto the three visible walls of a set, completing the circle of his imaginary worlds. Just as he had found a means of "erasing the camera" by thus implying the character of an unseen wall or window that might be occupying its place—light shining through unseen venetian blinds, barred windows, or transparent drapes—Bava's use of backstory gave his movies a sense of wholeness, as well as an illusion of greater scale. His use of backstory is also comparable to his technique of "selling" a glass matte painting by positioning something real in front of it, whether it be an actor, a tree branch, or a wagon wheel; it adds an extra layer of dimension.

ANDREJ and the priest discover Kruvajan at rest in the unconsecrated grave of Javutich.

20TH CENTURY FOX: Barbara Steele in a promotional shot documenting a short-lived blonde makeover.

BARBARA STEELE and John Richardson first appeared together onscreen in the 1959 Rank production, SAPPHIRE.

The script's emphasis on the beauty shared by three generations of women—a ripple through the centuries, if you will—called for an unforgettable face. In a move that would significantly alter the future course of horror, Bava cast this dual role with a young British actress whom critic Raymond Durgnat would later describe as "the only girl in films whose eyelids can snarl . . ." [12]

Cast

Despite the recent success of Dracula il vampiro, Bava's decision to launch his directorial career with a horror film must have been regarded at the time as a serious gamble. In the four years since I vampiri, no one in Italy had dared to produce another horror film, but the tremendous success of the Hammer film had been encouraging—and not just to Bava. Elsewhere in Rome, as Bava's directorial debut was entering preproduction, a low-budget film entitled L'amante del vampiro ("The Vampire's Lover") was being shot in the Castello di Borghese in Artena—exteriors courtesy of the Castello di Balsorano in L'Aquila—with an Italian cast headed by Walter Brandi. (The film was later released in America as The Vampire and the Ballerina.) Showing that Riccardo Freda had taught him well, Bava insisted that the casting of British talent was essential to the film's success; it was the only way to persuade the Italian public that they were being offered something of comparable quality to Dracula il vampiro. With that in mind, Bava began looking at photographs of actors under contract to 20th Century-Fox, who were then planning to join forces with Galatea the following summer to coproduce a Biblical epic called Esther and the King. He quickly settled on two young British actors, who were represented by the same agent at William Morris and available for employment on the Continent.

Barbara Steele was born in Trenton Wirrall, Cheshire, England, on December 29, 1938. The only child of a well-to-do couple, Steele spent an impatient childhood "looking forward to the day I could get out of there [the country]" and found temporary respite from her boredom in the fantasy worlds of grammar school plays. In her late teens, she moved to London, where she attended the Chelsea Art School and moved in the same circles as future screenwriter/director Donald Cammell (Performance) and members of The Rolling Stones. Amateur modelling—kitschy samples of which show the nascent performer (in what she calls "my virgin days") admiring potted plants and registering surprise—led to her first professional job, as the model for the album cover of Reg Owen's easy listening album You Don't Know Paree!, released in 1958.

ARTURO DOMINICI as Asa's deadly brother and minion, Javutich.

That same year, Steele was noticed in a play and offered an acting contract with The Rank Organization, who publicized their latest acquisition with a two-page spread in the December 1, 1958 issue of Life magazine. One of the last contract players to be signed by the company, Steele arrived on the screen in five Rank productions released in rapid succession during 1959, including Upstairs and Downstairs and two films directed by Basil Dearden—his remake of The 39 Steps and his racially-themed police procedural Sapphire. Too exotic-looking to be believably cast as the girl next door, Rank sold Steele's contract to 20th Century-Fox in 1959.

The 20-year-old was excited about relocating to Hollywood, but things did not work out to her liking. The studio promptly ordered that she be dyed blonde, and she was cast as the female lead in the Elvis Presley Western, Flaming Star. Steele and director Don Siegel did not see eye-to-eye and she was replaced by Barbara Eden during the first week of shooting. She acted as a blonde only once, in an episode of TV's Adventures in Paradise called "Daughter of Illusion," before her career (and many others) ground to a halt by a major Screen Actors Guild strike, which commenced on March 7, 1960. Based on a SAG demand that actors be additionally paid when theatrical motion pictures were sold to television, the strike was aimed against theatrical film production at those major studios which had not signed new SAG contracts making such allowances. Only Universal and some other small production companies had signed the updated contracts. In addition to countless actors, nearly 5,000 studio employees were put out of work until the situation was resolved in late April.

"I remember there was this terrible Screen Actors Guild strike happening, or about to happen, so I knew that work in Hollywood was going to be pretty hard to come by," Steele recalls. "So I decided to fly back to Europe, find a nice beach somewhere, and wait things out."

On the same front page of The Hollywood Reporter where the details of KATIA mourns beside the coffin of her father Prince Vajda (Ivo Garrani), only to see his eyes open in bloodlust.

12 Motion Magazine 4: Violence in the Cinema (London, UK: 1963).

the SAG strike were reported, there appears another story which would prove equally as fateful to Steele's stalled screen career:

> ITALIAN PRODUCERS STEP UP ACTIVITY
>
> Rome—Possibly with an eye to a bigger share of the US and world film market resulting from the Hollywood strike situation, Italian producers are stepping up activity.
>
> Nearly twenty productions and co-productions now are shooting, which [sic] the number in preparation has gone past the sixty mark.

It was during this fateful juncture that Mario Bava, in the process of casting his directorial debut, happened to discovered Steele's photograph in a stack of résumé submissions from the William Morris Agency. His experienced eye recognized in her dark beauty an equal potential for romance and horror. "She had the perfect face for my films," he later said. Indeed she did. No face is better identified with the films of Mario Bava than that of Barbara Steele, who would make horror film history in the dual role of the evil Princess Asa and her twin descendant, the melancholic Princess Katia.

For the male lead, Bava chose John Richardson. Born January 19, 1938, Richardson was a former male model whose career had run parallel to that of Steele. He had been signed to Rank on the same day as she; they appeared together in their first screen tests; they made their first film together (Bachelor of Hearts, 1958); and they also shared a couple of scenes in Basil Dearden's racially-themed murder mystery Sapphire (1959). Richardson was also signed to 20th Century-Fox, but had better luck there than Steele did. Among his starring roles were the Hammer Films productions She (1965), One Million Years B.C. (1966), and The Vengeance of She (1967)—but even he was dyed blonde. It was while filming One Million Years B.C. that Richardson and co-star Martine Beswick (later Beswicke) fell in love; they remained together for several years until an amicable separation. He had a supporting role in the Barbra Streisand musical On a Clear Day You Can See Forever (1970) and in the Sergio Martino-Ernesto Gastaldi giallo, I corpi presentano tracce di violenza carnale/Torso (1973). Ironically, in 1977, when Mario Bava was trying desperately to get a science fiction project produced in the wake of Star Wars, Richardson starred in two for Alfonso Brescia, one of the least talented of Italian directors: Battaglia negli spazie stellari/Cosmos: War of the Planets and Anno zero—guerra nello spazio/Battle of the Stars. Though still handsome in his 50s, Richardson's film career began to slow down after his appearance in Riccardo Freda's Unconscious/Murder Obsession (1980), which was followed by very brief appearances in Neri Parenti's Scuola di ladri—Parte Seconda (1987) and Michele Soavi's La chiesa/The Church (1989), in which he played the architect of the eponymous structure. According to Martine Beswicke, Richardson today makes his living as a photo journalist.

TEENAGE Germana Dominici is stalked by her father Arturo (as Javutich) in this gag shot. The two characters never meet in the film itself.

Apart from Steele and Richardson, La maschera del demonio was cast with local talent. Winning the important secondary role of Dr. Kruvajan was Andrea Checchi. Born October 21, 1916, Checchi made his first screen appearance at the age of 10 in Alessandro Blasetti's 1860 (1926). A graduate of Rome's Academia di Belle Arti, he won recognition for his painting as well as his acting. He had previously worked with Bava on the set of Buonanotte . . . avvocato!, in which he played the second male lead. In the same year that he starred in La maschera del demonio, Checchi also appeared in Vittorio De Sica's La ciociara/Two Women and Fritz Lang's Die Tausend Augen des Dr. Mabuse/The Thousand Eyes of Dr. Mabuse—three very different films, but all three worthy of being called masterpieces. Bava's family recall that Checchi was one of Mario's closest personal friends; his portrayal of Kruvajan—warm, ironic, and avuncular—was modelled on Bava himself. They would work together once again on the Viking adventure Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (1961).

La maschera del demonio marked the official end of Bava's long and fruitful collaborations with actors Ivo Garrani and Arturo Dominici, and the film presents both men with what are probably their greatest roles. As the haunted Prince Vajda, Garrani finds the summation of a half-dozen earlier performances as noblemen who compromise themselves and their families through weakness or corruption. Garroni's later film appearances would include Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire[13] (1960), Morgan il pirata (1960), Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide/Hercules and the Captive Women (1961), Luchino Visconti's Il gattopardo/The Leopard (1963), Mario Monicelli's Casanova '70 (1965), Waterloo (1970), Holocaust 2000/The Chosen (1977), and the horror-comedy Zora la vampira (2000).

MARIO BAVA directs Barbara Steele on the crypt set.

"I believe it was Bava himself who wanted me for the role," Garrani supposes. "He used to assemble his 'team' for his movies—people he already knew, people he knew he could trust. I think this was the reason he called me. He tried to have the same people around him as often as possible. Strangely, our collaborations ended after this. I don't know why; there was no particular reason."

Too often overlooked in discussions of La maschera del demonio is the outstanding performance of Arturo Dominici as the malevolent Javutich. We must remember that, for the majority of this picture, as Asa lies immobile in her crypt, Javutich is the evil that actually walks the Earth on this particular Feast of St. George, or Black Sunday. While Asa almost immediately fumbles her campaign after managing to stand once again on her own two feet, Javutich is given many opportunities to exhibit his intelligence and supernatural command over time and space. Steele has her great moment with the seduction of Kruvajan, but Dominici has four such highlights: his resurrection; the ghostly coach ride (surely one of the finest instances of poetic horror in the cinema); his escort of Kruvajan into progressively darker areas of Castle Vajda, until the lantern he carries is left hanging by itself in mid-air outside the crypt of Princess Asa; and his taunting materialization from thin air in front of Constantine, as he proceeds to prove that the young man is no match for his centuries-old familiarity with the castle and its secret trappings.

"I have good memories of Arturo," says Ivo Garrani, warmly. "We acted very well together, but I lost contact with him—as I did with almost every other actor I worked with, because I preferred to keep my private and professional lives separate. So I never had the occasion of pursuing an offscreen friendship with other actors."

"Arturo was a very sweet man," concurs actor Richard Harrison, who starred opposite him in Perseo l'invincibile/The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules (1963). "He was a charming gentleman, not at all the villain he played onscreen. He was also the type of actor who didn't put on airs, as some others were prone to do, so I could enjoy communicating with him. I also remember that he had a very pretty little daughter who was an actress."

In La maschera del demonio, Arturo's daughter Germana played the role of the innkeeper's daughter, whom the script does not give a name, though we are reminded several times that the name of her pet cow is Irina. Germana Dominici, the second-born of three daughters, was 13 years old at the time of filming. She remembers that her father's makeup was bluish-green in complexion, and that she first saw him in full costume at the studio commissary, where he surged up behind her with a monstrous growl, giving her a good fright.

Enrico Olivieri, who played the minor supporting role of Katia's brother Prince Constantine, was reportedly born to a noble family on December 4, 1939, in Turin, and was thus a prince in real life. [14] Despite his youth, Olivieri had been a working actor for longer than Ivo Garrani—active since 1948, when he played a piccolo role in Mario Soldati's Fuga in Francia. Soldati cast him again, in the more important role of Oscar, in La donna del fiume/Woman of the River (1955), which made international headlines for its steamy love scenes between Sophia Loren and her two leading men, Gerard Oury and Rik Battaglia. He also appeared in a minor, uncredited role in King Vidor's War and Peace (1956) and Giacomo Gentilomo's Sigfrido/The Dragon's Blood (1957, on which Eugenio Bava had worked as a technical advisor).

Production

The filming of La maschera del demonio commenced at Scalera Film (identified onscreen as Titanus Appia Studios) on March 28, 1960. The crypt and forest sequences were filmed on a sound stage next door to where Antonio Margheriti was directing Space Men/Assignment Outer Space—the second Italian science fiction film and the first to be made in color, which also happened to be co-scripted by Ennio De Concini. The Castle Vajda scenes (the exteriors and very few interiors) were filmed on location at a rented castello in Arsoli (about 60 kilometers outside Rome), which was owned by Prince Leone Massimo, the ex-husband of actress Dawn Addams (who had recently starred with Andrea Checchi in Die Tausend Augen des Dr. Mabuse).

Though Massimo De Rita remembers the allotted budget being in the neighborhood of $50–60,000, production manager Armando Govoni recalls

13 Countless film references erroneously credit Mario Bava with producing this film, but he had nothing to do with it. For some reason, American prints open with an animated sequence announcing "A Mario Fava Production"—though no one of this name is credited anywhere on Italian prints.

14 I say "reportedly" because this information appeared in the AIP pressbook for Black Sunday, which makes it worth mentioning, though its veracity is open to question.

JAVUTICH escorts Kruvajan through secret passages toward an unspeakable fate.

the final budget as closer to $100,000. With this sort of investment up front, Nello Santi wanted very much for the picture to be shot in Technicolor, like Hammer's Dracula film, but Bava submitted a list of reasons why it was essential that the film be photographed in black-and-white. "La maschera was filmed in black-and-white because Bava felt it was the appropriate stylistic choice for that kind of a movie," Govoni reasons. There was also the matter of reprising the red/green lighting transformation effects from I vampiri and Caltiki il mostro immortale, which would not have been possible to do, were the film shot in color.

During the course of production, Bava agreed to support his producer's needs by allowing a number of color production stills to be taken. These color stills offer a tremendous insight into Bava's approach to the production because they show that he and Ubaldo Terzano lighted the sets and actors as though the film was being shot in color, with the same bold swatches of saturated color gel lighting that would become Bava's calling card in horror films yet to come. Asked if Bava lighted the sets any differently than usual to accommodate the needs of the color stills photographer, Armando Govoni replies, "The set photographer shot some photos in color for the publicity and advertisements. If you see particular color effects in those pictures, they are present as a casual fact—but the lamps had the correct temperature for black-and-white shooting." In other words, the color stills reflect how the sets looked as a matter of course. Bava and Terzano used color gel lighting not only to set an on stage mood for the actors, but also to provide the black-and-white cinematography with specific tonalities of the gray scale that nature alone could not provide.

Production lasted approximately six weeks, wrapping on May 7. A six-week schedule was about par for a Galatea production, but somewhat more indulgent than the three or four weeks accorded to most Italian films of La maschera's station and period. Armando Govoni recalls the schedule as "very tiring. We usually worked from 8:00 a.m. till 1:00 a.m. the next morning. Sometimes, instead of going home, I spent the night in one of the Scalera dressing rooms, to steal an hour more of sleep. Since La maschera, I've worked on movies made in only two weeks and a day, but this one was particularly demanding—full of special effects, requiring a precise, millimetric positioning of the lights."

The schedule was meant to be luxurious, but Bava and his crew were worked to the bone. Govoni denies that the film was a "troubled" production, but by reading between the lines of what is known about the film's production—and by closely examining the film itself—La maschera del demonio begins to look like a project that went before the cameras prematurely, before its script was fully settled. "I like to start [the filmmaking process] with a storyboard," Bava once explained, "which means that I draw the entire film [on paper], with all the shots and cuts. It helps me a great deal, but if I am not given enough time to prepare myself, then I have to work intuitively." [15]

Bava placed great faith in intuition, which sometimes led him to ideas that brought sparkle to the turgid waters of second-rate scripts. "My father was never satisfied with his stories,"

POETRY IN SLOW MOTION. Javutich and his celebrated spectral carriage.

Lamberto Bava reveals. "He would continually revise his scenarios even after shooting had begun, sometimes changing as much as 50–60% of the script." [16]

La maschera del demonio was clearly such a case. Regardless of how well it looks and plays, the film contains many inconsistencies. Govoni remembers reading a completed script for the picture in February, prior to having it translated into English. Barbara Steele, on the other hand, denies ever seeing a completed script. "We were given the pages day to day. We had hardly any idea of what was going down on that film. We had no idea of the end, or the beginning either, not at all. I'm sure that Bava knew . . . [but] maybe he didn't!" [17]

The compulsion to continually improve upon the scripts he was given was a habit that Bava would never break; he couldn't resist the temptation to improvise, to expose his work to hazard or the influence of whatever happened to be in the air. "I'll never be another Antonioni," he once admitted. "I love to improvise too much, to solve problems, to create new scenes out of sheer desperation. A good director doesn't work this way; he sticks to the letter of the script and his schedule. That's how masterpieces get made." [18]

To seasoned horror buffs, the film's most obvious fallacy is its confusion of witchcraft and vampirism. Bava confessed that he came to the film with little prior knowledge of the subject of vampires. "The strange thing is that I didn't know, before making this film, what vampires were," he said. "In our country, we have no vampires. As a child, I heard our maid telling us fables about Sardinian and Sicilian bandits, which terrified me, but I never heard of a vampire. In our country, the sun drives such things away." [19]

As in I vampiri, there is no literal blood-drinking in La maschera del demonio, but considering the immense commercial success of Dracula il vampiro in Rome, it is unlikely that Bava felt any obligation to tiptoe around such explicitudes to placate the Italian censors. In fact, the characters of Asa and Javutich were originally scripted as Hammer-like vampires, and Steele and Dominici were fitted with the vampire fangs Christopher Lee had made famous. A publicity still of Dominici wearing his fangs survives, and the photo's outdoor setting indicates that the attack of Javutich on the ill-fated coachman Boris may have been filmed. But, after a few days, the fangs were discarded. "I made the actors get rid of them, because they were becoming a cliché even then," Bava reasoned, but Armando Govoni remembers differently: "The fangs were used throughout the shooting, but when we saw

ARTURO DOMINICI bares the vampire fangs that were ultimately eliminated from the shooting.

15 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

16 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

17 Christopher Dietrich and Peter Beckman, "Karma, Catsup and Caskets: The Barbara Steele Interview," Video Watchdog 7, September/October 1991, 50.

18 Alfredo Castelli and Tito Monego, interview in Horror 1. 1969.

19 It's interesting to note, given this context, that the vampiric wurdalaks of I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath (1963) seem to have arisen from Bava's childhood memories of this peasant bandit class.

MARIO BAVA camps it up on the graveyard set, as Ubaldo Terzano frames Javutich's resurrection behind the camera.

the rushes, especially in the close-ups, they looked too fake, so Serandrei cut around them."

It was in this way that the defining lines between vampire, witch, and Satanist began to blur. In Black Sunday, American International's English-language version of the film, the narration tries to bridge the gulf between the two by saying, "History has given these slaves of Satan the name of Vampire."

Another source of confusion involves the precise nature of the relationship between Asa and Javutich. In the English-language versions of the film, Javutich is described as Asa's "serf" or "servant," but the film's Italian press materials identify him as "Prince Ygor Javutich—fratello della strega"—which means, "brother of the witch." This revelation helps to clear up some of the mysteries surrounding this character in the English versions—namely, why the Vajdas would hang a portrait of one of their former servants on the wall of their castle, and why a servant would dress as imperiously as Javutich, his breast emblazoned with the griffin carved into the family hearth at Castle Vajda. With this information in hand, and given the devotion that Arturo Dominici displays in all his scenes opposite Barbara Steele, it becomes more obvious that these royal siblings may have been crucified less for practicing Black Magic than the rites of incest.[20] Late in the picture, when Andrej and Constantine discover the secret passage to the family crypt behind the castle's fireplace, they discover in that secret recess a nude portrait of Asa, who is shown holding a crystal ball in her hand, with a snake weaving in and out of her fingers—symbolizing her commanding grasp of male power symbols that would have posed an intolerable challenge to the men around her.

WILLED back to life by his sister, Asa, Javutich rises from his grave—the Mask of Satan still hammered to his face.

PRINCESS KATIA sees an unwelcome reflection in her vanity mirror while preparing herself for bed.

One wishes that the film had been made in a period when issues such as these could have been addressed more directly by the script, but at the time, it was daring enough to hint at them visually.

Not all of the production's difficulties were rooted in the dilutions and revisions of its screenplay. La maschera del demonio was further complicated by the on-set behavior of its 20-year-old star, Barbara Steele.

"Bava chose her for her eyes and her face," Govoni confirms, "but I was never impressed by her limited acting ability. She was a strange, neurotic person—unlike John Richardson, who was precise, punctual, and always prepared."

Bava agreed. "Steele was half-crazy, afraid of Italians," he said, more boldly. [21]

"Lord alone knows I was difficult enough," Steele admits. "I didn't like my fangs—I had them changed three times. I loathed my wig—I changed that four times. I couldn't understand Italian, I didn't want to play a Chopin waltz. I certainly didn't want them to tear open my dress and expose my breasts, so they got a double that I didn't like at all, so I ended up doing it anyway—drunk, barely over 18, embarrassed and not very easy to be around." [22] This last bit refers to a scene in the crypt, after Javutich delivers Katia to Asa's burial site. He tears the front of her dress, as though to reveal her throat, and then prepares to satisfy his own curiosity by ripping away the front of her white undergarment—but an offstage sound arrests his move, and he dashes away. While doing publicity for the film's US release, Steele told New York Daily News "On the Town" columnist Charles McHarry that the original La maschera script contained three nude scenes in which she refused to participate. This assertion, of course, contradicts her later assertion of having never seen a complete script of the film.

Furthermore, Steele was frequently a late arrival on the set. Bava remembered one such occasion: "One day she refused to come to the set because someone told her I was using a special film stock that made the actors look naked! I went to her and said that, if I had such an invention, I would have made millions from it long ago." [23]

Germana Dominici remembers that her father Arturo was often forced to stand around, awaiting the unpredictable actress in the heat of a Roman spring, wearing heavy makeup and an even heavier velvet cloak. She recalls him pacing and railing at the amiable director, "Who does she think she is—Marilyn Monroe?" Dominici's burden of makeup and wardrobe also caused him to suffer a mishap while filming the celebrated sequence of Javutich clawing his way out of a muddy grave. Buried for several minutes—under his costume, a heavy cloak, a lightweight version of the bronze "Mask of Satan," and several pounds of dampened vermiculite—the actor succumbed to the heat, amplified by the studio lights, and fainted. The crew was not aware of this until he failed to surface on cue, and they rushed to pull him out before he suffocated. After shots were grabbed of the earth pulsing with his effort to emerge, Bava thought of a safer way of filming the resurrection: at a low angle, with Dominici's clawed hands scrabbling over a built-up mound of earth. To the amusement of his crew, Bava lightened the mood on the set by climbing into the open grave himself and demonstrating various comic ways in which the scene might be played.

Steele's own memories of the filming tend to be more imaginative than reliable, for reasons that have little to do with a faulty memory. Less than a year after completing the picture, her colorful storytelling found a receptive ear with journalist Charles McHarry, who happily reported her claim that she had mastered twelve different screams for the picture. "[Steele] couldn't scream worth a hoot until the Italian director of Black Sunday went to work on her," wrote McHarry. "She quickly learned a witchy scream, a disgusted scream, a defiant scream, a frightened scream, a fury scream, and some others. The witchy scream was toughest, and was managed only after gargling with a nasty potion mixed by the director. She thinks the stuff was alum water and wine." [24] (Alum water and wine—a recipe for ballyhoo?)

Though the production records say otherwise, Steele remembers making the movie in the dead of winter, 20 This was not quite a first in vampire cinema. In 1935, Tod Browning's Mark of the Vampire propagated the legend of an incestuous father and daughter, played by Bela Lugosi and Carroll Borland, who became vampires after committing suicide—but the detail ran afoul of the Hays Office and had to be omitted, with only a bullet wound in Lugosi's temple surviving as a remnant of Browning's intention.

21 Volta.

22 Barbara Steele, liner notes for Mario Bava's Black Sunday CD, Bay Cities, 1992, music composed by Les Baxter.

23 Abruzzese.

24 Charles McHarry, "On the Town," New York Daily News, February 28, 1961.

describes the weather as freezing cold, and claims that long days were spent out of doors on location, in the drafty castello, and on location in actual tombs. "Bava was deathly ill," she claims, "as was everybody else. Everybody had some terrible virus and we were totally asphyxiated by all the dry ice. It's just as well that the film was dubbed later, because everyone was utterly nasal." [25] Asked about the freezing cold, Armando Govoni counters, "We shot from March through May; don't you think it would be difficult for a Roman spring to be like a polar spring?" And, as already pointed out, La maschera's various tombs, crypts, and cemeteries were all built on sound stages at Scalera Film.

While much of what Steele has said on (and off) the record about the production is discredited by production records and other on-set witnesses, a few of her stories have the ring of truth. For example, she talks about herself and John Richardson getting a case of the slap-happies in the midst of some last-minute shooting: "You reach a point of no return when you start to laugh. You laugh because you're nervous, then you become so guilty you can't stop. I just couldn't look John in the eye any more, so I'd look at his nose, the left part of his forehead—anything! Bava nearly had a heart attack at the end. He thought we would never get through it!" [26]

La maschera del demonio may have been a difficult production, but Armando Govoni insists that Bava's first experience as a credited director was undaunting. "To think that a film of this kind could impose difficulties on Bava is to insult him," he says. "Bava had been a major director of photography. Directors called on him all the time for advice about where they should place their camera to get the best point of view. So, for Bava to direct this movie was 'business as usual.' He had some problems, perhaps, in directing the actors."

This is virtually the only point on which Steele and Govoni agree. "I think that Bava was a director's director, as opposed to an actor's director," Steele proposes. "He was totally concerned with the look of the film. He didn't work on any concept with the actors, particularly; we just fell into it. He sort of salvaged us, actually."

PROMOTIONAL shot of Steele and Richardson chatting in costume.

In a tribute to Bava written on the occasion of his death (but not published until 1992), Steele wrote an elegant, impressionistic memoir of her La maschera del demonio experience: "I can see Mr. Bava standing with perfect equanimity in an old tweed jacket on a sub-zero set that was loaded with twenty volatile Italians suffering from cheap brandy, 18-hour days, and the flu, wind machines flying, eyes full of rubber cement, and the producer swearing on his mother's grave that we'd all get paid 'next week.' And Mr. Bava, the perfect gentleman, kind, alert, amused, was always standing in the shadows in a state of perfect composure." [27]

Elsewhere, Steele has described Bava as being "like a ghost, a man in silent shoes . . . Not cold, but very shy and removed, inhibited and distant. Very subjective and obviously preoccupied with this fabulous vision that he had."

But Govoni describes Bava in warmer, more approachable terms: "Bava was a serious man, but no more formal than any other. When we were working together, we used to go to a restaurant about 200 meters from the studio. He was happy to eat with people he liked. A movie is not a marriage."

While Govoni's and Steele's recollections of Bava are opposite, in proximity and in temperature, they are doubtless equally sincere. Govoni speaks of Bava with the bonhomie of a fellow crew member, and the crew was always Bava's preferred company on a film set. The relationship that exists between an actor and director is quite different. As Govoni suggests, Bava "may have had some difficulty with directing the actors." Indeed, one of Bava's favorite daydreams in later years was that he might someday make "a film without actors." Steele's description of the man who made her famous, while warm and appreciative, also reflects what was lacking in their rapport.

PUBLICITY SHOT depicting Andrej and Princess Katia on horseback. Such exterior scenes tended to be written out in the editing.

Bava adapted to his new role of director with ease. As Lamberto Bava has said: "He made a certain kind of film, according to his own ideas, in his own way—and he found the experience enormously calming and therapeutic . . . [28] He sometimes became so technically involved that it was exasperating. To get lost in the minutiae of filmmaking gave him immense satisfaction—the pure joy of self-expression and diversion, yet formalized. In a sense, it was a bit like a game for him. On the set, he was a man transformed." [29]

Photography & Special Effects

Mario Bava would later declare that La maschera del demonio was "the only film of mine that was truly well-made. It was filmed entirely with a dolly, which I was never able to use again because of the time and money involved. There were 60 signs for the handtrucks, high and low. The crew were going crazy but, with the dolly, I could frame a scene perfectly simply by raising or lowering the camera. I photographed the film myself; I was very fast. At most, it would take me 7 minutes to light a shot, maybe 12 to light an entire room." [30]

Now it is Armando Govoni's turn to disagree with Bava. "The director of photography was actually Ubaldo Terzano, who had been Bava's assistant," he insists. "He lighted the sets so perfectly that Bava seldom had to correct him."

The film itself credits Bava with "photography," while Terzano is listed as "camera operator," but considering the increased demands on Bava's attention as director, it is understandable why Terzano would be given additional latitude in his responsibilities. That said, Bava was wholly responsible for designing the shots, approving Terzano's corresponding framings, and fine-tuning the lighting of individual scenes.

During his years as a cameraman, Bava had become increasingly involved in all visual aspects of film production, including art direction, set dressing, wardrobe, and makeup. Needing now to relegate some of these responsibilities, but wishing to retain creative control of each department, Bava filled his key crew positions with young craftspeople whose previous experience had been principally in positions of assistance—they were eager to please and to learn, worked cheaply, and were malleable and without ego. Line producer Massimo De Rita had served as production manager on La battaglia di Maratona; art director Giorgio Giovannini had started out as the assistant of Flavio Mogherini; first assistant director Paolo Mercuri had worked as a production secretary since 1954; Terzano, of course, had been Bava's camera assistant and, more recently, operator for many years. Bava would tell Terzano what he required visually, provide him with a storyboard, and then leave him to it; when the time came to rehearse a scene, he would either leave it as-is, adjust a light, change a lens, or improvise on impulse an entirely new approach to the scene. But we mustn't underestimate Terzano's involvement: he operated the camera, it was his eye looking through the viewfinder, and his call whether a take was printed or scratched. So the cinematography of this legendary horror film, so often attributed solely to Bava, was at least a collaboration of the two men, in which Terzano carried the ultimate responsibility. He may have followed Bava's instructions and realized his visual ideas, but this is not to say that Terzano was without creative influence; all one has to do is compare the panther-like grace of his camera movements, their smooth glide and their velvety shadows, to the starker, more mechanical cinematography operated by Antonio Rinaldi in Bava's post-1964 work to realize that Terzano was a tremendously valuable contributor to the sleek and stylish appearance of Bava's best-looking films.

Unlike Bava's later work with Rinaldi, La maschera del demonio has never been reprimanded for overusing

25 Dietrich and Beckman.

26 Ibid.

27 Barbara Steele.

28 Lamberto Bava interview, Cozzi.

29 "Intervista con Lamberto Bava," La Lettura, Cattolica 1st Festival internazionale del giallo e del mistero, September 1980, 107.

30 Abruzzese.

the zoom lens, yet the film abounds in zoom shots: the zoom as the door of the Prince's bedroom opens to reveal Javutich; the zoom-out from the cross that repels him; the zoom into the empty doorway as we hear the vampire's fleeing footfalls; the zoom into the face of the dead serf Boris; the zoom into Kruvajan's face as it is unearthed at the burial site of Javutich; and the corresponding zoom-out from the shocked faces of Andrej and the priest. In each of these cases, the zoom is used to convey, visually, the effects of fright—the zoom-in reproducing the way the eye seizes upon abhorrent details, the zoom-out visualizing a corresponding flinch of revulsion.

There is little doubt that Bava was fully in charge of the film's many special effects shots, which required his particular eye and sense of precision. It was the Italian way of working to reserve all special effects photography for a final week appended to the shooting schedule, so it is likely that Terzano supervised the camera crew during principal photography of all the films he made with Bava, while Bava took over for the sake of expediency in the final week of production.

La maschera del demonio contains some of Bava's most lauded visual moments, particularly the prologue's hammering of the Mask of Satan onto Princess Asa's face; the 360° pan shot as Andrej and Kruvajan descend into the Vajda crypt; the attack of the large bat, a creature evoked almost entirely through shadowplay; the introduction of Princess Katia, flanked by two frightening Great Dane hounds; the unnoticed beads of Kruvajan's blood on the broken glass window of Asa's crypt, dripping into her hollow eye sockets; Kruvajan casually tossing a pebble into a small moonlit pond, which dissolves to an overhead shot of Asa beckoning Javutich to live again; Javutich rising from his grave under a lightning-scarred sky and plucking the mask of spikes from his pitted face; the alarming 180° pivot above the ravaged, staring face of the murdered Prince Vajda . . . the list goes on and on. It is difficult to think of an earlier horror film in the sound era with an equal number of such impressive, purely visual moments.

The last shot mentioned is a classic example of Bava's dictum that the simplest solution to a problem is always best. While analyzing the film in preparation to record my audio commentary for Image Entertainment's DVD of Black Sunday, I was baffled—knowing how heavy motion picture cameras were in those days—by the smoothness of the radical camera movement that reveals the ravaged face of Prince Vajda, so I screened the picture for my friend Michael Lennick, a professional special effects designer of more than twenty-five years experience. Michael immediately understood how the shot was done, and described to me how the camera had been mounted on a pivot platform locked down inside a rig of two concentric steel rings, separated by a system of wheels. Such a contraption, he explained, would allow the camera to drop forward on the guides of one ring, then spin 180° onto the other, turning the upside-down close-up of Prince Vajda's ravaged face rightside-up. He also pointed out that Black Sunday was making use of this technology more than two decades before Freddie Francis' camera team innovated such a rig for the Dino De Laurentiis production of Dune in 1984. Great. The only problem is—according to the actor involved in the shot—this was not how it was done.

FILMING the 180° "reveal" of Prince Vajda's death with a special camera rig devised by Eugenio Bava.

KATIA and Constantine (Enrico Olivieri) discover the ravaged body of their dead father.

"Actually, it was faked in post-production," reveals Ivo Garrani. "Bava never moved the camera in that shot. Instead, he created the illusion of rotation with the camera truca." In other words, the frame was locked down and optically spun until the ravaged face of Prince Vajda was right-side up onscreen.

One hesitates to challenge the word of such an important witness, but a recently surfaced production photo documenting the filming of this shot shows Ubaldo Terzano manning a customized 35 mm camera, whose modifications were the work of Eugenio Bava. The camera appears to be mounted between two planks of wood, with the lens encircled by a steel ring; a rear system of radiating handlebars look capable of rotating the camera a full 180° in a single spin. Evidently the camera moved so little that Garrani was deceived into thinking the shot was achieved optically.

Garrani also says that the shot of the Prince roasting to death in the family hearth—which other special effects men have suggested to me was done by filming the flames through an angled piece of glass capturing Garrani's reflection—was also done with the truca, which married the separate elements of himself and the fire. For the actual shots of the Prince's head melting and charring in the flames, a wax head with a mechanized interior was substituted, so that the head could continue to move its eyes and jaws realistically as it burned. The contraption was one of several contributions made to the film by Eugenio Bava.

TURKISH one-sheet poster, art by Ibrahim Gökcan.

"I knew Eugenio Bava quite well," recalls Armando Govoni, whose duties on the picture included running an errand to Milan to acquire a special foam latex used by Eugenio to create the dead faces of Asa and Kruvajan. "I don't recall whether he ever visited the set of La maschera, but I can confirm that all of the modifications made to the cameras used by Mario for his special effects were the inventions of his father."

Eugenio Bava was able to fashion a foam latex mask of Barbara Steele's face from her photos, without taking an actual lifecast. It was used for the shots inside Asa's violated tomb, depicting the scrambling of scorpions from its hollow eye sockets and the rematerializing of its eyes. (Many years later, Bava confided to fellow special effects designer Armando Valcauda that the scorpions used in this scene posed quite a problem, as some of them escaped the confines of the shot and got loose on the set, throwing the crew into a tizzy.) A special section of the tomb was rebuilt for these close-ups, with a hollow area built under the mask, allowing various kitchen mixtures to be lifted into the sockets from below—first a mixture of what appears to be tomato soup and rice (suggesting blood and maggots), and then two poached eggs (representing Asa's rematerializing eyes). To give the dull eggs the illusion of brightening with sorcerous power and intelligence, two small, pulsating lights were trained on each yolk. Eugenio also designed and sculpted various forms of the eponymous "Mask of Satan"—a real one cast in bronze, and also lightweight foam rubber substitutes which were painted bronze and worn by the actors.

One imagines that Eugenio's "Mask of Satan" must be one of the most coveted props in horror film history. After the film's release, Bava received a number of offers for it. "I throw out all the letters I get," he told Ornella Volta. "The only one I've kept was from a crazy woman in Bruges. She said that she would pay me any amount of money for the Mask of Satan that my father made—the one with all the spikes inside, to keep Barbara Steele nailed down in one spot. If I ever happen to go to Bruges, I must remember to take a look at that woman's house. My films are most successful in Northern countries, because crazy people tend to live in the North, away from the sunshine. Just think how cold it must be during the winter in Bruges!" [31]

JAVUTICH whips his ghost mares—a studio cyclorama clearly visible behind him.

Even more forbidding than Bava's notions of Bruges are the film's scenes in the forest between Moldavia and Mirgorod, the eeriest of which were shot on a small sound stage at the Scalera studios. No artificial trees were erected; the entire forest was suggested with glass mattes, foregrounded bracken, and other "smoke and mirrors." Studied closely, most shots of the coach in transit show that the horse-drawn vehicle was incapable of moving more than eight steps in either direction. For the close-ups of the coach driver (Mario Passante, who had previously worked for Federico Fellini in Il bidone and La notte di Cabiria/The Nights of Cabiria), Bava photographed the actor seated atop a false coach rig, with rising smoke behind him to lend activity to a static studio cyclorama, and then rewound the exposed footage in the camera, superimposing a zoetropic procession of tree branches. For the shots of the passengers inside the coach, various stagehands trotted past the windows carrying branches obtained from a local florist. To show the coach coming and going, it was photographed moving hesitantly toward, and then away from, a different set of glass mattes painted with black streaks and augmented with actual placements of dead wood.

Fearing that these tight conditions might show through, Bava insisted on one day of location shooting, so that the coach could be photographed in a more realistic setting before it moved on into the clutching, bone-fingered trees of Mirgorod. A false entrance to the derelict Vajda chapel was built and simply leaned against a hillside; it incorporated a small, black-lined alcove that the actors could walk into. The day set aside for the shooting was a typical, sunny, Roman spring day, but Bava cleverly camouflaged the sunshine by photographing the roadside always through the gnarled branches of dead trees, placed artfully in the foreground as a framing device. Look at these shots again and imagine the bracken erased from view, and you'll be astonished at how much of a difference such a minor addition can make in a shot. It alters the very temperature, as well as the character of a scene.

31 Volta.

CONSTANTINE emerges from the spiked pit to pull his evil ancestor to his doom.

Another bit of camera trickery was involved in the memorable scene of Javutich floating like a ghost toward the bed of Prince Vajda. This technique may have been introduced by cinematographer Henri Alekan in Jean Cocteau's exquisite La Belle et le Bête/Beauty and the Beast (1946), where Beauty (Josette Day) is shown gliding through the corridors of the Beast's enchanted castle. Bava reproduced the effect by having Arturo Dominici stand on a makeshift dolly, while the camera held him in tight close-up, its own backtracking movement pulling him along. Dominici's complete lack of ambulation gave him the appearance of malevolently willing himself toward the helpless Prince Vajda, no longer patriarchal in his presence.

For the third time in four years, Bava resorted once again to his popular (and still top-secret) red-and-green makeup/lighting dissolve trick for the simultaneous aging of Princess Katia and the rejuvenation of Asa. The trick would be trotted out once again at the film's finale, as Asa succumbs to age while burning at the stake. Wrinkles were presketched on Steele's face in red grease pencil, and her eyes and cheeks shaded with rouge to look sallow and sunken. All of this was rendered invisible under a barrage of strong red lighting (invisible on monochromatic film stock), and made gradually apparent as the red lights dimmed and green lights were raised, bringing the red lines into relief with the monochromatic illusion of gray and black. The effect is actually less impressive here than in its previous applications, because the barrage of red lighting makes Katia look overly tanned before the transformation begins. Of course, Terzano was looking through the viewfinder this time; one imagines that Bava's more attuned sense of optical effects might have caused him to make some lighting adjustments, were their roles reversed. The aging of Katia in the sequence is also not maintained in later scenes, which makes Asa's only onscreen act of vampirism in the entire picture look ineffectual, if not gratuitous.

ANDREJ rescues Constantine from the pit, but the price for victory has already been paid.

The most impressive special effects in La maschera are the in-camera trick shots supervised by Bava himself, which are so invisible that they are rarely singled out for praise. The split-screen scenes in which Steele acts with herself, as Asa gloats over the prostrate form of her subdued descendant, are not only convincing but stylishly framed, with the rewound double-exposed footage matted along the jagged edge of the witch's exploded tomb. The explosion of the witch's resting place—which may have been inspired by a "Ripley's Believe It or Not!" account of Queen Elizabeth I's coffin exploding while on view at Whitehall Palace in London, on the eve of her interment on March 24, 1603—was accomplished with miniatures; the tiny crypt, a bit larger than a shoe box, was prescored so that the pieces of its lid could be pulled away by a fine wire, revealing a doll of Steele resting inside. Viewed through the groined, cobwebbed arches of the ruined chapel (either a foregrounded miniature or a photographic matte; we can't be certain), the shot is remarkably convincing, even on a big screen. The film's Italian trailer, included on Image Entertainment's Black Sunday DVD, includes an alternate take of this effects shot that doesn't work nearly so well.

Perhaps the greatest single effects shot in La maschera del demonio is the transition shot immediately following Kruvajan's arrival at the castle, after his seduction by Asa. We see a night exterior of Castle Vajda, as one of the windows is illuminated by the full moon as it peeks out from behind a passing cloud. This shot—a throwaway moment so perfectly believable that it hardly begs consideration until one's fourth or fifth viewing—is a multi-layered glass matte effect that was executed live, in front of the camera. The left wall of the castle—which is viewed from a staggered low angle—was a forced perspective maquette that merged, toward the right side of the screen, with a perfectly tailored black paper cut-out of the castle's tower that was affixed to a foregrounded pane of glass. Behind this layer, a cloudy night sky was airbrushed onto a second level of glass, lending a sense of depth to the image. Behind these two layers, a small light was positioned behind a diffusion screen to provide the moon, which was itself set up behind a third glass matte depicting a passing cloud. This pane of glass was pulled manually across the light to animate the movement of the cloud over the "moon." As the "moon" was gradually revealed, a small flashlight-sized beam positioned behind the window of the maquette was raised on a dimmer, creating the illusion of moonlight being reflected on the window—a window which, in truth, isn't there; there was no glass in the window of the maquette. It's the perfect grace note to a magnificent illusion, all the more magnificent because the shot is seemingly so unnecessary and disposable.

For the shot in which Javutich gleefully materializes out of thin air to stalk Constantine, Bava employed a simple trick. Enrico Olivieri was positioned on the left side of the frame, standing before the nude painting of Princess Asa found in the secret passage behind the secret fireplace, the right side of which was painted mostly black and merged with shadows. Arturo Dominici stood in darkness, at an angle behind the camera which, as the lights were raised, presented the illusion of the gloating actor materializing in front of the painting out of thin air—or rather his reflection, as it was caught on a pane of angled glass positioned between the set and the lens. The shot contains a subtle giveaway to how it was achieved: the griffin emblazoned on Dominici's costume is reversed.

Shortly after Javutich intimidates Constantine into walking backwards toward a trap door that drops him into a pit of spikes, the vampire struggles with Andrej over the same precipice. Surprisingly, the scene cuts from the floor-level action to an in-camera shot that presents us, presumably, with Constantine's point of view from the depths of the pit. For this shot, Bava constructed what appears to be a hurried, but perfectly effective, combination of matte painting and foregrounded miniature. Actor John Richardson appears to be hanging onto the edge of the trap, dangling over a pit of tall, jagged spikes, while still fighting with Dominici, who is visible on the other side of the aperture. By still-framing the shot, it is possible to see that Richardson (or, more likely, his double) was actually resting on his stomach in a dark makeshift tunnel not much longer than his own body, pretending to hang on, while Dominici grappled with him, standing outside the tunnel in a brightly lit area. The foreground of the shot consists of miniature spikes (which look as though they might be a jagged bouquet of snapped pencils) and a stone wall maquette, suggesting the walls and floor of the pit. Richardson was lit from above and from the right, the light sources blocked from view by nothing more elaborate than a bluntly positioned piece of cardboard! At the top of the shot, two bare planks are nailed together—just enough to suggest the juncture of the other two walls of the pit at a glance. The unexpected image has great dramatic punch, and is onscreen for such a short time that the viewer hasn't adequate time to deconstruct it.

Editing

Not only was La maschera del demonio continually rewritten on the set, but the shared screenwriting credit of Mario Serandrei—the film's editor—strongly suggests that it was rewritten in the editing room, as well. Serandrei may have been the most talented film editor working in Italy—he had edited Ossessione, Senso, and Fabiola, among many other timeless classics—but he wasn't a writer. In a career dating back to the early 1940s, La maschera del demonio is his only writing credit. This implies that he devised solutions to narrative problems in the editing room, to an extent that went beyond the usual cutting-together of existing scenes and sequences.

La maschera del demonio contains a number of scenes that don't hold up to close scrutiny—in the way they are edited, in the way one scene results from another, or in the way certain scenes are played by the actors. For example, though Princess Asa drains the life from Kruvajan with her kiss, she is not restored to life by it. Although revived and strong enough to explode the walls of the tomb that imprisons her through a sheer exertion of will, she remains immobile in the family crypt until the last reel of the picture. (In later years, when Hammer Films produced Dracula A.D. 1972, they came under a great deal of criticism for allowing the Count [Christopher Lee] to spend the entire film in a ruined church, never interacting with the modern world; it's a testament to Bava's direction and Steele's performance that La maschera del demonio has never been accused of a similar reticence.) Furthermore, one would imagine that, upon his resurrection, Javutich would dash immediately to the grave of his sister/inamorata—but instead, he is not shown reunited with Asa until several scenes after he has led Kruvajan to her tomb. (That's right: she has already fed on Kruvajan, yet she still lies there, powerless.) My suspicion is that the scene of Javutich visiting the prone Asa was filmed with the idea that it would immediately follow his resurrection, and that his first order of business was originally to abduct Katia and bring her to Asa, who then took her descendant's place. ("I will bring you a fresh, young body," he says in the Black Sunday version. "She was cast in your image. Through her blood, your destiny will be fulfilled." Javutich actually says these words before we see him lay eyes on Katia for the first time.) This theory is further supported by Steele's inexplicably shady reading of some scenes, such as the one following the death of Prince Vajda, in which Katia goes out of her way to ridicule the idea that Javutich might still be alive and then flirtatiously invites Andrej to stay at the castle. Watch the scene again, and you'll see that these are not the actions of a young woman determined to find the answers behind the death of her father, nor of someone shaken by the death of a parent. Here, Steele's performance is much more in line with Asa impersonating Katia.

The moment of Katia's abduction by Javutich may well be included in the finished picture to some extent, in the scene where Katia—preparing herself for bed—spies the clutching hand of Javutich reflected in her vanity table mirror and screams. As she first enters the room, she pauses beside a curtain to undress and it is immediately apparent that Javutich is behind the curtain. The shot is composed in such a way that it would have no purpose unless A) Javutich was going to grab her from behind, or B) nearly grab her from behind, without success. Neither thing happens, because as the curtain begins to rustle, the scene cuts away to a pointless shot of Andrej, pacing in his own room. When we cut back to Katia's room, she is wearing a nightgown and seated at a vanity table (we assume—we never see it), where she removes her crucifix. At that very moment, she sees the reflection of Javutich's gloved hand in the mirror reaching through the curtain for her. First of all, Javutich couldn't possibly hope to reach the Princess from such a distance; the shot would make sense only as a close-up of his hand as it reached for her nearby. Secondly, there is no vanity table or mirror in the scene. Bava suggests their presence entirely with sleight of hand—by filming Steele going through the motions of a woman using such items, and by inserting a cutaway to an optically flipped shot of Javutich's reaching hand (and Katia's reaction to it), which allows the viewer to interpret it as a mirrored reflection. The more one thinks about it, what could Javutich possibly hope to reach from the other side of the room? Clearly, this is recycled footage of the gloved hand reaching out to Katia as she stood within reach of the curtain.

Fortunately, La maschera del demonio is such a parade of classic Gothic imagery and nightmarish chills, and so expertly edited, that one must know the film very well indeed before its well-concealed faults begin to show. Bava intended the film to be seen once, maybe twice, and then forgotten—but the world had other plans.

AIP & Black Sunday

La maschera del demonio premiered in Rome in August 1960, shortly after the Italian horror film—dormant since the commercial failure of I vampiri—had been revived by another quickie inspired by the success of Dracula il vampiro: L'amante del vampiro/The Vampire and the Ballerina. Written by Ernesto Gastaldi and directed by Renato Polselli, L'amante del vampiro proved only a moderate success. Bava's directorial debut earned even more—an estimated 140 million lire [$87,000]—but this was probably little more than a break-even figure; if its earnings had ended there, the endeavor would hardly have been worth the bother. In retrospect, it is interesting to note that both of these films were signed with their directors' own Italian names, not with English pseudonyms, which may have been the very thing that prevented them from achieving popularity in Rome as they would elsewhere around the world.

When La maschera del demonio was sold to other European countries, it received plaudits far in excess of its homeland reception. It was particularly well-received in France, where the respected magazine Positif acknowledged the film's importance by putting Barbara Steele's Princess Katia, flanked by her two hounds, on the front cover of their July 1961 edition. And when it was released in the United States by American International Pictures—under the title Black Sunday—it became an immediate hit with genre fans, who praised it as a perfect hybrid of classic and contemporary horror cinema.

As mentioned earlier, Samuel Z. Arkoff and his partner James H. Nicholson began acquiring Italian films for AIP in 1959, with the help of Fulvio Lucisano, a Roman talent agent with a few modest production credits to his name. Sword-and-sandal pictures were inexpensive to acquire and performed well in the wake of Hercules, so Arkoff and Nicholson began to pick up every halfway-decent, exploitable picture Lucisano could find for them. In time, they would found American International Television to play-off those purchases whose titles did not test well with theater owners, or which they decided not to formally distribute to theaters. It was in their second year of these foreign acquisitions that Lucisano—"a man who looks exactly like Julius Caesar," in Arkoff's estimation—invited Arkoff and Nicholson to attend a screening of a new Galatea production entitled La maschera del demonio.

PRINCESS KATIA*'s first appearance, an image copied by numerous horror film directors from Rafael Baledón to Jean Rollin.*

"It was a very cold time of the year in Rome," Arkoff reminisced. "We sat in a screening room, as I recall, at 9:00 in the morning and, because of the high ceilings and marble floors, it was as cold as a sonofabitch! And then this picture started . . . It was terrific! We saw it in Italian with an interpreter, which isn't usually satisfactory, but Fulvio would chime in from time to time to make things more understandable. But [we could tell] it was a picture from a first-class horror and suspense director. Bava himself arrived towards the end of the screening. He heard there were a couple of Americans coming and we had already made a reputation for ourselves by distributing a number of horror pictures, so he was interested in meeting us. I daresay Mario was near 50 at the time, and his English didn't seem to be very good. In fact, he seemed to be embarrassed somewhat by talking, but he could actually speak English better than he let on. He would smile, happy that we liked the film and that we were quite effusive about it. He was very modest, but I thought Bava was a great artist."

Arkoff and Nicholson bought the American rights to La maschera del demonio—their very first international horror acquisition—for "under or about" $100,000. (Little did they suspect that their purchase covered the picture's entire production cost in one fell swoop!) In the wake of this lucrative deal, Arkoff and Nicholson entered into a formal business partnership with Lucisano, allowing him to resume his career as a film producer under the banner of his own company, Italian International—which continues to thrive today, nearly fifty years after its founding. AIP's five-year contract with Lucisano specified that their otherwise independent companies would co-produce two films annually, with AIP providing the script, the expensive top-line marquee talent, and on-set dialogue and production supervisors, while Lucisano would be responsible for everything else. Lucisano would control the product sales in Italy, France and Belgium, while AIP would control sales throughout the rest of the globe. [32]

Though excited by the film they had seen in Rome, Arkoff and Nicholson's enthusiasm cooled somewhat when Galatea delivered an English-language print, bearing the title The Mask of Satan. This version had been recorded at ELDA [English Language Dubbers Association] in Rome, utilizing a translation of the original scripted dialogue by George Higgins III, with most—if not all—of the male roles dubbed by an expatriate American actor named Dan Sturkie. [33] Arkoff found the ELDA track to be "technically unacceptable."

Consequently, AIP hired Lou Rusoff—Arkoff's brother-in-law, who later wrote the screenplay that launched AIP's popular Beach Party franchise—to produce a new English-language version of the picture at New York City's Titra Sound Corporation. The sessions were directed by Lee Kresel, edited by Salvatore Billitteri, and recorded by Robert Sherwood. The redubbing of the picture was not conducted with any of the original stars, though Barbara Steele told Hollywood columnist Louella O. Parsons that she had dubbed her own performance in New York (untrue). Titra's voice talent included Joyce Gordon as Asa and Katia, Bernard Grant as Dr. Kruvajan, Brett Morrison as Prince Vajda, Peter Fernandez as Constantine, Corinne Orr as the tavern keeper's daughter, and George Gonneau as the film's narrator. During the dubbing process, it was decided to alter certain character names, resulting in decades of jarring reportage: Kruvajan's Christian name was changed from Choma to Thomas (an interesting change, given its Biblical associations of doubt and the ironic approach which the character takes to the artifacts in the Vajda crypt), Andrej Gorobec became Andreas Gorobecs, and Javutich became Javuto.

Nearly all of the film's original cast (with the exception of Checchi, Dominici and his daughter) had spoken their lines in English. According to Armando Govoni, the cast was given a crude text translation to work from, and they largely stuck to it. Hence, John Richardson finds the time—while recoiling in horror from the resurrected Asa—to blurt out, "We're in the midst of a mystery that defies all reasoning!" (Technically unacceptable, indeed.) The on-set sound was recorded for reference rather than use, and one of Steele's actual screams is heard on the soundtrack. As Titra set about redubbing the film, their voice talent were required to stick to what the actors onscreen were saying, with only slight embellishment. In some cases, the embellishment was done for censorship reasons, as when Asa's line "You too can find the joy and happiness of Hades!" was awkwardly softened to "You too can find the joy and happiness of hating!" In the first of many sexual elements in Bava's work softened by AIP, the incestuous relationship between Javutich and Asa was also eradicated by the new dialogue, so that the evil Prince became Asa's "unfortunate serf, Javuto, whom you forced to do your bidding." When he finally saw the film in 1968, British critic Tom Milne wrote in Monthly Film Bulletin that "the English version . . . was devastated by dubbing that sounds as 32 Born in the state of Georgia on January 5, 1924, Dan Sturkie made few onscreen appearances, and only in minor roles (as in Jack Arnold's Outside the Law, 1956), before relocating to Rome in 1959 to pursue a career in dubbing. He would later dub Reg Park in Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World (1961) and Bekim Fehmiu in Odissea/The Odyssey a.k.a. The Adventures of Ulysses (1968), to name only a couple of key performances in the Bava canon. When the Italian film industry began to fail in the 1970s, Sturkie returned to Hollywood and found work with his friend Mel Welles—whom he had known since they worked together, providing most of the dubbed male voices in Richard Fleischer's Barabbas (1962)—in the features Joyride to Nowhere (1977) and Dr. Heckyl and Mr. Hype (1980); he also landed small roles in William Friedkin's Cruising (1980), Psi Factor (1980), and Michael Wadleigh's Wolfen (1981) before retiring. He died on May 10, 1992, at the age of 68.

THE FOUNDERS of American International Pictures: Samuel Z. Arkoff (with cigar) and James H. Nicholson.

33 "Demi-Gods but Not Muscle-bound: Nicholson on Beefcake Casting Problem," Variety, June 15, 1960, 20.

ANDREJ declares his support to the melancholy Katia in this scene, deleted from the AIP version known as BLACK SUNDAY.

though it belongs, not just to a different film, but to a different world from the near-hysterical images on the screen."

AIP's meddling with the picture did not stop at its soundtrack. In Europe, horror films were considered to be adult entertainment, and they stopped at nothing in the cause of frightening and titillating their audience, including glimpses of female nudity—as in Renato Polselli's L'amante del vampiro and Giorgio Ferroni's Il mulino delle donne di pietra/Mill of the Stone Women (both 1960). This was the opposite credo to AIP, who had built their fledgling empire on producing and distributing exploitation fodder for "kiddie matinees." Though The Mask of Satan contained no nudity, it was more graphically violent than anything American audiences had previously seen. Therefore, Arkoff dictated to his brother-in-law that certain editorial changes be made, as well.

Though the eventual AIP ad campaign promised a more adult kind of horror, most of its mature content was scrapped before it ever saw the light of an American 35 mm projector. Among the most obvious trims: the shot of the sizzling "S" imprinted on Asa's back as the brand is lifted (shortened), and the spurting of blood from behind the spiked mask as it is hammered onto Asa's face (faded to black); the squirting impalement of the undead Kruvajan's eye and his scream (removed entirely); the flesh peeling from Prince Vajda's face as he roasts to death in the family fireplace (shortened); and, most damaging of all, the final, objective shot of Kruvajan succumbing to Asa's cold, dead kiss. In the AIP version, the subjective shot of Asa's lips, parting in thirsty anticipation, fades prudently to black, almost as though she has swallowed the camera whole. In fact, it looks like a deliberate parody of Jack Buetel's subjective-view kiss with Jane Russell in Howard Hughes' The Outlaw (1943).

"All of AIP's films were very clean," Sam Arkoff reasoned, "so, anything that was suggestive of playing around—fornicating a corpse, you know what I'm saying?—we wouldn't stand for it."

Arkoff knew a couple of other things that AIP's juvenile audiences wouldn't stand for, as well: romance and a lot of talk. Therefore, excessive dialogue and scenes reinforcing the romance between Katia (Steele) and Andrej were also cut.

The first of the deleted scenes was apparently snipped before AIP got anywhere near the picture, and survives only in Italian prints. Even here, the scene is inexplicably misplaced, a daylight scene that interrupts the consecutive night scenes of the innkeeper's daughter milking the cow and Javutich's rising from his grave—replacing the tracking shot to the barn window and the progressively closer shots of the tombstone. The scene in question involves Katia and Prince Vajda, who meet at the bottom of a long staircase-like fountain,[34] where the Prince finds his daughter in the grip of a dark and strangely pensive mood:

VAJDA
Katia! Katia, my child! You seem worried, overwhelmingly sad about something.

KATIA
No, it's nothing. It's just that . . . the coming of autumn always makes me sad.

VAJDA
You don't smile any more. Would you like it if we moved away from this castle? You seem so unhappy within these ancient walls . . .

KATIA
No, I want to stay here. My melancholy isn't very serious, and this castle has belonged to our family for centuries, so why change now? All of our history is contained here, all that remains of those who came before us.

VAJDA
I wanted to take you away from here when you were born—you and Constantine. I wanted to take you both far, far away from this dominion of sadness and the memories that run rampant here.

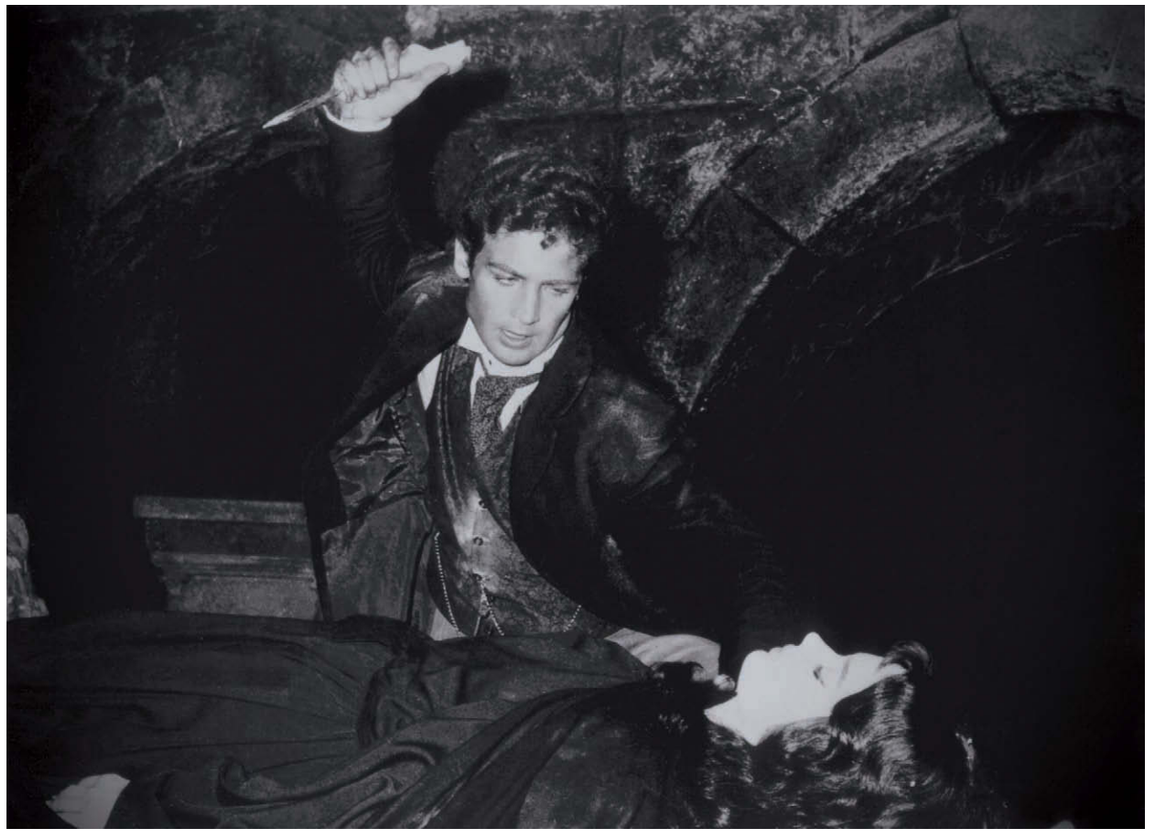
KATIA
I might have still been unhappy . . .

VAJDA
Perhaps. But not like this.

KATIA
Oh, Father, how can I convince you?

VAJDA
Perhaps you could convince me—with one of your smiles?

KATIA
[Tries to smile unsuccessfully]
No, it's no good . . .



VAJDA
You see? The way you shuddered just now, as though a dark menace was hovering about you . . .

KATIA
Please, let us not speak of this any more. Excuse me, Father. We'll talk later.[35]

The scene would have made better sense had it appeared earlier in the film, and marked Katia's return to the castle, immediately following her encounter with Andrej in the chapel ruins. Placed thusly, it would have ventured an explanation for the "sadness in her eyes."

The scene also marks the only time in the film when Prince Vajda is depicted in a normal disposition; he looks dignified and in perfect self-control, not yet overwhelmed by his fears. Had it been used, however, it would have seriously weakened the impact of the Prince's introduction, as it stands—Bava's camera opening on Katia playing a romantic theme on the piano, then dollying along to Constantine cleaning his rifle, and then tracking around a wing chair to reveal the Prince, visibly preoccupied with unspoken fears. Finally, the fountain scene is too awkwardly inserted—too disruptive of one of the film's great suspense set pieces (not to mention the fact that it interrupts an elaborately storyboarded camera move)—to believe it had the approval of Bava or Serandrei. As seen in the Italian version, the scene looks very much like a discarded remnant swept up from the cutting room floor and crudely reinserted at random. It is appropriate that, when the export versions of the film were produced in Italy, this dialogue scene was omitted.

The most bewildering of the cuts imposed by AIP sacrificed one of the loveliest shots in the movie, as well as a key dramatic revelation. After Katia leaves her ailing father in the care of Dr. Kruvajan, she goes to bed, and we fade in on the next morning as an early fog rolls through an open window. The camera follows the waves of fog to Katia's bed, where the Princess lies asleep. (The shot is compositionally similar to a shot of Daliah Lavi's Nevenka in Bava's La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, made three years later.) Suddenly, Katia's brother Constantine rushes into the room, embracing her and crying "Katia! Poor father!" As she embraces him in shock, we realize that Prince Vajda has died. Curiously, the AIP version includes the rolling fog, but cuts away—before we see Katia—to the Princess rushing toward the Prince's bed with Constantine in close pursuit, discouraging her with shouts of "Katia! No!" before she sees her father's ravaged face. The only possible explanation for such an omission is that AIP felt the scene would be more frightening if the Prince's death was not announced, but permitted to take the viewer by surprise.

In the film's second half, the two versions present a key event somewhat differently to disguise the removal of an entire scene from the AIP version. On the morning after the death of Prince Vajda, we see an exterior shot of various workmen on the castle staff unloading various artifacts from a wagon, including tall candlestick holders, which are being delivered from the sacristy to adorn the Prince's coffin as he lies in state. Inside the castle, Andrej presents the priest with the icon from Asa's tomb, and the priest agrees to attempt a translation of its Cyrillic text, in the hope of discovering some useful deterrents to the evil oppressing the castle. Then Constantine engages the priest's attention, asking for his help in persuading Katia to leave the premises. As they talk, Andrej drifts toward a nearby window, where he sees Katia walking toward the garden; we then cut to an exterior of Katia standing beside a fountain. The AIP version does not include the following scene, in which Andrej follows the Princess outside and engages her in their first intimate conversation:

ANDREJ
Princess Katia? I hope I'm not intruding . . .

KATIA
No. I feel so desperate and alone.

ANDREJ
I understand, but you mustn't despair. You should always have faith in yourself. In life!

KATIA
In life? What is my life? Nothing but sadness and grief! Something that destroys itself day by day, and no one can rebuild it. [Indicates ruins] Here is the very image of my life. Look at it. It's being consumed, hour by hour, like this garden—abandoned to a purposeless existence.

KATIA leans against a tree, half-embracing it.

ANDREJ
If the hand of man abandoned this castle, or even this earth, there is no reason why you should do likewise with your life and your youth. Go far away from here and you will be happy again, Katia. Forgive me if I've called you by name. And remember that I'll always be ready to help you.

KATIA turns to him.

KATIA
You're very kind, Andrej. But today everything seems so hopeless. I feel a sense of terror. A presentiment of death, of being destroyed by something that's inside me. How I wish I had your faith, your strength!

ANDREJ
You mustn't give in to despair. I know it's hard for you, but even here in this garden, the sun will reach into the darkest corners and chase away the shadows of the night.

KATIA
Andrej, help me! I beg you to help me . . .

KATIA leans against him, almost kisses him, and breaks into sobs.

34 This isolated exterior scene may have been filmed at Villa Lante in Bagnaia, east of Viterbo, which is said to be remarkable for just such a fountain.

35 Translated from the Italian by Christopher Sven Dietrich.

EMPHASIZING the film's eye injury motif, Princess Asa and her victims can only be put to rest by staking them through the eye.

When Katia says, "Here is the very image of my life," in reference to the garden ruins of her castle, her words foreshadow a line from Bava's 1973 film Lisa and the Devil, in which the reclusive necrophile Maximillian (Alessio Orano) remarks that his life "is the very configuration of this villa"—a Borgesian conceit that may suggest Bava's own input as a screenwriter. As the couple embrace, the scene shifts back indoors, where we see a breeze blow in from outside, which causes a hanging velvet drape to billow against one of the ornamental candle holders and catch fire. The servant Ivan puts the fire out, and in so doing, he pulls down the drape to reveal the portrait of Javutich—now torn to reveal the gears which operate the secret passage behind the hearth. Taken purely as an accident, the moment seems awkwardly contrived; however, since the breeze appears to rush in from the spot where Andrej and Katia have embraced, the breeze can be interpreted as a physical manifestation of the goodness of their affection for one another—a positive mystical force, bred by love, that works to expose the hiding place of the evil within the house.

This interpretation is impossible to reach in the AIP version, which cuts directly from the delivery of the funereal accoutrements to the ornamental candle randomly setting the drapery on fire. At this point, the scene between Andrej, Constantine, and the priest is inserted, with Andrej's gazing from the window interrupted by the discovery of the fire, which cuts to Andrej's return from outside—the entire exterior dialogue scene is omitted, being too romantic for AIP's target audience.

Also trimmed from the AIP version was some material from the climax. As Asa is captured by the villagers and readied for another bonfire, Andrej views the spectacle from a ground-level window in the subterranean crypt and succumbs to despair. Believing Katia to be dead, our emotional hero pleads with the priest for explanations of why his beloved must die, while this monster perishes with her beauty.

RARE color shots of the film's Inquisition prologue, a sequence copied by countless horror films in years to come.

> ANDREJ
> Katia! My life is finished too, now! How can I ever resign myself? I will never find peace!

These sentiments are a bit over-the-top for a relationship that is barely a day old, and AIP's judgment here was correct: the finale works much better without them. But, melodramatic and overwrought as they are, these scenes find Bava accommodating in his film the elements of romance that Italian audiences of the day demanded.

As it reaches its finale, the AIP version includes a final, clumsy piece of narration, as George Gonneau intones, "The Lord has answered our prayers, for He will conquer the forces of darkness forever." It serves the purpose of leaving no doubt, in the minds of American parent and religious groups, that the picture leaves an ultimately wholesome impression on its audience, despite its decidedly unwholesome highlights.

Music

During the dubbing sessions, the decision was made to replace the film's original Roberto Nicolosi score, which Sam Arkoff felt was . . . well, too Italian. "The Italians made relatively inexpensive pictures and had no budget for music," he related. "There were several companies in Italy that would provide soundtracks free, in exchange for publishing and other rights. You would tell them what you wanted and they had a whole supply of themes to choose from. We would never accept their canned music, which was written to Italian tastes. Italians favored a different kind of music than American audiences would accept."

For the rescoring, Arkoff hired Les Baxter (1922–96), a bandleader, arranger, and a former musical associate of Nat King Cole and Mel Tormé, whose orchestral albums Ritual of the Savage, Tamboo!, and The Sacred Idol had helped to popularize the "exotica" craze of the 1950s. Baxter's first score for AIP had been for the aforementioned Goliath and the Barbarians, which was subsequently released on vinyl not as a soundtrack, but in the guise of one of his "exotica" LPs, Barbarian. Baxter flew to New York City on Monday, January 9, 1961, to begin scoring the picture at Titra.[36]

Watching The Mask of Satan and Black Sunday back-to-back, one can well appreciate that Baxter's score was a major factor in the creative fulfillment and international success of Bava's debut. Nicolosi's score (orchestrated by Pier Luigi Urbini) is applied very sparingly, leaving much of the film's macabre atmosphere to baleful winds and other manifestations of the sound editor. It makes intermittent stabs at thematic underlining, as when celestial chimes accompany the appearances of the cross; however, some key dramatic scenes—including, unbelievably, the climactic fistfight between Andrej and Javutich—are accompanied by no music whatsoever. At times, the lack of music enhances the tension of scenes, makes them seem more godforsaken, but what music is present tends to be thinly orchestrated and derivative. It is obvious that Nicolosi patterned his cues after James Bernard's anxious music for Horror of Dracula; there is a good deal of frenetic, stop-and-go, up-an-octave cat-scratching, and in the forlorn, bass clarinet theme that accompanies Javutich's rise from the grave, one can hear the discernible influence of Hans J. Salter's oboe theme for Ygor (Bela Lugosi) in Universal's Son of Frankenstein (1939). The association is relevant in view of the original dialogue, which refers to the character with the full name of "Prince Ygor Javutich."

Scoring a horror film would have been a challenge to any Italian composer at this point in history, so Nicolosi can be forgiven for grabbing at straws and actually clutching very few; it is better, in most cases, to err on the side of subtlety. Where Nicolosi unquestionably excels is in the composition of what might be termed "Katia's Theme"—a lushly romantic piano piece in the Rachmaninoff mode that first sweeps into place during her conversation with Andrej outside the crypt (establishing their mutual attraction) and, thereafter, whenever passion or sorrow is felt. This leitmotif works so well that Baxter incorporated it into his own score, alluding to it during this initial scene with a single, teasing phrase and allowing it to come into full flower later. No credit was given to Nicolosi. On November 30, 1960—a full month before the film's scoring sessions in New York—Baxter included a recording of this theme on his exotica album Jewel of the Sea as the title track (with a footnote on the jacket explaining that it was originally composed as "Katia's Theme" for American International Pictures' Black Sunday), and legal records show that, on May 25, 1961, Baxter filed copyright on "Katia's Theme" in his own name. The true author of the piece is easily identified by comparing the scene of Andrej carrying the swooning Katia to her bedroom, as it appears in the two versions of the film; the scoring here is basically identical, though more grandly orchestrated in the AIP version. One hastens to mention in this regard that, by acquiring the rights to the picture, AIP were empowered to use (or not use) Nicolosi's score in any way they wished.

ASA is burned by the Inquisitioners led by her brother, Griabi.

36 AIP press release, January 3, 1961.

There are instances when the two scores lead the viewer to interpret the same scene entirely differently. Nicolosi's judgment is most flattered by the first scene inside Castle Vajda, in the elaborate dolly move that glides past Katia at the piano, past her brother Constantine cleaning his hunting rifle, and ends on Prince Vajda staring hauntedly into the fireplace. Baxter gives Katia a woeful dirge to play (clearly written not to tune, but to match Steele's hand movements on the keyboard), establishing a tone of dread long before we are shown the Prince's facial expression; in fact, one infers from the scene, as it appears in the AIP version, that the music has brought on the man's mood. Nicolosi, however, has Katia reprise the theme established on the soundtrack during her meeting with Andrej, suggesting that she is distracted by thoughts of new love, making their subsequent, quick romance much easier to accept. When the shot finally creeps over the Prince's shoulder, the otherness of his expression comes as a shock and he is established as firmly in the grip of the day's implications and vulnerable to its advances.

Baxter's score is everything Nicolosi's score is not: boisterous, unsubtle, boldly orchestrated, incessantly busy—musically underlining every footfall, every droplet of dripping blood (note how the string section adjusts to pizzicato whenever we go back to Asa's crypt), every smoking undulation of dry ice. Consequently, whereas the Nicolosi score allows Bava's mise en scène to stand more or less on its own legs, the Baxter score is much more supportive, responding to its visual information, accentuating (and even prompting) the viewer's responses to it, with the end result that Black Sunday becomes much more rigorous in its determination and ability to frighten. This post-production marriage of Bava and Baxter, was, in essence, the synergy that produced the first authentic masterpiece of Italian horror.

PRINCESS ASA—the first truly erotic succubus of the cinema.

THIS staged publicity photo finds Andrej grappling with Javutich for the soul of comatose Princess Katia.

And yet . . . and yet. While Baxter's music bolsters the film immeasurably, in doing so, it also obscures—as it complements—the quantum leap of creative imagination that is actually embodied by Bava's debut. To see AIP's version is to see a much tighter, more polished work than Bava actually directed; the post-production gloss applied to the film, especially the new score, helps to eliminate every hint of the native cinematic conventions that Bava had so brilliantly overcome. The precise value of the Nicolosi score is that it better illustrates where Bava was coming from—the true measure of his advance. La maschera del demonio started out as a second-rate, openly derivative horror project manufactured in a country with little or no previous experience in the genre; it became something much more, thanks to Bava's grounding in art, literature, and photography. To see the film in its original state (e.g., The Mask of Satan) is to understand that, even at the time of its completion, the Italian horror film was still a work-in-progress, not as yet wholly defined. It was wholly defined only when it became Black Sunday.[37]

Distribution

AIP's retitling of the picture was another crucial chapter in its reinvention for North America. In 1960, the word "Satan" was considered too strong for use in the title of a horror film, and according to New York columnist Robert Sylvester, AIP had tested numerous alternatives—including Witchcraft, The House of Fright, The Curse, Vengeance, and Demoniaque—before finally settling on the title that would bring the film its most lasting fame.

In the original dialogue, the recurring, tragic events that beset the Vajda family are said to occur every 100 years since the execution of Princess Asa on the day known as "The Feast of St. George." The references to St. George are vague—the Vajda family is linked to the emblematic image of the dragon slain by George—and nowhere is it mentioned that the Feast of St. George is the Sunday following the Christian holidays of Palm Sunday and Easter Sunday. In the first chapter of Bram Stoker's novel Dracula, the 4 May diary entry of Jonathan Harker quotes an old, hysterical peasant woman who cautions him not to keep his midnight appointment to meet a coach from Castle Dracula: "It is the eve of St. George's day. Do you not know that tonight, when the clock strikes midnight, all the evil things in the world will have full sway?" Bava and his screenwriters may have been attracted to this date by common superstition or its literary connection to the meeting of Harker and Count Dracula, but it is more likely that Bava heard the details of St. George's mythic life from his father Eugenio, who made a study of the lives of the Saints he sculpted. Known mostly to Westerners as the fabled dragon slayer, George was born circa 245 A.D. and had a glorious early career as a soldier in the Roman army. When Diocletian became emperor, George was tortured and put to a martyr's death for speaking out against his terrible persecution of the Church, which included the demolition of Christian churches, the massacre of entire Christian towns, and the arrest and torture of bishops and deacons. George was killed not once, but three times; each time—after being dismembered, prematurely buried, and finally burned at the stake—restored to life, as legend has it, by a righteous and vengeful God. In Bava's film, Asa is not portrayed as a martyr, but she is put to death thrice in very similar ways: first by mutilation, again in the backstory by an earthquake, and by fire before the end credits roll.

BARBARA STEELE models the rotted skeleton breastplate briefly glimpsed during the film's climax.

37 Another musical variant is offered by the film's Spanish soundtrack. The Spanish version, which was evidently assembled without access to the film's original music-and-effects tracks, was given entirely new accompaniment in the form of public domain classical tracks by Edvard Grieg and Richard Wagner. It is this version which was released on DVD in Spain by Vella Vision, under the title La Máscara del Demonio.

During the scripting of the AIP soundtrack, someone—most likely, producer Lou Rusoff or director Lee Kresel—had the brainstorm of replacing Bava's subtle allusions to the Feast of St. George with a more sinister-sounding anniversary. As summarized by George Gonneau in the AIP version's opening narration, "One day in each century, it is said that Satan walks the earth. To the God-fearing, this day is known as Black Sunday." But what is lost in this translation is the connection the original screenwriters intended to make between the Vajda and Dracula families, as Drakul—the root of Dracula's name—is Romanian for "Dragon slayer."

When AIP premiered Bava's film at the Allen Theater in Cleveland, Ohio, on February 3, 1961, it bore the title Black Sunday—a moniker perhaps inspired by Black Friday (a 1940 Universal production starring Boris Karloff and Bela Lugosi) and another hot European import of the moment, Jules Dassin's Never on Sunday. According to Glenn Erickson, the original release prints of Black Sunday superimposed over its closing shot of the flaming brazier a recommendation that the audience also see AIP's concurrent release, The Two Faces of Dr. Jekyll; one of these original prints was still in circulation as recently as Filmex in 1980. In its initial release, Black Sunday was double-billed with films from smaller independent companies, including the British comedy Carry On Nurse, which starred future

US one-sheet poster, art by Reynold Brown.

FACADE of Cleveland's Allen Theater, where BLACK SUNDAY had its US premiere.

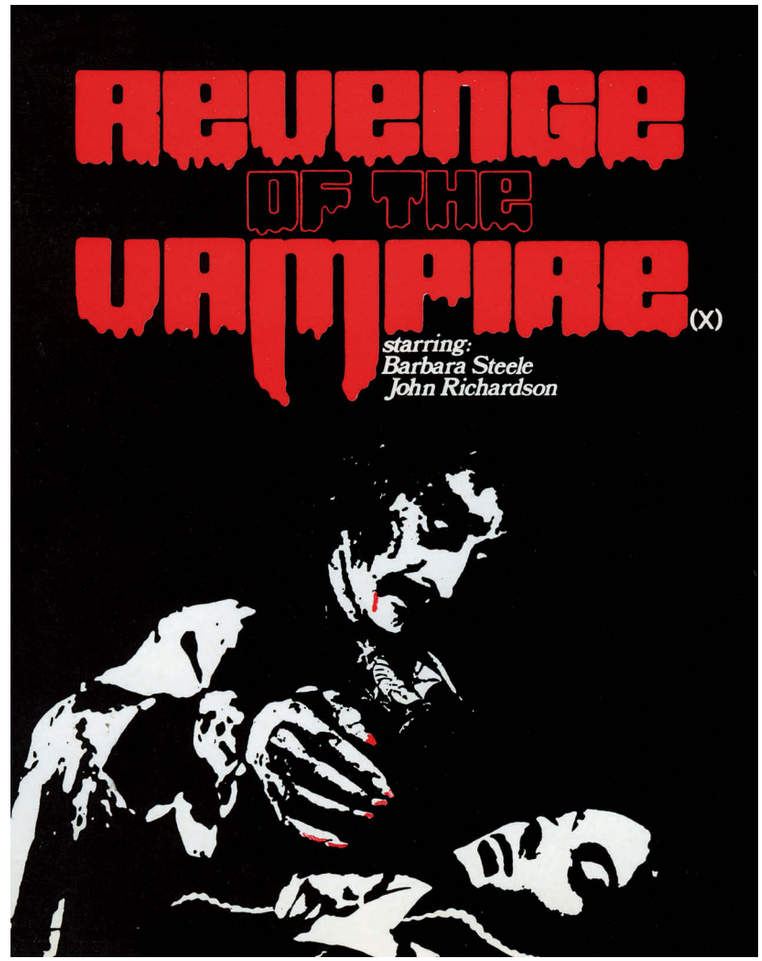
Goldfinger golden girl Shirley Eaton, distributed in the US by Governor Films.

As it happens, Black Sunday went into release at approximately the same time as The Devil's Commandment, RCIP's reworked US version of I vampiri. In a neat coincidence, the two films were reviewed on the same page of the industry journal Boxoffice, whose critic was unaware of any creative link between them, and unwilling to cut either film any slack. Incredibly, of Black Sunday he wrote: "The photoplay has its artistic facets—light compositions, camera movement, etc.—but the less said about them, the better."

In an unprecedented publicity move inspired by the showmanship of Alfred Hitchcock and William Castle, AIP's ad campaign announced that admission to Black Sunday would be restricted. A special introductory crawl was also added to AIP's prints, which read, "The producers of the film you are about to see feel a moral obligation to warn you that it will shock you as no other film has . . . Because it could be very harmful to young and impressionable minds, it is restricted to only those over 14 years of age." (Unless, of course, they happened to be accompanied by the price of admission.)



AIP also manufactured a promotional gimmick giveaway in the form of an envelope containing a card upon which was printed a kind of "protection" incantation. The card read:

Witch and Wizard, go away!
Chill some other soul today!
Vampire bat and horrid toad,
Deadly snake beside the road,
Ghostly shriek and chilling moan,
I command—Leave Me Alone!

All your horrors and your terrors
Daunt me not. They're only errors
Conjured by you just to frighten;
Never truly to enlighten.
Powers of Darkness—go away!
Chill some other soul today!

The ballyhoo paid off: Black Sunday grossed $14,750 in its first week at the Allen Theater, topping AIP's previous record holders by 35%. On the basis of three record-breaking opening dates—the other two being in San Francisco, California, and Salt Lake City, Utah—Black Sunday became the biggest grosser in AIP's five-year history.[38] From the get-go, it was a bigger commercial success than Roger Corman's first Poe picture, 1960's The Fall of the House of Usher—which had been produced in color and widescreen on a budget of $270,000, roughly 3–5 times the total cost of La maschera del demonio. In its first year of release, Black Sunday had 8,392 recorded playdates, generating domestic rentals in the amount of $706,000. 35 mm prints would remain in active drive-in and neighborhood theater circulation for years to come. By all accounts, it traumatized a generation.

The film's reception in Great Britain would prove more complicated. AIP's British partners in distribution, Anglo-Amalgamated, submitted a print of the retooled version to the British Board of Film Censors in February 1961, at which time it was rejected outright—in more sensational language, banned in the United Kingdom. Somehow, a single screening of Black Sunday was arranged at the National Film Theatre during the Christmas holiday season of 1961, when Tod Browning's Freaks (also banned in the UK at that time) was yanked from the schedule at the last minute. It would prove the film's only public screening in Britain for the better part of a decade, and some fans lucky enough to have scored a ticket spoke to their friends about Bava's forbidden debut in ways that added immeasurably to its legend. The British ban would remain in effect until May 15, 1968, when the film was finally passed in cut form with an "X" certificate under the title Revenge of the Vampire. Distributed by Border Films, the picture was paired with William Grefé's Florida-made Sting of Death (1966); seldom has a double bill better showcased the best art and trash the horror genre has to offer. A vivid illustration of how the cinematic landscape had changed in the intervening years was offered by its coverage in Monthly Film Bulletin, which appeared on the same page as a review of Michael Reeves' final film, Witchfinder General. The MFB, always careful about such tabulations, reported the film's running time of 88 minutes, indicating that Border Films had bypassed the AIP cut in favor of the original, ELDA-dubbed version, The Mask of Satan.

UK poster designs from the film's belated 1968 British release.

For better or worse, it is this original export edition that is currently the prevailing edition of the home video era. Because AIP acquired the film as an independent production, their rights to the picture contractually expired thirty years later, in 1991. It was on the eve of that contract's expiration that Orion Pictures (then the owners of the American International library) released Black Sunday on LaserDisc, the AIP version's only legitimate video release to date. That same year, the Italian owners signalled the return of the film to their control by licensing The Mask of Satan—first to Toshiba Video of Japan, and then to Great Britain's Redemption Video, for release on VHS. Since then, The Mask of Satan has also been surfaced on VHS and DVD, for the first time in the United States, through Image Entertainment—under the more familiar, but technically misleading, title of Black Sunday.

Over the years, there has been talk of a possible home video release of the AIP version through MGM Home (now Sony) Entertainment, the current holders of the company's product, but various factors have kept this from happening. As AIP's properties traded hands, the rights to certain import titles like Black Sunday were not renewed and fell into the public domain. Therefore, it would not be in the financial interests of MGM to digitally restore and release this, or any other, PD titles, because any other video company would be within their legal rights to digitally copy and issue their product under a competing banner, probably at a lower price. Also, Image Entertainment's decision to use the title of Black Sunday on their release has misled the marketplace into thinking that the movie that bore this title has already been released.

38 AIP press release, February 24, 1961.

Consequently, Mario Bava's most famous film has entered the 21st century as twins, the older successfully usurping the younger's place in our modern world. Both versions are beautiful . . . but different. One is the director's original creation—complete and uncut, uncut in the dual sense of being uncensored and also a flawed gem, like an uncut diamond. The other version is the director's first tour de force—a cut version, but cut like a diamond, somehow more perfect and scintillating in its streamlined reduction. If a Baxter-scored version of the uncut film existed, there would be no problem; as things stand, it is difficult to choose between them.

Commentary

La maschera del demonio is considered by many to be the most auspicious directorial debut in the history of horror films. Its arrival on theater screens was greeted as a welcome return to the black-and-white, Old World atmosphere of Universal's "golden age" horrors, while the younger, Hammer-bred generation of horror aficionados responded with equal enthusiasm to its unflinching scenes of graphic horror. Beyond these studio signatures, Bava's grounding in cinematography imbued the film with a greater emphasis on visual storytelling—visual continuity, in fact—than had been perpetrated by any horror film since the 1920s. It also had a dark fairy tale aspect, which marked its inheritance from such European antecedents as F. W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922) and Faust (1923) and—the most pronounced of all its influences—Cocteau's La Belle et le Bête, with which it also shared a pronounced romanticism that made it unusually palatable to female audience members.

Despite the catholicism of its influences, La maschera del demonio also represented something new. It was not second-hand German Expressionist like the Universal horror films, nor was it purely influenced by 19th century realists like Thomas Gainsborough as were the Hammer films; La maschera del demonio drew inspiration not only from these, but from a variety of other artistic sources: Byzantine art, Russian orthodox iconography, fairy tale illustrations, art nouveau, rococo, Disney—and somehow, it all blends believably together in its baleful wash of black-and-white cinematography. It is the very hallmark of what is known today as "golden age" Italian horror.

GERMAN A-1 poster, art by Hans Drain.

From its opening 13-second plunge into darkness, which fades up on an image of flames, to the rhyming closure of its incendiary finale, La maschera del demonio exudes a mood of dark serendipity, of Manichean evil poised for inevitable triumph. Here, the most appalling horrors are strangely alluring and seductive—even the ruins are morbidly compelling. The monochromatic landscapes are steeped in an ever-thickening atmosphere of godforsakenness and dread, a fact cleverly underscored by Bava's careful placement of the camera in cowering postures—behind trees, behind columns and candelabra, as if intimidated by everything it sees—and elsewhere, its intricate, geometric movements feel so precise as to make the sequence of events feel irrevocably fated.

Bava also supplied La maschera del demonio with an assortment of visual quotations that prove a familiarity with the genre, remarkable considering that horror films had been banned in Italy until the mid-1950s. Prince Vajda's vision of the Mask of Satan in his hot toddy recalls a nearly identical moment in Victor Halperin's White Zombie (1932) when the face of voodoo master Murder Legendre (Bela Lugosi) appears in a goblet of wine. The innkeeper's daughter's fearful walk through the forest to milk a cow not far from the haunted cemetery harkens as much to Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1937) as to the "corn meal" sequence in Jacques Tourneur's The Leopard Man (1943). After his seduction by Princess Asa, the stubble-faced vampiric form of Kruvajan greatly resembles Onslow Stevens, as he looked when he played another doctor infected with vampirism in Universal's House of Dracula (1945). The climactic scenes in the crypt reveal an acquaintance with the final acts of Tod Browning's Dracula and James Whale's Frankenstein (both 1931), as torch-bearing villagers converge on the Vajda chapel ruins to put the vampire to rest.

But it was from Cocteau's La Belle et le Bête that Bava seems to have learned the most about navigating the terrain of cinematic fantasy. The scene of Belle's father (Marcel André) getting lost in the woods, prior to his discovery of the Beast's castle, is very much a blueprint of Bava's own presentation of the haunted woods of Mirgorod, and the father himself has many characteristics shared by Prince Vajda; there are suggestions in both films of a once important family brought low by the father's weaknesses, which are themselves a self-loathing response to even greater ancestral sins. In both films, the younger generation must pay the price for the sins of their fathers, and both also address the fears of a young woman about choosing a husband in advance of her father's approaching death. Yet the greatest similarities between the two films are stylistic rather than thematic. Understandably, given the facts of his background, Bava was attracted to Cocteau's technique of using his actors as tableaux vivant, as a form of living sculpture; he would always be less concerned with his actors' dramatic capabilities than with their visual correctness for a role. The character of Javutich resembles the Beast somewhat in his combination of sleek monstrousness and regality, most of all as he emerges from his grave in princely finery with a bronze leonine mask hammered to his face. For the scene of Javutich driving the spectral carriage, Bava borrowed a page from the scene of Beauty's arrival at the Beast's castle, which underscored the transition from reality to a world where magic held free reign by introducing slow motion photography. (Bava's handling of the scene also represents an inspired inversion of a coach scene in Murnau's Nosferatu, which was undercranked to show the horsedrawn phantom vehicle moving at a nightmarishly jagged, accelerated speed.) Another source of inspiration was Cocteau's use of actor Jean Marais in the dual role of Avenant—the handsome farmer who asks for Belle's hand in marriage—and the Beast. This twinned casting lends credence to the popular interpretation that the Beast represents Belle's virginal fears about marriage and sex with Avenant, which are ultimately resolved when both Avenant and the Beast die at the same moment, to be reborn as a third character, a Prince, who embodies the best qualities of both. Marais' inventive casting in La Belle et le Bête may have inspired the idea of Asa and Princess Katia resembling one another and being played by the same actress. [39]

Bava also quotes his own work in La maschera del demonio with the introduction of Javutich—his long-nailed hands scrambling up and over a mound of earth—a scene which is modelled on the first appearance of Nieto (also played by Arturo Dominici) in the opening moments of Caltiki il mostro immortale. Self-quotation can be a form of in-joking, which is also discernible in Bava's debut. For example, the celebrated shot that introduces Princess Katia—the sudden appearance of her imposing presence flanked by two menacing mastino napoletano dogs—may have been intended by Bava as a wink at his mentor, Riccardo Freda. Giuseppe Maccari, who worked as a camera assistant on one of Freda's films, recalled: "I remember that Freda used to come to the set with a little dog every day—except a couple of days when he arrived with a huge mastino napoletano! A huge dog with a face full of wrinkles and red eyes. I mean, I love dogs myself, but that one was really scary! It wasn't nice to work in a small room with that beast—that animal!" [40] In the image of Asa's barrel-chested, mallet-wielding executioner may also lurk a conscious parody of the mallet-bearer that introduced all of Barbara Steele's and John Richardson's earlier films, striking a bronze mask instead of the famous Rank Organisation gong.

If such tongue-in-cheek parallels seem incompatible with such a frightening movie, consider the humor in the demeanor of Asa and Javutich as they flaunt their power over life and death: Asa's closed eyes mischievously springing open in the instant that poor Kruvajan looks away from her, and the look of imperious satisfaction on Javutich's pitted face as he materializes before Constantine out of thin air. It is in these two merrily macabre moments that La maschera del demonio comes closest to evoking the mood of Gogol's writing, and that unexpected element of humor and irony is somehow inextricably entwined with the ability of these two scenes to chill the blood.

It is almost easier to think of La maschera del demonio without Mario Bava than without Barbara Steele, whose dual performance as the Princesses Asa and Katia led to her immediate coronation as "The Queen of Horror." As with Gina Lollobrigida and Steve Reeves before her, Bava recognized and brought out the qualities that could make Steele an international star. Asa and Katia have been described by some critics as a literalization of the Madonna/Whore complex, but it is more immediately pertinent to call attention to Princess Asa as the first formidably female monster in the history of horror pictures.

Elsa Lanchester in Bride of Frankenstein (1935) was an inspired amalgam of ghoulishness and glamor, but she was blown to atoms almost the minute she was unwrapped. Gloria Holden in Dracula's Daughter (1936) was a normal-looking character whose predatory, lesbian nightlife was depicted solely by implication; her tragic aspect made her seem as much a victim as a villain. Margaret 39 There is something cosmic at work here. On five occasions in his long career, Jean Marais would play dual roles in five films: La Belle et le Bête, Le Capitaine Fracasse (1960, as Baron de Sigognac/Capitaine Fracasse), and a series of three films for director Andre Hunebelle—Fantômas (1964), Fantômas se déchaîne (1965), and Fantômas contre Scotland Yard (1967)—in which he played the master criminal Fantômas and his reporter adversary Fandor. In each of those films, he played opposite an actor (Josette Day in La Belle . . . , Louis De Funès in the other four) who was born within twenty-four hours of Mario Bava, on the most commonly reported date of his birth: July 31, 1914. Furthermore, Bava may have had something to do with the special effects of the second film in the Fantômas trilogy (see Unverified Works in Appendices).

40 Alan Upchurch, "Raptus: The Making of The Horrible Dr. Hichcock," Video Watchdog 49, January 1999, 36.

Hamilton made a frightening Wicked Witch of the West in The Wizard of Oz (1939), but in this children's film, her characterization was deliberately polarized, utterly unattractive and divorced from gender. Monsterdom generally reverted to a boy's club throughout the 1940s; when women did essay horror roles during this period—like Virginia Christine's reborn Princess Ananka in The Mummy's Curse (1944)—they were revealingly portrayed as ciphers, out of touch with their identity and inner strengths, who survived the centuries only to remain subservient to the brutish male monsters who pined for them. Exotic dancer Shirley Kilpatrick's shapely radioactive threat in The Astounding She-Monster (1958) was perhaps the first example of a female monster who was equally enticing and repellent, but in the final reel she was revealed to be an innocent, well-meaning, fatally fumbling emissary from space. Meanwhile, the eponymous corpse-quilt of Frankenstein's Daughter (also 1958) was so desexualized that she not only appeared to be male, but was actually played by a man.

The template for the rejuvenated Princess Asa appears to be the Wicked Queen of Walt Disney's classic animated feature Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1937), which, as mentioned earlier, was for many Italians their first taste of horror on the big screen. This character—principally animated by Art Babbitt and voiced by veteran actress Lucille LaVerne—was described by Disney himself as "a mixture of Lady Macbeth and the Big, Bad Wolf."[41] (For her part, Barbara Steele once told me that Lady Macbeth was one of the roles she would most love to play.) Princess Asa—pallid, thirsting not for blood but male essence—is a far more complex figure, one that presses psychological buttons never before pushed by any other nightmare conjured up by the horror cinema. Her face is abhorrent—a glowering, hole-pocked death's head. (The character Pinhead, from Clive Barker's Hellraiser films, is very much the inversion of her.) She is utterly repugnant, a living corpse, yet Bava shows us what Kruvajan sees, the attraction that draws him irresistibly nearer and nearer to his doom. Below her ghastly visage is a voluptuous body, breasts heaving with expectancy, her long nails scratching at the jagged stonework of her obliterated resting place. "Kiss me," she commands. "You will die, but you will experience pleasures mortals cannot know"—and we have no reason to doubt her. The only thing remotely like this apparition in the long history of horror cinema is Max Schreck's repellent Count Orlock in Murnau's Nosferatu, a symbol of post-WWI pestilence who has been called the most sexless of monsters. Asa, on the other hand, embodies a highly eroticized image of Death, and she galvanizes—in one powerful, visual jolt—the great leitmotif that runs throughout Bava's filmography as director: Sex and Death.

BELGIAN affiche, a crude repainting of Giuliano Nistri's original, elegant poster design.

Roy Bava remembers, as an inquisitive youngster, quizzing his grandfather about his professional preoccupation with love and death. Mario's response, as paraphrased by his grandson: "Why am I so preoccupied with death? Because in life there are only two things you can be sure about: one day, you are born and someday, you are going to die. It's quite easy to be born; there's nothing too interesting about that. Nobody's very interested in speaking about the dead or even the aesthetics of death, but people tend to speak quite a lot about love, so I thought maybe I could put love and death together."[42]

Obviously, this is the sort of simplified explanation one would offer to a young, inquisitive grandchild. It is neither dishonest nor evasive, but one senses it doesn't quite get at the whole truth. Bava's true feelings on the subject were certainly more complex and deeply rooted—they would have to be, in order to preoccupy him for the next twenty years—and it is possible that Bava himself, who took an instinctive rather than a deliberately self-expressive approach to his art (or his "work," as he would have termed it), never consciously traced the reasons behind his obsession.

In depicting Princess Asa as he does, Bava might have simply been recreating, in vivid terms, the character described in Gogol's story:

> She lay as though living: the lovely forehead, fair as snow, as silver, looked deep in thought: the even brows—dark as night in the midst of sunshine—rose proudly above the closed eyes; the eyelashes, that fell like arrows on the cheeks, glowed with the warmth of secret desires; the lips were rubies, ready to break into the laugh of bliss, the flood of joy . . . But in them, in those very features, he saw something terrible and poignant. He felt a sickening ache stirring in his heart . . . The rubies of her lips looked like blood surging up from her heart . . . 'The witch!' he cried in a voice not his own as, turning pale, he looked away and fell to repeating his prayers. It was the witch he had killed."[43]

But the dichotomy embodied by Asa can be interpreted in many different ways: as a personification of the fear of sex, of venereal disease, of temptation and faithlessness, of the damnation of succumbing to sexual temptation, of the marital contract itself ("Till death do us part")—and, in all frankness, any of these things might become secret preoccupations in the middle age of a self-described "romantic artisan" who had spent nearly half of his life in an increasingly ill-fitting marriage, and who lived in a country where divorce was regarded not only as immoral but was in fact illegal.

La maschera del demonio also resonates as a horror story about what Lamberto Bava calls "the burden of heredity." Just as Mario's son has admitted to having difficulties living up to his father's professional legacy, Mario also faced the challenge of becoming his own man while standing in the long shadow cast in the Italian film business by his father. In La maschera, the Vajda family is living under much more than a curse; they are living under the weight of their family name and family history. It is by no accident that Bava depicts the living and the dead of the Vajda family communicating via an ornately carved fireplace—the very thing Le Pathé Cinema asked Eugenio Bava to provide on the night when the Bava family took its first, fateful step into the motion picture business. When Asa spitefully replies to her brother's condemnation, she curses not only him but the blood he will pass onto his son "and his son and his son"—the house of Vajda itself. Given the sovereignty of Castle Vajda ("The history of Moldavia is carved in these stones," says Kruvajan as he surveys the family crypt), the curse placed on it appears to have trickled down over the centuries until all of Moldavia has fallen into an almost unsalvageable state of superstitious, moral disrepair 200 years later, when the narration is resumed. The first Moldavian villager we meet in the film's "present day" year of 1830 is an alcoholic coachman who relies on strong drink to make the journey to Mirgorod, which takes him past the Vajda crypt, where, as bad luck would have it, his axle wheel snaps—perhaps by a malevolent external force, perhaps under the weight of his own dread. Andrej and Kruvajan, the first of many unlucky travellers in Bava's official filmography, fulfill their roles as out-of-towners by ridiculing his local lore but, as night falls, they too grow timid and are shown delving into their cups because they have both been touched by configurations of Asa. Andrej has fallen in love with Katia, her mirror image, while Kruvajan's own morbid attraction to the witch's legend has led to the reactivation of her ancient evil with his own blood.

THIS FRENCH reissue affiche from the 1970s (which misspells Barbara Steele's name) is a rarity for its use of a photographic image.

In sharp contrast to the imperious Asa and Javutich, Katia and Constantine—and also their father, Prince Vajda—are depicted as victims of their ancestral past, tyrannized by the burden of heredity. Over the centuries, the Vajda family has lived under a cloud of inertia, not even taking down the portraits of the two blackest sheep in their family, choosing instead to live under their malignant stares, almost as a daily reminder of their inevitable triumph. Even the family chapel—their only sanctuary from such evil—has been allowed to degenerate into a rotted shell of its former purpose, because of its proximity to Asa's tomb; fear itself has deprived them of the ability to protect themselves. So rife with cowardly regression are the present day Vajdas, the film implies, that they have ceased to be themselves. As we delve deeper into Bava's work as a director, we will see that another of his principal themes was the destructive properties of the family unit, and it is fascinating to find it already in full flower in his first film—in fact, in its very first scene.

La maschera del demonio has sustained its classic reputation over the years on the strength of Barbara Steele's personal allure, its beautifully decadent imagery, and a half-dozen or more classic scenes. Unfortunately, as noted earlier, the film also contains much that is patchy and inconsistent. The not-fully-discarded vampire premise breaks many of the genre's traditions, particularly the shot of Javutich's hand reflected in a mirror. The ultimate confrontation between Andrej and Javutich is not conspicuously different to a fistfight in a Western, with Javutich reeling from punches as mortally as his opponent—after we have seen him rise from the grave, pull a spiked mask from his face, pilot a ghostly carriage, and pass through open flames. Though the Cyrillic icon buried with Asa states that a vampire can be destroyed only by a stake through the eye, Javuto is dispatched by a fall into a pit of spikes and Asa is burned at the stake by torch-bearing villagers, as History repeats itself. Too many of the film's most memorable shocks—the aging/rejuvenation scene, and the climactic moment when Asa's black cloak opens to reveal a putrid, skinless torso beneath (a gag Bava would later recycle in 1965's Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires), to name two—are staged purely for effect, without narrative cause or consequence. After a wonderful build-up, Asa's actual revival is extremely perfunctory, depriving her of the reign of terror which we've been led to expect and Steele's performance deserved, rushing to an uninspired conclusion as though suddenly bereft of invention.

In spite of its narrative instability and perfunctory wrap-up, La maschera del demonio somehow never prompted the cries of "When will Bava get a decent script?" that would greet some of his later, more challenging work. But such questions miss the point of Bava's particular genius, which was always more attentive to inner life than outer deeds, more attentive to atmosphere than location, more attentive to mise en scène than to actors—in short, more elemental than materialistic. However inarticulate he may have been about his craft, Bava must have been conscious of at least this much about his creative leanings; too many of his movies open on shots of the sea, the sky, or the sands of a beach to be accidental, just as La maschera begins and ends with images of silvery, flickering fire. The story that unfolds between those images is hastily-sketched and partly improvised—an excuse for mining the deeper levels where Bava lived: the levels of visual and thematic continuity. In cinematic terms, one might call these levels the subconscious, or the paranormal, of narrative. Thus, Bava's most popular film is surprisingly consistent with the most personal, least commercial films he made.

41 John Grant, Encyclopedia of Walt Disney's Animated Characters (New York NY: Harper and Row, 1987), 139.

42 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

43 Nikolai Gogol, "Viy" in Mirgorod (Moscow, USSR: Foreign Languages Publishing House, undated), 212–13. The title of Gogol's story can be found in translation spelled "Vij" or "Viy" because the English translation of Russian words and proper names are based on phonestic transcriptions of the original Cyrillic spellings. By the same token, some of Gogol's works can be found in English attributed to "Nikolaj" or "Nikolay" Gogol. The "j" spelling is characteristic of older translations.

Reverberations

Despite the tremendous worldwide success of La maschera del demonio, Mario Bava and Barbara Steele would never work together again. The reasons for this disappointment are complicated. According to Lamberto Bava, Mario was very pleased with her contribution to the film. "As an actress, he was delighted by her, feeling that she was the ideal star for La maschera del demonio," he says, "but as a person, he didn't hold her in very high esteem, because she always made him feel as though the movie was beneath her."

After the release of La maschera, Steele took immediate advantage of her newfound currency as the Queen of Horror by appearing in such films as Roger Corman's Pit and the Pendulum (1961, in which she was slammed inside an Iron Maiden) and also Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962, in which she was buried alive) and Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963, in which she was injected with a chemical that left her permanently immobile), almost never lingering anywhere long enough to dub her own performances. Then she won a supporting role in Federico Fellini's Otto e mezzo/8½ (1963)—in which she is introduced muttering to herself, "Cruel bees, sucking all the life from these poor flowers . . ."

THIS ARGENTINIAN poster lends the title of Bava's classic to another Barbara Steele film, Antonio Margheriti's I LUNGHI CAPELLI DELLA MORTE (1964).

As Steele was making her favorite film with Fellini, across town, Bava was preparing a film for producer Luciano Martino entitled La frusta e il corpo. Evidence suggests that Bava or Martino may have offered Steele the lead role of Nevenka (eventually played to perfection by Daliah Lavi) and was rejected, her agents discouraging offers for her to appear in films that were "beneath" her. During a Q&A session following a screening of Black Sunday at the Egyptian Theater in Los Angeles in June 2002, Steele said as much herself: "Apparently, he [Bava] wanted me to play a role in another picture that was eventually done by Daliah Lavi. I would have been very happy to do it, but the invitation never reached me."

In the end, Steele appeared in more European art films (e.g., Schlondorff's Der Junge Torless/Young Torless) and Italian comedies (Lucio Fulci's I maniaci) than horror films, but to her own dismay, it is for her Italian horror films, and La maschera del demonio in particular, that she is best remembered. Her other primary works in this category are Antonio Margheriti's Danza macabra/Castle of Blood (1964) and I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (also '64, which was released in Argentina under the title . . . La maschera del demonio!), Mario Caiano's Amanti d'oltretomba/Nightmare Castle (1965), Camillo Mastrocinque's Un angela per satana/An Angel for Satan (1966), Massimo Pupillo's Cinque tombe per un medium/Terror Creatures From the Grave (1966) and Michael Reeves' Italian-made Revenge of the Blood Beast/The She Beast (1966).

It is regrettable that Steele and Bava went their separate ways because he was unquestionably the von Sternberg to her Dietrich. And she, better than any other actress, personified that crucial element of Bava's universe: the seductive allure of superstition, the beauty at the heart of darkness. One can easily envision her in the roles played by Leticia Roman, Michèle Mercier, Fabienne Dalí, and Claudine Auger in La ragazza che sapeva troppo/Evil Eye, I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath, Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!, and Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve—and imagine the added potency that her presence would have brought to each film. (Indeed, the Auger role might have been Steele's longed-for opportunity to play Lady Macbeth.) Only Daliah Lavi in La frusta e il corpo and Laura Betti in Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon succeeded in making what might have been ideal Barbara Steele roles completely their own.

"It was very difficult for me, doing all those horror films at that particular period of my life," Steele confided to Christopher Sven Dietrich and Peter Beckman. "The difficult thing is that most directors demand excess in acting. They want a very expressive reaction at all times, which is fine for one take but, put together as a whole, looks a little overboard all the time. Vincent Price can do that; I mean, he's a certain age, it's his makeup and he's got a certain kind of look to be creeping around pillars all the time. It's a fairly stylized form of filmmaking and they often want a stylized form of acting. But it's hard for a woman to do that." [44]

Unable to shake the impression she had made in her Italian horror films, Steele briefly retired from acting and married the American screenwriter James Poe, with whom she had a son. Poe is said to have written a role for Barbara in his screenplay adaptation of Horace McCoy's novel They Shoot Horses, Don't They?, which was ultimately played by Susannah York. As her marriage faltered in the early '70s, Steele made occasional surprise returns to the screen, almost always with novice directors destined for importance—i.e., Jonathan Demme's Caged Heat (1974), David Cronenberg's Shivers/They Came From Within (1975), and Joe Dante's Piranha (1978). After her 1980 divorce from Poe (who subsequently died), Steele went to work for producer Dan Curtis, for whom she co-produced the successful TV miniseries The Winds of War and War and Remembrance. In 1990, against all odds, Steele did exactly what she vowed never to do, by returning to the horror genre. She played vampire lover Dr. Julia Hoffman in Curtis' 1991 NBC-TV primetime revival of his '60s horror soap, Dark Shadows, which lasted only nine episodes.

An interview conducted during this period found her finally coming to terms with her screen persona: "I have total respect for Mario Bava and Black Sunday," she declared, "because it is visually stunning and that's what cinema is: visuals and atmosphere. It's like a Rembrandt. As an observer—if I remove myself and think of myself [as] an audience—I'm very grateful and respectful towards it." [45]

ANOTHER STRIKING Reynold Brown design, used only on US window cards and ad mats.

In 1992, Steele contributed liner notes to Bay Cities' compact disc release of Les Baxter's Black Sunday score, and in 1994, she collaborated with Video Watchdog on the publication of a 1995 Black Sunday Calendar. When the calendar debuted at the Chiller Theater Convention at the Meadowlands Hotel in Secaucus, New Jersey, Steele also sold T-shirts and videocassettes of the film, which she autographed. At a question-and-answer session hosted by Tim Lucas and David Del Valle, the actress gave her large audience exactly what they had longed to hear when she said, "Okay—I loved Mario Bava." After decades of resisting the brand he had burned into her career, her defenses fell as she finally embraced it.

Her feelings about the film have clearly changed, but her insecurities about her own contributions as an actress remain firm. "Black Sunday looks so exquisite to me today, as a film," she says. "It was probably the best of that genre of film I've made, but I don't feel it was the best for me as an actress. Frame by frame, it looks so beautiful . . . but anybody could have been playing that girl." [46]

Just as La maschera del demonio minted Barbara Steele's inescapable image as a horror star, it helped Mario Bava to discover not only his true calling, but his true identity. "My father's first film had a great success, especially in America," recalls Lamberto Bava. "The producers wanted this kind of film and they petitioned him for more. Consequently, he became passionate about it, reading nearly everything in literature of a fantastic nature, even very rare works . . . He was a fatalist who had a very profound sense of death, like an unavoidable event that could potentially intrude upon his every aspiration. In a way, with these films, he strove to purge these superstitious feelings, to exorcise them from himself. Yet he also had a desire for the unexpected, the unknown. Perhaps the fantastic gave him a means of addressing the things he did not want to happen, of stepping outside the real world in order to get away from the things we encounter every day."

And yet the film's extraordinary success had a perversely antagonistic effect on Bava's subsequent career. In the years following its release, critics were virtually unanimous in not only praising La maschera del demonio or Black Sunday as Bava's best film, but damning it in the same breath as his only good one.

Carlos Clarens' groundbreaking An Illustrated History of the Horror Film (1967) was the first reference book to take this view. Clarens opined that Bava never fulfilled his early promise because he quickly "rejected chiaroscuro in favor of lush Technicolor and developed the directorial flourishes of La maschera del demonio into mannered tricks, such as gratuitous shock cuts and an unrestrained use of the zoom lens." [47] Similarly, in a chapter on Black Sunday in his compendium Cult Movies (1984), Danny Peary recalled that the film "convinced many of us that Mario Bava would be a force to be reckoned with for many years to come. Unfortunately, he never made another movie half as good." [48]

There is no question that La maschera del demonio is one of the most confident directorial debuts in cinema history, far too accomplished to limit to its particular genre. However, Clarens' assessment overlooks the fact that it is every bit as guilty of shock cuts and zoom shots as any other Bava film; it also fails to consider the purely technical necessity for black-and-white in Black Sunday, or that Bava had built his reputation as a cameraman on works of

44 Dietrich and Beckman.

45 Ibid.

46 Ibid.

47 Carlos Clarens, An Illustrated History of the Horror Film (New York NY: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967), 158.

48 Danny Peary, Cult Movies (New York NY: Delta/Dell Publishing, 1981), 35.

widescreen, Technicolor pageantry. La maschera was the exception—an aberration—not the rule. One imagines Clarens and Peary would have been no less critical of Bava, had he spent the rest of his career churning out uninspired variations on his first success.

The great irony of La maschera del demonio is that it was held in such high esteem by audiences and critics that Bava couldn't improve upon it, even by improving upon it. When his subsequent films were released in America, they were so badly dubbed, so compromised by editorial reworking, so far ahead of their time, or so difficult to see, that his distinguished debut can be regarded as a glorious fluke.

On the occasion of the film's belated release in London, Tom Milne laid down this candid assessment: "In general the atmosphere . . . is much closer to Gothic Transylvanian than is usual with Bava . . . About three-quarters of the way through, unfortunately, Bava's restlessly prowling camera suddenly gives up; after that the precarious atmosphere of unease is dissolved in a series of shock cuts and much rushing to and fro as all the loose ends are tidied away as quickly as possible."[49] The critical clarity of Milne's remarks was made possible by the fact that several of Bava's later, more personal works—like Sei donne per l'assassino and Operazione paura—were released in Great Britain well in advance of Revenge of the Vampire, enabling Milne to look back on the debut with greater objectivity.

The critical confusion surrounding Bava in America would persist until well after his death, but Black Sunday would always be held in high esteem. It was his most widely seen, most accessible film and, most importantly, it was the only one of his films to actually be improved by the meddling of an American distributor. These factors, coupled with Bava's reticence to discuss himself or his work seriously, led Black Sunday—an uncharacteristic work—to be misunderstood, for many years, as the accidental masterpiece of a flashy albeit uninspired hack.

When asked how his father felt about his own films, and how he reacted to unfavorable criticism, Lamberto Bava answers vividly: "He was a very private man, and did not speak about this. If someone recognized the value of his work, he was very happy; of course, the disapproval of the critics (who sometimes equated his films with comic strips) was hurtful, although a small group of intellectuals came to appreciate him. He would sometimes say, at the start of shooting a film, 'Now we're going to make a movie—and then we will all have much to be ashamed of.' It wasn't important to him that he join the pantheon of famous directors, some of whom he did not know, and are not generally known to the vast public. It was purely an amusement for him; he felt that he was making his films only for himself."

Remakes & Influences

Unbeknownst to Mario Bava, Gogol's "Viy" had been previously filmed in 1918 by the great Russian animator Ladislas Starevich (1892–1965), who had used it as the basis for an early experiment in the combination of live actors (Amo Bek Nazarov and Katia Senitskaya) and stop-motion animated demons. The short film ran only 1,200 meters.

The definitive adaptation of the story would not be produced until 1967, when Constantin Erchov and Gueorgui Kropatchov co-directed Viy for Mosfilm. The special effects of this production were executed by Aleksandr Ptushko—a director, art director, and special effects genius who specialized in works of fantasy such as Kameny Tsvetok/The Stone Flower (1946), Sadko/The Magic Voyage of Sinbad (1952), and Ilya Muromets/The Sword and the Dragon (1956), who was comparable to Bava in many ways. Directed by the younger Erchov and Kropatchov under the supervision of the ailing Ptushko (who died in 1973), Viy stars Leonid Kouraviliev as Khoma Brut and Natalya Varley as the witch. It is extremely faithful to the original story, and remarkable for its skillful teetering between the comic and the horrific. It isn't known whether the Russian filmmakers saw Bava's film, which is so loose in its adaptation of Gogol to be something else entirely, but the two films share a certain atmosphere and also certain directorial flourishes; for example, like Bava, Erchov and Kropatchov execute some wonderful 360° camera turns in the witch's crypt. Viy's colorful, delirious staging of the final confrontation between Khoma Brut and the witch, who rallies all manner of hellspawn to her defense, is also remarkably similar to Bava's handling of the climactic Hadean sequences of Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World (1961).

In 1968, Mario Bava was approached by Lawrence Woolner—who, with his brother Bernard, had distributed a couple of his films in the United States—with an offer to remake Black Sunday in color. Bava was all about process; he lost interest in his films once they were completed, so he had not seen his capolavoro in some time. Therefore, he arranged a private screening of the picture for himself and Lamberto, to see if the proposal was worth accepting.

"I didn't make the deal because my son and I couldn't keep a straight face as we watched it," Bava explained, in one of his rare published interviews. "Except for some rare masterpieces like Chaplin's films or All Quiet on the Western Front, people laugh at movies that are 10 years old—especially horror movies, which tend to look old-fashioned after even a couple of years."[50]

Bava's account sounds plausible, but he may have been using the interview to put a positive spin on the fact that the plans for this remake never quite came together. According to Bava's fan and friend Luigi Cozzi, Bava was not only receptive to this offer, but somewhat excited by the possibilities. "Two or three times, Mario told me that he was on the verge of making a deal to remake La maschera del demonio in color," Cozzi remembers. "When he spoke to me about it, he was very happy, but the deal always fell through." Bava's statement projects the calculated impression of a director who wants the world to know that he has moved up from his point of origin, and has learned to look down on his past work, as the producers he met were so fond of doing.

Almost two decades later, in 1989, Lamberto Bava announced his plan to do what his father never succeeded in doing: to remake La maschera del demonio in color. In truth, the resulting film is not a remake; it is as different to Mario's film as it had been different to Gogol's "Viy." Lamberto embarked on the production with hopes of casting Barbara Steele. "I wanted her to be in it," admits Lamberto, who sent her a personal letter of invitation. "She didn't even send a reply."

In Lamberto Bava's La maschera del demonio, four young couples on a skiing expedition accidentally disturb the glacial resting place of the diabolical witch Anibas (Eva Grimaldi). After removing a mask of spikes from the evil one's face, the ski party is rescued by a blind priest who offers them the comforts of his sanctuary until help arrives. It soon becomes apparent that three of the four couples have become unwitting receptors for the evil which Anibas swore on the descendants of her inquisitors. The untainted couple (Deborah Caprioglio and Giovanni Guidelli), chaste young lovers, are gradually defined as the battleground wherein the witch's victory or defeat must ultimately be decided, as her powers tease and test the corruptibility of their flesh, faith, and spirit.

Scripted by Massimo De Rita and Giorgio Stegani (whose previous work included Giorgio Ferroni's Il mulino delle donne di pietra, 1960), Lamberto's La maschera del demonio actually owes more to Gogol than his father's version did: the witch's carnal harassment of the priest; the hideous seduction-cum-transformation in the barn (expertly executed by effects artist Sergio Stivaletti); the portrayals of giggly, mischievous evil; and Anibas' demonstrations of her powers to the hero as she lies in state on her altar—all of these are splendidly Gogolian. Only the element of the spike-lined Mask of Satan is shared with Mario's interpretation. Elsewhere, the film provides a more satisfying, less superficial variation on the mythos found in Lamberto's Demoni/Demons (1985), dramatizing evil as an enemy that taunts us from within, rather than as a virulent infection spread by drooling, gibbering, Heavy Metal miscreants. It's no Black Sunday, of course, but it's nevertheless one of Lamberto Bava's most personal and best-realized horror films, and also a most unusual Italian horror film of its period, one that teases our most primal insecurities and superstitions rather than run roughshod over its audience with gimmicks and graphic violence.

MEXICAN lobby card.

49 Monthly Film Bulletin, May 15, 1968.

50 Volta.

51 See The Jack Kirby Collector 13, December 1996, 42, where the debt to Bava's film is explicitly indicated.

In the forty-plus years of its reign, Mario Bava's La maschera del demonio has had an almost incalculable influence—on Bava's own peers, as well as on subsequent generations of artists and filmmakers. One of the first people to be graphically influenced by the film was the legendary comic book artist Jack Kirby (1917–94), who was well-known for using concepts and images from 1950s B-movies in his stories and artwork for "Silver Age" Marvel Comics. The influence of Bava is most strongly felt in two villains conceived to oppose the Fantastic Four: Doctor Doom (who first appeared in The Fantastic Four No. 5, 1962) and Diablo (first appearance: Fantastic Four No. 30, 1964). The former (whose origin story was first told in Fantastic Four Annual 2, 1964) was Victor Von Doom, the East European son of a dead witch, whose face was encased in a metal mask after it was hideously disfigured in a laboratory explosion. As Doctor Doom is generally acknowledged to be the primary inspiration for George Lucas' character Darth Vader, the great villain of the Star Wars movies can be traced—arguably—to Bava's Mask of Satan. Like Doctor Doom, Diablo is another East European monster—a Transylvanian alchemist and sorcerer buried by villagers within the ruins of his own castle 100 years ago, who is unwittingly freed by the vacationing Fantastic Four, who stumble upon his tomb. Diablo looks very much like a super-costumed version of Javutich, and in fact, the image of Javutich would reappear in Kirby's art years later, when he drew the vampire Count Dragorin in the two-part story "The Man From Transylvane" for DC Comics' Superman's Pal, Jimmy Olsen Nos. 142–43 in the 1970s.[51]

Perhaps the first filmmaker to show Bava's influence was Roger Corman, who, as AIP's main provider of horror product, had an "inside track" of sorts. In addition to casting Barbara Steele in his Pit and the Pendulum, the influence of Black Sunday is apparent in The Haunted Palace (1963, an adaptation of H. P. Lovecraft's "The Strange Case of Charles Dexter Ward" deliberately misattributed to Edgar Allan Poe), which reprised many of its highlights: it opens with a warlock (Vincent Price) cursing the descendants of the townsfolk who are about to burn him alive; it then jumps 200 years ahead, when the warlock's twin descendant comes to inhabit the family castle and becomes darkly obsessed with his resemblance to his evil ancestor's portrait; elsewhere, there is a fight ending with a man falling into a blazing fireplace, a doctor hero, and a circular construction that ends with a second burning. It is possible that Bava drew some inspiration for La maschera del demonio from Lovecraft's story, as he later cited Lovecraft as his favorite writer.

Similar inquisition scenes occur in Chano Urueta's El Baron del Terror/The Brainiac (1961), Camillo Mastrocinque's La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964), Massimo Pupillo's Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror (1965), Michael Reeves' Revenge of the Blood Beast/The She-Beast (1966, also starring Barbara Steele), Harald Reinl's Die Schlangengrube und das Pendel/Blood Demon/The Torture Chamber of Dr. Sadism (1967), and Jim Wynorski's The Haunting of Morella (1990), which also made use of the film's good/evil twin theme. Imagery from La maschera del demonio made a startling reappearance in Tim Burton's virtually monochromatic color film Sleepy Hollow (1999), as Lisa Marie (a Steele lookalike) emerges from an Iron Maiden with her face punctured à la Princess Asa. One of Bava's most outspoken fans among the current generation of Hollywood filmmakers, Burton singled the film out as a major influence in the Channel 4 documentary Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre:

PRINCESS ASA, unmasked and consigned once again to flame, signals another of Bava's red-and-green lighting transformation effects.

"One of the movies that remain with me probably stronger than anything is Black Sunday," he revealed. "I remember seeing images of it on TV as a child. Then I remember, when I was slightly older, I went to one of those horror marathons . . . a whole weekend where you sit there for fifty-some hours of horror films. You're sort of wafting in and out of consciousness, and the one film I remember from that whole weekend was Black Sunday. It was like a dream; [Bava] really captured film-as-dream, you know? People always say to me, 'Your films look good, but there's no story . . .' Well, there's a lot of those old films—his in particular—where the vibe and the feeling is what it's about . . . Bava was probably Number One that way, in telling you a story through the images and giving you a feeling. The feeling's a mixture of eroticism, of sex, of horror and starkness of image—and, to me, that is more real than what most people would consider as realism in films, because somehow it bypasses your mind and goes straight inside of you . . . To me, there's something about things that cannot be simply and quickly identified, and that are powerful, that makes them the most meaningful things of all. So yes, it was inspiring." Burton also hosted a special showing of Black Sunday as part of American Movie Classics' "Monsterfest" celebration in October 1998.

The popularity of La maschera del demonio may have yet to reach its zenith. A 1996 poll of the Top 25 Favorite Horror Films of All Time conducted by the British fan magazine Shivers placed La maschera del demonio at #15. In 2001, one year after Image Entertainment released Bava's director's cut on VHS and DVD for the first time in America, Fangoria polled its readers' choices for the ten greatest horror films made before 1970; Black Sunday actually tied for #7 with the film that helped inspire it, Hammer's Horror of Dracula—a ranking that would have been unthinkable in the Hammer-centric 1960s. (Even more surprising, James Whale's perennial favorite Bride of Frankenstein [1935] rode in at #8.)[52] What these polls show is that, while some traditional favorites are slipping, Black Sunday's dark star continues in its ascent.

A possible disadvantage in the future history of La maschera del demonio came to light in October 2002, when Turner Classic Movies programmed a month of Mario Bava films for their weekly "TCM Imports" slot. The prints used for this retrospective were obtained from Alfredo Leone's International Media Films, Inc., and, in some cases, contained new editorial changes which Leone made in order to file new copyrights on the public domain material he had purchased in good faith. In no film were these changes more substantially, or disturbingly, inflicted than in La maschera del demonio.

Copyrighted 2000 by the Alfredo Leone Trust, this version—announced by TCM as Black Sunday but carrying the onscreen title of La maschera del demonio—predates the Image Entertainment release of Black Sunday (The Mask of Satan) on DVD, though it had never been publicly exhibited before 2002. While the onscreen title is here in Italian, the entire visual template is taken from the ELDA-dubbed Mask of Satan edition. Leone's version opens with the International Media Films Inc. logo, followed by a video-generated, red-on-black title card in scar-like lettering that reads, "Alfredo Leone Presents." As the executioner stokes the fire with a branding iron, the same red video-generated titles announce "A Mario Bava Film." From the moment the image fades up, through the shot of the S-shaped brand being pressed into the flesh of Asa's back, the soundtrack surprises us with a newly recorded (and horribly overwritten) narration:

> Before the dawn of the Age of Reason, Satanic beings appeared across the world, lusting for blood. Simple folk and gentry alike rose up to desperately defend against the murderous assault of those monstrous undead horrors among them. No piteous pleas of human love or bonds of family afforded safety from condemning accusation. No beloved spouse or cherished brother was to be spared from the vampires for the flames of savagely justified destruction. At that time, a ritual began that signified the casting of the unholy ones into the abyss to suffer the eternal tortures of the dark underworld. Wielding steel and fire, the righteous inquisitors nailed the horrid mark of Satan into the unclean flesh of the damned, sealing their fate and establishing the Mask of Satan.

Once the Mask of Satan is hammered onto Asa's face, the image of the mask that provided the backdrop to the original credit sequence is freeze-framed, and the title La maschera del demonio is superimposed in the same red, video-generated, scar-like font. The main titles are snipped out and reinserted at the end of the picture, following a red, video-generated "Fine."

The original music credit is replaced with a new card that credits the music jointly to Roberto Nicolosi and Les Baxter. Herein lies the key to Leone's most substantial changes, which occur on the level of its soundtrack. As anyone familiar with the original Italian (i.e. DVD) version can attest, several of La maschera's most suspenseful scenes play out in a setting of eerie, desolated silence. In the International Media version, Nicolosi's sparse score is padded, whenever it fades down or out, with cues from Baxter's completely unrelated score for Baron Blood (another Bava film owned by Leone). Consequently, there is nary a quiet moment left in the picture; even the effects track has been beefed-up, so that when the Mirgorod villagers assemble at the Castle and are heard downstairs, they sound like they are about to crash through the doors upstairs. The film's original tenebrous soundscapes are robbed of all their intended subtlety, giving Bava's classic a heavy-handed feel that was never a part of its legend.

Clearly, Alfredo Leone was obliged to alter the content of these films to protect the rights he bought from Italian companies with correct chain of ownership, before becoming aware that the versions he bought had fallen into the US public domain. While one appreciates Leone's endeavors to keep Bava's name alive, and his need to recoup his investment costs, the existence of a reworking as drastic as this is potentially damaging to Bava's reputation. It was this version of La maschera del demonio that was used to represent Bava's work in the most prestigious American broadcast of its shelf life, but in place of the version Bava signed, TCM's viewers were shown a cacophonous, tone-deaf mess.

This aberration deserves to disappear back into the vaults whence it came, but its existence arouses reasonable concern for the future life of Bava's directorial debut. Might this version someday replace the superior Mask of Satan version currently available on DVD? Is this the version that will ultimately be passed down for the discovery of future generations? Only time will tell.

Beyond its artistic importance, La maschera del demonio represents a milestone in horror film history whose moment in time was transitional and decisive. It was the last great Gothic horror film in black-and-white. Other monochrome classics would follow—Robert Wise's The Haunting (1963), George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead (1968)—but they were all contemporary in setting; they encouraged audiences to eavesdrop rather than to dream. La maschera, on the other hand, was like stepping back into the bedtime stories and nightmares of childhood; its opening narration could have easily begun with "Once Upon a Time . . ." But contrary to expectations, Bava used this magical, Old World setting to steer the genre into a disturbing new era. Here, horror was weirdly entwined with art, horror with beauty, and terror was tinged with poetry and a palpable new element of the erotic.

With one film, Mario Bava became the horror genre's last great classicist and its first great modernist.

52 Besting Black Sunday in the poll were Psycho (1960), Night of the Living Dead (1968), Dracula (1931) and Nosferatu (a tie for #3), Rosemary's Baby, Frankenstein (1931), and Robert Wise's The Haunting (1963).

MORGAN IL PIRATA

Morgan the Pirate

DETAIL of US one-sheet poster.

DURING THE PRODUCTION of La maschera del demonio, Mario Bava made the decision to follow that auspicious career chapter by returning to work as a motion picture cameraman—as though his opportunity to direct had never happened. He would follow the creation of his seminal horror classic with a gruelling six-month schedule of supportive (and partly anonymous) work that has mostly gone unchronicled.

Bava's main project during this period would be directing the photography of Galatea's upcoming international co-production with 20th Century-Fox, Esther and the King, to be directed by the legendary American filmmaker, Raoul Walsh. In the six-week period between the completion of La maschera del demonio on May 7 and the June 27 start date of Esther and the King, Bava loaned some uncredited assistance to the latest Steve Reeves picture, a co-production between Lux Film and Adelphia Cinematografica entitled Morgan il pirata.

SEVENTEENTH century buccaneer Henry Morgan (Steve Reeves, third from right) is captured and enslaved in Panama.

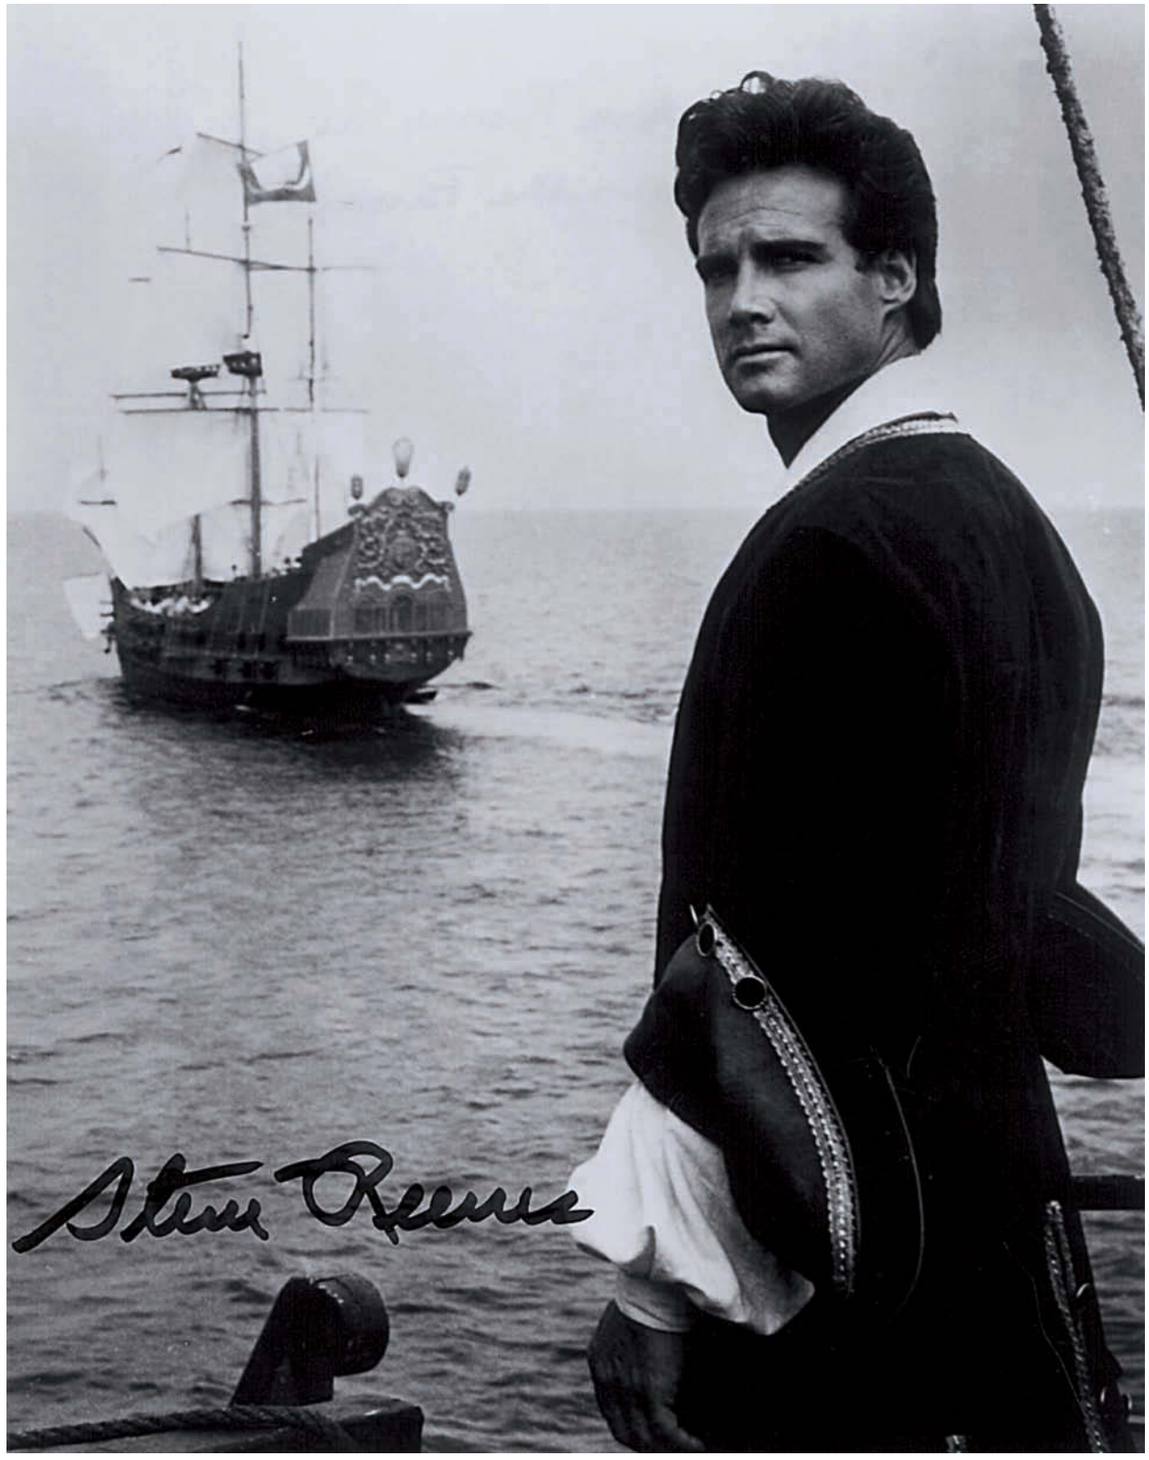
Marcello Gatti, later the award-winning cinematographer of Gillo Pontecorvo's La battaglia di Algeri/The Battle of Algiers (1965) and Enrico Maria Salerno's Anonimo Veneziano/The Anonymous Venetian (1970), met and worked with Bava several times on various uncredited assignments during the 1960s. "Whenever some special effect was needed, productions would call him," Gatti explains. "Mario would come, do his usual mysterious series of filmings, and take everything home to work on it, and later bring back the footage fully edited, with the special effects perfectly made."

Bava was happy to take these jobs; he was a professional paid for his services (presumably in cash), but in these situations, he agreed to work only on the condition that he received no credit. In a sense, his uncredited work—a virtual secret filmography—occupied the same place in his life that the sculpting of Saints occupied in the life of his father, Eugenio: it was work for the soul, his penitence for working in a business where self-promotion was essential to one's survival. In later years, Bava would explain his wish not to be credited by saying that he was a director, and that it could be detrimental to his career to be seen working as some other director's dogsbody. This was certainly true, but Bava had taken such jobs long before becoming a director, and he continued to take them after becoming a director because this was the work that he most loved to do. Creating illusions. Solving problems. Invisibly.

Because Mario's freelance jobs were uncredited, it has been impossible (till now) to look them up in reference books. The only way to find them is through the eyewitness testimony of colleagues, or by discovering them in the course of normal film-viewing, with an eye trained to recognize his particular arsenal of tricks, his brushstrokes. The latter is a very tricky business; the only special effects jobs I have included in the main body of this book are those which have been confirmed by Bava's co-workers and a few others which, my eyes tell me, unmistakably reflect his work. The more questionable titles are collected in a special appendix to this volume.

In the case of Morgan il pirata, we have the confirmation of Mario's son, Lamberto Bava. "Yes, it's true that my father sometimes worked on films for other directors, in secret," he admits. "When I became a teenager, I started to show more interest in my father's work and, sometimes, he would take me to the set with him. One of the earliest sets I remember visiting was Morgan il pirata." Lamberto would have been 16 years old at the time.



The first of Steve Reeves' films to be actively co-produced by Joseph E. Levine, after his success with the first two Hercules films in America, Morgan il pirata was primarily written by Bava's colleague Filippo Sanjust (Agi Murad, Caltiki)—again, with his services as costume designer attached. Brought in to direct the picture, at Reeves' request, was Andre de Toth. Born Endre Toth in Mako, Hungary, in 1912, he started making films in his homeland in the late 1930s, and like many other Hungarians, he fled his country as wartime invasions approached, turning for help to his most famous fellow countryman, producer Alexander Korda. Korda gave de Toth the opportunity to do some uncredited script work on Lydia (1941) for Julien Duvivier, and to provide some second unit direction to the classics The Thief of Bagdad (1940) and The Jungle Book (1942), after which he found himself directing Passport to Suez (1943), a "Lone Wolf" mystery starring Warren William. De Toth specialized in genre pictures—mostly crime thrillers and Westerns—achieving his greatest fame as the director of the horror classic House of Wax (1953), an ironic assignment as de Toth had only one eye and had to exploit the new "miracle" of 3-D without having any depth perception himself. By the same token, de Toth was that rare director of a pirate film to have actually worn an eye patch! After Morgan il pirata, he would helm

Morgan il pirata

"Morgan the Pirate"
Filmed at Titanus Studios (Scalera Film) and on location
May – June 1960
First released: November 17, 1960
Eastmancolor, CinemaScope, 2.35:1, 103 minutes

Production: Lux Film, Adelphia Cinematografica (Rome), Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris). Distributor: Lux Film.

Finland: Meri-Rostvo Pirat-Morgan, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer
France: Capitaine Morgan, 6/23/61
Germany: König der Seeräuber, "King of the Pirates," 9/29/61, 94m
UK: Morgan the Pirate, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 7/61, 95m 17s
US: Morgan the Pirate, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 7/6/61, 96m

AUTOGRAPHED portrait of Reeves in character.

two more Italian costume pictures—I mongoli/The Mongols (1961) and Oro per i Cesari/Gold for the Caesars (1963), both co-directed with Riccardo Freda. His final credit was as co-director of a low-budget American horror film, Terror Night (1987), starring Cameron Mitchell. Andre de Toth suffered a fatal cerebral hemmorhage at the age of 89 on October 27, 2002.

Eight years before his death, de Toth published a thick book of memoirs, Fragments: Portraits From the Inside, but it included no mention of Morgan il pirata, perhaps indicating that he considered it more the work of his co-director than something of his own. The film's Italian director was Primo Zeglio, a director in his own right since the early 1940s, and also an occasional screenwriter for other directors (Francisci's Attila). In 1947, Zeglio directed a version of the oft-filmed story of Catholic sainthood, Genoveffa de Brabante, the only star vehicle of American actress Harriet White; in the 1950s, he became enamored of swashbucklers and directed two pirate films: Capitan Fantasma (1953) and Il figlio del corsaro rosso/Son of the Red Pirate (1958). After co-directing Morgan il pirata, he co-directed Il dominatore dei sette mari/Seven Seas to Calais (1961) with Rudolph Maté—the story of Sir Francis Drake, another sea-faring film with battle scenes supervised by Riccardo Freda. Zeglio would sometimes work under the pseudonyms Anthony Green, Anthony Greepy and Omar Hopkins.

Morgan il pirata is a 17th century swashbuckler about Welsh buccaneer Sir Henry Morgan (1635–88), who raided and plundered numerous Spanish settlements in the West Indies with the implicit support of the English crown. The film diverges considerably from historical record in its effort to complement its action with a love story.

Doña Inez (Valérie Lagrange)—the daughter of Don José Guzman (Ivo Garrani), the governor of Panama—first encounters Morgan (Reeves) as a slave being beaten during an auction. She buys him to stop the violence and assigns him to work as a groom in her stable. When her lady-in-waiting, Doña Maria (Lidia Alfonsi), discovers Morgan kissing Inez, she orders him arrested and he is scheduled to be drawn and quartered. He wins a reprieve in a lottery, and is consigned to work on a Panamanian slave ship instead. Morgan spearheads a successful mutiny and flies the pirate flag. In his travels, he conquers other ships and has a victorious duel against another buccaneer, François l'Olonnais (Armand Mestral), who has captured Inez and Maria—winning their release into his custody. Maria falls in love with one of Morgan's men, but Inez withholds the affection she feels until Morgan returns her safely to her father. After Morgan's raid on Tortuga, he is approached by Sir Thomas (Giulio Bosetti), governor of Jamaica and an emissary from England, offering him a Knighthood, additional men and arms in exchange for a third of his plunders. When Don José Guzman forbids his daughter to see Morgan again and launches an attack against his fleet, Morgan plays along by staging his own death, later anonymously crashing the Governor's victory dinner for a minuet with Inez. Meeting secretly, Inez admits her love to Morgan, who refuses to let her join him yet. Instead, he decides to raid Panama and take the woman who loves him as his prize—entering not by sea as expected, but on land from the city's unprotected rear. It is a violent takeover, and while escaping her father's plan to sneak her away to safe haven in Spain, Inez is injured in the streets during an explosion. Morgan recognizes her medallion among the booty collected from bodies in the streets, and demands to be led to her. To his relief, he revives Inez, and the lovers reunite in a kiss.

Bava's covert contributions to Morgan il pirata are fairly easy to spot, because his cinematographic style is so much at odds with that of the film's principal cameraman, Tonino Delli Colli (b. 1923). Best known for photographing the Italian Westerns of Sergio Leone, Delli Colli—who first collaborated with Primo Zeglio on 1949's Nerone e Messalina ("Nero and Messalina")—is renowned for his arid, naturalistic visual style, which generally eschews shadow in favor of stark, sun-soaked imagery and an almost incidental limitation of color. Consequently, aside from the obvious trick shots, Bava's material tips its hand with its potent uses of color and shadow.

Bava's work first appears in a glass matte, which adds a palmy Panamanian vista to the plain background of a long-shot following Morgan's reprieve from execution. As Sir Thomas sails to the shore of Tortuga to meet with Morgan, we see another glass matte showing a fleet of five ships (more than the production could afford to build), viewed in silhouette over the shoulder of a foregrounded rock; this shot appears to have been achieved with nothing more than black paper cutouts, positioned on glass against a night shot of the sea. There are also incidental shots throughout the film that show backgrounds of ships anchored offshore; some of these were real, while others were painted on glass. Bava also would have supervised the filming of the water tank shots of miniature ships at sea, notably the shot in which two ships explode into flames. These were optically merged with shots filmed on an actual beach.

FINNISH one-sheet poster.

STEVE REEVES fences for freedom against Panamanian guardsmen in this US lobby card.

In addition to these trick shots, it appears that Bava was put in charge of photographing some retakes and additional shooting, as were required by editor Maurizio Lucidi. The most impressive of this work is a colorful, impressionistic montage depicting Morgan's sea battle at Panama, which suggests far more than it shows. Built around close and medium shots of Reeves, this sequence convincingly takes place aboard a ship with a full crew, yet all that we see of the vessel are a single sheet (for the sail), a rope ladder, and a steering wheel, with a couple of stand-ins providing incidental background action in shadow. The rest of the illusion is supplied entirely by sound effects. One overlooks this material at first, as one should, but when viewed on its own, the footage is an astounding job of cinematic sleight-of-hand.

A suddenly increased sense of color and shadow also suggests Bava's participation in the filming of other scenes: the reunion dinner of Don José and Doña Inez after Morgan ships her safely home; Morgan's reunion with Inez on the balcony at her father's victory celebration (the people's festivities inserted into the background via blue screen), which is rich in reflected "flame" and "fireworks" lighting; and the concluding scene of Morgan reviving Inez in the street, where a subjective shot from the heroine's dazed point of view utilizes Bava's trademark "water glass," which he had used in pick-up shots for Nel segno di Roma/Sign of the Gladiator (1959).

In his Foreword to Andre de Toth's memoirs, Martin Scorsese writes, "In de Toth's films, there are no happy endings; only ambiguous ones." This is certainly true of Morgan il pirata, though here the ambiguity is the dimension of rape and pillage that provides a backdrop to its final reunion of the two lovers. There is just enough of a taste of compromise and abruptness about this "happy" ending to suggest that Bava may also have been brought in to forge a more upbeat conclusion.

Despite the measures that were taken to "fix" the picture, evidence of production difficulties abounds. Reeves' beard appears and disappears and is sometimes replaced with a fake beard (as during the mutiny scene), indicating a skewed chronology of takes and retakes. This matter is only exacerbated by the choppy continuity of the American edition, Morgan the Pirate, which was released by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in a version relieved of more than 10 minutes of footage. The movie is also compromised by its own amorality: for the first and only time, Reeves is cast as an irredeemable cutthroat who bows to no man or flag, and the balance of the cast is divided among characters who are either craven, criminal, or cowardly, leaving the viewer with no one to whole-heartedly champion. Though the rough edges are hard to overlook, Morgan il pirata is nevertheless one of Reeves' most satisfying vehicles, thanks to his sincere performance, some tautly directed action scenes (especially the initial duel between Morgan and L'Olonnais, as the latter amusingly declines to remove his shirt after Morgan removes his and stands bare-chested before him), and of course, Sanjust's magnificent costumes.

Morgan il pirata was reportedly budgeted at $2 million—amazingly, twenty times the cost of Steve Reeves' first Hercules film. In Italy, it earned back 618 million lire [$385,000], which was not a steep drop from the earnings of La battaglia di Maratona but still a noticeable one. Of course, the film's higher—one might say excessive—cost made it more unlikely to turn a profit, as did the fact that it had no fantasy content to attract younger viewers. Despite these handicaps, Joseph E. Levine spared no expense when premiering the picture in America. In addition to the full-page newspaper ads, relentless TV-spotting, and mammoth billboards, the producer took advantage of his existing business arrangement with Dell Publishing Co. to issue not only a comic book adaptation of Morgan the Pirate, but—because the film's lack of the usual magic and monsters were better suited to adult audiences—a novelization of the picture, as well. This was entrusted to Robert Carse, a frequent contributor to Argosy magazine who had distinguished himself as an authority on the topic of piracy, fictional and factual, with such books as The Fabulous Buccaneer, From the Sea and the Jungle, Rum Row, and The Age of Piracy: A History.

SPANISH one-sheet poster, art by Soligo.

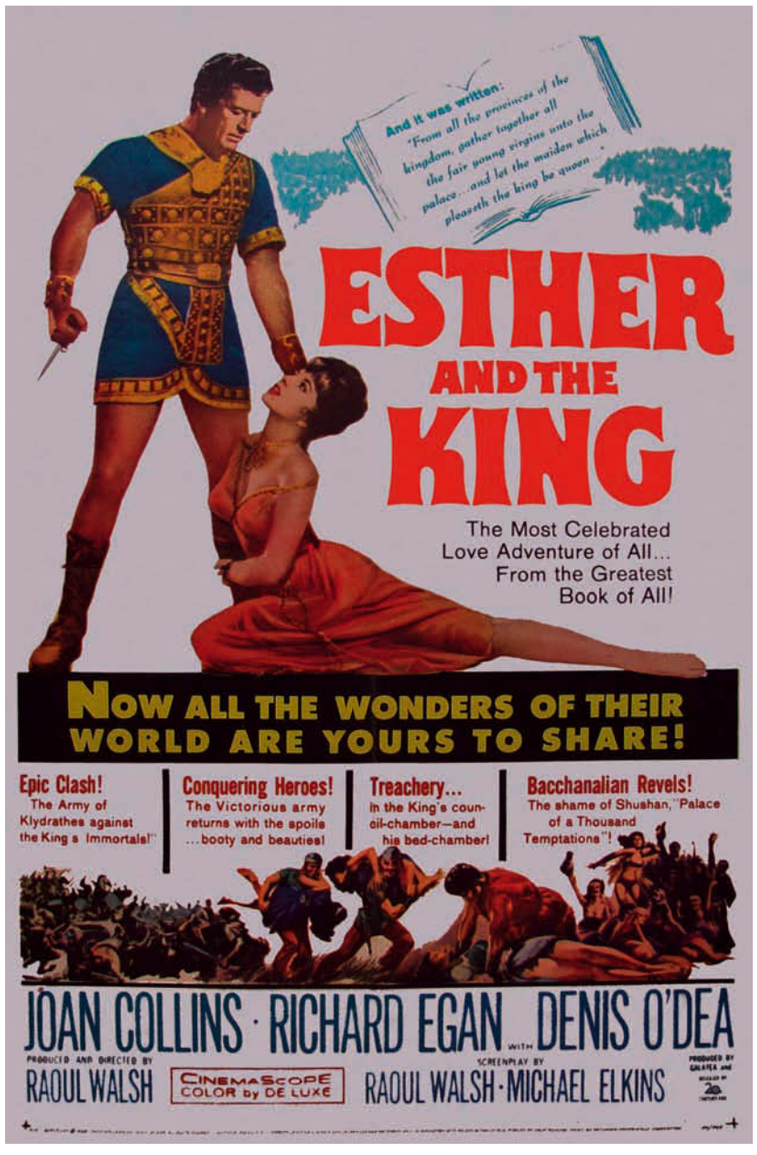
ESTHER AND THE KING



MARIO BAVA'S FIRST major project after the completion of La maschera del demonio represented a sharp shifting of gears. Esther and the King, a prestigious international co-production between Galatea and 20th Century-Fox, was based on the Book of Esther from the Old Testament. It was also the pet project of one of Hollywood's most illustrious veteran filmmakers, Raoul Walsh (1887–1980).

Walsh was the director of such Hollywood classics as The Thief of Bagdad (the 1924 version with Douglas Fairbanks), The Big Trail (1930, the first widescreen Western), The Roaring Twenties (1939, one of the last gangster films made before the advent of film noir), High Sierra and They Died With Their Boots On (both 1941), and the incendiary White Heat (1949). Walsh was given his start in films by David Wark Griffith, who assigned him his first directorial effort (co-directed with Christy Cabanne) the year Bava was born: The Life of General Villa (1914). He also acted in Griffith films—his most notable screen role being that of John Wilkes Booth in The Birth of a Nation (1915)—and was one of the thirty-six original founders of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences.

Like Bava, Walsh had acquired a reputation for bailing out troubled productions. In 1954, when director Robert Wise was falling behind schedule with Warner Brothers' $4,000,000 epic Helen of Troy and realized that he no longer had the time to direct several crucial action scenes he had reserved for himself, Walsh was sent to Rome to helm second unit action sequences with Yakima Canutt. [1]

The 20th Century-Fox pressbook for Esther and the King paints his legend large: "Veteran director Raoul Walsh is a cigarette-rolling, drawling Texan who must have seemed like a figure out of a rip-roaring Western drama to the 150-member crew of Italians . . . Walsh appeared on the set in Rome each day in tight pants, Texas cowboy boots and ten-gallon hat, with a thin cornpaper cigarette in the corner of his mouth. He carried with him pounds of his favorite American tobacco which he rolled into cigarettes at the rate of forty a day, a supply large enough to last the twelve-week shooting period in Rome."[2]

But as Leonard Maltin notes in his Movie Encyclopedia, "Raoul Walsh was a storyteller who never let the truth get in the way of a good tale." In fact, at the time Esther and the King was made, Walsh was 73 years old and his eyesight was failing him. (He had already lost his right eye in 1929, while directing In Old Arizona, the first talking Western. In 1952, Walsh directed Blackbeard the Pirate with Robert Newton, making him—like Andre de Toth—another of the eye-patch-wearing directors in this genre.) He would retire altogether from filmmaking only three years later, when his blindness became total.

US one-sheet poster.

In a career spanning six decades and over 100 films, Walsh scripted only a few, and Esther and the King was one of these. One would therefore imagine that it was a personal film for him, yet it doesn't rate even a passing mention in his 1974 autobiography Each Man in His Time, nor does he include it in the book's filmography—omissions which suggest denial of paternity.

During the production, something—the need to hasten production, his failing eyesight, or perhaps an inability to speak Italian—caused Walsh to relegate a measure of authority to Bava. Perhaps it had to do with Bava's own performance on the set, which so impressed Walsh that he confided to a reporter, "As long as there are people like him working in pictures, there's no need to worry about the future of our industry. Anyone who knows as much as he does about film technique revitalizes the motion picture every time they work."[3] Whatever the reason, European references such as the Dizionario del cinema Italiano confirm that Bava directed additional scenes for the picture. Most of this material—second-unit type shots of slaves turning a wheel that opens the palace gates, picturesque scenes celebrating the female form, and assorted free-floating mayhem—is fairly apparent even on the first pass, not only because the footage is fraught with Bava's signature touches, but because it's the type of second unit material that would not have required Walsh's presence. The Italian version of the film, Ester e il re, credits the film's direction to both Walsh and Bava.

The Italian version is also unique in assigning its editing credit to Mario Serandrei—a curiousity, considering that the Italian version is identical to the version released everywhere else in the world, which is credited to Jerry Webb. (Webb's only other known editing credits appear on the American versions of Martin Ritt's Five Branded Women and Duilio Coletti's Under Ten Flags—both Italian-made films, both also filmed in 1960, and both credited to other editors in their Italian form. You tell me.)

So who was the film's ultimate auteur?

Ephraim Katz once wrote of Raoul Walsh, "He tackled a variety of genres but was at his best with virile outdoor action dramas, which he often mellowed with moments of genuine

Esther and the King

Filmed at Titanus Appia Studios (Cinecittà), Istituto LUCE, and on location
June 27 – September 15, 1960
First released: December 14, 1960 (US)
Color by Deluxe, CinemaScope, 2.35:1, 109 minutes

Production: 20th Century-Fox (US), Galatea (Rome). Producers: Raoul Walsh, Lionello Santi. Associate producer: John Twist. Director: Raoul Walsh. Co-director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Ottavio Oppo. Screenplay: Raoul Walsh, Michael Elkins, Ennio De Concini (Italy). Dialogue coach: Harriet White Medin. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Ubaldo Terzano. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini. Costume design: Anna Maria Fea. Makeup: Euclide Santoli. Hairdresser: Mara Rochetti. Production supervisor: Ferruccio de Martino. Production manager: Mike Holden. Production secretary: Franca Franco. Unit manager: Massimo De Rita. Editor: Jerry Webb, Mario Serandrei (Italy). Music: Angelo Francesco Lavagnino and Roberto Nicolosi, conducted by Carlo Savina. Distributor: 20th Century-Fox for all territories unless otherwise noted.

Joan Collins (Esther), Richard Egan (King Ahasuerus), Sergio Fantoni (Haman), Dennis O'Dea (Mordecai), Daniela Rocca (Vashti), Rick Battaglia (Simon), Renato Baldini (Klidrates), Folco Lulli (Tobia), Gabriele Tinti (Samuel), Rosalba Neri (Keresh), Robert Buchanan [Walter Williams] (Hagi, the eunuch), Aldo Pini (Captain of the Guards), Italo Tancredi (Gisko), Ombretta Ostenda (uncredited).

France: Ester et le Roi
Germany: Das Schwert von Persien, "The Sword of Persia," Deutsche Fox, 3/3/61, 102m
Italy: Ester e il re, 2/17/61
Spain: Esther y el Rey, Hispano Fox Films S.A.E., 4/2/62, 95m
UK: Esther and the King, 2/27/61

EXECUTIVE producer Nello Santi and director Raoul Walsh converse with Mario Bava on the set.

tenderness."[4] Esther and the King fits this description perfectly in terms of its scripting and general supervision, but it also belongs to its cameraman in ways that transcend visual style. It might best be described as a Raoul Walsh film interpreted by Mario Bava. It isn't a film Bava would have made without Walsh, yet it looks like a Bava film, sounds like a Bava film and, most significantly, has the distinctive limitations of a Bava film. To put it succinctly, it's the only Raoul Walsh picture that loses its sense of paternity whenever the action shifts outdoors.

Synopsis

Persia, "2,500 years ago."[5] King Ahasuerus is returning home with his armies after conquering Egypt. As they approach the city of Shushan, the King halts his troops and rewards Simon, a Judean soldier who saved his life in battle, with the Sword of the Golden Rooster. When Simon expresses his eagerness to reunite with his fiancee, Ahasuerus gives him a plundered Egyptian necklace as a gift for the bride.

Simon's homecoming is anything but happy: a dead man hangs by the neck from the rafters of his own home, a warning from the King's prime minister, Prince Haman, that all Jews must remember to pay their taxes. Simon is reunited with Esther, his virginal bride-to-be who boasts of never having looked at another man. As one who lived under the tyranny of the King's minister during the war, she scoffs at Simon's allegiance to the King and throws the monarch's gift ruefully in the dirt.

True to the King's suspicions, Queen Vashti has been unfaithful during his absence, sleeping with the power-mad, drug-sniffing Haman, who covets the throne. When the King returns, he demands the truth of Vashti's misbehavior from his chief counselor Lord Mordecai—uncle to Esther—who explains that his eyes do not penetrate into the Queen's bedchamber. Ahasuerus immediately storms into Vashti's rooms, calls her "adulteress" and declares that, from that moment on, she is dead to him. Angry and embittered, Ahasuerus calls a secret meeting with Haman and Mordecai, announcing his immediate plan to conquer Greece and destroy "that young upstart" Alexander. As the King lays out his battle plan, Mordecai inscribes his strategems on KING AHASUERUS (Richard Egan) loses his heart to Esther (Joan Collins), the abducted fiancee of a Judean soldier who once saved his life in battle.

1 John Cary, Spectacular: The Story of Epic Films (Secaucus NJ: Castle Books, 1974), 71.

2 20th Century-Fox pressbook.

3 Raoul Walsh, as quoted in Pascal Martinet, Mario Bava (Paris, France: Edilig, 1984), 10.

4 Ephraim Katz, The Film Encyclopedia (New York NY: Harper Collins Publishers, 1990).

5 An historical error already. 2,500 years before 1960 would be approximately 540 B.C.—21 years before the acknowledged birth of the film's hero, King Ahasuerus—better known as King Xerxes I. The chronology of the synopsis in the 20th Century-Fox pressbook is even more askew, dating the action in 400 B.C.—65 years after the King's death.

tablets in Hebrew. Listening intently to the King's words, Haman concocts a plan to dispose of Mordecai, destroy the King, and usurp his throne.

That night during the celebratory revels, the spiteful Vashti dances provocatively before the court, strips herself naked before the King and spits at his feet. Hamar points out to the King that Persian law provides only two punishments for this offense: death or banishment. Ahasuerus banishes Vashti, but contrary to these orders, Haman instructs his henchman Gisko to kill her. He smothers her to death with a pillow.

Now, according to the ancient laws of Cyrus, a new Queen must be chosen from all the fairest virgins in the land, and Haman schemes to navigate his favorite courtesan, Keresh, into the throne he imagines will soon adjoin his own. He also busies himself with preparing a false set of battle plans, written in Greek and annotated in Hebrew, with which he plans to incriminate Lord Mordecai of treason. Meanwhile, he orders Klidrates, the Captain of the Guards, to raid the village and return with the requisite virgins, but not to pay too much attention to their beauty, lest they pose a threat to Keresh. In the Judean sector, royal guardsmen ride into town and abduct every young woman in sight, actually kidnapping Esther from her wedding to Simon before it is concluded. The outraged groom nearly murders a guard in trying to save Esther, and is advised by Mordecai to conceal himself until further notice in the ancient ruins of the City of the Dead.

Esther is taken to the palace. To ensure the success of Keresh's bid for the crown, Haman arranges for the three most beautiful captives—Esther among them—to be given to the guards for their pleasure. The King, sweaty from wrestling with his guards, witnesses the attempt and anonymously rescues the women. The next day, the court eunuch Hagi notices that Esther has dressed herself for the royal audition in a simple white garment. He admires her humility and rewards it by making her wear an ostentatious golden cape to her meeting with the King. As she models the garment, Haman instructs Gisko to remember the girl in the golden cloak . . . Just before Esther's appointment with the King, the scheming Keresh—determined to be noticed—steals the cloak and receives the fate intended for Esther. During her audition, Esther is recognized by the King as one of the women he rescued, and she is amazed to recognize her savior in this King whose reputation she has long abhorred. Almost immediately, they are attracted to one another, and the King announces the selection of his Queen.

Haman is displeased. After flogging Gisko for the murder of Keresh, he threatens Esther directly, warning her not to thwart him or he will inform the King that they have been lovers. Learning from Mordecai that Esther is preparing to wed Ahasuerus—with the blessing of her uncle, who hopes their union will establish a lasting peace between the Persians and the Judeans—Simon uses his Sword of the Golden Rooster to gain access to the palace, and tries to persuade Esther to escape with him. She refuses, and when Simon threatens to kill the King, Esther realizes that she does in fact love Ahasuerus and sounds a gong, forcing Simon to take flight.

King Ahasuerus celebrates the coronation of his new Queen by introducing a new and fairer system of taxation, and announcing that his forthcoming campaign against the Greeks will be funded not by additional taxes, but rather by spoils from the royal treasury at Persepolis. Fearful that his embezzlement from the treasury will be discovered, Haman suggests an alternate plan, based on an ancient law: that the coming war against Greece should be funded by annihilating the Jews and reaping their silver. The King declares this law archaic and hateful, and officially permits the Jews to worship their own God . . . until Haman charges Lord Mordecai of copying the King's secret military strategies and selling them to a Jew in Greece. At once, Ahasuerus angrily orders the arrest and execution of the Jews, starting with Mordecai, at which point Queen Esther shocks the court by confessing that she too is a Jew. The King asks her to renounce her faith and live, but she refuses, accusing Haman of treachery, and beseeching her husband to postpone Mordecai's execution until he returns from visiting the treasury at Persepolis. He agrees.

Haman casts Pur (colored tiles) for guidance, and a blood-red tile lands on the current month of the zodiac chart on his floor. Thus confirmed, he promises Klidrates 1,000 tallents of gold for the head of the King. Klidrates rides ahead to the City of the Dead with the intention of assassinating Ahasuerus as he rides by. Simon, in hiding there, overcomes Klidrates and notifies the King, who delivers the final blow and has Klidrates' severed head delivered to Haman at the palace. Reunited, Ahasuerus and Simon double back to overthrow Haman, who in the King's absence has staged the discovery of the false battle plans incriminating

HAMAN (Sergio Fantoni), Ahasuerus and the Captain of the Guards (Aldo Pini) admire the beauty of their Jewish female prisoners.

Mordecai and ordered his immediate hanging.

Having escaped an attempt on her life by Gisko, Esther joins her people at the Judean Temple, where they have assembled in defiance of the King's decree to observe the Sabbath. Simon arrives with the King's ring—his Seal of Empire—and orders the Master of Arms to supply the Judeans with weapons. The armed Jews storm the palace in time for Simon to save Mordecai, but as he removes the noose from the old man's neck, he is mortally wounded by a palace guard. Haman seizes a chariot to escape the bloody fracas, but finds his path of exit blocked by the King, who commands his guards to "Hang him . . . Hang him high!"

Simon is carried to the temple, where he dies in the lap of Esther. Lord Mordecai decrees that this day of the Jewish people's deliverance must never be forgotten, and since it was brought about by Haman's casting of the Pur, this day will henceforth be known as Purim.

One year later, on the first celebration of Purim, Ahasuerus returns home from the Grecian wars, defeated by Alexander. He is greeted by Esther, who explains to Mordecai, "It was not for his victories that I loved him."

Cast

The expert wrestling moves demonstrated in the film by King Ahasuerus are authentic. Born in San Francisco on July 29, 1921, rugged Richard Egan worked as an Army judo instructor during WWII and taught public speaking at Northwestern University upon returning to civilian life. He first appeared onscreen in Joseph Pevney's Undercover Girl (1950) and graduated to heroic leads in Fox adventure films and melodramas. Rugged, well-educated, and physically fit, he moved into costume roles as Dardanius in Demetrius and the Gladiators (1954, the sequel to the first CinemaScope film, The Robe, 1953). After Esther and the King, he returned to Rome to make The 300 Spartans for director Rudoph Maté. In later years, he was most frequently seen on American series television. He died of prostate cancer on July 20, 1987.

The role of Esther was won by Joan Collins, a British actress who made her screen debut in 1951's Lady Godiva Rides Again (1951). Born in London on May 23, 1933, she moved to Hollywood in her early 20s and became a 20th Century-Fox contract player, achieving her first major success opposite Jack Hawkins in Howard Hawks' Egyptian epic Land of the Pharaohs (a loan-out to Warner Bros., 1955). This was followed by major roles in The Virgin Queen and The Girl in the Red Velvet Swing (both also 1955), and various contemporary roles tailored to her sultry brand of sensuality. Collins, whose romances with Nicky Hilton and Warren Beatty were frequent grist for Tinsel Town publicity mills, was nearing 30 at the time she played the virginal Esther.

She recalls the film unkindly in her autobiography Second Act: "I thought the screenplay for Esther and the King was one of the most appalling I'd ever read . . . [it was] my final film for Fox and far and away the worst."[6] A true industry survivor, Collins continued to receive top billing throughout the 1970s in various British horror films (including Tales From the Crypt, 1972, and I Don't Want to Be Born/The Devil Within Her, 1974) and reinvented herself in the late '70s as the mature star of erotic films like The Bitch and The Stud (both 1979), based on best-selling potboilers by her younger sister, Jackie. She celebrated her 60th birthday by posing nude for Playboy, and found her greatest success on the American TV series Dynasty as archbitch Alexis Carrington Colby. She published two volumes of autobiography, beginning with Past Imperfect in 1978, which was followed in the late '80s and '90s with a series of torrid romance novels and a perfume of her own design.

Denis O'Dea, the stoic Irish actor who played Lord Mordecai, was born in Dublin on April 26, 1905. Although he made his first Italian film—Maurice Cloché's Peppino e Violetta—in 1950, he made several films in America during that decade, sometimes working as "Dennis O'Dea." He was an evident favorite of Raoul Walsh, who had previously used him for supporting roles in Captain Horatio Hornblower (1951) and Sea Devils (1953). Their reunion on Esther and the King may have been serendipity; at the time of production, O'Dea had relocated to Rome and was making a living in the dubbing industry. He dubbed his own voice in Esther; his dry, world-weary tones can also be heard in many other English-dubbed pepla of the period. This was apparently his final onscreen appearance, though he lived nearly another twenty years, until November 5, 1978.

Simon was played by Rik Battaglia, born Riccardo Battaglia in 1927, who made his screen debut in Mario Soldati's smoldering La donna del fiume/Woman of the River (1955), opposite Sophia Loren. Athletic with handsome, earthy features, Battaglia was a natural for historical pictures and he made many of them, including Orlando e i paladini di Francia, Teseo contro il Minotauro/The Minotaur (1960), Edgar G. Ulmer's Annibale/Hannibal (1961), and Robert Aldrich's Sodom and Gomorrah (1962). Between 1963 and 1968, Battaglia worked primarily in West Germany, appearing in a series of Westerns based on the writings of Karl May, the first of which was Old Shatterhand (1963). One of his few Italian film appearances during this period was a small, nothing role as Barbara Steele's ill-fated lover in Amante d'oltretomba/Nightmare Castle (1965). After appearing in Sergio Leone's Giù la testa/A Fistful of Dynamite (1971), his roles became fewer and he found himself working in sexploitation fare like Il mondo dei sensi de Emy Wong/Yellow Emanuelle (1976) and Suor Emanuelle/Sister Emanuelle (1978). Esther and the King is one of many films that credit his name as "Rick." Battaglia hasn't appeared onscreen since 1992.

HAMAN warns Esther not to thwart his plans to overthrow the King.

6 Joan Collins, Second Act (New York NY: St. Martin's Press, 1996), 125.

Renato Baldini (Klidrates) is onscreen in Esther and the King more often than anyone viewing the pan-and-scanned home video release might expect. Watching this cropped version, one might well wonder what Baldini did to warrant such prominent billing, but when the film is viewed in its original widescreen format, Klidrates is often shown complementing Haman's position onscreen, giving Richard Egan's King the appearance of being subtly surrounded and quietly overwhelmed by his enemies. Born in 1921, Baldini was in fact one of the actors most active in the peplum genre, sometimes billed as Ryan Brennan or Rajan Brennan. Among his credits are Riccardo Freda's Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio/Theodora, Slave Empress (1954), Giuditta e Oloferne/Head of a Tyrant (1958), Freda's Agi Murad il diavolo bianco (1959), Il figlio di Spartacus/Son of Spartacus (1963), and numerous Antonio Margheriti films, including La freccia d'oro/The Golden Arrow (1962), I giganti di Roma/The Giants of Rome (1964), Anthar l'invincibile/The Devil of the Desert vs. the Son of Hercules (1964), and La morte viene dal pianeta Aytin/Snow Devils (1964). Baldini's has not made a film since 1983.

QUEEN VASHTI (Daniela Rocca) feels her grip slipping on the newly enamored King.

Surprisingly, Gabriele Tinti—who plays the minor role of Samuel—had appeared in almost twenty features prior to Esther and the King. Born Gastone Tinti in 1932, he made his film debut in 1947 and is said to have played a small role in the Bava-photographed Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . (1951). His first important movie was Alessandro Blasetti's 1952 comedy, Altri tempi/Time Goes By. (Looking over the familiar cast list of this film—Aldo Fabrizi, Gina Lollobrigida, Andrea Checchi, Folco Lulli—one imagines that Bava himself could not have been very far from the set.) Young and handsome, Tinti kept well-employed during the pepla boom, appearing in Mario Caiano's Ulisse contro Ercole/Ulysses Against the Son of Hercules, David e Golia/David and Goliath, and Edgar G. Ulmer's L'Atlantide/Journey Beneath the Desert in 1961, and Sodom and Gomorrah in 1962. Tinti clearly ingratiated himself to director Robert Aldrich, for whom he worked again in Flight of the Phoenix (1965) and The Legend of Lylah Clare (1968). In the early 1960s, he married Brazilian starlet Norma Benguell (who starred in Bava's Terrore nello spazio [1965] as "Norma Bengell"), and he would work again with Bava himself in 1973, playing the chauffeur in Lisa and the Devil. He was also known to work under such aliases as Gus Stone and Peter Gabriel (!).

Daniela Rocca, who had played roles of increasing prominence in such Galatea films as La battaglia di Maratona and Caltiki il mostro immortale, turns the minor but pivotal role of Queen Vashti into a showcase. According to actress Harriet White Medin, Rocca was the mistress of producer Nello Santi and their relationship would last several years, eventually precipitating a divorce that led to the dissolution of Galatea in 1965. Medin recalled an amusing story about the filming of Queen Vashti's defiant veil dance, a striptease in which the excommunicated Queen strives to embarrass the King before his court.

"I'll never forget that day!" Medin laughed. "Raoul Walsh hired a professional dancer—an Austrian—to do the actual dancing, and he planned to film Daniela dancing only in close-up. Well, the day came to shoot the dance and Daniela suddenly got it into her head that she would do the dance herself. There was some debate about it, but she had some influence with the producer, shall we say, so she finally got her way. Daniela was built like a brick you-know-what, and when she started wiggling and running around . . . well! I've never seen so many people on a set become so fascinated by their shoes! Everybody was looking straight down at their feet, because Santi was on the set, and if anyone had laughed, heads would have rolled!"

Rocca was indulged but, in the final cut of the film, almost none of her ungainly flitting and swooning was preserved onscreen. Virtually the entire performance consists of the lithe and limber movements of the aforementioned Austrian dancer, whose face can plainly be seen in several shots. In fact, the sequence is so disregarding of any attempt to persuade the audience that Rocca was doing her own dancing that one can almost believe there was an element of reprimand involved. This was Rocca's last movie to be filmed by Mario Bava, but she followed this role with her greatest international success, as the mustached wife of Marcello Mastroianni in Pietro Germi's Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce Italian Style (1961). She made a few other good films after breaking off with Santi in 1963, including Damiano Damiani's Alberto Moravia adaptation La noia/The Empty Canvas (1963) and Fred Zinnemann's Behold a Pale Horse (1964), and she also published some books of fiction and poetry. All that has been recorded of her later years is that she was a patient in a mental institution at the time of her death, on May 28, 1995, in Milo, Sicily.

"Robert Buchanan," who gives an amusingly fey performance as the King's much put-upon eunuch, was a nom d'ecran for American-born expatriate actor Walter Williams. He would work with Mario Bava again in La ragazza che sapeva troppo/Evil Eye/The Girl Who Knew Too Much (1963, as "Robert Buchanan") and Diabolik/Danger: Diabolik (1968, unbilled). In 1966, he was billed under his real name for his supporting role as one of Ursula Andress' advisors in Elio Petri's La decima vittima/The 10th Victim, and for a small part that yielded two short scenes with Barbara Steele in "Bridge of Spies," an episode of the NBC-TV series I Spy. He dubbed his own performance in Esther and the King.

The role of Haman's equally predatory mistress Karesh was entrusted to Rosalba Neri, born June 19, 1939, in Furli, Emiglia Romana. Neri made her first screen appearance as a teenager in Guido Leoni's I pinguini ci guardino (1955) and played small roles—sometimes uncredited, as in Luigi Comencini's Moglie pericoloso (1958)—until reaching maturity, when her face achieved an uncanny, sultry, sphinx-like aspect. Cast in a minor role in Fernando Cerchio and Anton Giulio Majano's Il sepolcro dei re/Cleopatra's Daughter (1960), she was far more physically deserving of the lead role played by Debra Paget. After her memorable supporting role in Esther and the King, Neri would be hired to work with Bava once again in Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World (1961), but—although credited on some prints—she does not actually appear in the film itself. Neri's regal, feline looks would be well exploited throughout the peplum years of Italian film production, and she was able to balance B-movie assignments like Ercole contro Molock/The Conquest of Mycenae (1963) with the occasional important art house release like Pasquale Festa Campanile's Voci bianche/White Voices (1964). As the screen became more permissive in the late 1960s, Neri met its challenges head on, making a series of films with Spanish enfant terrible Jess Franco (beginning with 1967's Pop Art satire Lucky il intrepido/Lucky the Inscrutable) and agreeing to play a series of increasingly decadent characters, immoral or amoral, who felt no compunction about appearing completely nude; in 1971's La bestia uccide a sangue freddo/Slaughter Hotel, she revealed all in a startlingly graphic masturbation scene. For a brief period in the early 1970s, she adopted the screen name of Sara Bay, seducing her own brain transplant patient in Mel Welles' Lady Frankenstein (1971) and bathing in virgin blood in Luigi Batzella's Il plenilunio delle vergini/The Devil's Wedding Night (1973). Retired from films since the mid-1980s, Rosalba Neri is fondly remembered by many Euro cult fans as one of the most enticing women ever to grace the screen.

ESTHER is prepared for her first audience with King Ahasuerus by the court eunuch (Robert Buchanan), as Keresh (Rosalba Neri) looks on.

Production

According to its main titles, Esther and the King was filmed at Titanus Appia Studios, but the true production site in this case was Cinecittà. Harriet White Medin reflected fondly on a staple of studio life:

"They used to have these terrible box lunches—actually they were wonderful box lunches—at Cinecittà," she told me. "One day, Daniela was having lunch with me and she couldn't finish her bread. She hesitated for a long time, and finally, she blessed the bread. She made the Sign of the Cross on herself and then over the bread and then she threw it away! She looked over at me, somewhat embarrassed, and said, 'You know, in Sicily, we were so poor that it was considered a sin to throw bread away.' And I was very touched by that." These box lunches—called cestine, or cestina when singular—figure prominently in Federico Fellini's Intervista (1987), his moving tribute to the studio.

In an interview granted one year before his death, Bava looked back on the experience of working with Raoul Walsh on Esther and the King: "I always worked very quickly. Twelve days at the most it would take me to make a film. And with all the lines in my head. I always had the final assembly in mind, so that nothing was ever wasted, not so much as a meter of film. But the Americans—Walsh, for example—'covered' themselves, as they say. They didn't concern themselves with being creative, only with covering themselves. They would shoot the same scene twenty times, in case something went wrong. Once I said to Walsh, 'Maybe the camera should pan away to a brazier, so you can overdub the dialogue later and be sure of getting every word right.' He thought I was joking and laughed."[7]

Bava's opportunity to contribute more to the picture may have arisen from the script's unusual faithfulness to the Biblical texts that inspired it. The Old Testament account differs only in that Esther was an orphan adopted by Mordecai, and it was Mordecai (not Simon) who saved the King's life from Egyptian assassins, thus winning his favor as council to the court. Additionally, Queen Vashti was not an adulteress, nor did she shame the King with a torrid dance before the Court; instead, she lost her crown for speaking out of turn in court. She was banished, but never murdered on the orders of Prince Haman.

By examining closely the way the scenes are edited together, it appears that Walsh and his collaborator Michael Elkins originally intended to remain true to the Bible story, and to excuse Vashti from the narrative with her banishment. The scene where she spits on the floor and walks away from the King is as good an exit as any. When Gisko smothers Vashti with a pillow, it's one of those moments in the film where the guiding hand of Walsh cannot be felt at all. The aversion of the actress' face strongly suggests that the scene was a post-production insert, filmed without even the participation of Daniela Rocca.

The documentation of Bava's co-direction, combined with Mario Serandrei's editing credit and the shared credit for the film's musical score, suggests that, at some point after the film was completed by Walsh and scored by Angelo Francesco Lavagnino, Fox executives (or preview audiences) opined that the film was too long on talk and short on thrills. Consequently, Nello Santi may have been ordered to supply some reshoots, including a more violent demise for Queen Vashti. This material was shot at Cinecittà under the direction of Mario Bava, edited into the existing assembly by Mario Serandrei, and rescored with Lavagnino's tapes and additional music by Nicolosi.

MARIO BAVA demonstrates his knife-throwing prowess to a gathering of cast and crew members (including an amused Joan Collins), then impresses them with Poloroid's newly introduced miracle of instant photography.

The material Bava directed is fairly easy to pinpoint for anyone familiar with the music of Lavagnino, who was evidently not available or willing to rescore the extra footage. This material was then entrusted to Nicolosi, the composer of La maschera del demonio. Lavagnino's lyrical, heroic, uplifting score is an ideal accompaniment to the film, but during a number of brief scenes—Vashti's murder, Gisko peering through parted red velvet curtains for a glimpse of the golden cape, Haman sadistically whipping the brute for his mistaken killing of Keresh, and some individual shots of Simon entering the palace and fleeing the royal guards—the intrusion of Nicolosi's murkier, gloomier music jolts this Biblical epic into the alternative realm of Bavian horror. This scenario would also explain why Walsh might feel that Esther and the King—which he wrote, produced, and directed—was ultimately not his picture, and why he didn't include it with his other films in his autobiography.

If Nicolosi's ominous, baleful music can be taken as an indicator of where Bava's post-production tweaking was done, it begins as early as Simon's homecoming, when the returning hero is shocked by the sight of a Judean hanged from the roof of his house as Prince Haman's warning to other tax-payers. It's hard to tell what may have been added to this sequence, since the subsequent dialogue between Esther and Simon refers to the hanging—unless Walsh had elected to imply the horror rather than show it.

Some post-production sleight-of-hand is definitely discernible in the next instance of rescoring. After the King opts for the Queen's banishment, Prince Haman exits and is next seen entering a private corridor guarded by Gisko. He summons Gisko to his side and orders him to fetch the lady Keresh and bring her to his quarters, indicating that he has already forgotten Vashti and is now looking ahead to replacing her with someone more suitable for himself. The camera pivots away from them to Klidrates, who enters the corridor in good humor asking if he might sample some of the Prince's Syrian wine. Then the scene cuts back to Haman, who suddenly has a new priority: "There is another matter even more important," he tells Gisko. "It has to do with Queen Vashti." He whispers a short command into the brute's ear as the scene dissolves. If this matter truly was more important, wouldn't it have been his first command to Gisko—to ensure that the Queen was truly out of the way, before inviting a pretender to the palace? By examining the shot continuity closely, it becomes clear that this last bit was added later, requiring the entire sequence to be rescored by Nicolosi.

Vashti's death scene is obvious as a post-production insert because it was filmed using a double for Daniela Rocca, who was very much in demand that year, also starring in Giuseppe Vari's Le vendetta dei barbari/Revenge of the Barbarians and Vittorio Sala's La regina delle amazzoni/Love Slaves of the Amazons. Indeed, Bava may have decided to have the Queen smothered with a pillow because it was the only way to keep the face of Rocca's stand-in hidden throughout the entire shot! The result is a glaring anomaly in the Bava catalogue: the violent death of a beautiful woman that does not pay reverence to the face of the victim.

Nicolosi's music can also be heard, coincidentally, in the two scenes pertaining to Prince Haman's scheme to frame Lord Mordecai with forged documents pertaining to the King's plans for war against Greece. The first is the conversation between Haman and Klidrates following the aforementioned scene with Gisko, wherein Haman explains his plans while forging the documents, and the second finds Klidrates leading a group of soldiers into the Jewish Temple and pretending to discover the inscribed tablets in a secret repository. Indeed, there seems to be no reason for this subplot at all, other than to lend additional intrigue and bring the film up to a respectable length, because after usurping the throne in the absence of Ahasuerus, Haman really needs no excuse to authorize Lord Mordecai's execution. Why stage the incrimination of Mordecai in front of a gathering of Jews who have already been sentenced to death?

The shots of Simon using his Sword of the Golden Rooster to gain access to the palace are also curiously scored with this horror music, perhaps to lend suspense to the procedure. Again, these would have qualified as second-unit material even had they been shot during production, and it's hard to imagine Walsh wasting his time on them under the best conditions.

The movie is unusually short on matte paintings and other visual effects, considering Bava's involvement. The upper levels of the King's palace are clearly a glass matte extension, and it also appears that the environs of the City of the Dead may have been partially matted—not to add, but to eliminate location details from view. The most impressive special effect in the picture is the severed head of Klidrates, an uncannily realistic prop which may have been sculpted by an uncredited Eugenio Bava.

According to the film's pressbook, the American release of Esther and the King was expected to coincide with the release of an original soundtrack album, but the recording was never released—not even in Italy. Nevertheless, Harriet Medin recalled that 20th Century-Fox spared no expense in promoting the film, flying Daniela Rocca and herself from Rome to the United States to participate in a publicity tour. "We came to New York . . . and went up to Boston for some reason," Medin recollected. "I had a brother, Franny, living at that time who was a paraplegic, and he was in a hospital for incurables at Idlewild. Of course, I went to visit him and Daniela wanted to come with me. I wasn't sure if I wanted her to do that, but she seemed to want to. So we swept into this hospital, one of those terrible places where people are too old or too weak to hold their heads up, run by the Order of St. John of God. I must say, Daniela caused quite a stir—this Italian movie actress wafting through the place, looking every inch like an Italian movie actress. It was quite a day! I still don't know if, by going there, she was being very kind or curious or what, but I'll never forget the look of happiness and excitement that her presence brought to my poor brother's face."

Commentary

20th Century-Fox was the birthplace of the widescreen religious epic, beginning with Henry Koster's The Robe (1953), the first film lensed in CinemaScope. In 1960, the genre had reached its zenith, William Wyler's remake of Ben-Hur (1959) having just swept the Oscars. Esther and the King has all the trappings of a religious epic, but it is not a Christian epic, so it offers none of the miracles and overt special effects that made the most famous of these films so popular. Instead, it's a love story with subplots of religious persecution and political intrigue, which never really explores the conflicting ideals of the Persians and Jews, eschewing the spiritual in favor of the humanistic.

The Judaism at the heart of its conflict—the source of Esther's, Mordecai's, and Simon's basic decency—is condensed into symbols, as when Bava's camera tilts up from a scene to a decorative Star of David, or when Mordecai presents Simon and Esther with the wedding gift of a mezuzzah. The point of Judaism, as far as this story is concerned, is to find happiness in one's work, one's brethren and one's God, and to contrast this happiness with the emptiness of the life and spirit of the King, "the most powerful man in the world."

BEHIND the scenes shot of Joan Collins and Rik Battaglia relaxing with dialogue coach, actress Harriet White Medin.

7 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

Ahasuerus rules Persia with the codes of his forefathers, laws written and enacted (as Lord Mordecai says) in "an age of hatred." Essentially a good man, Ahasuerus feels himself burdened by these laws; when he is reminded by Haman that he must replace his banished Queen with another, he broods about "The dead hand of Destiny trying to thrust on me some unknown female." The emptiness of the Persian laws is emphasized by the King's ability to overrule them at will, further indicating that his problems are ultimately rooted in the emptiness of his own heart. As Mordecai expresses to Esther and Simon, "Something has changed him—a disillusionment, a despair . . . In all honesty, I think he would envy you." Though not particularly well conveyed by Egan's robust performance, the King is afflicted with the same noia, or ennui, that beset Princess Katia in La maschera del demonio and rendered her vulnerable to the manipulation of evil forces.

The Persian god is depicted in the form of a horned, half-human/half-animal idol allied to the casting of lots known as "Pur." Before he is shown deciding when to murder his King with a toss of these tiles, Haman boasts to Esther that "Mine is a life of hazard," two references that tie the Persian god to the restless, volatile energies of chaos, hazard, and chance. Other associations are evoked during the scene in which Haman bids Gisko to remember the girl in the golden cape; the wooden screen concealing them from view is composed of interlocking swastikas, an image ironically complemented later in the film in the Jews' Temple, as the men receive swords through a wooden screen in the configuration of interlocking Stars of David.

One of the film's most interesting characteristics, textually as well as visually, is this pervasive sense of irony. The movie's bookending images of Persian troops returning home after battle—the first carrying the spoils of victory, the second carrying the wounded on makeshift stretchers—is only one instance, of several, in which one scene is used to comment ironically on another. Similarly, when Esther is abducted from her wedding to Simon, the castaway groom is thrown by the raiding soldiers to the ground, where he falls in the same position as did Vashti, when Ahasuerus disregarded her; the complementary body language not only equates the two characters in relationship to the marriage of Esther and the King, but underlines the raid itself as a gesture of the King. Gisko's accidental killing of Keresh is yet another example, as is the eventual decapitation of Klidrates, which occurs in the City of the Dead not far from its centrally erected statue of an ancient soldier—whose fallen head lies upturned on the ground beside it. But the ultimate, and subtlest, of the film's ironies is the fact that Prince Haman's scheme is ultimately successful, despite King Ahasuerus and despite himself, and that the film manages to find its climactic happiness in a moment of humility and defeat.

During the musical and choreographed dance sequences that were de rigueur in Italian spectacles of the period—composed and lighted with painterly ingenuity by Bava, in ways that prophesy his handling of the Sibyl scenes in Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World—the irony surfaces in the dialogue as well. King Ahasuerus surprises the viewer by leaning toward Haman and asking about the singer, "Who is the one that wails like a she-wolf baying at the moon?" When the song segues into kaleidoscopic, belly-jutting choreography, he ups the ante by demanding, "What court idiot decided to bore me with this sorry spectacle?" It's no wonder, under the circumstances, that no one accepts credit for the choreography, but this sequence is notable in that Esther and the King is the only Italian peplum to regard this now-obligatory display with open contempt. (Those who have read this book from the beginning may recall the young Mario's reaction to being entertained by dancing girls at a supper club where his family was dining: "When those idiots go away, call me!")

Because Bava's cinematography is so lush and beautiful, it's tempting to look no deeper than its surface, but Esther and the King reveals the depth of his appreciation of the psychological and ironical values of color and composition.

During the sequence of Simon's homecoming, his conversation with Esther (including his defense of the King) is filmed from a number of different angles, each of which features a different background image of Jewish people engaged in honest toil. This is then ironically contrasted with palace life, when the scene segues to Queen Vashti refreshing her appearance after a tryst with Haman. Similarly, after Ahasuerus calls Vashti an "adulteress," the irony is purely visual when he storms out of her royal bedchamber and plops down amid his concubines to sulk. Bava's eye for the female form is not only appreciative, but idealized, and when his camera attends to the abducted virgins being bathed and dressed for the King's choosing, the images convey the same voyeuristic frisson as the dressing room scenes in Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace. It is also worth noting, along these lines, that Bava was perhaps the first cameraman to use the widescreen dimensions of CinemaScope to pay homage to that other great panorama of the 1950s, the Playboy centerfold. Some of the film's most striking images are of Daniela Rocca, Rosalba Neri and other actresses captured from head to toe (or in one memorable composition, from thigh to toe) in delectable horizontal displays of sexual invitation.

FRENCH VHS cover adapted from the original French affiche, art by Georges Allard.

The cinematography also showcases Bava's ability to combine actors, art direction, and color lighting in ways that reveal the psychology of character. During their secret war meeting, Ahasuerus, Lord Mordecai, and Haman are each presented in medium shots with tellingly different backgrounds: Ahasuerus is seated before a wall adorned with carved lions, bathed in gold and amber light evocative of wealth, warmth, and power; Mordecai is framed by two marble columns and the flame of a hanging lamp, suggestive of his support and wisdom; and Haman, whose false allegiance to the King has yet to be revealed, is flanked on either side by a violet curtain and a projection of green light falling on an ornamental horned idol, a literal illustration of his covert envy of all the King possesses. When Haman challenges Mordecai by daring to brandish his sword, Bava cuts to an alternate set-up from which only the green background and a madly flashing, contrapuntal vat of flame are visible. Similarly, when Esther meets Mordecai in the palace for the first time, and he attempts to persuade her that it might be best for their people were she to pursue the King's favor, Bava lights the wall behind their dialogue with a clash of red and green. Backgrounds are also imaginatively employed at the moment Ahasuerus first recognizes Esther: over his shoulder, bathed in amber light, is a large, ornamental molding of a female monarch—a eureka of the Queen of Persia.

ITALIAN fotobusta featuring a conference between Haman, Mordecai (Denis O'Dea), and Ahasuerus. Note Bava's prominently displayed credit as director.

Yet another instance of chromatic storytelling can be found in the scene where Ahasuerus expresses his love to Esther and asks if she has any affection for him. At this moment, Bava positions Richard Egan in a way that he appears to be emerging from the shadows into a field of intense red lighting—redolent of lust and candor—that limns his features; meanwhile, sitting beside him on the same couch, Joan Collins is not only dressed in white, but bathed in white light, making her look all the more virtuous, isolated, and unsure. A few moments later, after rejecting Simon's attempt to escape with her, Esther meets Ahasuerus again on the balcony of the throne room, and even in the moments before their first kiss, he and she are both ablush in red light. The only time the evil Haman comes into contact with red light is when he is whipping his hapless henchman, Gisko, within an inch of his life.

Although Esther and the King is a sumptuously visual experience, it is also a verbose film, overburdened with faux "historical" dialogue. The intimate scene between Ahasuerus and Esther, in which he brings her the gift of a lion cub, exemplifies the best and worst of this. The King is charming as he recounts his shortcomings: "I fear I could never imitate a lover. My hand was fashioned for a sword, and not the strings of a lyre. And these feet were not made to prance to music—they're uncommonly large, don't you think?" But he leans a bit too risibly toward double entendre when he responds to Esther's timid allowance of romantic interest with, "So I have gained the outer ramparts . . . yet you guard the inner citadel with more tenacity than the Greeks!" In a film this picturesque, the dialogue needn't be. In fact, the dialogue is so overwritten that it sometimes obscures the utterance of important plot details, which become clear only after repeated viewings.

The film's other great weakness may point to a more literal division of the directorial duties than English prints admit. There is an unmistakable schism between the major scenes involving the English-speaking actors—the ones that Walsh would have certainly commandeered—and those involving the Italian actors. The film's major stars (in all fairness, Joan Collins excepted) give hollow, stoic, over-rehearsed performances, while the Italian actors sparkle with freshness and spontaneity. They appear to have been directed.

But by whom? Bava may have obliquely answered that question in the brief memoir he contributed to the book La città del cinema. He did not exclude Raoul Walsh from his comments when he wrote, "I have worked with some American directors, and I never saw one of them stand up and tell an actor how a scene should be played. They just sit and shout, 'Action!' In Italy, however, the director does everything."

CAMERON MITCHELL, the definitive hero of Bava's adventure films, hoists his sword high in Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ULTIMO DEI VICHINGHI—a film partly directed by Mario Bava.

GIANTS, VIKINGS, AND THIEVES

I giganti della Tessaglia (Gli argonauti)
L'ultimo dei vichinghi
Il ladro di Bagdad

LA MASCHERA del demonio would not begin to make money and attract serious attention until its subsequent releases in France and the United States in 1961. Mario Bava took the initial non-returns of his directorial debut philosophically and was quite satisfied to continue working as before, accepting whatever offers that came his way. His next three jobs were uncredited.

I giganti della Tessaglia (Gli argonauti)

After working with Raoul Walsh, it must have felt like a homecoming for Bava when he was asked by Riccardo Freda to provide some special effects shots for his next film, I giganti della Tessaglia (Gli argonauti)/The Giants of Thessaly,[1] a film that anticipated the Ray Harryhausen adventure Jason and the Argonauts (1963) in much the same way Freda's Spartaco had preceded Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus (1960).

Freda's behavior on film sets could be erratic and quite volatile. It is said that Freda lost interest in directing films as he gained interest in horse racing, and that the films he did direct—after a point—were undertaken in the gambling spirit.

"[Freda] was a huge fan of race horses, owned some horses himself, and was also a gentleman rider," confirms Marcello Avallone, who served as his assistant director on L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962). "I often went to the race track, and sometimes enjoyed running the horses, and he appreciated the way I trained them. He had a horse named Zignago, so one day he told me, 'If you will train Zignago every morning, I will make you my assistant director.'"

In fact, Hichcock was undertaken by Freda as another bet with producers Ermanno Donati and Luigi Carpentieri, à la I vampiri. "Freda said, 'I bet I can shoot a film in ten days,' and they bet him a race horse that he couldn't," recalls the film's star, Barbara Steele. "He wanted that horse very badly and we all felt obliged to help him. We were running at top speed through the entire movie."

Freda never really cared for the horror genre; he invested much more of his heart in historical costume pictures, and I giganti della Tessaglia was something of a return to this kind of production, and also Freda's initial effort in the peplum genre. It was a coproduction of Alexandra Produzioni Cinematografiche (Rome) and Societé Cinématographique Lyre (Paris), shot partially at Cinecittà and at the Istituto LUCE. Freda had not directed an entire feature since Agi Murad il diavolo bianco in 1958.

While Jason (Roland Carey), the King of Jolcus, sails in search of the fabled Golden Fleece aboard the ship Argos, his abandoned kingdom is seized by the evil usurper Adrasto (Alberto Farnese), who wants Jason's wife Creusa (Ziva Rodann) for his own. After surviving a terrible storm at sea, the Argonauts are greeted from an island shore by women who swim out to meet them. Jason is greeted by the island's queen, Gaia (Nadine Duca), who is actually an evil, withered crone bent on transforming the entire male crew into sheep. They eventually escape her clutches, but encounter yet another terror at their next port—a kingdom plagued by a hideous, one-eyed ape creature. Jason swears to slay the monster, and one of the young Argonauts—Eurystheus (Luciano Marin)—falls in love with the King's daughter, Atalanta (Cathia Caro). After Jason and his men slay the cyclops, they set sail, and one of the men, Telemachus (Pietro Tordi), discovers Atalanta has stowed away. He is stopped from taking sexual advantage of his discovery by Eurystheus, but all three are placed on trial. Telemachus is to be whipped, while the two lovers are to be set adrift together on a raft with two weeks of provisions. The couple survive and find their way back to Jolcus, where Eurystheus overhears the news of Adrasto's forthcoming marriage to Creusa, who has agreed only in order to protect the life of her only son. Eurystheus swims out to the Argos to inform Jason, and the Argonauts organize a surprise attack during the wedding ceremony.

Watching I giganti della Tessaglia, the viewer gets the immediate impression that an entire first reel is missing, and that a desperate attempt to disguise this unevenness was made with narration. It is an entertaining picture, nevertheless, but more of a succession of rousing scenes than a satisfying whole.

The cinematography is credited to two cameramen—Vaclav Vich (La corona di ferro/The Iron Crown) and Raffaele Masciocchi (who had photographed La Venere dei pirati/Queen of the Pirates, starring Gianna Maria Canale)—which may account for some of the film's imbalance. Another explanation is found in a footnote relevant to this title, which appears in the Freda filmography in the 17th issue of the French magazine Présence du Cinema: "Certain insert scenes were filmed by the assistants, at the producers' request, following Freda's departure." Thus, it is yet another instance of Freda starting a picture and walking away before it was finished.

When I first saw I giganti della Tessaglia in 1984, I thought I recognized the hand of Mario Bava in a number of special effects scenes. Since we were in touch at the time, I decided to telephone Riccardo Freda directly for confirmation. He was a little vague at first, but then he asked me for the Italian title, and to describe the scenes in question. "You have a good eye," Freda told me, laughing. His memory refreshed, he confirmed

I giganti della Tessaglia (Gli argonauti)

"The Giants of Thessaly (The Argonauts)"
Filmed at Cinecittà and Istituto LUCE
August – September 1960
First released: December 6, 1960
Eastmancolor, SuperTotalScope, 2.35:1, 95 minutes

Production: Alexandra Produzioni Cinematografiche (Rome), Societé Cinématographique Lyre (Paris). Distributor: Filmar.

Belgium: De Reus van Thessalie
France: Le Géant de Thessalie, 1961
Germany: Das Schwert des Roten Giganten, "The Sword of the Red Giant," 3/6/64, 86m
UK: The Giants of Thessaly, 1963
US: The Giants of Thessaly, Medallion Pictures, 1962, 86m

L'ultimo dei vichinghi

"The Last of the Vikings"
Filmed at Titanus Studios and on location
August – October 1960
First released: February 8, 1961
Eastmancolor, Totalscope, 2.35:1, 105 minutes

Production: Tiberius Film. Distributor: Galatea.

Belgium: Die Laatste der Vikings
Denmark: 4/29/63
Finland: 4/27/62
France: Le Dernière des Vikings, 9/15/61
Germany: Der Letzte der Wikinger, 10/13/61, 104m
Spain: El Ultimo Vikingo, 8/7/61
UK: Last of the Vikings, Mondial Films Ltd., 4/62, 100m, Certificate "A," passed with cuts
US: Last of the Vikings, American International Pictures, Eastmancolor/Dyaliscope, 5/62, 102m

Il ladro di Bagdad

"The Thief of Baghdad"

Filmed at Titanus Studios and on location in Kairouan, Tunisia
October – December 1960
First released: March 23, 1961
Eastmancolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 100 minutes

Production: Titanus (Rome), Lux de France (Paris). Distributor: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in all territories unless otherwise noted.

Argentina: El Ladron de Bagdad, CinemaScope, 1961
France: Le Voleur de Bagdad, Lux Cinématographique, 8/9/61, 95m
Germany: Der Gauner von Bagdad, 3/1/62, 88m
Iceland: Pjofurinn frá Bagdao
Spain: El Ladrón de Bagdad, 8/30/62
UK: The Thief of Baghdad, 12/62, 89m 58s, Certificate "U," passed with no cuts
US: The Thief of Baghdad, 8/10/61, 90m

BELGIAN affiche.

that Bava did indeed provide a few uncredited effects shots to the picture. These included:

• The shots of the ship Argos being tossed about on a stormy sea, or engulfed by fog (miniatures shot in water tanks).

• The long-shots of the Colossus, whose open hand holds the Golden Fleece, flanked on either side by four columns topped with flaming braziers (a matte painting including photographic elements, with the braziers and pathway filmed live on set, allowing the actor to approach the towering statue).

• An impressive shot of the Argos sailing into a city's harbor (a miniature ship positioned before an optically inserted background and behind a foregrounded photographic cut-out on glass), and so on.

The film's opening panoramic shot includes a backgrounded, smoking volcano that may also be Bava's handiwork, as it resembles the same working miniature that is glimpsed briefly through a fissure in the wall of Omphale's cave in Ercole e la regina di Lidia.

One of the movie's highlights is a fabulous encounter with a giant, cyclopean gorilla designed by Carlo Rambaldi, whose work up to this time had always been filmed under the supervision of Eugenio Bava. In fact, since the film's credits list the Istituto LUCE as one of its production headquarters, it is likely that Eugenio was placed in charge of these sequences and procured the services of Rambaldi and also Mario, who wasn't working on a project of his own at the time. Mario's participation is indicated by the bold red and green lighting scheme within the monster's cave, as his revolutionary ideas about saturated color lighting were not yet embraced by his peers. "When I started using red and green gels, everybody told me I was crazy," he complained to interviewer Dante Matelli in 1979. "Nowadays, when Fellini uses them, they're all speechless with joy!"[2]

Of all the film's special effects scenes, none is more clearly indicative of Mario Bava's creative presence than the scenes involving the witch Gaia, which suggest how similar transformation scenes in I vampiri and La maschera del demonio might have been handled technically, had Bava photographed them in color. For the first scene, actress Nadine Duca was positioned to the right of a sheet of glass and lit so that her own reflection shone brightly on the glass. Then, on cue, her lights were dimmed as the lights were raised on the other side of the pane, where an extremely aged double was seated and matched perfectly to Duca's reflection, as seen through the camera. The old woman (uncredited) beseeches Apollo for a short extension of her youth, drinks from a small phial, and the lighting schemes are reversed, restoring Duca's reflection. The magic of the transformation is further complemented with a subtle, red overprinting (or double exposure) of ordinary cigarette smoke bending in the air, but printed backwards to accentuate its unnatural quality. There is also a second transformation in the picture, but it simply cuts away from Duca to a close shot of Jason, then cuts back to the elderly double, with the strange smoke configurations replayed over her face and gestures as she curses him. Because age is suggested here by the real thing, and bolstered by Carlo Rustichelli's chilly score, the sequence is actually more effective here than in its earlier, more celebrated, black-and-white stagings.

At the time I spoke to Freda, my eyes were peeled only for special effects scenes; I inquired no further, because the picture had a credited director. In hindsight, and especially in light of the aforementioned Présence du Cinema footnote, I wish I had also taken notice of some scenes that suggest Bava's possible involvement as a replacement director or cinematographer, and asked for Freda's confirmation of these, as well—but, of course, he might not have known what happened after his departure. One aspect that particularly caught my notice is the introductory scene aboard the Argos—as Jason (Roland Carey) and his crew fight against a terrible storm—which appears to have been photographed on the same minimal ship set later used in Vittorio Cottafavi's Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide/Hercules and the Captive Women and Bava's Gli invasori (both 1961), a largely suggestive set which Bava later took credit for designing. Also, the staging of two later scenes aboard the Argos are redolent with Bavian atmosphere: the trial of Eurystheus (Luciano Marin) and Telemachus (Pietro Tordi), with both men tied together to the ship's mast and with an eerie green light on the face of the former (anticipating the scene of a vestal virgin bound together with her lover in barbed wire in Gli invasori), and Eurystheus' reunion with Jason after swimming out to the ship to inform him of Adrasto's plan to marry his abandoned wife Creusa and seize his kingdom, which qualifies as a Bavian scene because the entire background is suggested by nothing more than fog.

1 I giganti della Tessaglia is unique among films of its kind in having an onscreen alternate title in parentheses "(Gli argonauti)"—but it is not known to have played anywhere in the world under this title.

2 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

ITALIAN fotobusta featuring Carlo Rambaldi's one-eyed gorilla creature and typical Bavian scenery.

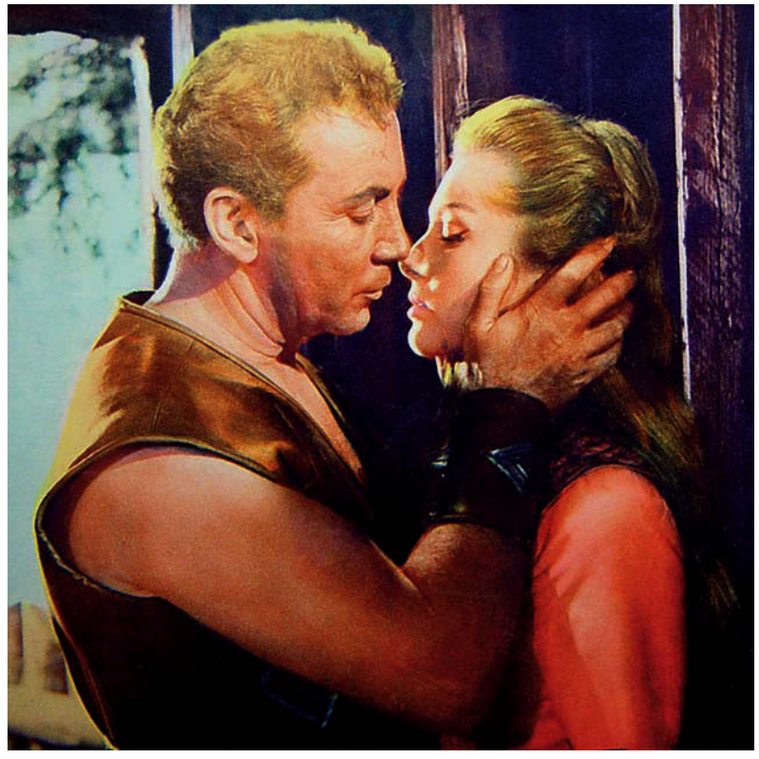
All that is known for certain is that one of Freda's assistants directed some additional scenes following his departure, and that one of his assistants on this production was in fact Mario Bava.



L'ultimo dei vichinghi

As the pepla prospered in Italy, expanding from the epicentral Steve Reeves to encompass a whole generation of bodybuilders ready and willing to fill his sandals, a new kind of costume picture arrived in Roman theaters to inspire a new wave of imitations: Richard Fleischer's The Vikings, starring Kirk Douglas and Tony Curtis.

Based on the novel The Viking by Edison Marshall, The Vikings was a $2.5 million dollar production filmed on location in Norway. It became one of the biggest boxoffice smashes of 1958, and when it finally reached Italy in 1960 as Gli vichinghi, it became one of the highest-grossing Italian pictures of that year. In accordance with Italian tradition, a host of imitations were rushed into harbor. The first of these—produced by Tiberius (Rome) and Criterion (Paris)—bore the ironic title of L'ultimo dei vichinghi/Last of the Vikings.

The film's director was Giacomo Gentilomo, who was born in Trieste on April 5, 1909. Like Mario Bava, Gentilomo turned to films after putting aside his dream of becoming a painter. He entered the film business in 1934, working as an assistant director, editor, screenwriter, and documentarian. Rising to the rank of director in 1939 with Il carnevale di Venezia (co-directed with Renato Simoni), Gentilomo's career included operettas, commedia del'arte, historical dramas, and such major films as I fratelli Karamazoff/The Brothers Karamazov (1947), Enrico Caruso (1951), and Sigfrido (1957), which marked the screen debut of special effects maestro Carlo Rambaldi, who devised a magnificent, life-sized mechanical dragon under the technical supervision of Gentilomo's old friend, Eugenio Bava. After Sigfrido, Gentilomo took a three-year break, returning to the director's chair with L'ultimo dei vichinghi. The film was produced by Galatea, which explains how Mario Bava came to be involved.

Cast in the lead role was American actor Cameron Mitchell, who was destined to become one of Bava's favorite colleagues. Born Cameron McDowell Mitzel on November 18, 1918, in Dallastown, Pennsylvania, he was the son of a minister who pursued a career in the theater, though it meant incurring his father's displeasure. Mitchell reached the Broadway stage by the time he was 21, but his fledgling career was interrupted by World War II, in which he served as an Air Force bombardier. His theatrical and wartime experience helped him to land a choice supporting role in John Ford's They Were Expendable (1945), his screen debut. He continued to act almost exclusively in war-themed dramas (always in supporting roles) until he scored his first major Broadway success, playing Happy Loman in the original cast production of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, directed by Elia Kazan. He reprised the role in Laslo Benedek's 1951 film version, worked again for Kazan in Man on a Tightrope (1953), and graduated to secondary roles in films of greater prestige. He supplied the voice of Christ in The Robe (1953) and played the second male lead in How to Marry a Millionaire (also '53), during which he introduced co-star Marilyn Monroe to Arthur Miller—a fact he was particularly fond of mentioning in interviews. Mitchell scored his first starring role as a heroin-addicted prize fighter in Andre de Toth's Monkey On My Back (1957), a success which helped him to land his own television series, The Beachcomber.

CAMERON MITCHELL as Viking king Harald, who falls for Danish princess Isabelle Corey in L'ULTIMO DEI VICHINGHI.

GIORGIO ARDISSON (left) and Cameron Mitchell are featured in an unmistakably Bavian moment from L'ULTIMO DEI VICHINGHI.

When the cancellation of The Beachcomber coincided with a failed marriage, Mitchell's personal life was further complicated by alimony payments and an escalating debt to the Internal Revenue Service. To escape these problems, he fled to Europe. He first went to Sweden, where he starred in Mannen utan Ansikte/Face of Fire (1959)—a moody adaptation of Stephen Crane's story "The Monster," directed by Albert Band (the pseudonym of French-born director Alfredo Antonini)—and had discussions with Ingmar Bergman to play the lead in a proposed film of Hermann Hesse's novel Siddhartha. When this project fell through, Mitchell moved on to Great Britain, where he busied himself with two films, followed by a film (Raubfischer im Hellas/As The Sea Rages) in West Germany. When Italy called, he went where the money was.

American actor–director Mel Welles, who worked with Mitchell later in the decade, remembers the actor's predicament: "He was having problems with the IRS. That's why he was in Europe, because they wouldn't let him keep any money. Everything he earned, they would grab. Working in Italy, he wasn't earning much, but he was treated like a star and the money that he did earn could go into a Swiss account. Eventually, he got enough money stashed away that he was able to start settling up with the IRS. He paid them a certain amount up front, and agreed to pay them something like ten cents on every future dollar earned, or something like that, and lived happily ever after."

Mitchell may have been, or felt, forced into working in Europe, but his period of European exile (1961–67) found him approaching each new role with utter conviction, creating an impressive gallery of historic knaves and nobles (including thoughtful interpretations of Cesaré Borgia and Julius Caesar), as well as an intriguing array of contemporary villains. His dramatis personæ ran the gamut from brash and boorish to aloof and mysterious, a diversity of roles that may well have eluded him had he remained in America, and which enabled him—unlike some of his colleagues—to maintain his leading man status well into his 50s.

Scripted by Luigi Mondello and Luigi Zurli, L'ultimo dei vichinghi was the story of Harald (Mitchell), heir to the throne of Viken, who returns home with younger brother Gunther (Giorgio Ardisson) after a three-year voyage to find his people obliterated, conquered by King Sveno of Norway (Edmond Purdom). Assisted by Gunther, Harald poses as a friendly Prince to infiltrate Sveno's castle and lay the groundwork for bloody revenge, but finds his plot complicated when he falls in love with a Danish princess (Isabelle Corey).

AN EXCRUCIATING moment as Harald pries Gunther (Giorgio Ardisson) from the beams upon which he's been crucified.

BELGIAN affiche.

L'ultimo dei vichinghi is about 15 minutes longer than most Italian films of its type, and it contains about 15 minutes of footage that exhibit the unmistakable brushstrokes of Mario Bava. Cameron Mitchell confirmed for me that Bava was present on the set.

"My first film with Mario was Last of the Vikings," he revealed. "It was a big boxoffice smash over there. Gentilomo hadn't made a picture in a long time, and we were lucky on that one. Roberto Capitani and Luigi Mondello—a couple of pirates—made it and I worked for twenty-two weeks without getting paid!"

Mitchell's account is likely exaggerated, but such exaggeration could only be invited by a troubled production that ran wildly over-schedule. These problems would explain why Bava was brought in, and also why Gentilomo was assigned a co-director for his next picture, Maciste contro il vampiro/Goliath and the Vampires. It cannot definitively be said whether Bava was summoned to take over from Gentilomo, to direct inserts or reshoots after Gentilomo had finished to "punch up" the picture, or to take over for cameraman Enzo Serafin, who may have had to leave to meet another obligation. (The film credits Serafin only as "direttore di luci"—lighting director—not as the film's cameraman; in fact, the titles credit no cameraman, nor any members of the camera team.) Whatever the case, it is certain that Bava worked on the picture, and in several scenes, his touch is unmistakable.

In the homecoming sequence, Harald finds his father's home pillaged, a dismantled ruin livid with cobwebs, a squawking crow, rolling mist, and a stone-carved ledger of dead kings; a signature-like profusion of Bavian props. Other such scenes in L'ultimo dei vichinghi are frankly sadistic, including one insert—it literally interrupts the scene of a Viking celebration—in which a Norwegian prisoner (Fausto Tozzi) is cruelly interrogated by having a blazing torch pressed against his face. In the film's only POV shot, the torch is thrust directly at the camera, echoing a shot from Riccardo Freda's Spartaco and foreshadowing one of the unforgettable moments of Bava's 1964 film Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace. Unlike the latter film—where a similar sequence of a model's smoking, disfigured face being lifted from a red-hot stove was censored in nearly all world markets—the effect appears here completely intact.

"As I understand it, Bava masterminded a scene in Ben-Hur where a torch was stuck in somebody's face," Mitchell told me. "He could take a mold off of your face and give your face to me with nothing more than latex and sculpture." Mitchell evidently observed this process with some amazement, as Bava prepared a flame-resistant mask for the stunt actor in this sequence, and regaled him with the story of its earlier uses in the cinema. However, Mitchell's story doesn't necessarily prove that Bava worked on Ben-Hur. Bava might have mentioned to Mitchell that he had performed this task for "Spartaco" (meaning the Riccardo Freda film, which also includes a shot of a gladiator receiving a blazing torch in his face), which Mitchell could have confused in later years with Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus or, after additional decades, William Wyler's Ben-Hur. But you never know with Bava . . . Ben-Hur was filmed in Italy, and it does include a shot—during Charlton Heston's escape from the slave galley—of a blazing torch being thrust into a guard's face . . . I wish I could confirm that Bava worked on a William Wyler picture, but since Bava certainly had engineered such an effect for Spartaco, it would be careless to accept this story on faith.

Another distinctively Bavian highlight of L'ultimo dei vichinghi is an excruciating scene in which Harald uses the handle of his sword to pry a gruesomely crucified Gunther free of the nails that bind him. This is followed by a scene of Harald carrying the dead body of Gunther into Sveno's court; the camera follows Gunther's lifeless arm down to his hand, a hole of light visible through its penetrated palm. Other gratuitous sequences appear: a group of bathing women whose frolicking under a waterfall is interrupted by a raid of Norwegians, who fire arrows into their eyes and necks and hurl spears into their backs, before the scene concludes with a shot of a woman's blood being carried downstream (recalling the death of Boris in La maschera del demonio); shots of men's and bears' heads being split with axes; and so forth.

During the filming, Mitchell and Bava took an instant liking to one another. "I never met a man I liked more personally than Bava," Mitchell effused. "I was impressed with him because of his humanity. My Italian was terrible, but I tried; his English was terrible, and I taught him all the bad words. 'Sonnabeech' was his favorite expression. 'Good morning, you sonnabeech,' he'd say. 'You sonbeech,' I'd say—all day it was like that! With Mario and I, there was something beyond speech or words. He was very sympathetic to me, and I think he liked me, because I did a number of films with Mario."

ITALIAN due-foglia.

Il ladro di Bagdad

In the early winter of 1960, Bava's need to stay busy prompted him to join a film crew in Kairuoan, Tunisia—a city on the edge of the Sahara Desert—where he would ultimately spend the better part of four months working on two different movies jointly produced by Titanus (Rome), Lux (France), and American producer Joseph E. Levine.

The first of these was the latest and biggest of the Steve Reeves extravaganzas, Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad—coincidentally, a remake of a 1924 silent classic directed by Bava's co-director on Esther and the King, Raoul Walsh. For this film, Bava was not officially credited though he was responsible for the lion's share of special effects in the picture. In gratitude, his involvement was more formalized for the second film, Le meraviglie di Aladino/The Wonders of Aladdin, whose credits in European prints acknowledge him as the director or co-director.

Preproduction on Il ladro di Bagdad got underway in October 1961. Once again, Steve Reeves made it known that he preferred to work with an English-speaking director, so Arthur Lubin was flown to Tunisia to co-direct with line producer Bruno Vailati. Born in Los Angeles on July 25, 1899, Lubin had started out as an actor in silent films and became a director in 1934, cranking out his first picture—A Successful Failure—in only five days. Among his best-known works in the horror-fantasy field are Black Friday (1940) with Boris Karloff and Bela Lugosi, the 1943 version of Phantom of the Opera with Claude Rains and Nelson Eddy, and The Spider Woman Strikes Back (1946) with Gale Sondergaard.

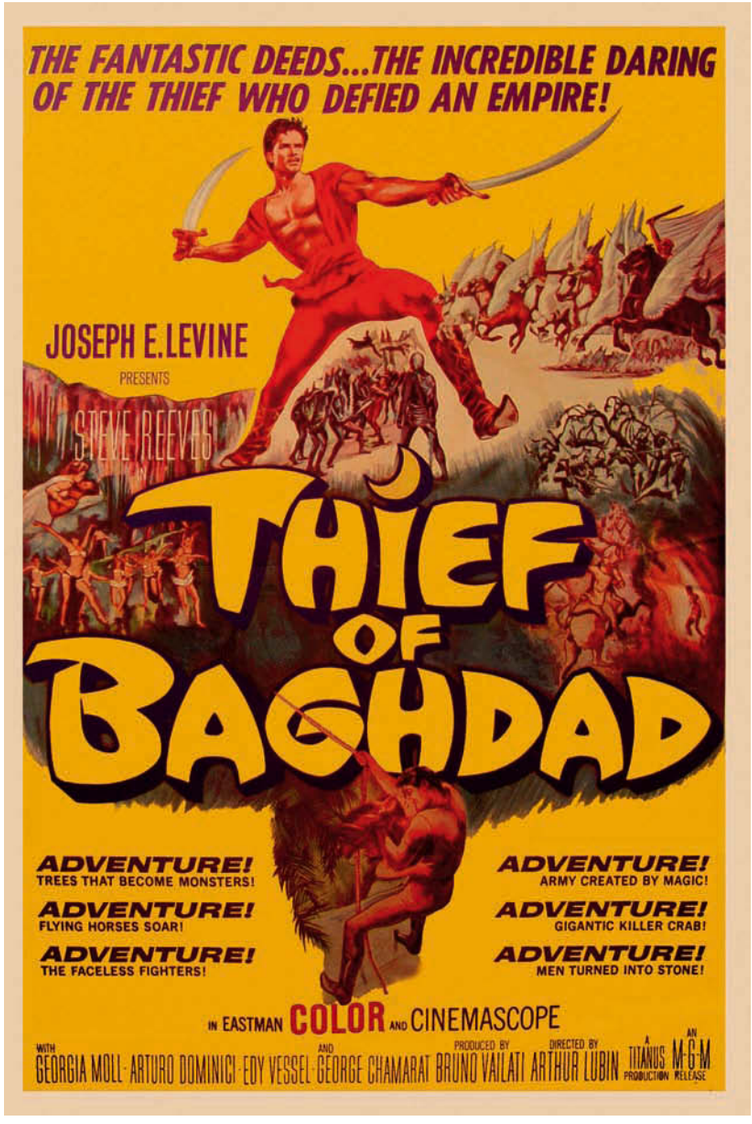
At the time, Lubin was best-known for directing the "Francis the Talking Mule" series with Donald O'Connor, and series television like Maverick and Bonanza, but what really got him the job was his past experience at Hollywood costume drama (e.g., Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves, 1944, starring Jon Hall and Maria Montez), and the fact that he was experienced at filming in Italy (1953's Stella dell'India/Star of India).

Steve Reeves—who had commemorated his stardom by purchasing a horse ranch in Lucerne, Switzerland—was now at the stage of his career when he was being paid more for exerting himself less. For starring in Il ladro di Bagdad, he was paid the then-handsome sum of $200,000. He limited his film work to twice a year, once in the summer and again in the winter, and trained intensely for six weeks before each new film—riding, climbing, walking, working with weights—to tone his physique and bring himself up to his ideal working weight of 200 pounds.



Only one film into his two-picture contract with Joseph E. Levine, the relationship between star and producer had already started to fray. After plastering Hercules and Hercules Unchained all over America, Levine liked to take credit for making Reeves a star, which annoyed the former Mr. America/World/Universe to no end. As he well knew, Le fatiche di Ercole had been popular enough to spawn a twice-as-costly sequel long before Levine's checkbook entered the picture. Further aggravating their relationship was a perceived backfire in Levine's contract with Reeves for Morgan il pirata, which had stipulated that the actor would be paid an additional $50,000 should the film gross in excess of $2,000,000. It did, and Levine refused to pay, hiring three lawyers to protect his interests against Reeves. Thanks to the careful accounting of Reeves' fiancee, it was quickly proven to Levine's legal team that the producer was withholding the actor's rightful due, and they advised their client to pay up. Reeves got the $50,000, but as a result, Il ladro di Bagdad got underway as something less than a pact between friends.

An early proponent of health and fitness through proper diet, Reeves had difficulties in adjusting to the eating conditions in Tunisia. "One day early on in filming Baghdad we all broke for lunch together," Reeves reminisced to biographer Chris LeClaire. "The luncheon was being served in this very large room that one would enter by means of this grand stairwell. From afar it looked as though a very large salad, heavily garnished with caviar, awaited us. But when we got closer, the caviar flew away! Flies! From then on, all I ate in Tunisia was bread, sliced cheese, canned tuna and beer!"[3]

The film's pressbook glossed over the reality by describing Reeves as roughing it by subsisting on a diet of honey, nuts, and yogurt milked from camels. "I'm convinced that yogurt made from camel's milk has an energy-giving ingredient which can't be found anywhere else in the human diet," Reeves was quoted as saying. "I never felt better than when I was in Tunisia, despite the fact that The Thief of Baghdad was my most strenuous role." In fact, due to his ongoing shoulder problems, much of Karim's acrobatic derring-do in the picture was stunt-doubled by Sergio Ciani.

Il ladro di Bagdad was the third screen version of this story. After Walsh's silent classic, which had starred Douglas Fairbanks and featured the fabulous art direction of William Cameron Menzies and pioneering special effects of Hampton Del Ruth, the film was famously remade in the interim year of 1940. Alexander Korda's Technicolor production of The Thief of Bagdad (1940) starred Sabu, under the scattershot direction of Michael Powell, Menzies, and several others, including producer Korda. These early versions are remembered as two of the greatest fantasy films of all time. The Reeves version cannot be discussed on the same level, but in its own right, it is a remarkable and charming adventure fantasy. It features what may be Reeves' most charismatic performance, wry and sparkling throughout; the Byzantine sets are splendidly designed and detailed by Flavio Mogherini; the elegant, exotic costumes of Filippo Sanjust are his best work in films ("They were tailored with such expertise that you didn't want to give them back," Reeves said);[4] Carlo Rustichelli contributed one of his loveliest, most beckoning scores; and as a special effects spectacle, Il ladro di Bagdad is virtually unmatched in the annals of Italian popular cinema. Everything about the picture is uncommonly inspired . . . except the screenplay—by Augusto Frassinetti (La battaglia di Maratona), Filippo Sanjust, and Bruno Vailati—which has the feel of a warmed-over "greatest hits" of peplum fantasy situations. Just as the money was coming in, the field of Italian fantasy seemed to be reaching the limits of its imagination and began repeating itself.

US one-sheet poster, promising a "gigantic killer crab" that never appears.

STEVE REEVES and Georgia Moll, reunited for the first time since AGI MURAD, smile for the camera on the set of IL LADRO DI BAGDAD.

When the forthcoming marriage of Baghdad's Princess Amina (Georgia Moll) to Prince Osman (Arturo Dominici) is announced in the public square, the purse of the King's spokesman Gamal (Daniele Vargas) is stolen by Karim (Reeves), a local Robin Hood who takes from the rich and gives to the poor. Prince Osman arrives at the palace to discuss wedding plans with the King (Antonio Battistella), but is overcome by Karim, who impersonates the Prince. During his meeting with the King, Karim succeeds in fleecing the entire court of their jewels before being discovered, and Amina—spying on the meeting from a secret vantage—falls in love with "Osman" at first sight. Hoping to get a glimpse of Amina's face, Karim climbs to her room and, overhearing her love for him, introduces himself and returns her father's stolen ring to her.

Finding the Princess no longer willing to marry Osman, the ambitious

Gamal proposes that she be drugged with a potion guaranteed to make her fall in love with Osman—unless she is already in love with another, in which case it becomes a slow-acting poison that will cause her to waste away. Osman consents to this plan, imagining the cloistered Princess to have no other love, but it naturally backfires. The only known antidote to the poison is the legendary blue rose. Three men rise to the challenge of finding it: Osman (who boldly threatens to make Baghdad his own, win or lose), another Prince named Assan (Edoardo Bergamo), and of course, Karim—whom the King allows to join the hunt, over Osman's violent objections. Whoever discovers the blue rose, the King declares, shall have Amina's hand in marriage.

Karim proceeds with the assistance of an old man (Georges Chamarat) possessed of magical powers and ancient wisdom, whom the hero impressed by giving away the entirety of a plundered fortune to the needy folk of Baghdad. He tells Karim that the blue rose can only be reached through the fabled Seven Doors, the first of which "can be seen where it is not." In the desert, this portal materializes in the form of a mirage. Only by defeating a forest of tentacled, man-eating trees around their campsite does Karim discover the Second Door, Third Door, and so forth—leading him into a fiery inferno, the erotic clutches of a gorgon named Kadeejah (Edy Vessel), an invisible monster (Chignone) who guards a bridge, an army of faceless warriors, etc. After the various facets of his character have been tested—strength, perception, fidelity, dedication, and so on—Karim finds the blue rose and is presented with a winged horse to hasten him on his return to Baghdad. There he finds the city under imminent attack by Osman, who has abducted Amina and plans to take Baghdad (and his bride) by force. In acknowledgment of his victory, Karim's magician friend has given him a jewel with the power to grant a single wish, and Karim now uses it to generate a larger army of soldiers—identical in appearance to himself! Osman is promptly defeated, but succeeds in slashing the blue rose held in Karim's belt. Karim returns Amina to the King and confesses his defeat. In the palace, Karim sees a bust of his magician friend and is told that it is the likeness of a former kind and beneficent King who ruled over Baghdad hundreds of years ago. In parting, the hero presents the Princess with a white rose as a farewell gift—and it turns miraculously blue in her hand, proving to the King's satisfaction that the two truly are in love. In a splendid ceremony, Karim and Amina are married and the former Thief of Baghdad becomes its new and just King.

STEVE REEVES with director Arthur Lubin.

The film's special effects are credited solely to Thomas Howard, a technician typically credited with "special photographic effects" and active in the British film industry since 1940, when he contributed uncredited work to Korda's Thief of Bagdad. His later screen credits include Blithe Spirit (1945), Knights of the Round Table (1953), Tarzan and the Lost Safari (1957), Suddenly, Last Summer (1959), Gorgo (1961, scored by Angelo Francesco Lavagnino), Captain Sindbad (1963), Children of the Damned (1963), The Haunting (1963), and several English-language productions lensed in Italy, including Quo Vadis (1951) and Light in the Piazza (1962). Howard's specialties were miniatures, opticals, and pyrotechnics, all of which are present in Il ladro di Bagdad, but the extent of Howard's contribution to the picture is open to question. Italian references credit Joseph Natanson with being in charge of the film's miniatures, which is odd because his particular field of expertise was matte painting. Carlo Rustichelli and Giuseppe Maccari (who worked as a third camera assistant on the production) both confirmed that although he receives no screen credit

A TENSE Reeves poses for a publicity shot with producer Joseph E. Levine, who had unsuccessfully tried to withhold a promised bonus for their previous picture.

3 Chris LeClaire, Worlds to Conquer: An Authorized Biography of Steve Reeves (South Chatham MA: Monomoy Books, 1999), 208.

4 LeClaire, 207.

KAREEM (Reeves) is held in thrall by Italy's latest mythological femme fatale, Edy Vessel as Kadeejah.

on the picture, Mario Bava was not only involved but "in charge" of the film's special effects unit. Listed as a production assistant in the film's end titles is a "Mario Basil," which may be a real person or perhaps a deliberate garbling of Bava's identity.

Here is a partial listing of the film's special effects shots, in the order in which they appear, followed by the names of the technicians most likely responsible for creating them:

• The opening establishing shot of Baghdad (miniature, Howard).

• The establishing shot of the walled entrance to Baghdad, the city's minarets visible behind wall (horizontal split-screen trick shot incorporating live action below and hanging miniature above, Bava).

• The various appearances/disappearances of the magician (blue screen opticals, Howard).

• Exterior of Prince Osman approaching the King's palace (split-screen trick shot, Bava).

• Gamal's belt being transformed into a snake and back again (optical dissolve effect, Bava).

• The shooting star observed by the King's guards (animation, Bava).

• The materialization of the First Door (blue screen optical, Howard).

• The close shot of the First Door (glass matte painting, Bava or Natanson).

• Detail of the rose carved above the portal of the First Door (painting, Bava or Natanson).

• The forest of evil trees (mechanical effect, Bava and Carlo Rambaldi).

• Materialization of a landscape of smoking lava behind Second Door (blue screen optical, Howard).

• The fire engulfing Karim behind the Second Door (optical, Howard).

• The fabulous Daliesque city atop the waterfall that Karim exits (a spectacular glass matte painting by Natanson—distinctly his style).

• Kadeejah's metamorphosis into stone (matte dissolve optical, Howard and Bava).

• The destruction of Kadeejah's cave palace (on-set pyrotechnics and post-production opticals, Howard and Bava).

• The invisible monster's bridge between two mountains (the mountains are matte paintings, Bava).

• The cloak of invisibility effects (blue screen opticals, Howard).

• The winged horse taking flight (animation, Bava—possibly Eugenio Bava).

• Close-ups of Karim astride the winged horse (mechanical prop, Bava and Rambaldi).

• The cloud that emanates from Karim's jewel as he makes his wish (animation, Bava).

• The army of Karims (foam latex molds and masks, Bava).

• The transformation of the white rose into a blue one (matte dissolve optical, Howard).

The film also includes several animated insert shots—of the shooting star observed by the King's guards, a brace of spears flung across the sky, and the winged horse as it gallops into flight—and Bava was the only technician of the three who was at all experienced in animation effects. (Bava had also animated similar flying arrows and javelins for Le fatiche di Ercole.) The shot of the winged horse's flight has a distinctly old-fashioned look, stylistically similar to the wheel of angels at the end of Cabiria, that makes one wonder if the talents of Eugenio Bava were also recruited.

Il ladro di Bagdad was photographed by the returning Tonino Delli Colli, whose robust handling of Morgan il pirata was much appreciated by Reeves and Levine. As with that film, Delli Colli's visual style is so unlike Bava's that it is possible to identify shots—here and there—where Bava took over. For example, unlike Bava, Delli Colli had no reputation as a cameraman who could make women look glamorous, and it appears that Bava was asked to shoot (or reshoot) various close-ups of Georgia Moll and second unit shots of her handmaidens. These are lushly colorful and dappled with laughing shadows and playful mystique, as are the scenes in Kadeejah's cave, particularly the parti-colored, dry ice choreography sequence featuring Caltiki dancer Gay Pearl. Bava's hand is also apparent in the scene of a man bringing a gift of Chinese fabric to the bed-ridden Princess, which is accepted by her old nurse, who is then approached by a young boy with a message from Karim—the mention of whose name raises Amina's weakened spirits.

ARTURO DOMINICI as Prince Osman.

The identity of the film's true editor isn't known. Italian and American sources credit the work to Gene Ruggiero, an Italian-American who worked as an editor at MGM for decades, cutting such films as Billy Wilder's Ninotchka (1939), several of MGM's "Tarzan" sequels, and Steve Reeves' early screen appearance in Athena (1954). I doubt the authenticity of his credit here because, although Ruggiero edited a couple of films with Italian locations, subjects, and co-funding—The Great Caruso (1951) and Arrivederci Roma! (1958)—these were principally American productions. Ruggiero never served as the sole editor of an Italian film. In 1964, he was credited with editing AIP's Italian acquisition The Last Man on Earth (1963, originally L'ultimo uomo della terra), which lists Lilia Silvi as editor on its original (and editorially identical) Italian prints.

Therefore, as opposed to being the film's editor, Ruggiero was more correctly the individual responsible for recutting the picture for America, which resulted in its tightening by more than 10 minutes. The differences between the US and European cuts are worth recounting.

• The US version adds two insert shots Georges Chamarat's "old magician" character in the market scene in the beginning, effectively introducing his character 10 minutes before he appears in the European cut (where we first see him blowing Prince Osman across the floor). They're just quick reaction shots, implying that the old magician is watching with pleasure as Karim outsmarts the Baghdad sheriff.

• In the European cut, the scene of Karim in the prison (where he pushes the cylindrical pillar) ends in the daytime and cuts to the scene of the "magician" introducing himself to the sultan as a wise man (by transforming his turban to a tall hat). Then we go back to the prison at night where Karim tricks the guards with his diamonds.

• In the US version, the scene with the magician as the wise man is placed before the prison sequence, which plays out as daytime pillar-turning right into the nighttime "diamond trick."

• In the European cut, at around 39:30, there's an additional short scene of the poor of Baghdad organizing to provide Karim (recently escaped from prison) with blue finery to wear into the palace, where he impersonates a nobleman and seeks permission to pursue the Blue Rose. This comes right before the scene where he marches into the palace, when the sheriff questions him about looking familiar.

• The European cut also harbors an additional scene of Prince Osman knifing the canteens of his fellow

EDY VESSEL as Kadeejah, who turns her admirers to stone.

AN AMERICAN in Tunisia: Reeves filming the scene of Kareem's triumph, as he succeeds in obtaining the fabled blue rose.

KAREEM fights for the right to the winged horse, Pegasus.

FRENCH affiche, art by Jean Mascii—starring "Steves Reeves" and directed by "Arturo Lubin."

KADEEJAH*'s ladies-in-waiting undulate amid dry ice, a dance sequence credited to choreographer Paul Steffen.*

seekers of the Blue Rose under cover of night, and riding away from the encampment on his own. In the Italian version, this scene is followed by a short cutaway to Princess Amina being consoled in her bed. In the US version, this cutaway is placed before the nighttime camping scene.

• Around 59:45, the Euro cut features additional footage following Karim's escape from the firewalls of the Second Door, showing him washing his face in a waterfall and following the sound of beckoning, female laughter to another falls (the Cascate di Montegelato, naturally) heralding the hidden realm of the sorceress Kadeejah. In the US recut, he leaves the lake and appears right at the doorstep as the seductive witch bids him entrance. In the original assembly, he is met by two toga-clad bathing beauties who lead him inside. The Kadeejah segment of the film also forfeited some footage from Gay Pearl's atmospheric dance.

It should also be noted that, judging by the way the two versions of the film are cut, that a scene of Princess Amina being drugged with the backfired love potion also appears to be missing. After the potion is explained, there is a cutaway scene of Karim, followed by our return to the palace, where the Princess has already been taken ill. If such a scene was shot at all (and given its importance, it should have been), it must have turned out unsatisfactorily to director Arthur Lubin, because the US and European cuts of this sequence are identical.

One of the film's intended highlights evidently also fell by the wayside. MGM's publicity campaign for The Thief of Baghdad sports an interesting anomaly. The earliest advertisements to be designed, including the one-sheet poster and a couple of large ad mats, list all of the film's highlights: "Army Created by Magic! Trees That Become Monsters! The Faceless Fighters! Men Turned to Stone! Flying Horses Soar!" However, one spectacle promised by the poster rings a sour note: "Gigantic Killer Crab" (which is rephrased in the ad mats as "Giant Killer of the Sea"). No such encounter appears in the picture, neither in the domestic nor European versions, though it probably would have followed Karim's escape from the possessive clutches of Kadeejah. (There is obviously something missing here, as Karim is shown fleeing Kadeejah's domain—shown atop the Cascate di Montegelato falls—by swimming to the surface from the bottom of the ocean. When he falls exhausted onto the beach, his shirt is inexplicably torn to shreds—perhaps by giant pincers?) One can only surmise from these details that such a scene was scripted, but was either dropped from the schedule before it was shot, or filmed but omitted from the final cut due to unacceptable results.

In August 1961, the month of the film's US theatrical release, Dell Publishing Co. released a comic book adaptation, illustrated by Reed Crandall, as well as a mass market paperback novelization written by Richard Wormser—the author of such Western novels as Ride a Northbound Horse and Gone to Texas. Knowing that novelizations are usually written from early draft screenplays and often contain scenes eliminated from the final cuts of the movies they adapt, some might turn to Wormser's book for answers to these questions, but it's a waste of time. The novelization is written in the first person by a "jinni," or genie, named Abu Hastin—a character that does not appear in the movie—and while the loose story manages to incorporate the right character names and some references to the Blue Rose, most of what occurs in the book has no corresponding scene in the movie. A choice example is the following encounter between the characters played by Steve Reeves and Georgia Moll, witnessed by the voyeuristic Abu Hastin:

"Karim crept slowly toward the Lady Amina, slowly and reverently, like a hadji approaching Mecca. Considering the trouble she had gone to, he could have hurried a little; or maybe he enjoyed the slow approach . . .

Then, slowly, softly, she lifted her face cloth.

Satisfied with what he saw, apparently, he kissed it. But softly, but gently.

Was this a true descendant of our Prophet, whose wives were only outnumbered by his concubines?

Maybe it was, because when he got through kissing Princess Amina's mouth, he moved a bit lower, and started nibbling gently on the section of bosom she had so considerately exposed for him."[5]

The Italian earnings for Il ladro di Bagdad amounted to 629,350,000 lire [$392,000], only a marginal improvement on Morgan il pirata. But the film's international earnings were significantly greater, owing to its attractions for the kiddie matinee circuit. In America, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer went all-out with their promotions, creating an usually elaborate, four-color pressbook. To this day, The Thief of Baghdad remains one of Steve Reeves' most beloved films.

5 Richard Wormser, Thief of Baghdad (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1961), 86–87.

ALADDIN (Donald O'Connor) surprises some bullies by wishing himself as tall as a house in LE MERAVIGLIE DI ALADINO, a sequence executed by Bava and Carlo Rambaldi.

Le meraviglie di Aladino

The Wonders of Aladdin

DURING THE PREPRODUCTION of Il ladro di Bagdad, the film's producers made the decision to get more for their money by shooting two Arabian fantasies at once. The principal crew members went on double-duty, with Flavio Mogherini designing the sets and Tonino Delli Colli behind the camera. The exact nature of Mario Bava's involvement in the second picture is obscured by the language of the film credits. In Italy, Le meraviglie di Aladino is "A Film by Henry Levin . . . Directed by Mario Bava." In France, Les Mille et Une Nuits is "Un Film de Henry Levin . . . Mise en Scène de Mario Bava." In America, where the film is known as The Wonders of Aladdin, Mario Bava is not mentioned at all.

The Italian edition is correct to the extent that Bava supervised the preparation (i.e., the dubbing, etc.) of the version released in Italy. The French explanation is also accurate because, as the phrasing implies, Henry Levin (1909–80)—fresh from filming Where the Boys Are (1960) in Ft. Lauderdale, Florida—was placed in charge of directing the bilingual cast, while Bava was primarily in charge of the second unit—that is, scenes featuring Italian actors, the special effects, and the supervising of the Italian technical crew.

"Bava was the director of the second unit, and I was his cameraman," explains Marcello Gatti. "The movie was directed by Levin—without question. He directed almost 80% of the movie, while Bava supervised the scenes involving special effects and situations. It's true that we also worked with actors, but we did only maybe 20% of the whole movie." [1]

A short list of credits in the American pressbook confirms Bava as "second unit director." This would explain why the major acting scenes in the film look a certain way, and why others—like the scene of Aladdin being chased through the marketplace at night—are marked by Bava's unmistakable lighting techniques. The presence of some charmingly naïve optical effects (not to be confused with some very bad blue-screen shots, credited in European prints to Technicolor Italiana) also strongly suggest that the film's post-production was left in Bava's capable hands, while Levin moved on to Austria to helm George Pal's Cinerama production, The Wonderful World of the Brothers Grimm (1962).

The lives and careers of Mario Bava and Henry Levin parallel one another in surprising ways. Both men began their directorial careers with horror films about women plagued by an ancestral curse; Levin's was Cry of the Werewolf (1944). In 1946, Levin directed The Devil's Mask; in 1960, Bava directed La maschera del demonio ("The Mask of Satan"). In 1959, Levin directed Journey to the Center of the Earth; in 1961, Bava directed Ercole al centro della terra ("Hercules at the Center of the Earth"). In 1967, the year after Bava directed Operazione paura, Levin directed Operazione paradiso/Kiss the Girls and Make Them Die. (After writing this film for Levin, screenwriter Dino Mauri went to work for Bava as one of the writers of Diabolik.) Both men made their last films for television. The final coincidence came when Bava and Levin died during the same week in 1980—Bava on April 25, Levin on May 1—from the same cause: a heart attack.

ALADDIN, another thief of Baghdad, steals some food from the local market to take home to his mother.

Le meraviglie di Aladino

"The Wonders of Aladdin"
Filmed at Titanus Studios, Cinecittà and on location in Kairouan, Tunisia
December 18 – March 1961
First released: October 31, 1961
Technicolor, CinemaScope, 2.35:1, 99 minutes

Production: Lux Film (Rome) and Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France (Paris). Directors: Henry Levin (US), Mario Bava (France/Italy). Assistant directors: Alberto Cardone, Franco Prosperi. Screenplay: Franco Prosperi and Sylvano Reina, based on a story by Stefano Strucchi and Duccio Tessari. [Some sources also credit Marco Vicario.] Director of photography: Tonino Delli Colli (and Mario Bava, special effects sequences). Camera assistant: Franco Delli Colli. Second Unit Camera assistant: Marcello Gatti. Art direction: Flavio Mogherini. Wardrobe: Giorgio Desideri, from designs by Rosine Delamare. Makeup: Eligio Trani. Hairdresser: Gustavo Sisi. Choreography: Secondina Cavallo. Production manager: Massimo Patrizi. Music: Angelo Francesco Lavagnino, conducted by Carlo Savina, performed by L'Orchestra Cinefonica Italiana. Editor: Maurizio Lucidi. Sound: Fonolux-Rome. Distributors: Lux Film (Italy), and Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in all other territories unless otherwise noted.

Additional credits: France: Paul Véry and Paul Tuckahoe. US: "Joseph E. Levine Presents . . ." Screenplay: Luther Davis. Editor: Gene Ruggiero, A.C.E. Music: Angelo Lavagnino, conducted by Mario Ammonini.

Donald O'Connor (Aladdin), Vittorio De Sica (Genie), Aldo Fabrizi (Sultan), Noëlle Adam (Djalma), Mario Girotti (Prince Moluk), Fausto Tozzi (Grand Vizier), Michèle Mercier (Zaina), Raymond Bussières (Magician), Milton Reid (Omar), Alberto Farnese (1st bandit), Marco Tulli (Fakir), Franco Ressel (Vizier's lieutenant), Vittorio Bonos (lamp vendor), Adriana Facchetti (Mamma), Giovanna Galletti (midwife).

Belgium: De Duizend en een Nacht, "The Thousand and One Nights," Eastmancolor/CinemaScope, 1962
Denmark: 2/25/63
Finland: 6/14/63
France: Les Mille et Une Nuits, Lux Cinématographique, Eastmancolor/CinemaScope, 2/21/62
Germany: Aladins Abenteuer, "Aladdin's Adventures," M-G-M Film Verleih, 6/1/62, 93m
UK: The Wonders of Aladdin, Eastmancolor/CinemaScope, 2/17/62, 92m 57s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: The Wonders of Aladdin, Eastmancolor/CinemaScope, 12/13/62, 93m

Synopsis

In a marketplace in Baghdad, an old woman haggles with a vendor over the price of a lamp. He drops his price, but presents her with an older, humbler lamp which has been frequently returned by customers, claiming that it made strange noises. The woman gives it to her starstruck son Aladdin, who is awed by the impressive caravan of Prince Moluk as it arrives in town. Learning that his mother has gone without food to buy him the lamp, Aladdin decides to return it—but a more tempting opportunity presents itself, to steal bagels and fruit from a vendor. A sound emanating from the lamp, which he thinks is the growling of his stomach, gives him away, and Aladdin is chased through the city streets by an angry mob. After hiding in a dog kennel, Aladdin is infested with fleas and scratches himself with the lamp, producing a genie. The genie grants him three wishes, and he uses the first of these to get out of his predicament. When the genie says, "Pffffft!" Aladdin grows to giant size and chases away the mob by flicking a giant flea in their direction. One of his pursuers, the burly Omar, pleads for his life and swears to serve Aladdin for the rest of his days.

As his slave, Omar's meager possessions become Aladdin's own, and he orders his servant to buy passage in a caravan bound for Bassora, where Prince Moluk is soon to marry Princess Zaina. Omar is poor, so they travel in a lowly sheep cart. Aladdin's girlfriend Djalma dances to raise travelling money of her own. Being beautiful, she is granted a place in the Prince's own entourage. But the evil Grand Vizier is against the coming marriage: he conspires to marry Princess Zaina himself and use her to gain the throne of Bassora. He has hired a band of cutthroats to raid Moluk's caravan and capture the Prince. A talented military strategist, Prince Moluk anticipates the attack and trades places with a lowly soldier, surviving with Djalma as an anonymous hostage. The Vizier immediately recognizes the "Prince" as an imposter, and drops him into a pit of tigers.

Meanwhile, Aladdin and Omar are abandoned by their caravan in the middle of the Desert of Tribulations, where they are rescued by a bevy of Amazon women. After being massaged and lavished with wine, they learn of their fate—to be skinned for clothing after a single night of pleasure—and summon the genie to their rescue. Aladdin asks that they be sent close to Prince Moluk . . . and wind up as fellow prisoners of the Grand Vizier. The Vizier goes to the Sultan, Zaina's father, with the clothes of the "dead" Prince, and offers himself as a replacement husband. The aging Sultan's wife is expecting a child, and needing a sire, he agrees to the marriage only if his own child is born female. The Vizier agrees to this condition, boasting that he has sired twenty-seven sons—and plots to abduct the infant, if born a male, and replace it with a female.

A magician cohort of the Vizier has manufactured two lifesize, mechanical dolls—one male, one female—as wedding gifts, the former to amuse, and the latter to kill the Sultan with a bone-crushing embrace. Using a tree as a catapult, Moluk escapes custody, followed by Aladdin, Djalma, and Omar, who are captured before they can get away. The Vizier takes Djalma to the magician's lair for private torture. The Prince is recognized and befriended in town by a fakir who sleeps on a bed of nails. The fakir helps him to find a secret passage into the magician's lab, where they find Djalma (who is gagged and dangling naked from the ceiling) and free her. They find Aladdin and Omar imprisoned in cowskins, meant to shrink in sunlight and suffocate them, and cut them down.

The baby-switching scheme is successful, and the Princess is compelled to marry the Grand Vizier. Prior to the wedding, Aladdin invades the court by posing as the mechanical doll; he entertains the Sultan with a dance. When Prince Moluk shows up alive, the Vizier's evil plot is exposed. Aladdin is knocked unconscious in an ensuing scuffle with the Vizier's men, and Djalma is abducted once again.

ALADDIN rescues Djalma (Noëlle Adam) from the evil Grand Vizier.

The Sultan names Aladdin as new Grand Vizier for his acts of valor, and the genie allows him to bend his last wish to encompass two desires: to save Djalma and to defeat the former Vizier. After besting the Vizier in a magical showdown in the desert, Aladdin finds Djalma tied nude in the Vizier's tent. "Why did I always think of you as my sister?" he asks himself. Freeing her, the genie sends them into the sky on a magic carpet, where they kiss to the hurrahs of the people of Bassora far below.

The various international prints of Le meraviglie di Aladino credit its screenplay to as many as nine different men. The original treatment was written by Stefano Strucchi and Duccio Tessari, from which a complete script was prepared by Sylvano Reina and Franco Prosperi, who used this leverage to land himself a position as Bava's assistant director. (Some sources also mention Marco Vicario, the husband of Helen of Troy actress Rosanna Podestà and later the producer of several Antonio Margheriti films, including La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle, 1963.) French prints extend credit to Pierre Véry and Paul Tuckahoe, perhaps to satisfy the quota demanded by Lux-Rome's co-production agreement with Lux-Paris. Furthermore, when Henry Levin became involved as director, he hired American screenwriter Luther Davis to write polished English dialogue for the actors, all of whom either played their roles in English or spoke their lines phonetically.

Cast

One of the most beloved actors ever to appear in a Bava film, Donald O'Connor was the son of circus performers. He was born on August 28, 1925, in Chicago, Illinois, and paid his dues in vaudeville before making his screen debut at age 11, in 1937's Melody for Two. He continued to juggle small juvenile roles for Paramount and vaudeville engagements for a couple of years, before becoming a Universal contract player in the 1940s. He became a bona fide star in 1952, when his antic musical numbers (such as "Make 'Em Laugh") repeatedly stole the show from co-stars Gene Kelly and Debbie Reynolds in MGM's Singin' in the Rain. But this was rare honey indeed, as O'Connor spent the bulk of the decade back at Universal, starring opposite the irrepressible Francis the Talking Mule, in a series of B-pictures that made more money than good reputations. (O'Connor was likely tapped for the role of Aladdin by Il ladro di Bagdad director Arthur Lubin, who had directed all of O'Connor's "Francis" pictures.) Later in the decade, the actor began to complement his slipping career by composing classical music; in 1956, he conducted the Los Angeles Philharmonic's performance of his premiere symphony, Reflections d'un Comique. In his later years, O'Connor was seen primarily in television commercials as a celebrity endorser of products; in the early 1990s, he allied himself with a worthy but short-lived plan to dub into English a number of classic fairy tale films from Russia's Mosfilm Studios, which were to be sold by subscription. Unfortunately, the program fell apart after the first title was completed: Father Frost—originally Aleksandr Rou's Moroshka—which O'Connor dubbed with Phyllis Diller and others. Donald O'Connor died of an apparent heart attack in Los Angeles, on September 26, 2003.

1 Marcello Gatti interviewed by Luca Rea, August 1999.

Actor–director Vittorio De Sica—born July 7, 1902 in Sora, Latium—had previously worked with Bava in Pietro Francisci's Natale al campo 119 and Villa Borghese. Raised in Naples, he became a screen actor as early as 1918, and rose to the status of matinee idol as his good looks matured. His stardom was assured on the strengths of light comedies, but as he began to direct his own films in the early '40s, the impact of the second World War aroused a more serious, socially minded dimension in his art, first expressed in the neorealist films Sciuschia/Shoeshine (1946) and Ladri di biciclette/The Bicycle Thief (1948). Another of his early acclaimed films, Miraculo a Milano/Miracle in Milan (1951), which he also co-produced and co-authored, was a rare and splendid attempt to infuse neorealism with elements of fantasy—an important signal that the Italian spirit was healing after the war. His 1952 masterpiece Umberto D.—the story of an old man who worries what will become of his dog when he dies—is one of

ALADDIN*'s initial meeting with friend Omar (Milton Reid) is not at all friendly.*

ALADDIN and Omar are taken into custody by the Grand Vizier's soldiers.

ALADDIN and Omar are rescued from the Desert of Tribulations by a bevy of Amazon women.

Mario Girotti was born March 29, 1939, in Venice—and, incidentally, is not related to actor Massimo Girotti, as some published sources claim. He started acting in 1952 and appeared, as did De Sica, in the Bava-photographed Villa Borghese. Prior to his role as Prince Moluk in Le meraviglie di Aladino, he had played minor roles in Annibale/Hannibal and Cartagine in fiamme/Carthage in Flames, both produced in 1959. Afterwards, he took advantage of his German ancestry to appear in some of the Karl May Westerns being produced in West Germany, notably Winnetou II (1964) and Old Surehand (1965). His success in German Westerns prompted a mid-career transformation: Mario Girotti became "Terence Hill"—star of Italian Westerns. After Hill had appeared in a couple of films, he was cast as the lead in Lo chiamavano Trinità (1969), an early comic Spaghetti Western directed by former cinematographer Enzo Barboni under the pseudonym the most unbearably poignant human dramas ever filmed. As a director, De Sica helmed many important pictures that gained popular recognition in America, probably more than any other Italian director to date: Stazione termini/Indiscretion of an American Wife (1953), La ciociara/Two Women (1960), an episode of Boccaccio '70 (1962), Il Boom, lere, oggi, domani/ Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow (1962), the Galatea production Matrimonio all'italiana/Marriage, Italian Style (1964), Caccia alla volpe/After the Fox (1966), and the Oscar-winning Il giardino dei Finzi-Contini/The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (1971). He died on November 13, 1974, shortly after playing the amusing role of the Marquis De Fiore in Paul Morrissey's Blood for Dracula a.k.a. Andy Warhol's Dracula. Actress Harriet White Medin, who worked with De Sica as a dialogue coach on several films made in the 1950s, described him to me as "the finest human being" she ever met in the Italian film industry.

"E. B. Clucher." When the film was released in the US as They Call Me Trinity, Hill and co-star Bud Spencer (a.k.a. Carlo Pedersoli) became international stars. This success was followed by a sequel—Continuavano a chiamarlo Trinità/Trinity is Still My Name (1971)—and countless imitations, including Clucher's own Figli di Trinità/Sons of Trinity (1995).

Both of the film's female leads, Noëlle Adam and Michèle Mercier, were French and had started acting after brief careers in ballet. Mercier was born Jocelyne Mercier on January 1, 1939, in Nice, France. She made her first film in 1957, but her first international success came a few years later, when she played the small role of Clarisse in François Truffaut's second feature Tirez sur le Pianiste/Shoot the Piano Player (1960), in which she ensured that she would be remembered by boldly baring her breasts—a scene cut from the original American release. She is one of the extraordinary presences in Le meraviglie di Aladino, and looks absolutely exquisite in the wedding gown designed for her by Rosine Delamare. Bava must have been impressed, as well; Mercier worked for him again, giving a superbly edgy (and erotic) performance as Rosy in the "Il telefono" segment of I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath.

Fausto Tozzi is a superbly menacing Grand Vizier, who brings a tongue-in-cheek quality, worthy of Vincent Price, to the prospect of burning a woman's bare legs with acid. Tozzi also worked with Bava again, as the villainous Aghen in I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger and as Menelaus in the miniseries Odissea.

Le meraviglie di Aladino also marks the earliest appearance of character actor Franco Ressel in a Bava film, as the walrus-mustached lieutenant of the Grand Vizier. Ressel was born Domenico Orobona on February 8, 1925, in Naples. His earliest-known Italian film was a forerunner of the giallo, a crime thriller entitled L'assassino, directed by Elio Petri and co-starring La maschera del demonio's Andrea Checchi. Bava took a liking to the smug, effete quality of Ressel's face and subsequently cast him as the ill-fated King Lotar in Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror, after which he was bumped up to his definitive role, as the superbly slimy Marquis in Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace. Ressel appeared in over 80 Euro horror, Western, and sexploitation features, including Riccardo Freda's Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan/Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World (1961) and Caccia al'uomo/Roger La Honte (1961), Antonio Margheriti's I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet (1965), Sergio Corbucci's Il mercenario/The Mercenary (1968), Mario Caiano's L'occhio nel labirinto/Eye in the Labyrinth (1971), and Federico Fellini's E la nave va/And the Ship Sails On (1983). His last film was Sergio Corbucci's A tu per tu (1984), made one year before his death at the age of 60.

DISGUISED as a mechanical man, Aladdin reveals the Vizier's plot to the Sultan (Aldo Fabrizi), as Princess Zaina (Michèle Mercier) looks on.

British actor Milton Reid (b. 1917) gives a wonderful comic performance as the bald, hulking Omar, but he did not become a fixture of the Italian cinema. The brawny, shaven-headed Reid started out as a weightlifter and stuntman before he landed his first significant role as the Executioner in Val Guest's The Camp on Blood Island (1958), a Hammer Films production. This was followed by another Hammer film, Terror of the Tongs (1961), where he attended Christopher Lee's utterance of the famous line, "Have you ever had your bones scraped?" After Le meraviglie di Aladino, Reid continued to turn up infrequently—but always memorably—in such British films as Dr. No (1962), Captain Clegg/Night Creatures (1962), Deadlier than the Male (1967), Dr. Phibes Rises Again (1972), and The Spy Who Loved Me (1977).

Production

Le meraviglie di Aladino is noteworthy in Bava's filmography as the occasion of his meeting with Franco Prosperi, who subsequently became his assistant director for a run of pictures.[2] "I worked closely with Mario for a period of his career, in the early 1960s," he reminisced to the editors of the Italian magazine Nocturno. "We communicated in English, so that he might become more comfortable with it; I had worked as an assistant on a lot of American films. I made five films with Bava: La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Ercole al centro della terra, then a very beautiful one that isn't often seen, Gli invasori with the Kessler Twins and Cameron Mitchell, followed by a horrendous Western, La strada per Fort Alamo—the producer did not have a lira to his name! For Le meraviglie di Aladino, Mario shot the second unit and I was the assistant of Henry Levin . . . I had to act as interpreter between him and Levin, and in this way we became fast friends. Mario was a very good man—the best of men—and a superb director of photography. In those days, the film stock had only 40 ASA of sensitivity and Bava could photograph anything with the least amount light. He knew everything there was to know about cinema, truly."[3]

The filming took place over a ten-week schedule, partly on location in Kairouan, Tunisia. Alas, the production turned out to be anything but a vacation. Filming was repeatedly plagued by upsets that made the crew wish they had never left home. On one occasion, the production became embroiled in a border incident when ALADDIN pleads with his lamp for one more wish. Note the bed's ornate headboard, which figures in many other Bava films.

Donald O'Connor, Vittorio De Sica, and Noëlle Adam accidentally crossed the border into Algeria during a desert scene, causing them and other crew members to be detained for three unpleasant hours by Algerian frontier troops. On another day, shooting was disrupted by a medium-sized earthquake. While participating in an action sequence, O'Connor ruptured a blood vessel in his throat, putting him temporarily out of action.

But the production's most harrowing situation arose when the company was granted permission by Governor Amor Chachia to film inside the sacred, 1300-year-old Grand Mosque of Kairouan at the end of January. To photograph the interior of this sacred temple, to bring food and drink inside this spiritual place, which was also forbidden to women—all of these innocent transgressions were regarded as a desecration by Muslim leader Grand Mufti Abderrahim Khalil, who loudly protested the filming and was placed under arrest by the Governor for inciting a riot. The film's American pressbook politely described the resulting fracas as "a minor Muslim revolution." According to Variety, after the Grand Mufti's arrest, "an angry mob of [Muslims] broke into [the Governor's] palace, killed one of his guards, then overturned and burned ambulances, trucks, and cars as Tunisian troops rushed to the scene, opened fire on them, killing four civilians." The story might have been contained, but the film's publicist Harvey Matofsky promptly phoned the story to the Associated Press and United Press International, for which he was personally threatened with arrest and promptly banished from the city by the Governor. [4]

No members of the cast or crew were injured, but ten years later, in an interview with Ornella Volta, Mario Bava looked back on this incident as the one time in his life when he was most truly afraid. "We had invaded the Grand Mosque in Kairouan with a full crew—cameras, lights, elephants, makeup kits, ham sandwiches—everything that makes Muslims upset! Suddenly, I found myself on the ground with fifty furious Arabs standing above me, all armed with spears! Fifty spears—pointed at me! They were the procession for a scene we were supposed to have filmed, which was subsequently scrapped. Those Arabs were supposed to have flung themselves into a fire in the scene we were going to shoot, and they demanded to be paid whether we filmed it or not, because of the terror they had all suffered from imagining it!" [5]

On the positive side, art director Flavio Mogherini worked wonders on location, transforming Kairouan's Foire du Tapis Palace—renowned for hosting an annual exhibition of hand-woven carpets and rugs—into a Baghdad market place as long as a city block. The ambitious set reportedly included a fully appointed bath house (where Djalma works for her father) and fourteen different shops. Mogherini did his usual magnificent job on this production, giving the film a marvelously Byzantine look, and providing a wonderfully spooky and atmospheric lair for Raymond Bussières' evil magician.

Special Effects

The "wonders" of The Wonders of Aladdin were the doing of Mario Bava and Carlo Rambaldi. According to Marcello Gatti, Bava's special effects duties were not limited to the obvious. Especially after the Grand Mosque incident, the film company was limited in its scenic options—but if Mario could not be taken to the required scenery, the scenery would come to Mario.

"Bava was an absolute genius," says Gatti. "When we were making the movie, he bought a lot of tourist postcards—you know, the typical local landscapes—and he spent an entire evening cutting up these postcards with a small scissors. We all wondered what the hell was he trying to do! Then he glued all the pieces on various panes of glass, creating a series of perfect mattes that perfectly matched shots we had scheduled, providing wonderful backgrounds and landscapes! He put a mirror at a certain angle to the camera and told me how to shoot the mirror. I had an actress that was standing at a completely different angle to the camera, but she was somehow projected into the midst of another incredibly prepared background! Yes, that's how it was—I would follow his instructions and try to figure out what he was doing, but I was never really able to anticipate him. I just waited for the dailies to see what the hell we had really shot!"

To suggest the limbo experienced by Aladdin as his wishes transport him from one place to another, Bava employed a water tank.

2 One of the greater sources of confusion for those of us who chronicle the field of popular Italian cinema is the presence of two Franco Prosperis on the scene. Bava's assistant director, Francesco "Franco" Prosperi, who was also a screenwriter and later became a director in his own right, should not be mistaken for the Franco E. Prosperi who co-directed Mondo Cane (1962), Africa addio (1966), Addio zio Tom (1971), and other so-called "mondo movies" with Gualtiero Jacopetti. The Prosperi who worked with Bava later directed such films as Tecnica di un omicidio/Hired Killer (1966), Dick Smart 2.007 (1967), La settima donna/Terror (1978) and Il trono di fuoco/Throne of Fire (1982), sometimes using the pseudonyms "Frank Shannon" and "Charles Price."

3 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

4 Variety, January 25, 1961, 11.

5 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

The shots appear to have been filmed in 16 mm and then transferred to 35 mm anamorphic stock, resulting in a deliberately grainy and distorted, taffy-pull imagery. The giant flea—one of the film's comic highlights—was constructed by Rambaldi, with a small catapult built into its underside to help it leap. As with Il ladro di Bagdad, Bava was not responsible for the uncharacteristically sloppy blue screen work seen in the picture—which causes De Sica's genie to float and Aladdin's magic carpet to fly—which was done during post-production, after Bava had moved on to other projects.

Variants

In America, the distribution rights to The Wonders of Aladdin were initially sold by Joseph E. Levine to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. MGM was apparently uncomfortable with some aspects of the production and hired American editor Gene Ruggiero to re-edit the picture. The resulting variant is true to Le meraviglie di Aladino in terms of story and dialogue, but it differs from the European prints in some striking ways. The following is a list of shots and scenes included in the European versions, signed by Bava, which are not included in the US Levin cut:

- Medium shot of Prince's carriage interior, as Moluk offers one of the harem girls painting his fingernails a taste of his ice cream.
- When Aladdin leaves to take back the lamp, the scene cuts to a silhouetted rear view of Aladdin exiting a keyhole-shaped doorway into the market place. On the threshold, he blows out the flame of his lamp and a fire-eater entertaining the locals responds by blowing a large arc of flame into the sky. He then eats flame from the end of a stick. Aladdin looks around, and we cut to the lamp vendor, seeing Aladdin and hiding—not wishing to refund money for the lamp once again.
- While running away from the mob, Aladdin pauses to stash his stolen goods in an alcove.

FRENCH affiche with prominent billing for Mario Bava.

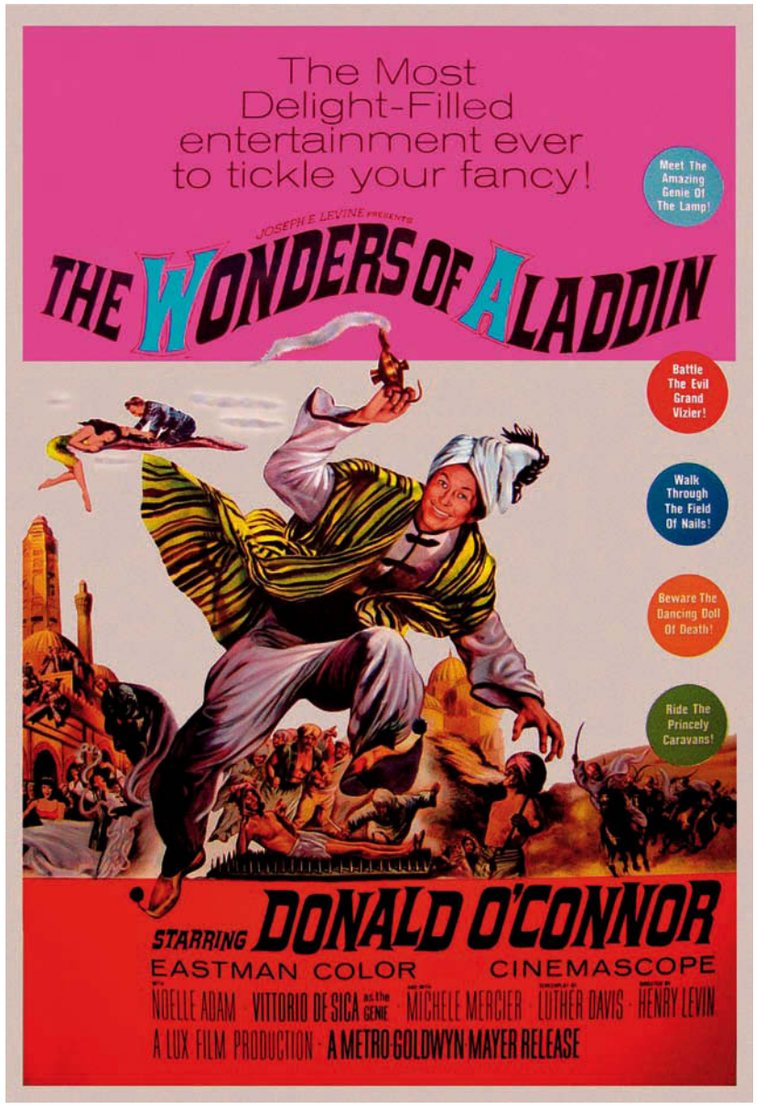
• Aladdin drops his lamp while running over the fakir on his bed of nails. As his pursuers grab their feet in pain after running over the tacks he has spilled in the street, Aladdin is brought the lamp by the friendly fakir.

• Chased onto the rooftops, Aladdin tries to descend a ladder to the streets, but Omar and the others are at the other end, climbing up. He grabs a handy basket and dumps an enormous load of red chili peppers onto them, and dashes to the next roof.

• An added shot of Aladdin's giant hand closing the door after the flea chases most of his pursuers away.

• After chasing Aladdin out of her shop, throwing fistfuls of flea powder after him, Djalma sees some women dancing for coins in the street. In order to make money to accompany Aladdin to Bassora, she performs an exotic dance, removing a series of veils. Prince Moluk is one of her admirers, and he throws her a silver coin—her biggest contribution. She thanks him, and he comments on her beauty. [She does not dance, and she does not make the Prince's acquaintance at this point in the US version.] Later, when he notices Djalma looking for a caravan to join, he points her out to his assistant as "the little dancer."

• An extra dialogue scene in the magician's tent between the Grand Vizier and the raider leading the attack caravan.



• A shot of Prince Moluk lifting Djalma helpfully onto her mule.

• As the bandit leader watches the Prince's caravan through a telescope, the European prints add a Bavian point-of-view shot through the telescope lens as Djalma passes before it. The bandit mentions that he might take the beautiful girl for himself.

• When Aladdin and Omar encounter the Amazon women pouring water in the desert, there is an additional shot of their hands roaming up their legs.

• After the genie helps Aladdin to fade out of the Amazon Queen's bedroom, he stays behind—and walks suggestively toward her! Dissolve to next scene.

• After the Grand Vizier enters the magician's lair and climbs the stairs to its mezzanine, he playfully taps the foot of a dangling skeleton and unravels the scrolled portrait his emissary has sketched of the secluded Princess Zaina.

US one-sheet poster with no billing for Bava.

• When Aladdin uses a handy bellows as a makeshift flame thrower, there is an extra shot of the burned soldiers backing away and being met by the whip of the Grand Vizier, urging them on to battle.

• A shot of the flame-throwing bellows running out of fire, and Aladdin discovering that his oil supply is exhausted. Followed by additional shots of elephants being used to topple the walls of their barricade.

• After the Vizier leaves with Djalma, there is an additional sequence of an elephant lifting Aladdin's lamp and dropping it beside him. He tries to reach it, but a guard interferes, and another elephant hoists it over the wall with its trunk, out of our hero's reach.

• A group of soldiers has formed a search party. Once they pass, the Prince—who has been breathing through a reed—emerges from the water and runs in the opposite direction.

• When the Vizier abducts Djalma again from the wedding fiasco, there are additional shots of his associates mounting their horses and galloping away, and a shot of Djalma being thrown unconscious across his saddle.

• When Aladdin finds Djalma shackled naked in the Vizier's tent, there is an additional shot of her—after she turns her back to him—looking over her shoulder and imploring him not to look.

• As Djalma and Aladdin sail away on their magic carpet, there is an extra shot of the fakir waving to them from below, and them waving back, before kissing one another two or three times. In the US version, Aladdin sees Djalma naked, but never kisses her!

Aside from these mostly minor omissions of violence and mild eroticism, Joseph E. Levine ordered The Wonders of Aladdin to be rescored. Angelo Lavagnino's score was retained but, in a separate session conducted by Mario Ammonini, the music was arranged and re-recorded to sound brighter and more cheerful in tone, de-emphasizing the fabulous, mysterioso qualities for which Lavagnino's name is renowned by soundtrack collectors. Thus the reorchestrated score also shares some responsibility for making the film's eroticism to feel more tasteless and inappropriate than they actually are.

As with The Thief of Bagdad, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer arranged for a Dell "Movie Classic" comic book adaptation of the film to be released. This fifteen-cent comic book (illustrated by Luís Dominguez) is of interest for being true to the synopsis . . . with one major exception, which alludes to a scene that may have been scripted and shot, but was not included in the final assembly.

When Aladdin and Omar encounter the Amazons in the Desert of Tribulation, the water-bearing women are shot dead with arrows and our heroes are taken into custody. They are put up for auction, and the auctioneer draws the attention of the crowd to Aladdin's talent for dancing. Aladdin's performance so impresses the Amazon Queen that she acquires him for herself. He is taken to her tent, where the genie rescues Aladdin by turning the Amazons into cats—and the Queen into a woman with a cat's head! A battle royal ensues, during which Aladdin and Omar make their escape. One can easily imagine how poorly executed the Queen's cat head effect might have been, and understand why it had to be dropped, but as a result, the final film offers a much sketchier explanation of why Omar also happened to be saved from the Amazons.

ITALIAN fotobusta.

Commentary

The film's American pressbook contains a quote from director Henry Levin about the hopes he had attached to this "multi-million dollar" production. "The Wonders of Aladdin reflects a return, in a sense, to the slapstick and hi-jinx comedy of costume movie-making that you just don't see any more," Levin waxed wistfully. "It's a pity too, because these were the kind of pictures that attracted mass audiences everywhere. We feel our picture has caught that same spirit of humor, excitement and spectacle."

It's easy to see why Levin's promotional statement could not quite untangle its promises of a good time from a sense of lament. Despite the best intentions of everyone involved, Le meraviglie di Aladino is a failure—particularly in its Americanized version, which was one of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's year-end holiday offerings of 1962.

In America, adult audiences were becoming more sophisticated in their tastes for comedy, and The Wonders of Aladdin was no Some Like It Hot. In the European version, Donald O'Connor's slapstick comedy feels perfectly at home in an entertainment suitable for all ages, because his performance is consistent with broad comedy trends still popular in France and Italy. In America, however, O'Connor's impish, daringly physical performance was considered too broad for adults and had to be re-addressed to juvenile ticket-buyers—the fans of Jerry Lewis and the Three Stooges.

In a film geared toward children, one is startled to see the nude bathing girls in Princess Zaina's pool (however vaguely glimpsed), the bosomy Amazons massaging O'Connor's bare shoulders, and the film's heroine dangling naked in the villain's tent. In the original version, these elements work harmoniously as part of a sensuous and straightforward Arabian Nights entertainment. But The Wonders of Aladdin is a pasteurized, condescending kiddie's matinee interpretation, in which these same elements are made to seem inappropriate and prurient. Aggravating the matter further is the leering tone of such dialogue as "Torture these two men till they talk . . . I'll, uh, torture the girl at home." Another line that never fails to astonish American audiences is Prince Moluk's advice to a soldier struck by an arrow: "Chew a little hashish; it will diminish the pain." (As Variety critic "Pit" sighed, "For audiences, gum will have to do.")[6]

With nine screenwriters involved in the film's preparation, it's a miracle that Le meraviglie di Aladino plays at all harmoniously—yet numerous plot elements are left unresolved. The most noticeable loose ends are the two mechanical dolls, an invention borrowed (along with much else) from the Alexander Korda production of The Thief of Bagdad. Here, the robots never fulfill their promise, being given nothing to do but dance and lend a sense of decorative menace to the magician's lair. The one scene in which the female doll crushes one of the Grand Vizier's soldiers is so blandly executed, it's obvious that Bava had no part in its staging. In the English-language version, the Magician and the Vizier never offer a clear-cut explanation for the dolls' role in their scheme. Likewise, when Aladdin disguises himself as one of the robots, he is also given nothing practical to do, though it gives Donald O'Connor a brief opportunity to showcase the kind of madcap dancing that defined his stardom at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in the 1950s. (We also have no explanation of how Aladdin even knows about this dancing robot, which he has never seen—much less how he has obtained its costume!) This scene incidentally foreshadows another in Bava's 1966 Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, in which Franco Franchi impersonates a dancing robot.

Another continuity problem concerns Omar, who appears in blackface during the wedding scene, but is portrayed as Caucasian in every other scene. Is he disguised as a Nubian in this scene (the film offers nothing to support such an interpretation) or was this the first of Omar's scenes to be filmed, shot before wiser minds prevailed and decreed blackface to be no longer acceptable?

THE FILM*'s Belgian affiche carries no mention of Bava—unusual for a European release.*

The troubled location shooting of Le meraviglie di Aladino was completed at Titanus Studios in March 1961, and Mario Bava was greatly relieved to be able to return home with body and soul intact. After the sustained uneasiness of this production, culminating in the trauma he had experienced in the Grand Mosque, it would be many years before he could be persuaded to work outside of Rome again.

By this point in time, Bava's professional life was back in high gear, as it had been before he interrupted his career as a cameraman to "play 'director.'" He might even have begun to assume that his brief adventure as a movie director had been nothing more than a lark, destined to be forgotten. But he was happy to be doing what he was doing; he took refuge in work where he was comfortable, well-known, and respected, and worked as often as there was something for him to do.

Meanwhile, Bava's homelife was anything but calm. In 1961, his son Lamberto—at the precocious age of 17—married his high school sweetheart, Fiamma Giovagnoli, the daughter of a renowned Italian art restorationist. It was through Fiamma that Lamberto met and befriended a young film buff named Dario Argento, the son of producer Salvatore Argento.

As Argento told Alan Jones: "We met because we were all in the same class—Lamberto, Fiammetta, my future wife Marisa [Casale], and myself—also my sister. We had a similar story because I married Marisa, then he married Fiammetta. We also had something else in common, because both of our fathers worked in the cinema. But after we got married and left school, we didn't see each other again for many years."

The news of Lamberto's early marriage must have concerned Mario greatly. By this time, Mario's own marriage had grown discontented and, especially in a country where divorce was not only illegal but considered a sacrilege, he must have agonized over his teenage son's rash decision to tie himself so early in life to one woman, particularly as the marriage was not motivated by pregnancy, accidental or otherwise.

Around this same time, Eugenio Bava reached the venerable age of 75 and formally stepped down from his long-held post as head of the Istituto LUCE's optical effects department. (His successor was Adriano Pischiutta.) Like his son, Eugenio was not well-disposed to inactivity. Sensing his father's creative restlessness in retirement, Mario began to involve him more and more in his own projects. Eugenio seems to have had a few irons of his own in the fire, and returned the favor.

6 Pit., "The Wonders of Aladdin" review, Variety, October 26, 1961.

Thrice the Might!

Maciste contro il vampiro
Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan
Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide

GORDON SCOTT as Maciste, mustering all his fabled strength against the Blue Faced Men in Giacomo Gentilomo's MACISTE CONTRO IL VAMPIRO.

BY 1961, much had transpired in the arena of Italian spectacle films in the years since Mario Bava had filmed Steve Reeves in his star-making performances as Hercules. The success of the Hercules films was unparallelled in its impact on Italian cinema. Between 1957 and 1959—due entirely to the international boxoffice success of Hercules and Hercules Unchained—the peplum genre grew from three productions annually to thirteen, and musclemen like Brad Harris, Ed Fury, and Mickey Hargitay were imported to play the likes of Samson, Ursus, and Hercules. Generally speaking, these productions were thinly veiled excuses to recycle leftover sets, props, and wardrobe from costly international co-productions like Helen of Troy, Esther and the King, The Colossus of Rhodes, and Sodom and Gomorrah. A select few achieved more as entertainment than was either expected or necessary, and one of these was Giacomo Gentilomo's Maciste contro i vampiri/Goliath and the Vampires.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Enrico DeSeta.

Maciste contro il vampiro

This film was scripted by the two-fisted team of Sergio Corbucci and Duccio Tessari under the working title of La rivincita di Maciste ("Maciste's Revenge"), which remained the film's title until shortly before its theatrical release. The script was the third to reinvent Maciste—the heroic Nubian slave of Giovanni Pastrone's Cabiria—as a mythic, white-skinned demigod worthy of standing shoulder-to-shoulder with Hercules, Samson, Ulysses, and the rest; it was preceded by Carlo Campogalliani's Maciste nella valle dei Re/Son of Samson (1960, starring Mark Forest) and Antonio Leonviola's Maciste nella terra dei Ciclopi/Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops (1961, starring Gordon Mitchell), which featured special effects by Joseph Natanson.

Maciste contro il vampiro

"Maciste vs. the Vampire"
Working title: La rivincità di Maciste ("Maciste's Revenge")
Filmed at Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica, and in Yugoslavia
March – April 1961
First released: August 24, 1961
Technicolor, Totalscope, 2.35:1, 97 minutes

Production: Società Ambrosiana Cinematografica (Milan). Distributor: De Laurentiis

Germany: Maciste Grösstes Abenteuer, "Maciste's Greatest Adventure," 8/14/64, 92m
Spain: Puños de Hierro, "Fists of Iron," 9/24/62
UK: Goliath Against the Vampire, Gala Film Distributors Ltd., 7/64, 92m, Certificate "X," passed with cuts
US: Goliath and the Vampires, American International Pictures, 1964, 91m

Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan

"Maciste at the Court of the Grand Khan"
Filmed at INCIR–De Paolis Studios
May – July 1961
First released: October 31, 1961
Technicolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 94 minutes

Production: Panda Cinematografica (Rome), Gallus Productions (Paris). Distributors: Unidis, Jolly Film.

France: Le Géant à la Cour de Kublai Kan, 3/15/63, 92m; Hercule le géant des Mongoles (video title)
Germany: Maciste in der Gewalt des Tyrannen, 3/23/63, 95m
Mexico: Sanson y los Siete Milagros
UK: Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World, Anglo-Amalgamated via Warner Pathé Ltd., 12/62, 77m 34s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World, 12/62, 76m

Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide

"Hercules at the Conquest of Atlantis"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
December 1960 – February 1961
First released: August 19, 1961
Technicolor, Technirama, 2.35:1, 101 minutes

Production: SPA Cinematografica (Rome), Comptoir Français du Film Production (Paris). Distributor: Regionale

Finland: 4/6/62
France: Hercule à la Conquête de l'Atlantide, Comptoir Française du Film Production, 2/14/62, 98m
Germany: Herkules Erobert Atlantis, "Hercules Conquers Atlantis," Rolei, 2/2/62
UK: Hercules Conquers Atlantis, Golden Era Films, 1962, 101m 9s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Hercules and the Captive Women, Woolner Brothers, Allied Artists Pictures Corporation, 4/15/63, 93m

As the American titles of these films show, the name Maciste meant nothing in English-speaking countries. Therefore, when Maciste contro il vampiro was exported, the hero was renamed "Goliath" in the English dubbing (American International having staked a claim on this fictional character with the earlier Goliath and the Barbarians).

Giacomo Gentilomo had also previously worked with Eugenio Bava on Sigfrido, and the onscreen evidence of Maciste contro il vampiro suggests that Gentilomo invited the newly retired Eugenio to keep himself busy by lending the film a creative hand; the scenario required a number of lifelike human sculptures. While Eugenio's contribution is perhaps more noticeable here than that of his son, the film contains some trick shots which indicate that Eugenio farmed out some matte painting work to his son, who was between assignments at the time this film was in production.

WOMEN are abducted and bled to feed the hellish appetite of Kobruk in MACISTE CONTRO IL VAMPIRO.

Maciste (Gordon Scott) and his boy companion Giro (Rocco Vitalazzi), the young brother of his fiancee Julia (Leonora Ruffo), ride back to their home to find their entire village in flames, its people either missing or murdered—the victims of the evil raider Amahl (Van Aikens). As they sail back to their island of Salmanac, Amahl's soldiers slay the old and the very young abductees, feed the useless men to the sharks, and collect the blood of the young women in a chalice to be drunk by the demonic Kobrak (Guido Celano), a vampire belowdecks who compels the people of Salmanac to do his bidding.

Maciste and Giro journey to Salmanac, where they see Julia's friend Magda (Annabella Incontrera) being auctioned in a public square; they enable her to escape, with the escort of the mysterious interloper Kurtik (Jacques Sernas). Maciste and Giro escape Amahl's soldiers by hiding behind a door that leads to Kurtik's domain—a fantastic alchemist's laboratory, stocked with bubbling potions and curious wax figures. Kurtik explains his dedication to destroying Kobrak, and Maciste agrees to accompany him to a tavern where Amahl's soldiers are known to congregate. Shortly after they leave, consigning Giro to Magda's care, the young woman finds a parchment in Kurtik's laboratory, and by pronouncing the dread name of Kobrak, she summons the vampire, who tears out her throat. Salmanac is ruled by Sultan Abdul (Mario Feliciani), a guilty authority figure dominated by Kobrak and his flesh-and-blood associate Astra (Gianna Maria Canale). Astra arrives at the tavern before our heroes, spiriting Julia away to the Sultan's palace before Maciste can rescue her. Maciste tracks Julia to the palace, and the Sultan is so impressed by their mutual love that he grants their freedom—much to the displeasure of Kobrak, who kills the ruler. Astra blames Abdul's death on Maciste, who is pursued with Julia into the desert, where they become disoriented in a sandstorm. They fall underground and discover a secret race of Blue Men—humanoids bred by Kobrak from the bodies of abducted victims. Among them is Kurtik, who is himself a more human, white-skinned Blue Man who rules their legion, determined to cure the others with a potion only one ingredient shy of perfection.

GIANNA MARIA CANALE as Astra, Kobruk's imperious associate.

Kurtik has abducted Astra from the palace and lowers her into a pit with a giant insect creature, but Maciste intervenes, refusing to see her murdered. He promises to find the ingredient and leads an army of Blue Men back to Salmanac, but in a haunted forest outside the kingdom they are overcome by a larger horde of Kobrak's faceless warriors. Young Giro is actually killed in this battle. Maciste is placed in a pit, where Kobrak tries to deafen him with strikes against a giant lowered bell, but Astra (who has found her way back to the monster's side, but has fallen in love with Maciste) saves the hero by secretly providing him with wax to plug his ears. Thinking himself victorious, Kobrak assumes the form of Maciste to take a false and destructive chemical to Kurtik, but the real Maciste arrives in time to best the demon in battle, unmasking him and delivering the ingredient needed to complete Kurtik's formula. Humanity is restored to Maciste's people and his victory is celebrated with the unveiling of a statue in his likeness.

Produced by Paolo Moffa for Società Ambrosiana Cinematografica at the newly built studios of Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica. Maciste contro il vampiro is an entertaining peplum that finds the genre wildly fusing aspects of horror, fantasy, and science fiction, in ways that exceed even the fecund imagination of Francisci's Ercole e la regina di Lidia.

Gordon Scott was born Gordon Werschkul, in Portland, Oregon, on August 3, 1927. Though he matured into quite a good actor, he never aspired to be a movie star; he was a former Las Vegas lifeguard who, after being discovered by producer Sol Lesser, played Tarzan in a half-dozen pictures for RKO and Paramount, culminating in the excellent Tarzan's Greatest Adventure (1959) and Tarzan the Magnificent (1960). Scott came to Italy earlier in 1961 when Steve Reeves suggested him to producer Tonino Cervi as the ideal actor to portray the role of his jealous, headstrong brother in Sergio Corbucci's Romolo e Remo/Duel of the Titans—the story of Romulus and Remus and the founding of Rome, scripted by no less than eight screenwriters, including Corbucci, Ennio De Concini, and Sergio Leone. Scott, who had been unceremoniously replaced as Tarzan after spearheading the long-running series' two finest entries, grabbed the opportunity with both hands and played the role of Remus to the hilt, giving arguably the finest performance of his career. After this impressive peplum debut, Scott was offered Maciste contro il vampiro and became one of no fewer than four actors who were portraying Maciste on Italian screens at the same time: the others were two Americans, Mark Forest and Gordon Mitchell, and one Italian, Kirk Morris (whose real name was Adriano Bellini). Of the four, there is no question that Scott was the best Maciste; he was the best actor and a formidable stunt man as well, which he would demonstrate beyond any question in his next picture, Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan/Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World (1961). Scott is seen here in his best-ever physical condition, attacking the role of Maciste with gusto. [1] He could also act, and there is never a sense (as one often gets with Steve Reeves) that he is merely going through the poses. Scott would remain a working actor on the continent through 1967, the time of his retirement from the screen, playing an appreciably broad range of roles: not only Maciste and others of his ilk, but Julius Caesar, Zorro, Coriolanus, and Buffalo Bill. His career following much the same trajectory as that of his friend and sponsor Steve Reeves—from pepla to swashbucklers to Westerns—Scott eventually won the role that made Reeves famous in Albert Band's unsold TV pilot Hercules and the Princess of Troy (1965), in which he fought an elaborate sea monster built and operated by Carlo Rambaldi. As Italy's premiere monster-builder, it is likely that Rambaldi was responsible for manufacturing the monsters glimpsed in Maciste contro il vampiro, though he received no screen credit.

US one-sheet poster, art by Reynold Brown.

GORDON SCOTT and stunt double Giovanni Cianfriglia (who later had his own screen career as "Ken Wood") grapple as Maciste comes face-to-face with his own evil doppelgänger.

What is most startling about Maciste contro il vampiro, even today, is the unexpected cruelty and ferocity of its images: the village raid with its wall-to-wall atrocities (an arrow fired into a man's eye, another man suspended by one leg and set ablaze); Amahl's rampant slashing of women's arms in the hold of his ship to fill a chalice with blood; Kobruk's monstrous hand emerging from the curtains of a canopied bed to receive the chalice; Magda's unwitting summoning of the vampire in the alchemist's lair, his talons shredding her throat; Astra being lowered into a pit as fodder for a gigantic, gibbering insect; the demon's eyes malevolently peering through a window in the bell intended to deafen Maciste; and the surprisingly bloody death of young Giro, to name a few. The nightmarish quality of these moments is further intensified by hellish lighting, credited to Alvaro Mancori, which accompanies most of Kobrak's appearances with a saturation of red that scalds the screen. The film's aggressive use of color, its stylized aura of supernatural cruelty, and some of its specific images—like Kobruck's curtained presence and the alchemist's lab where an unsuspecting woman is torn to ribbons—anticipate the garishly colored supernatural works of Dario Argento: Suspiria (1977) and Inferno (1980).

Given his past associations with Gentilomo, Eugenio Bava may have contributed some, if not all, of the lifesize wax figures to the picture, including a couple of detailed, elderly examples seen in Kurtik's underground laboratory. Some of these, considering their otherwise unnecessary advanced age, may well have been the statues of Saints which Eugenio had recently finished, or was then in the process of sculpting. Meanwhile, Mario's signature style can be detected in a glass matte of Amahl's ship shown anchored offshore during the village raid (this may well have been a reused matte executed for an earlier picture—it looks familiar), and he may have been involved in photographing some shots, such as the various summonings of Kobrak, which utilize the same technique Bava used to film Arturo Dominici's materialization out of thin air in La maschera del demonio. These required that actor Guido Celano—in costume, off camera—have his lighted reflection aligned with the on-set action on a sheet of glass placed at a 45° angle in front of the camera, enabling him to "appear" or "disappear" by raising or lowering the light on the reflected element. Mario may have also had a hand in creating the latex masks worn by the Blue Men (as he had done with the many Steve Reeves lookalikes in Il ladro di Bagdad), which give them a uniformly passive appearance.

1 In Germany, the film was released as Maciste grösstes Abenteuer ("Maciste's Greatest Adventure"), because Scott's earlier Tarzan film had been very popular there, under the title Tarzan grösstes Abenteuer.

Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan

Gordon Scott's next Maciste project, Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan, was produced by Luigi Carpentieri and Ermanno Donati's Panda Cinematografica and made possible by another Panda production: Piero Pierotti's Marco Polo (1962). The principal screenwriter of both projects was Oreste Biancoli (1897-1971), best-known as the author of Vittorio De Sica's classic Ladri di biciclette/The Bicycle Thief (1948); Biancoli was also a longtime friend of Bava, having written his early photographic assignment Sant'Elena, piccolo isola (1943) and, since the second World War, served as the artistic executive of Scalera Film, where Bava did much of his studio filming.

Starring American actor Rory Calhoun as the 13th century Venetian adventurer, Marco Polo was a resplendent production, the most ostentatious ever undertaken by Carpentieri and Donati. It yielded such magnificent sets (by Zoran Zorcic) and costumes (by Mario Giorsi), and featured so many Asian extras, that the producers saw the wisdom of extending these resources into a second feature. The presence of Gordon Scott in Rome prompted the idea of featuring him in another Maciste film, thus taking advantage of the publicity surrounding the picture he had just completed for Dino De Laurentiis. To American sensibilities, the notion of having Maciste turn up without explanation in 13th century China was far-fetched, but as Oreste Biancoli understood, such an idea was faithful to the screen career of the original Maciste, Bartolomeo Pagano. After his screen debut in Cabiria, Pagono parlayed his success as Maciste into a long career, always as Maciste, who became a timeless figure of the might of right. Maciste could walk the streets of Rome in a toga or a suit and tie; his spirit could be manifest in all lands, in all eras, throughout history, whenever such selfless strength as his was required to counter the forces of evil. Biancoli proposed the storyline, and signed the script with Ennio De Concini, Duccio Tessari, and others.

GORDON SCOTT and Yoko Tani bring the body of the assassinated Prince Ti-sung to a Holy Man in Riccardo Freda's MACISTE ALLA CORTE DEL GRAN KHAN.

The female lead of Marco Polo, the exquisite Yoko Tani, was carried over to the new picture, as were cameraman Riccardo Pallottini and other key personnel. The director's chair was awarded to Carpentieri and Donati's gambling buddy Riccardo Freda.

Although Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan was made possible by the splendors of Marco Polo, so extensive was the larger film's post-production period, the subsidiary feature beat its progenitor into Italian theaters by six months.

In 13th century China, the evil Mongolian pretender Garak (Leonardo Severini) stages a coup that results in the death of the Emperor and sets him up in the palace at Panjan as the regent protector of the Princess Lei-ling (Yoko Tani) and her younger brother, Prince Ti-sung (Chiu Lai Chit). When the children come of age and stand to pose a threat to his control of the throne, Garak is advised by his paramour Liu Tai (Hélène Chanel) to invite the young Prince on a tiger hunt rigged to end in his own demise. She likewise proposes that the murder of the Princess take place during a raid on the convent, which can be rumored as a hiding place for the rebels living in the mountains. Garak's soldiers, led by Bajan (Dante Di Paolo), have Ti-sung bound and leave him as bait in a tiger trap. Just in time, Maciste (Gordon Scott) emerges from the forest to fight the tiger to the death and rescue the Prince, physically uprooting a tree to shake the Mongol soldiers from its branches. He carries the inert form of the Prince to a nearby Buddhist monastery, where the high priest Tao (Valerij Inkijinoff) accepts him thankfully. Tao proposes that the Prince's blood-stained clothing be taken to the palace as "proof" of Ti-sung's demise, and that Maciste join forces with the leader of the rebels, Cho (Gabriele Antonini). Maciste is directed to the House of the Swan, where his meeting with Cho is interrupted by a drunken Mongol soldier who demands a room to share with an unwilling Chinese woman he has commandeered—it is Lei-ling, who fled the convent as it was being raided. She is saved from the brute by Cho, with Maciste's help, neither of them realizing her true identity. Cho offers sanctuary to Lei-ling, to whom he is greatly attracted, and he is humbled when she confides her identity to him. Bajan, looking for the woman taken from his soldier, is led to Cho's home by an informant. Cho, not recognized as the rebel leader, is merely beaten, while Lei-ling is taken to Panjan to be tortured. But when her tattoo is exposed, Garak intervenes and frees her, proposing that they marry instead—much to the chagrin of the ambitious Liu Tai.

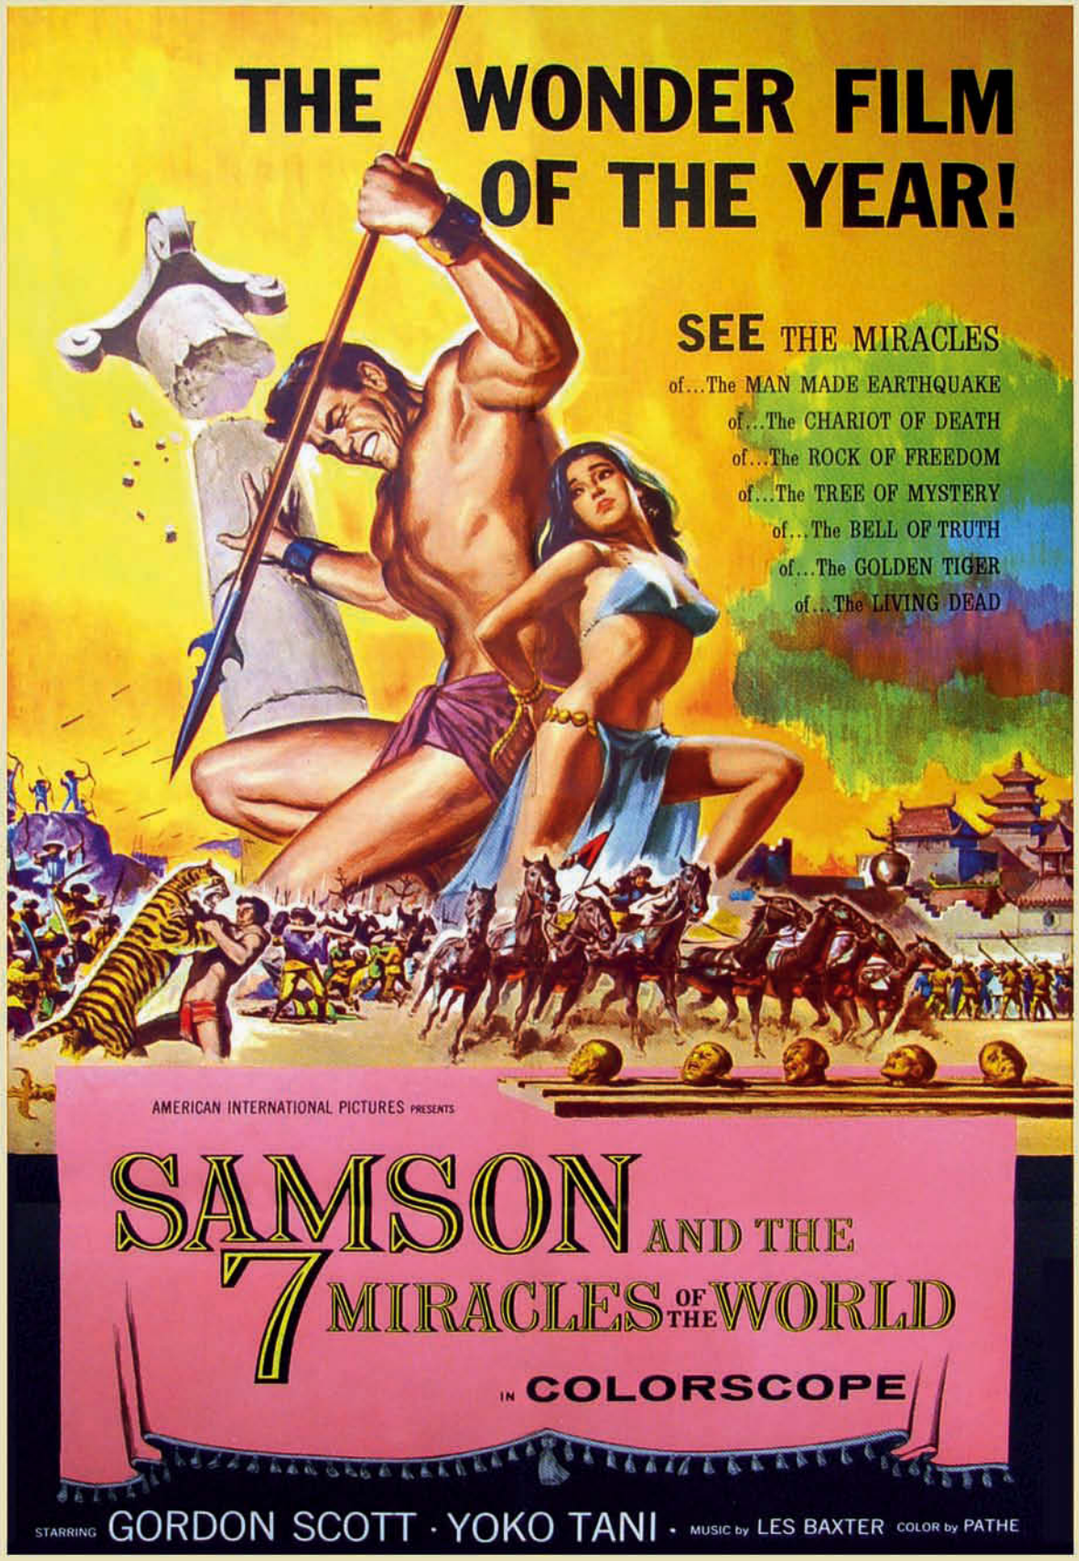
Tao, having taken the Prince's gruesoaked robes to Garak, sends a carrier pigeon back to the monastery with word of the impending marriage. Liu Tai witnesses this, and intercepts the return message announcing Maciste's imminent arrival. The strong man reaches Panjan when a group of rebel prisoners are ceremoniously buried up to their necks in the arena and set to be decapitated for Garak's amusement by a chariot with a blade affixed to its underside. Maciste wrests the chariot from its driver and overturns it before the blade or the horses can reach the vulnerable men. He then flees the scene to the secret entrance to Panjan where he was to meet Tao, whom he finds dead—shackled to the ceiling. He is met instead by Liu Tai, who takes him to Princess Lei-ling. They make a successful escape and thank Liu Tai, who shuns their gratitude and says she did not do it for them. She is promptly arrested and sent to the dungeon for torture at the hands of Garak himself.

In the meantime, Cho and Ti-sung have regained their strength at the monastery, which is now the secret headquarters of Cho's rebel forces. Maciste and Lei-ling arrive with Bajan's army in hot pursuit—Ti-sung insists on joining Cho's men in an effort to fight them off, despite his sister's pleas to the contrary. As the Mongol soldiers invade the monastery on horseback, flailing their swords against the defenseless Buddhist monks, Ti-sung is felled by an arrow. Maciste uses his strength to open a fissure in the wall to permit the escape of the Princess and the others, then allows the ceiling to fall on the Mongols and the Buddhist monks who refused to abandon their temple. He carries the dead body of the Prince through the caverns beyond, until they discover the throne of the Buddhist divinity known as the Wise One (Luang Ham Chou), who reveals the secret of restoring order. Maciste must perform the miracle of ringing the Bell of Freedom at Panjan, an ancient bell encircled by centuries of vines, whose toll will signal to one and all the restoration of Chinese rule and the end of enslavement to the Mongols. Having imparted these words of hope, the Wise One dies. With no unobstructed path to the bell, Lei-ling offers to provide a distraction by returning to Panjan to keep her promise of marriage to Garak.



Finding the bell, Maciste uses all his strength to free its ornate clanger from a profusion of thick vines and rings freedom in, triggering a revolt among the slaves of the Mongols. Garak realizes at once that Lei-ling's return has been a diversion and he orders her sent to Liu Tai's cell. Garak's guards converge around the Bell of Freedom to arrest Maciste; as he turns to challenge them, the bell's heavy clanger swings, striking the back of his head and killing him. Garak makes a show of his dead body to the two imprisoned women and orders his burial in the deepest foundations of the palace. There, the voice of the Wise One resonates within Maciste's dead body, pleading for the miracle of his life to be restored. Maciste awakens from death and summons the strength to escape, his exertions causing a subterranean quake that topples much of the palace grounds during the planned execution of Cho and his rebels. In the confusion, Cho succeeds in hurling a spear into Garak's back, killing him.

Princess Lei-ling and Cho later marry. During the elaborate ceremony, Maciste sees that his work is done and exits in search of the next cause where his strength and integrity will be needed.

AS BAJAN, American actor Dante Di Paolo dispenses tortures to the captives of the Grand Khan.

Riccardo Freda was at his best in the realm of historic adventure and Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan is one of his finest pictures. Impeccably designed, it is also acted with style and conviction. Though Leonardo Severini is hardly convincing as the Grand Khan, he does convince as one of Freda's trademark sadistic villains. The role of the Grand Khan was originally to be played by Dante Di Paolo, who angered Freda by refusing to shave the full beard he was contracted to grow for his next picture, Irving Rapper's Ponzio Pilato/Pontius Pilate (1962). He was replaced by Severini and given the role of Bajan instead. The imperiously seductive Hélène Chanel is well-cast as Liu Tai, less for her distinctly non-Asiatic appearance than for her resemblance to the actress who usually played such roles in Freda's films, Gianna Maria Canale. (Canale's absence from the picture might be explained by the fact that she and Freda had a child around this time—a daughter named Jacqueline.) Purists might quibble over the casting of Japanese-born, French-raised Yoko Tani as a Chinese princess, yet she lends an aura of tender nobility to the character of Lei-ling and gives what is perhaps the most feeling lead female performance to be found in this entire male-dominant genre.

Freda's direction is proud, stoic and exemplary, yet not without humor. In the wake of the fistfight at the House of the Swan, he lets the scene linger on the proprietor surveying a business where everything has been wrecked . . . except for a single vase, which he then voluntarily smashes over the head of a reviving Mongolian troublemaker, losing everything. His Sadean sense is particularly acute here, especially in the scene of Garak administering a solution of salt and vinegar to Liu Tan's flogging welts on the edge of a feather, and going so far as to indulge in the black humor of a cut from the plummeting of a headsman's axe to a shot of a court entertainment juggling an array of head-sized balls.

Dante Di Paolo remembers that on the last day of filming, Freda demanded that he and a team of more experienced horsemen ride in their Mongolian makeup through a field rigged with explosives. Di Paolo was confused, as no such scene appeared in the script and later learned that it was an action scene Freda was directing for Andre de Toth's I mongoli/ The Mongols (1961)!

Notable among the Maciste film's many strengths is that, if not for some blatantly Western casting (particularly Di Paolo as Bajan), it could pass for a film actually lensed in Asia. This illusion was partly the contribution of Mario Bava, who assisted credited cameraman Riccardo Pallottini with a number of unacknowledged trick shots. He created the maquette of the palace at Panjan; painted the palace and other pagoda-like buildings (such as the convent) onto the hilltops of various country roads, sometimes adding to the verisimilitude with a foregrounded tree branch; added a gigantic stone sculpture of an elephant (actually a tiny thing carved by Freda himself) to the foreground of another exterior shot; and employed artful double exposures to multiply the number of extras in epic shots of Asian slaves engaged in toil. He appears to have replaced Pallottini for two scenes that stand out strikingly from the rest of the film's photography: Maciste's covert rescue of Lei-ling from the Grand Khan's palace, which includes a stunning composition of three actors radiant in unique primary color—Tani in yellow, Scott in red, Chanel in blue—while framed on either side by silhouetted sprays of potted plants; and the rain-soaked scene in the cave where Maciste carries the fallen Prince, pierced by an arrow, to the throne of the Wise One and pleads for guidance.

US one-sheet, art by Reynold Brown.

Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan was acquired for US release (as Marco Polo would be) by American International Pictures, who cut nearly 20 minutes from its running time and, as was becoming a tradition, scrapped Carlo Innocenzi's original score in favor of a more boldly orchestrated re-recording by Les Baxter, for which he was accorded sole credit. (Marco Polo had the further indignity of having its direction credited on AIP and British Warner Pathé prints to Hugo Fregonese, who never set foot on the set and merely supervised the recutting and dubbing of the picture. The AIP pressbooks for both films are astonishing in their gall, their publicity stories focusing exclusively on the contributions of Baxter and Fregonese.) Known in America as Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World and abroad as simply Samson and the 7 Miracles, the dubbed version imposed the concept of the miracles on the picture, but they are identified only in the film's advertising: "See the Miracle of—The Golden Tiger! The Tree of Mystery! The Chariot of Death! The Rock of Freedom! The Living Dead! The Bell of Truth! The Man-Made Earthquake!" (The tiger is an ordinary Bengal tiger, and the only possible "Tree of Mystery" is either the one that Maciste uproots to shake some Mongol soldiers off its branches, or the heavy vines ensnaring the Bell of Freedom.) These miracles were presumably conceived as a Samsonesque counterpart to the labors of Hercules, but the first four are incidental rather than miraculous, and only the fifth and sixth are specifically alluded to as miracles in the dialogue (and called the "sixth" and "seventh," incidentally).

While renewing their acquaintance on this production, Mario Bava and Oreste Biancoli resolved to work together again, and they did: Biancoli would script Bava's forthcoming Viking saga, Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror (1961).

Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide

At the very moment that other film companies began to produce their variations on the peplum genre he had fostered, Galatea mogol Nello Santi became embarrassed by the series whose success put his company on the map. He dumped Hercules, and set his sights on making more sophisticated fare like Roberto Rossellini's Viva l'Italia! (1960) and Pietro Germi's Divorzo all'Italiana/Divorce Italian Style (1961).

Mario Bava found this kind of behavior hard to understand: "After Ercole e la regina di Lidia, Santi said, 'Enough of these Hercules films! I won't make any more!' And yet, because of Hercules, he didn't have to work for anyone else for ten years!" [2]

Santi washed his hands of Hercules by selling the franchise to another Italian production company, SPA Cinematografica, which had the distinction of being founded by Giovanni Battista Enrico Antonio Maria (1897-1978), then a member of the College of Cardinals and destined to ascend to the papacy as Pope Paul VI in 1963. SPA's executive producer was Achille Piazzi, who had achieved international success with his first production, Michelangelo Antonioni's Il grido ("The Outcry," 1957). A neorealist drama starring Steve Cochran and Alida Valli, Il grido—scripted in part by the ever-fertile mind of Ennio De Concini—won the Grand Critic's Prize at the 10th Locarno Film Festival and launched Antonioni (who had been directing films since the early 1950s) as one of Italy's most innovative filmmakers. Unlike Santi, Piazzi quickly showed a preference for more commercial entertainment, following Il grido with espionage and action pictures including Tunisi Top Secret and Il raccomandato di ferro (both 1959). SPA's big title for 1960 was announced as La vendetta di Ercole, presumably to star Steve Reeves.

ITALIAN locandina.

2 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

As Reeves later explained, "I never refused the offer to star in a third Hercules film. I was willing to do it, but I wanted to do it with Pietro Francisci, not with some other director."

Reeves' stubborn allegiance to Francisci was unfortunate for several reasons. First of all, SPA's choice to succeed Francisci was Vittorio Cottafavi. Born January 30, 1914, in Modena, Cottafavi wrote his first produced script in 1939 and had been directing since 1943's I nostri sogni, which starred Vittorio De Sica and Paolo Stoppa. By the 1950s, he came to specialize in costume pictures and swashbucklers and, apace with Francisci, pepla. He was more talented than Francisci, though films like La rivolta dei gladiatori/The Warrior and the Slave Girl (1958), Messalina venere imperatrice/Messalina (1959), and Le legioni di Cleopatra/Legions of the Nile (1960) did not prove as popular with audiences. While Francisci had Steve Reeves, Cottafavi had Georges Marchal. A collaboration between Cottafavi and Reeves might have resulted in the greatest peplum of all, but it was not to be. Reeves had become too much an icon of the Italian cinema to be devastated by the loss of his signature role. Anywhere he went, his physique would follow. As we have seen, his retirement as Hercules freed him to pursue new avenues of cinematic heroism.

Meanwhile, the role of Hercules was inherited by another American body-builder, Brooklyn-born Lou Degni (b. 1933), who adopted the screen name of "Mark Forest." According to American International Pictures producer Samuel Z. Arkoff, "The Italian prejudice against local talent was so intense that only American bodybuilders were being hired for films. You couldn't star a man with an Italian name—even if he was an Italian-American!"

HERCULES is attacked by the vampire god Proteus, first in the form of a vulture . . .

Degni had an impressive physique but never won a major bodybuilding title. His accomplishments in this field were coming in 27th in the 1952 Mr. America competition (at age 19), and being named "Mr. Venice Beach" in 1954. He made his acting debut in Cottafavi's La vendetta di Ercole ("The Vengeance of Hercules," 1960). While not one of Cottafavi's best films, it is one of the better pepla, emulating the colorful cinematography, imaginative set design, and weird comic strip goings-on of the Hercules films Bava had photographed. Degni also proved himself a charismatic successor to Reeves. While his bulbous physique lacked Reeves' trim, chiselled perfection, Degni's demeanor was less rigid, more natural and easygoing, resulting in a warmer, more approachable Hercules. But Degni too was fated to lose the coveted role, after gaggling with Achille Piazzi over some of the labors described in the already-completed script for the series' fourth entry.

"It was extremely demanding," Degni complained. "In and out of water, and fighting, and—oh, it was just terrible! I said, 'I can't work under these conditions.' And they said, 'Well, we're going to get Reg Park,' and I said, 'Go ahead and use him . . . I don't care,' because I had other obligations to other companies."[3]

Degni made good on his threat by travelling to Zagreb, Yugoslavia, in November 1960 to star in Maciste nella valle dei Re ("Maciste in the Valley of Kings," 1960), which was later released in the United States as Son of Samson. He continued to work as "Mark Forest" in similar films through the mid-1960s, primarily in the reactivated role of Maciste, and he remains one of the most admired stars of an admittedly minor genre.

Achille Piazzi likewise made good on his threat—by dispatching a telegram to world-famous bodybuilder Reg Park at his gymnasium in Johannesberg, South Africa.

Born in Leeds, England, on June 7, 1928, Reginald Park had been a talented teen athlete. He managed to run the 100-yard dash in slightly more than 10 seconds at age 16. He won Britain's "Perfect Boy" competition the next year and, after spending his military service in Scotland and Malaya, he returned to England and won the Mr. Britain bodybuilding competition at the age of 21. At the time of the events covered in this chapter, Park had twice won the coveted Mr. Universe title (in 1951 and 1958); he had also tried for the title in 1950, coming in second place to the victorious Steve Reeves. (After the events covered in this chapter, he would win the title an unprecedented third time, in 1965.) In addition to these distinctions, by 1961, Park had married and settled down in Johannesberg, where he became the successful owner of a gymnasium and mail order business. Unlike Steve Reeves, Park had never entertained fantasies of an acting career. His success enabled him to respond to Piazzi's screen test invitation with demands not often met by the lire-pinching Italian film industry.

"Send me a First Class round trip ticket, a room in a 5-star hotel, and my expenses for the test, and I'd be happy to come," Park cabled back. [4] No reply was immediately forthcoming, so Park forgot about it and went on with his life. Then, on Christmas Eve, Piazzi telegrammed back, agreeing to meet Park's demands, and flew Mr. Universe to Rome on Boxing Day, December 26.

The resulting film, Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide, was not directed by Mario Bava but Bava's signature style is present in a number of scenes, indicating that he was either hired as an anonymous special effects hand while the film was still in production, or brought in afterwards—perhaps at the time he was hired to direct its sequel, Ercole al centro della terra/Hercules in the Haunted World—to shoot additional material.

While riding home with son Hylas (Luciano Marin), Theban king Androcles (Ettore Manni), and the dwarf Timotheus (Salvatore Furnari), Hercules (Park) witnesses a frightening vision of the world bathed in blood and fire, as a voice utters warnings that the cities of Greece are imperiled by a threat from the heavens. The three men decide to go to the prophet Tiresias (Nando Tamberlani) for an explanation, and he informs them that the threat extends from across the ocean and a place from which no man has returned. Androcles decides to sail into those forbidden waters, and wary of usurpers, Hercules shatters the king's throne so that no one will sit upon it until his return. Tired of battles, Hercules vows to his wife Deianara (Luciana Angiolillo) to settle down and not sail with Androcles. He awakens on the deck of Androcles' ship, out to sea with a minimal crew of ne'er-do-wells, having been drugged and abducted by his adventure-hungry son (who hides belowdecks, so as not to be punished). The hero takes the surprise in good stride, but refuses to lift a finger in assistance—until the crew attempt to steal the ship while Hercules and Androcles are ashore on an island, collecting provisions. Hercules pulls the escaping ship back to shore with its own anchor chain. The pirates are left behind, and the four-man crew advance into the unknown—with Hercules once again refusing to assist. That night, the ship is engulfed in a terrible storm that washes Androcles overboard and separates Hercules from Timotheus and the son he does not yet realize has accompanied them.

Hercules awakens on a chunk of the ruined ship, and follows the delirious cries of Androcles to a foggy shore where he finds a girl (Laura Efrikian, billed as Laura Altan), half-imprisoned in stone, begging to be killed. She is tormented by the evil, vampiric god Proteus, who appears to Hercules as an old man before attacking him in the guises of a horned lizard, a python, a lion, and a vulture. The hero defeats them all, freeing the girl from the stone. She is Ismene, daughter of Queen Antinea (Fay Spain) of Atlantis, who was placed there as a sacrifice to protect the people of Atlantis. With the death of Proteus, the veil of fog protecting Atlantis from discovery is lifted, and Hercules escorts Ismene home. She is not a welcome sight to her mother, however, as it is written in the sacred books of Atlantis that if Ismene survives her mother, the island kingdom will be destroyed. Out of Hercules' sight, Ismene is seized by guards. He later sees Androcles in the corridors of the palace, but as he pursues the phantom, he walks into a mirror image of himself, and then again into one of the Queen's strange-looking, heavy-browed companion officers (led by Mimmo Palmara).

Ismene is taken to a precipice by guards and tied to a tree, where Hylas and Timotheus overcome the guards and free her. Meanwhile, Antinea amuses Hercules with dancing girls and philosophical discussion, but the hero yearns to find his lost friend; the Queen promises him a ship, but that night in his room, an attempt is made on Hercules' life—by Androcles! The king reprises the rhetoric of the earlier vision, about the coming rains of blood and fire, which he more explicitly ties to the fated conquest of the god Uranus. Hercules overcomes his former friend, and Antinea explains that she kept Androcles' presence a secret because he was driven mad by the storm, and is no longer himself. She hopes to calm Hercules with some drugged wine, but he has the foresight not to swallow it. Left alone, he escapes his barred room and follows the soldiers carrying Androcles to a distant pit, meeting Hylas, Timotheus, and Ismane on the road. The soldiers dump meat into a pit of men with burned faces and open sores, and lower Androcles among them. Hercules pummels the gate imprisoning the men, and carries Androcles out—fulfilling the vision of himself. One of the men tells Hercules of a rock, high in the mountains, which Antinea uses to change men; they, with the burns and sores, resisted the rock's influence and were placed in the pit to starve, while others were transformed into evil, invincible creatures.

. . .THEN in the form of a reptilian monster.

3 William Connolly, "Forest in the Valley of Italians," Spaghetti Cinema 31, August 1988, 5–6.

4 John Turner, "Tribute to a Big Man I," Spaghetti Cinema 35, June 1989, 4.

As Hercules climbs toward the place of the rock, the freed prisoners decide to attack Antinea's palace. Hylas tries to stop them, but to no avail. Hercules finds the cave that harbors a large crater emitting an eerie, radium-like light with the power to destroy some ordinary men and mutate others into sons of Uranus. Zenith (Mario Petri)—a priest of Uranus—appears, telling Hercules that the rock was formed from a single drop of blood from the god Uranus; he will continue to worship it until a stronger force appears. Hercules demonstrates his invulnerability to the light, and Zenith admits that only the light of the sun can bring an end to it. Hercules returns to the palace, littered with the corpses of the men from the pit, and combats an army of soldiers, all with the same light hair and heavy brows that mark the sons of Uranus. They overcome him and send him into an underground cell that also holds his son, Hylas. Gas is let into the cell, and the stone ceiling begins to descend, but Hercules succeeds in tipping the ceiling into a ladder, enabling them to climb free. Hercules orders his son to go to safety, but he once again disobeys by disguising himself as a Uranian soldier and getting aboard the ship where Ismene is once again held hostage. Hercules steals a chariot and flees, pursued by Uranian soldiers, who are thwarted by fiery traps and collapsed passages. He makes his way back to the cave of the rock, climbs to the top and tears a chunk from the stone ceiling, letting a ray of sunlight fall near the crater, which will reach it in time. As the heroes are united and the abductors are overcome, the sun reaches the crater, triggering vast volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, and the ultimate destruction of Atlantis. Antinea is crushed by the toppling likeness of her own false god, and Androcles is freed from his amnesia. Unable to remember anything since the storm, the Theban king has his memory refreshed by Hercules: "You saved all of Greece!"

Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide was co-scripted by Vittorio Cottafavi, Alessandro "Sandro" Continenza, and Duccio Tessari. Continenza had previously co-written several films photographed by Bava, including Graziella (1954), Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (1955), Mio figlio Nerone (1956), and La morte viene dallo spazio (1958), and he had also scripted a number of successful pepla, including Edgar G. Ulmer's Annibale/Hannibal and Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia's Gli amori di Ercole/The Loves of Hercules (both 1960). Duccio Tessari, like Mario Bava, had entered the business as a cameraman of documentaries and co-wrote his earliest scripts with the industrious Ennio De Concini, including those for Mario Bonnard's Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei and Sergio Leone's Il colosso di Rodi/The Colossus of Rhodes (1961). He had worked with Bava more recently than Continenza had, as co-author of Le meraviglie di Aladino. Tessari's subsequent works as a screenwriter and director—particularly his impressive debut, Arrivano i titani/My Son the Hero (1961)—indicate that he was responsible for the tongue-in-cheek depiction of Hercules and the supporting character of Timotheus. Cottafavi, the helmsman of La vendetta di Ercole, returned as director, and several crew members from that earlier production also returned, including production designer Franco Lolli and editor Maurizio Lucidi.

Tessari described his working and personal relationship with his director: "The idea to make an ironic Hercules was mine and Cottafavi's. In fact, it's very difficult, when there are two people working together, to establish which of the two came up with an idea, because perhaps it was just a minor thought, a prompting I gave him, or a suggestion, or perhaps one that he gave to me . . . The ideas, when you work together, always come from the whole partnership, because they are stimulated by that circumstance. Cottafavi was a delight, a true gentleman, who was not called Vittorio (like he tells you), but as I discovered, Benedetto Vittorio Emanuele Secondo, and therefore must have come from a monarchic line. He loved me greatly, above all because I smoke cigars and, when I went to dinner at his home, his wife felt obliged to withdraw so that I could smoke, which meant that he was able to smoke too, without being forced to go outside onto the terrace. Cottafavi was a very cultured man, very prepared, very intelligent—which did not go well towards making a film of great commercial success, but he always had the ambition to make a more committed film. He had made films of this sort before, but they hadn't been understood; they performed very badly."[5]

Filming commenced in late January 1961, allowing Reg Park time to get into top condition at the Roman gym on Via Archimede and to grow the required beard. Behind the camera was Carlo Carlini (Fellini's I vitelloni), who shot the picture in Technicolor and Super Technirama, a process introduced by King Vidor's Solomon and Sheba in 1959. A product of Technicolor, Super Technirama (sometimes called Super Technirama 70) utilized special cameras which were fed standard 35 mm negative stock horizontally, resulting in an image more than 2.5 times the size of conventional film, which could be printed directly to 70 mm stock or printed anamorphically on 35 mm stock with a slight squeeze or slight cropping. Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide is sometimes mistakenly referred to as a 70 mm production, but it was actually shot on standard 35 mm stock and never released in 70 mm anywhere in the world.

Park's co-star Fay Spain (1932–83) was an American actress who had been playing teenage roles only a few years earlier—in Roger Corman's Teenage Doll (1957) and Anthony Mann's God's Little Acre (1958)—and was now, at age 29, already portraying the mother of a teenage daughter. Ettore Manni (1927–79), cast as Androcles, had previously played the brother of Anthony Quinn's eponymous character in Pietro Francisci's Attila (1954), and had proved himself a favorite of Cottafavi in La rivolta dei gladiatori and Le legioni di Cleopatra. Manni subsequently appeared in many more pepla, including Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia's La vergini di Roma/Amazons of Rome (1961, co-directed by Cottafavi), Giuseppe Vari's I Normanni/Conquest of the Normans (1962), Andre de Toth's Oro per i Cesari/Gold for the Caesars (1964), and Antonio Margheriti's I giganti di Roma/The Giants of Rome (1964). Manni was playing a role in Fellini's La città delle donne/City of Women at the time of his death in a shooting accident.

The young Luciano Marin was already an experienced hand at peplum roles, having played opposite Steve Reeves in Il terrore dei barbari/Goliath and the Barbarians and in Riccardo Freda's I giganti della Tessaglia (1960). Cottafavi's clout was sufficient to attract amusing guest-star appearances by Enrico Maria Salerno, Ivo Garrani, and Gian Maria Volonté as the decadent kings of Megara, Megalia, and Sparta. A winning addition to the cast is Salvatore Furnari as the dwarf Timotheus, with whom Park demonstrates a fond and respectful rapport. Furnari had previously appeared in I sette nani alla riscossa/Seven Dwarfs to the Rescue (1951) and I giganti della Tessaglia.

Many fans consider Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide—later released in America in condensed, revised form as Hercules and the Captive Women—to be the finest of all pepla. From the very beginning, it takes the viewer by surprise with a pleasingly ironical perspective as a spectacular tavern brawl erupts: fists are flung, chairs are broken over heads, men are hurled into wine barrels, while sitting placidly in the middle of the fracas is Hercules, oblivious to the action as he eats a meal. When one thrown fellow accidentally sweeps Hercules' dinner away, we expect a big change in attitude, but when the man apologizes and returns the meal, Hercules continues with his repast as though nothing happened. Only when he finishes dining does Hercules intrude, stopping the fight with a single outstretched hand that knocks an entire battering ram retinue onto its backsides. Audiences conditioned by the spectacular, show-stopping displays of Steve Reeves' physique were presented here with a strength so self-confident that it didn't need to show off—and when he was forced to do so by circumstance, Reg Park's Hercules humbly apologized to Zeus in advance for his seeming lack of humility.

ALL Uranians look alike to Hercules (Reg Park), as he comes face-to-face with Zenith's soldiers.

Again, there is no question that Steve Reeves was the more handsome, better-sculpted, definitive Hercules, but even under the best circumstances, his acting never fully transcended the woodenness instilled in him by his past experience in competition posing and still photography modelling; these were his ideal milieux. On the screen, Reg Park transcends Reeves in every other way. He is fully at ease in front of the camera, projecting a personality full of warmth, wit, and humor, and not the slightest inclination to take himself too seriously. In one dialogue scene with Antinea, Park wears an effeminate cloth cowl that strikes an amusing counterpoint to his burly image, but it is also entirely in keeping with his whimsical personality. The twinkle in his eye also extends to surprising the audience, as when he is apparently drugged by the wine of a femme fatale (a trick that got the best of Reeves in Ercole e la regina di Lidia) only to spit it out in a jubilant arc at the moment Antinea exits his chambers. Park's past success in athletics as well as bodybuilding also enabled him to perform virtually all of his own stunts. The only real exception is Hercules' high dive into the ocean from a mountain peak, for which Park was doubled.

Park attributed his success in the role to Vittorio Cottafavi: "He used to say to me, 'You are Hercules,' and I had no doubt that I was Hercules. I had scenes where I pushed back a group of nineteen guys holding a log, using just my one hand. I pulled a chain [attached to] a boat out at sea. I was really digging into the sand . . . I worked like Hercules, pulling this bloody thing! Cottafavi made me believe I was Hercules and I really was Hercules! I used to walk around and everyone was saying, 'Hey, Ercole!' and I really loved it."[6]

5 Franca Faldini and Goffredo Fofi, "The Fofi Papers," Spaghetti Cinema 72, July 2000, 2–12.

6 Turner, 13–14.

THE FIGHT against Proteus rages on in this shot, later used as the basis for the film's German release poster.

There is an onscreen credit for the film's special effects, but often in Italian films, this credit is given to technicians responsible for on-set effects—controlling the fire, rigging the collapsing walls, creating the monster suit of Proteus, and so on. Mario Bava's province, as always, was the in-camera trick shot. His uncredited presence is first felt—strongly—during Hercules' vision of the world being bathed in a rain of the blood of Uranus. There is a red-tinted shot of the sun, low in the sky over some mountains, and the camera zooms adroitly in and out as Gino Marinuzzi Jr.'s score begins percolating with queer, electronic impulses. Then the screen turns completely red, and behind the dense veil of color we see an animated bolt of lighting strike a tree, which dissolves into flames, followed by the delirious image of Hercules carrying the fallen Androcles, emerging from the ripples of heat. The scene is something of a ringer in context, because Cottafavi filmed no "moment of recognition" when Hercules later does carry Androcles from the pit of radiation-scarred men, so it ultimately feels like clever padding—a set-up for a moment that does occur, though not with the importance portended.

The scene in which Hercules first glimpses Androcles in a corridor in Antinea's castle, and bumps into his own reflection—which relies on an effective but simply achieved trick mirror shot—may also reveal Bava's hand. This scene (and indeed, the vision sequence previously described) taps into a disorienting, metaphysical vein not elsewhere explored by Cottafavi, while clearly anticipating the celebrated "Mobius strip" sequence of Bava's own Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!.

Bava also executed several matte paintings for the picture: the ceiling of the hall in which the various kings meet to discuss the vision; the arch of stone on the beach where Hercules pulls the ship back to shore (the arch was created by painting a bridge of stone between a mountain on the left, and a large boulder on the right); Ismene's imprisonment in stone on the isle of Proteus (which dissolves optically, allowing the viewer to see the exact areas Bava painted); the establishing shot of Atlantis (painted on glass facing the open sea); the fleet of ships surrounding Atlantis; a columned alcove above the entrance to Antinea's cavern palace; the fiery dissolution of a character when he dares to come into contact with the light from the crater; and the ray of sunlight shining down toward the open crater.

Most of the special effects seen during the climactic volcanic destruction of Atlantis were a combination of volcanic stock footage (somewhat distorted by virtue of having been filmed in a different widescreen gauge) and reused footage from the climax of L'ultimi giorni di Pompei.

Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide was reasonably successful in Italy, earning more than half a billion lire [$312,000] in its initial release—not as much as Steve Reeves' latest, Il ladro di Bagdad, but enough to suggest that Hercules had a strong chance of survival apart from the man who made the role famous.

An English-language version of Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide (entitled Hercules Conquers Atlantis) was prepared in order to attract international sales. By this time, American International Pictures' James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff were buying Italian genre films almost by the dozen, but they flatly refused to consider Hercules Conquers Atlantis as an acquisition due to a sour past business relationship with producer Achille Piazzi. To explain this situation, we must go back one or two years, before either Mark Forest or Reg Park had arrived on the scene.

Sometime in 1959–60, Achille Piazzi and Gianni Fuchs had approached Arkoff and Nicholson with an invitation to co-produce an original peplum film in Italy using an American cast and an American screenplay. George Worthing Yates (The Amazing Colossal Man) was hired to write an original script entitled Goliath and the Dragon, conceived as a sequel to their successful acquisition, Goliath and the Barbarians.

"Steve Reeves was Goliath in our first film, and we planned to use him again if we could get him," Arkoff explained, "but, by the time everything was ready, Reeves had become aware of the success of Hercules in America and he suddenly became very expensive and very busy. We finally wound up with Richard Harrison, a Muscle Beach devotee, who hadn't been to Italy yet. We were also going to use Debra Paget, who was a well-known actress and already in Italy making a picture."

An elaborate, life-size, fire-breathing dragon's head was constructed for the picture by AIP's resident monster maker Paul Blaisdell and Marcel Delgado, a veteran master of special mechanical effects who had worked on The Lost World (1925) and the original King Kong (1933). The immense prop was crated and flown to Rome in the belly of a TWA airliner.

"Anyway," Arkoff continued, "I flew over to Italy to make a deal with the same team responsible for the first picture, and we were all set to go. Then, out of the blue, Achille Piazzi and his cohort Gianni Fuchs upped our budget by 50%! 'You always make certain changes'—that was their excuse! They were used to big American companies coming over to make Ben-Hur, where money was never a problem. I said, 'Nothing doing! I don't operate that way. I have a deal with you, and I want to make this picture with you, but I'm not going to be blackmailed!' They expected me to give in, because American companies always give in on these deals. Nobody ever went to Italy without coming back with a picture . . . but I did! After all, the company was mine, and I didn't have to answer to anybody. So Goliath and the Dragon was disbanded and everybody went back to the States, and nothing was filmed."

After returning home to Los Angeles, Sam Arkoff collected his wife and children and took them on a trip to Japan (where AIP was preparing to co-produce a film), followed by side trips through India and Bangkok. When the Arkoffs arrived in India, Sam found a telegram waiting for him, sent by his Italian liaison Fulvio Lucisano. "His wire reported that there was a Hercules film being made in Rome which had suddenly run out of money, and there was an opportunity for AIP to acquire it," Arkoff recalled.

The film turned out to be Achille Piazzi's next production, La vendetta di Ercole, starring Mark Forest. "The picture was about half-done, and what had happened was . . . the completion bond company . . . all of the money hadn't been in the kitty, and the company got caught. They no longer had the money and they were desperately looking for someone to take the picture over. So I told them that American International would take the picture over . . . if they used our dragon!"

And so George Worthing Yates' screenplay of Goliath and the Dragon was never filmed. Instead, AIP funded the completion of La vendetta di Ercole and had an additional scene scripted, in which Mark Forest grappled with AIP's dragon head. The scene is not included in European versions of the picture. AIP got their picture, but they had no intention of working again with Achille Piazzi.

Consequently, the US distribution rights to Hercules Conquers Atlantis fell to Bernard and Lawrence Woolner, two theater chain owners who had just set up their own releasing company—Woolner Brothers—whose product would be distributed by Allied Artists, much as some of Roger Corman's Filmgroup productions were distributed to theaters by American International. The Woolner brothers had in fact entered the movie-making business through Corman's auspices. Bernard Woolner (1910–77) served in production capacities on Corman's Swamp Women (1955) and Teenage Doll (1957, which had starred Fay Spain), the latter of which marked the entry of brother Lawrence (1912–85) into the business as associate producer. Bernard later produced the infamous sci-fi cheapie Attack of the 50 Foot Woman (1958, directed by Nathan Juran as "Nathan Hertz"), which marked the beginning of his relationship with Allied Artists. Hercules Conquers Atlantis was the Woolners' first overseas acquisition. After undergoing a series of cosmetic alternations for the US market, it became the first Woolner Brothers release, under the title Hercules and the Captive Women.

Hercules and the Captive Women was made under the "executive supervision" of Hugo Grimaldi, who had some prior experience with this sort of film doctoring, having "supervised" Gigantis, the Fire Monster (the American edit of Ishiro Honda's second Godzilla film Gojira no gyakushu, 1955), Mill of the Stone Women (the US version of Giorgio Ferroni's 1960 Italian horror classic Il mulino delle donne di pietra) and Assignment: Outer Space (a re-edit of Antonio Margheriti's seminal 1960 Italian science fiction space opera, Space Men).

The original, cheap-looking title sequence, which accompanied the tavern brawl, was replaced in the Grimaldi cut by a new animated title sequence by Filmation Associates. The titles (which credit the direction to "Vittorio Cottafan") are followed by a map of Greece and narration introducing Androcles (whose original introduction was more obscure and unflattering), Hercules and Hylas, via clips from the excised brawl sequence. ("Good natured brawling was a necessity to keep the warriors fit and strong," we're told.) The re-edit races to Bava's blood-tinted vision sequence as quickly as possible, and also abbreviates the scene of the meeting between the Grecian rulers so that most of Ivo Garrani's and Enrico Maria Salerno's exaggeratedly fey approach to their characters line is eliminated. The choreographed dance sequence, staged for Hercules by Antinea, is also abbreviated. The US version also rethinks the original scoring of the picture, keeping most of the original score, while adding a bizarre patchwork of library music to previously unscored scenes. The scene of Hylas' initial rescue of Ismene is largely scored with familiar "thrill" cues from Universal's Creature From the Black Lagoon (1954). Although the Woolners acquired the picture in 1961, Grimaldi's work and other considerations held it back from actual release in America until 1963.

Bernard and Lawrence Woolner were only two of the international film people who expressed financial interest in the production as it was ongoing. "While we were filming, there were distributors from all over the world coming in—from Japan, India, America," Reg Park remembers. "And before the film was finished, they were already making bids for it. And [the production assistant] said to me, 'Why don't you do another one?' So I signed a deal to do another one, called Hercules in the Center of the Earth."[7]

7 Ibid.

PROMOTIONAL art (we assume) for the original Italian release of ERCOLE AL CENTRO DELLA TERRA—the hardest-to-find Italian poster material for any Bava film.

ERCOLE AL CENTRO DELLA TERRA

Hercules in the Haunted World

THEN IT HAPPENED. Virtually overnight, Mario Bava became an international success.

In February 1961, American International pictures released Black Sunday in the United States, where it quickly became the top-grossing film in the company's history. This was an unheard-of level of commercial success for an Italian picture in America, and it was suddenly the talk of the Italian film community. Achille Piazzi, the producer of Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide, must have been astounded to discover the director of this international hit working anonymously on his shaky payroll. Furthermore, Bava was the man who had photographed the first two Hercules films with Steve Reeves! While the rest of the Italian film industry scrambled to respond to the success of Black Sunday with the sincerest form of flattery, Piazzi signed Bava to photograph, provide the special effects for, and direct Reg Park's second Hercules picture.

Even before Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide had completed filming, screenwriter Sandro Continenza set to work on a treatment for the sequel, under Bava's supervision. Subsequent drafts were hammered out by Duccio Tessari and Bava's assistant director, Franco Prosperi. Bava may not have been entirely pleased with the script he was given to film, but he approached every new project gamely.

"He was very modest, even modest about the things he knew, and he knew a great deal," observes Bava's friend Andrea Piazzesi. "Every film he made began with him saying, 'Why not?' He simply tried to make them as best he could. He would never dream of turning down a script, or saying that it wasn't good enough for him. He would more likely say, 'Who am I to say this isn't a good script?'"

Bava's second solo directorial effort proves the extent to which he was capable of imbuing a film with his own personality, even when the script came together in haste. Quite the opposite of Reg Park's first Hercules film, which relied heavily on actual beachfront locations and brightly lit sets, Ercole al centro della terra would reflect its maker by being shot almost entirely in the studio, and to an almost miraculous extent within the camera itself, delving into realms of trompe-l'oeuil not explored on the same elemental level since the pioneering days of the silent cinema.

Synopsis

Hercules and his friend Theseus are attacked by blundering mercenary troops, unaware of whom they've been paid to kill. When Hercules hurls an entire wagon in their direction, the attackers recognize the demigod and retreat to Ecalia, where the evil Lico punishes their failure with death. Hercules sets out for Ecalia to wed Deianara, daughter of the late King Uretes, [1] unaware that Lico—her uncle—has preempted her (and Hercules') ascent to the throne by hypnotically enslaving her to a state of living death. Lico explains to Hercules that Deianara was driven mad by his long absences, uncertainties about his faithfulness, and her father's death. Kyros, a friend of the couple, promises to bring other facts to Hercules' attention later that night, but he is found dead at their meeting place, with Lico not far away. Lico explains that Ecalia is under a curse and suggests that Hercules consult the oracle Medea, who may channel good counsel from the lips of Zeus.

Medea refuses to speak at first, but when Hercules offers to surrender his immortality for information about how to break the spell over Deianara, she responds favorably. She informs him that Deianara's soul is imprisoned by evil forces and may only be restored by the Stone of Pluto—a rock that glows like white fire, which can be found only in Hades, the Kingdom of the Dead. To enter and exit Hades safely, he must first obtain the Golden Apple of the Hesperides. Hercules is joined in his quest by Theseus and Telemachus, a buffoon who is vying for the affections of Theseus' girlfriend Jocasta. After commandeering a magic ship from the ogre Sunis, the three men sail for Hades. They grow sleepy, the blood-red skies darkening as a seam in the ocean opens to ensnare their vessel, swallowing them.

They awaken in the Garden of the Hesperides, daughters of the Sun who have been damned to live in eternal night for their acts of cannibalism. While Hercules climbs a Sacred Tree to reach the fabled apple, the Hesperides deliver his companions to the torture chamber of the golem-like Procrustes. After falling from a high branch, Hercules collects a boulder, unbridles a chariot and uses the leather straps as a makeshift slingshot, asking Zeus to guide his hand if his cause is just. The Golden Apple falls to the ground. Thus, Hercules frees the Hesperides from their curse, and they warn him of his friends' endangerment. They tell him that no one has ever defeated Procrustes, but to do so will open the gates of Hades. Indeed, when Hercules destroys Procrustes by hurling his stone body against a stone wall, the impact clears a portal to Hades.

Telemachus is sent back to the ship to guard the Golden Apple, while Hercules and Theseus enter Hell. The advice of the Hesperides ("Believe only in what you do yourself; do not believe in what you think you see") is valuable as they brave illusory canyons of fire

LEONORA RUFFO as Deianara.

Ercole al centro della terra

"Hercules at the Center of the Earth"
Working title: Ercole nel regno dei morti, "Hercules in the Realm of the Dead"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
May 29 – July 1961
First released: November 16, 1961
Technicolor, Totalscope Super 100, 2.35:1, 91 minutes

Production: SPA Cinematografica (Rome), Omnia Deutsche Film Export (Germany). Producer: Achille Piazzi. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Franco Prosperi. Screenplay: Alessandro Continenza, Mario Bava, Franco Prosperi, Duccio Tessari. Continuity: Bona Magrini. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Ubaldo Terzano. Camera assistants: Giuseppe Berta, Luciano Brebbia. Art direction: Franco Lolli. Assistant art director: Giuseppe Ranieri. Set construction: Antonio Sarzi Braga. Special effects [uncredited]: Eugenio Bava, Mario Bava. Wardrobe: Mario Giorsi. Wardrobe assistant: Sylvano Giusti. Makeup: Franco Palombi. Makeup assistant: Renzo Francioni. Production manager: Danilo Marciani. Production inspector: Giorgio Baldi. Production assistants: Giovanna Pelligrino, Alfredo Petri. Production secretary: Dino Di Salvi. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Assistant editor: Lina Caterini. Music: Armando Trovajoli [Fonolux]. Sound: Luigi Puri. Sound effects: Tonino Cacciottolo. Publicity: Giuseppe Di Martino. Distributor: Imperialciné.

Additional US credits: Executive supervision: Hugo Grimaldi. Title animation by Filmation Associates.

Reg Park (Hercules), Leonora Ruffo (Deianara), Christopher Lee (Lico), Giorgio Ardisson (Theseus), Franco Giacobini (Telemachus), Ida Galli (Persephone), Ely Draco (Jocasta), Mino Doro (Keros), Aldo Pedinotti (Sunis), Marisa Belli (Aretheuse), Gaia Germani (Medea), Monica Neri (Elettra/Helena), Raf [Rafaelle] Baldassare (mercenary), Elisabetta Pavan (Tamar), Grazia Collodi (Electra), Claudio Marzulli.

Australia: Hercules in the Centre of the Earth, KGH Presentation, 1963, 77m
Austria: Herkules Gegen die Vampire, "Hercules vs. the Vampire" Belgium: Herculus Tegen de Vampiers, "Hercules vs. the Vampire"
Denmark: Herkules i Underverdenen, "Hercules in the Underworld," 11/26/62
France: Hercule Contre les Vampires, "Hercules vs. the Vampires," Comptoir Français du Film Production, 5/9/62
Germany: Vampire Gegen Herakles, Rolei, 4/27/62, 83m, Atlas (16 mm); Vampiren gegen Herkules (TV)
Mexico: Hercules al Centro de la Tierra, Distribuídora Sotomayor S.A., "Filmida con el Ultramoderno Sistema di 70 mm" ["Filmed in the Ultramodern System of 70 mm"]
UK: Hercules in the Centre of the Earth, Golden Era Distributors Ltd., 11/62, 76m 34s, Certificate "U," passed without cuts and demonic winds. Separated from the Stone of Light by an ocean of lava, Hercules cuts a length of vine that (as in Dante's Inferno) houses the screaming, bleeding souls of the damned, ties it to a boulder and hurls it to the other side. Theseus falls during their precarious crossing, seemingly killed in this vortex of illusion. He awakens elsewhere in Hades in the presence of a beautiful woman. Instantly enamored of her, he vows to rescue her from Hades, with or without Hercules' permission. Meanwhile, Hercules obtains the Stone of Light and returns to the ship, happy to find Theseus still alive—but unaware of the stowaway. The three men sail back to Ecalia, ignorant of the fact that the woman on board is Persephone, "the favorite daughter of Pluto."[2] The seas erupt in a great storm of Plutonian anger, which Theseus calms by throwing the Golden Apple into its depths.
US: Hercules in the Haunted World, Woolner Brothers, Allied Artists Picture Corporation, 4/64, 84m

In their absence, Ecalia has succumbed to accursed droughts and Hercules is jeered by the masses upon his return for bringing them bad luck. Theseus also turns against Hercules, boasting that he will do anything to defend his love for Persephone, even if it means killing his friend. Hercules successfully revives Deianara with the Stone of Light, and is told by Lico that Pluto has cursed Ecalia for something the demigod has done. In search of answers, Hercules seeks the counsel of Medea once more. With Hercules out of the way, Lico murders Deianara's handmaiden Helena and abducts the princess, carrying her to a sacrificial altar where he plans to cement his rule of Ecalia by drinking her royal blood at the moment of the lunar eclipse—"when the moon is devoured by the Great Dragon." Medea warns Hercules that Theseus must renounce Persephone or else the Dead will walk the Earth; he races back to the palace and finds much mayhem. Hercules and Theseus fight, and Persephone takes advantage of her loved one's unconsciousness to bless him with forgetfulness and return to Hades. Hercules pursues Lico to the altar, where he is besieged by armies of the dead. Using the monolithic stones of the temple against them, Hercules keeps the demons at bay until sunrise—at which point Lico bursts into flames. The curse is ended.

The next morning, Theseus remembers nothing of the adventure and Telemachus returns with Jocasta, who has agreed to be his wife. Theseus and Jocasta embrace and run away together, and Telemachus throws himself into the sea in exasperation. Hercules embraces Deianara on the threshold of a new life together.

HERCULES (Reg Park) and Theseus (Giorgio Ardisson) sail toward Hades.

Ercole al centro della terra has its narrative origins in the eleventh and twelfth labors of the Greek hero. According to the myths, Hercules married Megara, the daughter of the Theban king. Driven mad by Hera—the jealous, bedeviling wife of Hercules' immortal father Zeus—Hercules murdered his wife and children. When he recovered his sanity, he exiled himself from Thebes and threw himself on the mercy of his cousin Eurystheus, King of Mycenae, for twelve years. If, by the end of that period, he had satisfied all of the king's outlandish demands, he would be forgiven his sins and granted the gift of immortality.

After Hercules had already fulfilled ten impossible demands, Eurystheus was seized by a further whim to feast his eyes on Cerberus, the legendary three-headed hound that guards the gates of Hell. Hercules was ordered to borrow the monster from Pluto himself and was accompanied in his descent by Mercury, the patron of travellers, and Minerva, the Roman goddess of Wisdom—not Theseus and Telemachus, his hapless companions in Bava's film. Pluto granted Hercules permission to bring the three-headed hound out into the light of day, provided he could accomplish the feat with his own bare hands. (Some versions of the myth mention that Hercules had to beat consent out of Pluto.) He overcame Cerberus, laid the animal at the feet of Eurystheus and later returned the guardian to the gates of Hell. During the course of this adventure, Hercules took the opportunity of being in Hades to liberate Theseus, a friend who had been imprisoned there since attempting to imitate his labors by abducting Persephone, Queen of Hades.

Hercules' final task was the retrieval of the Golden Apple of the Hesperides. This rare and luminous fruit was a wedding gift given to Hera by the Earth goddess, watched over in later years by the daughters of Night and a ferocious dragon. There are two variants of the myth; in one, Hercules slays the dragon and fetches the apple himself, while in another, he appeals to Atlas, the father of the Hesperides, to obtain the apple from his daughters, taking the weight of the world onto his own shoulders during his absence.

1 The names "Deianara" and "Uretes" are corruptions of Deianira and Eurystheus, as the names are found in the original Greek Myths.

2 According to the Greek myths, Persephone was not the daughter of Pluto, but rather his wife. This mistake was originated in the English-dubbed export version of the film, as Ida Galli's character goes by the correct name of Myosotide in the original Italian version.

LICO has more than avuncular plans for Deianara . . .

Ercole al centro della terra plays fast and loose with its mythic bases, but it is essentially a workable compression of these final labors into a single adventure. In other ways, it distorts and parodies Greco-Roman mythology. Procrustes—an Attican robber renowned for stretching and amputating victims to make them taller and shorter—is portrayed as an absurd, kiddie matinee golem. It was one of Theseus' most famous accomplishments to rid the world of Procrustes, but his glory is pre-empted here by Hercules.

In Homer's The Odyssey, Telemachus is the son of Odysseus, a handsome young man of naturally regal bearing. In Bava's film, Telemachus is a scrawny, comic relief buffoon. (If only the film had reunited Park's Hercules and the diminutive Timotheus from the previous film!) While the myths tell of no adventures shared by Hercules and Telemachus, both men were mentored by Minerva, who accompanied Hercules on his descent into Hades and led Telemachus back to his home to defend his mother Penelope from encroaching suitors in his father's absence.

The closest mythic parallel for the film's villain, Lico, is Lichas,[3] a friend of Hercules. Many years after their marriage, when Deianara became aware of her husband's interest in Iole,[4] she arranged for Lichas to bring him a gift tunic, which she had dyed red in the lethal blood of a centaur. Feeling himself poisoned, Hercules managed to throw the unwitting Lichas into the sea as a dying gesture of anger and vengeance.

Cast

Barbara Steele may have achieved notoriety as "The Queen of Horror" after her star-making appearance in La maschera del demonio, but Ercole al centro della terra marked Mario Bava's first experience of directing an established horror star. Hired to appear opposite Reg Park in the imperious role of Lico was the man whose work Bava held directly responsible for making the Italian horror film (and his own directorial debut) commercially feasible: Christopher Lee.

Born May 27, 1922, Christopher Frank Carandini Lee made his screen debut in Terence Young's Corridor of Mirrors (1948) and played increasingly visible supporting roles in more than thirty pictures before being cast as the pathetic, man-made Creature in Terence Fisher's The Curse of Frankenstein (1957), the first full-color adaptation of Mary Shelley's famous novella. This fortuitous casting led directly to the role responsible for his "overnight" stardom: Count Dracula in Fisher's Dracula/Horror of Dracula (1958). Fluent in six languages, the 6' 5" Lee resided during 1961 in Geneva, Switzerland, and found it as easy to drive to acting assignments in Paris, Rome, Berlin, or Munich in his trusty Volkswagen as it was to drive to London for the latest Hammer production. Indeed, between 1960 and 1964, Lee made close to twenty films—only three of which were for Hammer.

"One of the reasons I made so many films in French, German, Italian, and so on," Lee explains, "was simply that I wanted people in those countries to say, 'Yes, we know this actor, because he's done films in our country, in our language'—which is important to an actor in these days of increasingly international co-production."[5] One of Lee's earliest continental features was Steno's bloodsucking spoof Tempi duri per i vampiri/Uncle Was a Vampire (1959), a parody inspired by the Italian success of Hammer's Dracula il vampiro.

Lee liked Mario Bava enormously: "He was delightful to work with, a fine technician, and a very intelligent man. His behavior during the shooting of a film was always courteous and helpful, at times even hilarious. He was full of praise for the cast and crew. He may have been more concerned with the technical aspects of a film, but it never showed." Lee thought so highly of Bava that, after returning home to London from this assignment, he encouraged his friend and neighbor Boris Karloff to accept an offer from American International to star in Bava's I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath—which Karloff did.

Given the important supporting role of the incorrigibly romantic Theseus was Giorgio Ardisson, who had previously played supporting roles in Andre de Toth's Morgan il pirata and Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ultimo dei vichinghi. As Reg Park remembered, "Giorgio Ardisson [used to be] one of the Vatican guards, [but] always wanted to be a movie actor. Good-looking kid—

3 European credits identify this character as "Lichas," though the actors who speak his name onscreen are clearly saying, "Lico."

4 If we observe the chronology of the original myths, Hercules' later involvement with Iole would make Le fatiche di Ercole and Ercole e la regina di Lidia, the two Steve Reeves films, sequels to Ercole al centro della terra.

5 Robert W. Pohle Jr. and Douglas C. Hart, The Films of Christopher Lee (Metuchen NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1986), vii.

6 Ibid.

7 US viewers may not realize this, because Giacobini's comic relief scenes were cut from Gli invasori, when it was re-edited and distributed by AIP under the title Erik the Conqueror.

blonde hair, nice body, but never trained. One of the Cardinals said to Achille Piazzi, the producer, 'Please, this guy is not cut out to be a guard. He's a guard because his mother wanted him to be a guard!'" [6]

Bright-eyed, lean, and eager to please, Ardisson provided a strong contrast to Park's ursine charisma and more than lived up to the opportunities provided him. Bava liked Ardisson's looks and athletic energy, and he would cast him in another important role in Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror.

Eleonora Ruffo, billed here as "Leonora Ruffo," originated the role of Deianara in Cottafavi's La vendetta di Ercole and came to Bava's film after playing the female lead in Gentilomo's Maciste contro il vampiro. She later appeared in Pietro Francisci's 2+5: Missione Hydra/Star Pilot (1966).

Cast as Persephone (not Myosotide, as cited in many sources) was Ida Galli, born Adriana Galli in Sestola, Italy, in 1941. She would adopt a number of different names over the course of her acting career. It was as Ida Galli that she also appeared in Federico Fellini's La dolce vita (1960) as "Debutante of the Year," and also in the Galatea productions Fantasmi a Roma/The Ghosts of Rome and Roma contro Roma/War of the Zombies (1964). Bava must have liked her, because they worked together again on La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, with Galli working as "Isli Oberon."

Appearing as Telemachus, the son of Odysseus and Penelope—described in Homer's Odyssey as a handsome man of naturally regal bearing—is Italian comic actor Franco Giacobini. Active in films since Via Padova 46 (1954), Giacobini may have come to Bava's attention as he studied Christopher Lee's performance in Steno's Tempi duri per i vampiri. Bava and Giacobini got along well enough that he hired him for Gli invasori (1961), in which he played Rustichello, essentially a reprise of his cowardly, trouble-prone Telemachus. [7] Giacobini later worked with Christopher Lee a third time, in the West German production Sherlock Holmes und das Halsband des Todes/Sherlock Holmes and the Deadly Necklace (1962), directed by Terence Fisher. His last reported film appearance was dated 1974.

Gaia Germani, masked throughout the film in her brief appearance as the oracular Medea, was a pretty Yugoslavian actress who can be seen unmasked, opposite Christopher Lee, as the heroine of Il castello dei morti vivi/Castle of the Living Dead (1964), directed by Lorenzo Sabatini a.k.a. "Warren Kiefer."

Rosalba Neri, who previously appeared in Esther and the King, is listed in many sources as a cast member of Ercole al centro della terra, as indeed she was intended to be. But the credit is erroneous—in fact, something of a willful deception. Though Italian and German prints of the film credit "Rosalba Neri, c.s.c." in the cast (designating her as a graduate of the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica), other prints credit Monica Neri. In a 2002 telephone conversation with Kit J. Gavin, Neri explained that Monica Neri was "a close relative" (she declined to reveal whether she was a sister, half-sister, or cousin) who "appeared in two movies instead of me, because the resemblance was considerable . . . but I am sure you agree, darling, that I was far, far more beautiful!" Apparently Rosalba was contracted to appear in the film, but fell ill at the last minute or had something better to do, so she sent Monica to the set in her place. The still-unanswered question is, "Which role did Monica Neri play?" In one print of the film that carries her name, Monica

. . .AS Theseus and Hercules brave the fiery pits of Hades.

HERCULES and Theseus must cut a path through the Hadean jungle of vines, filled with the blood of the damned.

THESEUS (Giorgio Ardisson) appears to be swallowed up in an ocean of molten lava.

DON'T believe in what you think you see: That's Monica Neri, not her lookalike relative Rosalba Neri, as a Hadean apparition.

Neri is billed above Ely Draco (who plays Theseus' girlfriend Jocasta in the first and final scenes) and below Marisa Belli (the Queen of the Hesperides); these are both prominent, speaking roles, so Neri's role should be at least as prominent. While some European publications at the time identified her role as "Egle"—a name not heard in the English or Italian version, which is reportedly used in the German version to identify one of the Hesperides women who greet Theseus and Telemachus in the grotto of Procrustes—other, later references credit Rosalba Neri in the role of "Helena." The English version features a single line of dialogue in which Deianara addresses her first handmaiden (the one later killed by Lico) as Helena; she is called Elettra in the Italian version. The fact that the actress playing this part looks nothing like Rosalba Neri only confuses the matter further. The only actress who shares the sultry look and voluptuous figure of Rosalba Neri is the nude woman, bound to a rock by chains, encountered in Hades by Hercules and Theseus and revealed to be an illusion. I am convinced, on the basis of Rosalba's explanation, that this actress must be Monica Neri.

Production

Scripted as Ercole nel regno dei morti ("Hercules in the Realm of the Dead"), the film's working title was changed at some point to Ercole contro i vampiri ("Hercules Against the Vampires") to exploit the casting of Christopher Lee. However, Dino De Laurentiis preempted this plan when his own latest production, La rivincita di Maciste, changed its title to Maciste contro il vampiro shortly before its release.

Consequently, Bava's film was given a new identity, which traded on the title of another recent Italian boxoffice success: Viaggio al centro della terra—that is, Journey to the Center of the Earth, made in 1959 by Bava's erstwhile associate, Le meraviglie di Aladino director Henry Levin. The title and the coincidence suited Bava's sense of irony, and thus Ercole al centro della terra was born. Bava later had his revenge on De Laurentiis in France and Germany, where his film was released first and thus could play under its original title. The De Laurentiis production was renamed Maciste contro le Fantôme ("Maciste Against the Phantom") for its French release.

Whereas Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide had been a comparatively lavish co-production of SPA and Comptoir Française du Film Production of Paris, Ercole al centro della terra was produced solely by SPA at Cinecittà with ludicrously minimal means. "For this film, I had to make a little bet with myself," Bava later confessed, "that I could shoot the entire picture using only one segmented wall composed of doors and windows, and four moveable columns."[8]

Bava was exaggerating, but only a little. The columns were inherited, incidentally, from Riccardo Freda's 1960 film I giganti della Tessaglia—they are visible in its very first scene.

"This story is basically accurate, and I can vouch for it," Christopher Lee attests. "The only exceptions to the sparse scenery were the scenes shot on location." These were shot at the usual Tor Caldara beach locations near Anzio, with the opening scenes filmed once again at the picturesque falls of Cascate di Montegelato.

Virtually every interior set seen in the film is limited to the components described by Bava, with the set flats moved and reassembled in different configurations, and the white columns multiplied by mirrors and variously "painted" with colored gel lighting. Everything else—the exterior sets, the doors, the boat, even the wardrobe—were leftover pieces from earlier mythological films shot at Cinecittà.

For those viewers with an eye for such things, Ercole al centro della terra is a veritable rummage sale of props identifiable from other films. Medea wears a stylized mask previously worn by a nightclub entertainer in an early scene of Fellini's La dolce vita, and the Art Nouveau throne of the Queen of the Hesperides can also be seen in Edgar G. Ulmer's L'Atlantide/Journey Beneath the Desert (1961) as the ornamental throne of Antinea (Haya Harareet), Queen of Atlantis.[9] In this way, Ercole al centro della terra showcases Bava's uncanny ability to conjure a film "out of nothing," building a metaphysical scenario around a set of unrelated and all-too-earthly props, in much the same way he had previously juggled stock footage to create the illusion of global catastrophe in La morte viene dallo spazio.

Despite its thrift shop origins, Ercole al centro della terra obtained an aura of grandeur by being photographed in the new Totalscope Super/100 format. According to Robert E. Carr and R. M. Hayes' book Wide Screen Movies, Totalscope Super/100 "probably refers to a 100 mm prime lens used with the anamorphics. It doesn't refer to the film gauge. It might, though not likely, refer to the intention to project the anamorphic image onto a concave screen of 100°."[10] When projected on flat American theater screens, the image width does indeed overspill the periphery, and even the 2.35:1 DVD presentation looks ever so slightly squeezed and cropped at the sides, so a curved screen may well be essential to the film's most accurate presentation. Ercole al centro della terra has the apparent distinction of being the only feature film ever photographed in Totalscope Super/100, which is probably due to the less-than-universal applications of the gauge.

Bava marked his return to color cinematography with his customary sensitivity to the end result. He ensured that prints of Ercole al centro della terra would be struck at Technicolor Roma according to a special three-strip process, which applied the distinct red, cyan, and yellow color dyes to the film strip one layer at a time. This allowed for an approximation of Technicolor's cumbersome, discontinued three-strip negative process, ensuring that the colors would look exceedingly ripe and seem to literally pop off the screen. Film collector Jay Fenton explains how to identify a three-strip print: "If you look at a color print and then at a black-and-white print, you'll notice the color print has a tinge of color around the soundtrack, while a black-and-white print is pure gray scale black-and-white on the soundtrack. But if you look at a three-strip print, you'll notice the soundtrack looks as though it belongs on a black-and-white print. This is because most three-strip prints had a black-and-white matrix for contrast, since three-strip was inherently grainy and soft."

Considering that Bava was not only directing this film, but also lighting it, photographing it in a new and experimental gauge, and supervising the special effects unit, it is a tribute to his character that he didn't behave on-set like a distracted, short-tempered bundle of nerves—especially when one considers that the entire film had to be shot in three weeks.

LICO battles Hercules with an interesting skeletal dagger, barely glimpsed in the movie, in this Italian fotobusta.

"There is no doubt that Mario was under great mental stress at times, but it never seemed to affect his work," observes Christopher Lee. "The only time I ever saw him displeased was during the Hercules film, when for some reason, Reg Park and I got a fit of the giggles and wasted a good deal of valuable time."

While blocking the scene, the absurdity of a hand-to-hand battle between the tall, thin Lee and the burly, muscular Mr. Universe became apparent to both actors, and they couldn't stop laughing, even when the time came to put the climax on film. "These things do happen and it was very naughty of us both. However, [Bava] did forgive us. He was essentially a kind and most amusing person."[11]

Reg Park also remembers the incident: "[Christopher] got me into a lot of trouble. When it was my take, they would shoot over his shoulder . . . he was a big, tall guy, by the way . . . and he would be making me laugh and I was killing all of the scenes. Instead of taking one take, we were taking five, ten, twelve takes! Bava reprimanded

THESEUS swears that he will even kill Hercules, should he interfere with his love for Persephone (Ida Galli).

8 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

9 This sort of chicanery occurs in all pepla, to a greater or lesser extent. For example, Hercules Conquers Atlantis—which was surely made to exploit existing scenery from Ulmer's Atlantean fantasy Journey Beneath the Desert—contains a scene in which Hercules conceals himself in an upright sarcophagus. This prop was previously seen, without its lid, in Hercules Unchained . . . as the smoky vat in which Omphale's former lovers were preserved for all time!

10 Robert E. Carr and R. M. Hayes, Wide Screen Movies (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1988), 85.

11 Christopher Lee, letter to the author, July 6, 1986.

BAVA bet himself that he could shoot the entire film using only second-hand props, such as these columns previously used in I GIGANTI DELLA TESSAGLIA.

me and I said, 'Listen—it's not me, it's this guy!' And he's so straight-faced and serious on camera . . . I got into a lot of trouble there." Though Park remembers Bava as a "very good" director, he found him more preoccupied with the technical challenges of the production than with lending guidance to a still inexperienced actor, so his personal favorite of his Italian directors remains Vittorio Cottafavi.

Lip readers may notice a fascinating quirk about Reg Park's performances in his two Hercules films. Evidently a religious man, Park invoked the name "Jesus" rather than "Zeus" or "Jove" in the scenes where Hercules calls upon his immortal parent, and said, "Oh heavenly Father" instead of "Oh heavenly Zeus," as the line is dubbed in English by voice actor Dan Sturkie. It's an amusing anachronism when one considers that the legends of Hercules date from 500 to 1,000 years before the birth of Christ. Thank God for dubbing . . . unless you happen to be Christopher Lee.

As often happened in his European films, Lee did not dub his performance as Lico with his own stentorian baritone. "I have no idea why my own voice was not used in this film," he says. "Of course, I played the part in English and there was no need for any change. In those days, direct sound was never used in Italy because of so much extraneous noise. I can only suppose that the production company was unwilling to incur the expense of bringing me from Geneva to Rome, or to pay me for the necessary looping of the original dialogue with my own voice. I suppose they got some 'local talent.' This was not the first time it happened to me, but I think it is very tacky and indeed self-defeating."

In fact, the various Italian dubbing facilities—ELDA or, in this case, IDS (International Dubbing Studios)—did their level best to discourage actors from dubbing their own performances. It was standard policy that if an actor was paid for his/her performance in a film, he/she would not be paid again for the service of dubbing their work; it was considered as part of the performance they gave—as half of their job—but they could take it or leave it. If the actor declined this option out of inconvenience, unavailability or principle, the film's producer was forced to employ voice talent from one of the dubbing facilities, at additional cost. When you hear an English or American actor dubbing their own performance in an Italian film, it means that he/she genuinely cared enough about the quality of their performance to have a dubbing clause written into their contract, or that they were doing a favor for a producer who had run out of post-production funds. In the case of Christopher Lee, immediately after the end of filming, he flew back to England to star in The Pirates of Blood River for Hammer, and was not available for looping. Lee's performance, like Park's, was also dubbed by Dan Sturkie, using a silkier vocal register that he would also use to dub Lee's performance in his next Bava film, La frusta e il corpo.

Special Effects

The Italian cinema had first depicted a hero's descent into the Underworld in Guido Brignone's Maciste all'inferno/ Maciste in Hell (1925), one of the country's earliest and most remarkable fantasy films. Based in part on the first book of Dante's Divina Commedia, Brignone's film found Pluto (Umberto Guarracino), Lord of the Underworld, in need of new Hadean subjects. He sends one of his demons (Mario Salo) to the surface world to abduct people, but this leonine lackey makes the stupid mistake of abducting the only human who might possibly get the best of the Devil himself: Maciste (Bartolomeo Pagano). By the time he made this picture, Pagano had played the character of Maciste in more than twenty films, during which the character changed from the Nubian slave of Cabiria to a fictionalized, modern-day variation of Pagano himself. He descended into Hell wearing a tie and a tweed suit.

The special effects of Maciste all'inferno were credited to Segundo de Chomón, who was assisted once again by his uncredited Cabiria associate Eugenio Bava in the provision of miniatures, maquettes and in-camera trick shots. Just as Mario Bava took his own children to visit his film sets in their youth, it is possible that Maciste all'inferno was one of the first movie sets Mario Bava visited in person, as a child. The film was also photographed by Mario's future mentor Massimo Terzano and by Ubaldo Arata, the namesake of Terzano's son. Therefore, for Mario, his camera assistant Ubaldo Terzano, and for Eugenio Bava as well—who was involved in the creation of certain effects shots for the picture—making Ercole al centro della terra must have been an extremely nostalgic experience.

Like Brignone's film, Ercole al centro della terra stages the majority of its epic visual effects within the camera. Working at Bava's side for a short time on this production was one of Eugenio's former apprentices, Aristide Massaccesi, who later adopted the professional name "Joe D'Amato" when he became a director and producer. "I worked on Ercole al centro della terra as a second camera operator for a couple of days," Massaccesi revealed. "I knew Mario from the time when he was only a director of photography, and I worked as an assistant camera operator. I was involved in some of the special effect shots of that film."

ITALIAN fotobusta: Lico punishes a soldier for failing in his mission to kill Hercules.

To offer a fuller appreciation of the trick shots in the film, the following is a time-coded breakdown of the various illusions staged for the movie, cued to their appearance on Fantoma's DVD of Hercules in the Haunted World:

5:14 • Establishing shot of Ecalia. This is a glass matte with photographic cut-outs providing the ancient buildings on the right side of the frame. The silhouetted Hill of the Dead on the left, distinguished by its upright stone slabs, was either painted or cut from paper, and its heavy shadows merge into the other half at the middle, probably with black paint. The background, visible through the glass is a plain cyclorama, lighted with red and blue gels, and animated with a small amount of smoke.

10:11 • Lico's throne room at the palace has an open ceiling, which was likely an optically inserted continuation of the blue cycloramic background visible in the rear of these shots. Considering Bava's statement that he had only a few columns to design his sets, it may be that this shot is also a devious double exposure that allowed the columns to be moved from one side of the set to the other—and the spear-carriers, as well.

22:32 • The film's most stunning effects shot is Hercules' ship's entrance into the land of the Hesperides. We see the magic ship sailing under a full moon, toward a blood-red horizon that is gradually suffused by inky tentacles of darkness. Then, a seam appears to open in the sea, sucking the ship along an opened gully toward the horizon. This was an in-camera split-screen trick shot involving a combination of miniature and cloud tank special effects. The inky suffusion of the sky was done in a cloud tank, like the volcano under the main titles of Caltiki il mostro immortale; that is, the sky is actually an aquarium filled with an initially veiny, progressively denser, red-colored liquid, with a diffused light positioned at some distance on the other side of it, providing the illusion of the lunar sphere. (The same light provided the moon for the recurring establishing shot of Ecalia, which was a matte painting by Bava.) At the proper moment, black ink—heavier than the red liquid—was dumped into the aquarium, spilling into and overwhelming the scarlet water with wonderfully crepuscular effect. The bottom half of the shot was a view of the ocean, filmed in a large pool with an overcranked, diagonally positioned camera. After filming a simple shot of the magic ship (a miniature) sailing through the ocean waves, two thick planks positioned under the water beneath it were slowly pulled apart. As the water rushed into the seam, the diagonal positioning of the camera provided the illusion of an opening zipper-like effect in the rippling waters. The miniature ship, wind fanned into its sail, was then pulled along the length of this aisle on a string, and the lighting was dimmed to complement the blackening of the top half of the illusion.

The result is a ravishingly beautiful image that is also startling in its psychedelic qualities. It is the kind of shot that demands to be seen in 35 mm Technicolor widescreen to be fully felt and appreciated. The shots aboard the ship are illusory in their own right, as very little of the ship is actually shown.

26:54 • As Hercules scales a tree to obtain the Golden Apple of the Hesperides, his climb is supported by the illusion of a double exposure in the frame's upper right hand corner, revealing a high angle shot of the Hesperides looking up at his ascent. In the rest of the shot, Reg Park is shown climbing up into an artificial tree bough, from below.

29:10 • A mass of bracken, suggesting the main trunk of the tree, foregrounds Park's climb up a single wooden branch, filmed simultaneously through a negative lens, which gives the illusion of the actor receding far in the distance. Park is actually maneuvering around a branch-like wooden pole, with a small platform allowing him to stand and turn fully around it, pantomiming a climb. When he raises his leg at 29:19, he casts a shadow on the night-blue cycloramic backdrop that can't be much more than a few feet behind him.

29:33 • A different set-up involving another tangle of bracken, now filling even more of the screen, with Park (still viewed through a negative lens) now higher and harder to see in the profusion of branches. He is still on the same pole. Bava introduces some foregrounded smoke and lightning-like flashes into the shot to tease the eye away from examining the shot too closely.

29:36 • Another close set-up, with Park hoisting himself once again into position among a new cluster of branches, arranged level-upon-level like the bars of a jungle gym. Again, moving smoke and flashes of light support the illusion of continuity.

29:59 • Yet another close set-up, with Park continuing his ascent from one foothold to another. As he reaches for a vine, it snaps, and we cut to two separate images of Hercules falling through frame, behind two different foregrounds of tree. The falling figure is a stunt man, photographed at a very slightly overcranked speed to slow the plummet and thereby lend an illusion of greater height to the tree.

PROCRUSTES plans to make Theseus a little longer and Telemachus (Franco Giacobini) a little shorter.

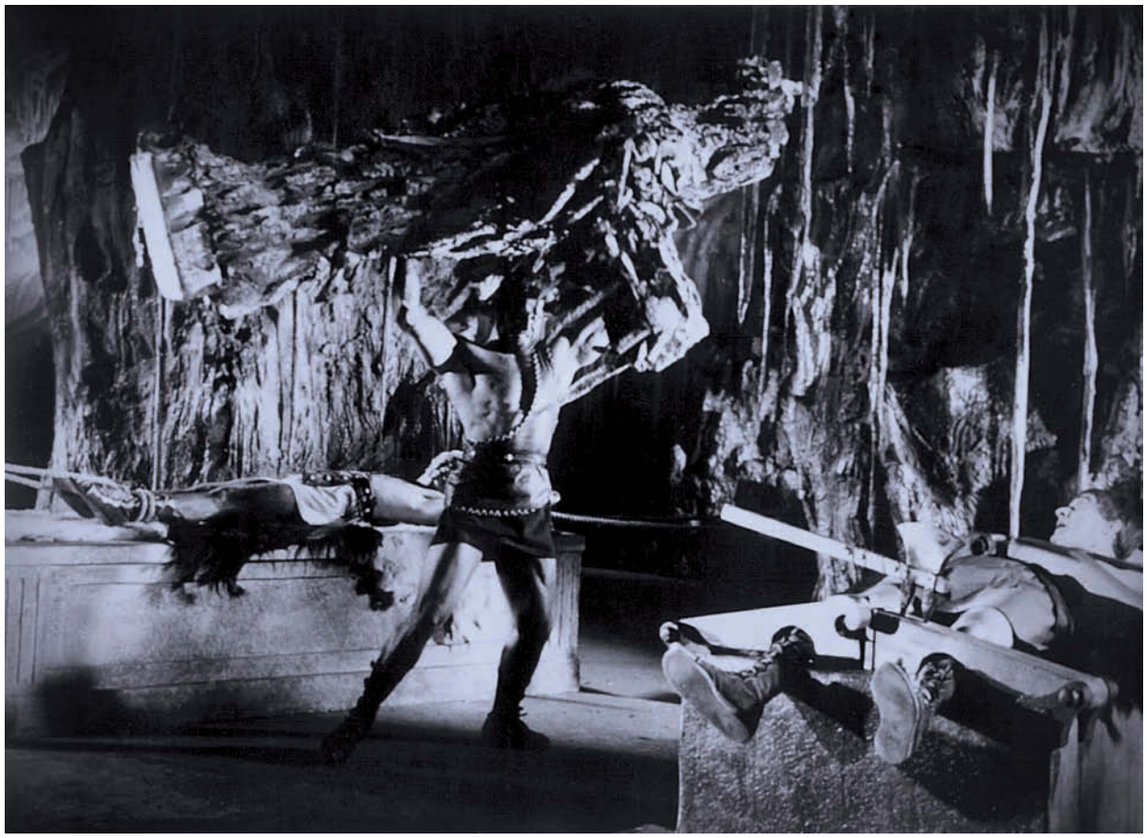
30:12 • Park drops from a very modest height into frame for this close shot, finding a handhold on a central branch. As he climbs up, fire and ash begin to fall, adding another environmental layer to the smoke and flashes of light. A chunk of burning material actually lands on Park's back during this shot. He then gives up and begins his descent, climbing down through the various set-ups he scaled in earlier shots. We can see that he climbed up, and then down, in these shots, possibly without the camera bothering to stop.



32:24 • As Hercules fells the Golden Apple from its branch, the camera set-up from 29:33 is repeated, this time with the background aperture blacked out, and another, smaller branch being maneuvered across the frame in the foreground, held from above and brought closer to, and finally past the lens, suggesting the falling cluster of vines bearing the fabled fruit. There is a superb deep focus shot as a long view of Hercules is interrupted by the foregrounded landing of the branches, with the large, round apple tumbling into perfect focus.

35:34 • Mario Bava was an optical effects artist, not a suit builder, so he cannot be held too much to blame for the ludicrous monster Procrustes, other than for allowing it to go before the cameras. What Bava did contribute to this sequence follows the shot of Hercules hurling the stone demon at a wall ("You are made of stone, and so by stone you will be destroyed!"), as we cut to a miniature shot of a small model Procrustes being thrown against a tiny wall constructed of a stone-like substance like vermiculite. The tiny stones collapse, clearing a view of a tunnel filled with green, undulating fog. The camera tracks slowly into the tunnel and fades to black, providing an elegant transition to the next shot.

37:30 • The chained woman's transformation into a cackling flame is an optical.

37:43 • The long-shot of Hercules and Theseus standing on a Hadean precipice is an optically printed shot combining animated overlays (the foregrounded flames), a glass matte (the background mountains and smoke), and live photography of Park and Ardisson filmed at a distance on a darkened set. When Hercules leaps into the flames at 38:02, it is an animated figure we see fall. The same is true of Theseus' jump at 38:21, although here—with the flames now revealed as cool water—the foregrounded optical fire is replaced with a double exposure of what appears to be a blue field of smoke along the bottom quarter of the frame.

40:13 • Bava's Hadean landscape is rich with unforgettable sights and sounds, some of which feature ingredients that would not be out of place in the average Roman kitchen. The long-shot of the island bearing the Stone of Pluto—which, as a composition, conveys the very essence of Mario Bava—is also a miniature, photographed with a fish-eye lens to give the reused background glass matte of jagged mountains, with its backgrounded red fog, a false appearance of depth and concavity. To examine this tabletop model in depth, the foreground is an arrangement of tiny handmade trees with bare branches. The bubbling lava bed surrounding the central stone island is made of polenta (corn meal), heated on an oversized frying pan to a bubbling consistency, its natural golden color disguised by red, neon-bold lighting. [12] Beyond the central stones of the island is a rim of miniature stonework suggesting the closest areas of the jagged, glass matte mountain range that form the backdrop, its unpainted area revealing once again the red, smoky sky. The island is backlit with a halo of white light and additional smoke, which is directed by off-camera fans.

HERCULES disrupts the evil god's plans by using his stonelike mass against stone, opening the hidden path to Hades.

40:39 • Another angle of the same set-up, this time with Park and Ardisson photographed at a distance, allowing Bava to "insert" them on a miniature promontory.

41:56 • The thrown boulder shot is a double exposure of a tiny stone, with a thread of hemp tied around it, held taut and jiggled from off-camera, combined with another exposure of a "whip pan" to suggest the background blur of its trajectory. At 41:59, we see the thread manipulated around a tiny stone by hand.

42:50 • Another double exposure, this time marrying a background layer of Park and Ardisson moving along the rope at a distance to the foregrounded miniature set.

49:46 • A miniature ship filmed in a studio tank, of course. Bava fashioned the ship out of Buitoni pasta.

52:36 • A reprise of the glass matte previously seen at 5:14, this time with the added detail of an arc light visible in the background, shot through diffusion, to suggest the sun peering through ominous weather.

61:00 • Another glass matte, again of the arc light sun, viewed through an airbrushed foreground of clouds.

74:27 • The shots of the lunar eclipse are also a combination of foregrounded glass mattes and a diffused, backgrounded light source.

78:31 • Lico's eruption into flames is an optical dissolve effect.

In addition to these scale model, glass matte, and optical effects, Ercole al centro della terra contains some classic examples of Mario Bava's greatest skill: his unparalleled knack for visual suggestion. Perhaps the best example of this phenomenon is the "set" used for the appearances of Medea. The oracle's environment is spare yet exotic; it conveys the impression of a room in Shangri-La, or something out of Frank Lloyd Wright's Egyptian period . . . yet it consists of nothing more than a low balcony, a mirror laid flat on the studio floor to provide the illusion of a pool, a box for actress Gaia Germani to sit upon, and some Christmas tree "icicles" manually waved in front of the camera (by Bava himself) to suggest the shimmer of a beaded curtain.

Music

The score for Ercole al centro della terra was composed by Armando Trovajoli, who had performed the same duties for Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide. Born in Rome on September 2, 1917, Trovajoli was a young innovator on the Italian jazz scene. Inspired by the Benny Goodman Quartet, he formed his own swing band in 1944 and later studied piano at the conservatory in Rome, graduating in 1949. He made his first professional recordings in 1950, as the leader of two trios, one of which featured La maschera del demonio composer Roberto Nicolosi. His piano playing can also be heard on recordings by jazz legends Django Reinhardt, Stephane Grappelli, and Toots Thielemans. He entered the film business by writing some songs for the Dino De Laurentiis production Riso amaro/Bitter Rice (1948), a sultry drama that made a star of the producer's future wife, Silvana Mangano. Trovajoli subsequently wrote the music for movies by Luigi Comencini, Aldo Fabrizi, and Steno before Carlo Ponti grabbed him to score his lurid answer to Riso amaro, La donna del fiume/Woman of the River (1955), starring Ponti's own future wife, Sophia Loren. Between 1956 and 1958, Trovajoli scored less conspicuous works, including Franco Zefferelli's directorial debut Camping (1957), but spent most of his time as an orchestra leader for Radio Audizione Italiane (RAI). In 1959, Trovajoli entered into professional contact with two future contributors to Ercole al centro della terra: he scored Dino Risi's Il vedovo (coscripted by Sandro Continenza) and also Steno's horror comedy Tempi duri per i vampiri/Uncle Was a Vampire, starring Christopher Lee. Just before accepting Achille Piazzi's invitation to score the two Hercules films, Trovajoli's career reached its height when Carlo Ponti secured him to write the music for La ciociara/Two Women (1960), which won the Academy Awards for "Best Foreign Film" as well as the "Best Actress" Oscar for Sophia Loren. In his career, which is still going strong in the 21st century, Armando Trovajoli has scored nearly 200 films. He also appeared as an actor in Vittorio De Sica's Ieri, oggi, domani/Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow (1963).

12 For the shots of Thesus drowning in the mixture, the popping bubbles were created by adding calcium pellets to the polenta.

Bava may have had little to do with choosing Trovajoli to score the film, but he was extremely well served by him. Trovajoli's approach to the picture was, like Bava's own, more atmospheric than melodic (or in Bava's case, narrative). In the scene that introduces Hercules, the music is light, fluttery, and shimmering, hearkening back to the Elysian charms of Enzo Masetti's music for the two Francisci films; the almost immediate action scenes are handled equally well, with ascending staccato horn patterns that lend energy to the cutting of the sequence. Similarly ascending patterns are used in the scene of Hercules' climb toward the Golden Apple, though interpreted by strings, giving the test of strength a greater sense of stress and sinew. The predominant instruments throughout, in terms of evoking intimations of the uncanny, are the bass clarinet and viola, which respectively suggest a woeful loneliness as might dwell in the various levels of Hell, as well as a sense of skulking shadow and otherworldly intrigue. Deianara's appearances are accompanied by an almost shapeless, ethereal music, interweaving dreamy ostinati and meandering woodwinds. Trovajoli also shows himself expert at underscoring Bava's penchant for shock cuts and zoom reveals with shuddery effusions that are surprisingly like those Carlo Rustichelli would use in his collaborations with Bava. Most memorable is the hypnotic, sighing, progressively narcotic music that accompanies the heroes' sojourn to the land of the Hesperides, which—combined with Bava's disorienting mise-en-scène—lends that sequence a psychedelic aspect truly before its time.

A curiosity about Trovajoli's Ercole al centro della terra score is that a number of its outstanding cues can also be heard in another film released contemporaneously: Umberto Scarpelli's science fiction peplum Il gigante di Metropolis/The Giant of Metropolis. The Scarpelli film, which was produced at approximately the same time as the Bava picture, was released to Roman theaters two weeks earlier, on October 26, 1961. In addition to sounding like a Bava film, Il gigante di Metropolis also looks like one: Giorgio Giovannini's extraordinary production design and the futuristic, leather-based costumes of Giovanna Natili approximate the look of Bava's next work in the science fiction genre, Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires (1965).

HERCULES, Theseus, and Telemachus (silhouetted) find themselves in the garden of the Hesperides in this Italian fotobusta.

Commentary

Mario Bava would later describe Ercole al centro della terra as "a parody of the pepla," [13] but something gets lost in this translation. The film has a lighthearted, freewheeling sense of adventure, and there are several amusing interludes, but its most memorable quality is the unexpectedly dark and tragic undertone of its harlequin-colored images. It is possible that Bava was bending the truth to make his film's extravagant bending of mythology (or its unevenness) more forgivable, and it's also possible that he was thinking of Duccio Tessari's contributions to the script—some of which survived, while others apparently did not.

Anyone familiar with Tessari's pepla and Spaghetti Westerns will recognize Giorgio Ardisson's Theseus as the middle ground in the evolution of a single character, which began with Donald O'Connor's impish Aladdin in Le meraviglie di Aladino and reached fruition with Giuliano Gemma's Crios in Tessari's own Arrivano i titani/My Son the Hero (1961)—a blonde, brash, athletic Romeo who bests his adversaries with brains rather than brawn. There is also something of Tessari in the film's comic, almost Irish brand of exaggeration. In the first Hercules film, Bava introduced Hercules by having Steve Reeves uproot an entire large tree from the ground and hurl it as a brake in front of Iole's runaway chariot. In the context of Bava's hyperbolic sequel, this once-jaw-dropping spectacle would be much too understated; instead, Hercules is introduced by lifting an entire wagon over his head—hayload and all—and hurling it through the air like a paper glider. In Hades, he knocks the Golden Apple out of the Sacred Tree of the Hesperides with a slingshot made of a horse's bridle, loaded with a gigantic boulder. And, as if the effect wasn't already comic enough, 2 minutes later, Hercules finds the same rock in a different corner of Hades to help him solve a different problem. (It's easy to miss this detail on home video, but when viewed on a big screen, audiences find this coincidence invariably amusing.)

Humor also creeps into the dialogue on occasion, as when, after a close shave in the torture chamber of the dime-store golem Procrustes, Theseus exhorts to his companions, "I never thought Hades would be anything like this!" It's a line that never fails to tickle an audience—unlike the broad slapstick of Giacobini's Telemachus.

In this half-jovial context, the film's darker, tragic aspects sometimes assume an unexpected cast of poignancy. Early in the film, in one of its finest set pieces, Lico summons the spellbound Deianara from a stone tomb. She stands erect, much as Max Schreck arose from his coffin in F. W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922), and floats toward him as he speaks her name in a recurrent command. Bava had used the same technique for Javutich's visit to Prince Vajda's room in La maschera del demonio, but the scene in Ercole al centro della terra marks the first time an actress was placed on casters for this dramatic purpose: to show an individual unable to resist bending to a stronger will. As such, this shot seems to add something valuable and new to the vocabulary of cinema.

Also effective is Bava's handling of the doomed love affair between Theseus (conceived as a comic Romeo character) and Persephone. In one striking shot, Bava implies that their unnatural love is damned, by dollying away from their kiss until they are blocked from view by a ceremonial flame that appears to engulf them. The moment of Persephone's self-sacrifice is rich with sweet regret, as she veils her face with the sheer sleeve of her gown and fades away. And who could forget the Hadean forest of vines that imprison the souls of the damned, that weep, scream, and bleed as our heroes cut a path through their jungling torment?

The characters of Deianara and Persephone—two statuesque beauties reduced to living statues—hint at the use of mannequins, suits of armor and statuary that would haunt Bava's films throughout the next decade. In a sense, the quest of Hercules is to imbue a statue of his beloved with life. Fittingly, Bava approaches Hercules by way of the legend of Galatea.

Aside from its uneasy mixture of comedy and tragedy, the narrative of Ercole al centro della terra frequently contradicts itself. The details suggest that the original scenario was extensively rewritten during production and post-production, with several scenes reshot, and some crucial revisions appearing solely on the soundtrack.

Most of the film's narrative confusion originates in the Garden of the Hesperides sequence, which also happens to be the dramatic highlight of the picture. One notably loose thread is the unexplained (yet very handy) presence of a horsedrawn chariot, which Hercules unbridles to fashion an oversized slingshot to aim at the Golden Apple. Doomed to dwell for eternity in their realm of Night, the Hesperides obviously have no use for such transportation. The only reason for a chariot to be present (other than to provide Hercules with the sling he needs) is that, in an earlier draft of the screenplay, Hercules rode it there. This makes sense because nowhere in mythology is it necessary to sail a magic ship through a rift in the ocean to reach the Garden of the Hesperides, which was not located in Hades, nor was it an annex to the Underworld. It would also seem that Hercules took this trip alone, as neither Theseus nor Telemachus are visible in any of the group shots at the outset of this sequence. After a few isolated medium shots with Hercules, the two characters are curiously absent from the sequence.

The dialogue proposes that the Golden Apple is a token permitting the safe passage of the living into Hades, and back. Nowhere in Greek or Roman mythology is a Golden Apple used to this end. The Golden Apples (plural) were a wedding gift to Hera, a food of the gods capable of bestowing the gift of immortality on any mortal who tasted them. My theory is that, in an earlier draft that actually went before the cameras, Hercules intended the apple as a wedding gift for Deianara, to make her a demigod like himself. Indeed, his chariot ride to the Hesperides may well have been filmed as part of the journey from which Hercules is shown returning at the beginning of the film, which is never otherwise explained. Never in the film is the apple proposed as a means of facilitating travel in or out of Hades; it is Hercules' defeat of Procrustes that (accidentally) reveals the passage into Hell.

When the heroic trio sail out of Hades with Persephone, Pluto's anger over the abduction of his daughter is demonstrated in a terrifying storm. Curiously, the storm is calmed when Theseus throws the Golden Apple overboard. This doesn't make sense, because the loss of the Golden Apple—after all, the property of the Hesperides, who gave it willingly—would seem less cause for Pluto's ire than the abduction of his daughter or the theft of the Stone of Light (also called the "Stone of Pluto" in the film).

HERCULES uses the reins of a handy chariot to fell the fabled Golden Apple of the Hesperides from its high branch.

13 Levin Safao, Libération, May 5, 1980.

BELGIAN affiche.

Though the thrown object is not clearly shown, frame-by-frame study reveals that it is indeed the apple prop that Theseus flings overboard to quell the tempest; I suspect this scene was shot early in production, well before the importance of the prop was contradicted by later rewrites. The camera set-ups chosen to illustrate the sequence also add to one's suspicions: nearly all of the expositional dialogue is spoken by Hercules with his back turned toward the camera, allowing critical plot details to be reconsidered and rewritten in the editing room well after the scene was shot. Also, Persephone is hidden below ship throughout the sequence, kept separate from the action, so it is entirely possible that the character was not included in the script at the time the scene was filmed. The scene would make better sense were she not present, because the storm could not be caused (as is implied) by Pluto's wrath over his daughter's elopement if it can be sated by returning a Golden Apple that does not even belong to him.

Also to be offered in support of this theory is the scene of Hercules' return to Ecalia. In Hades, when Hercules first sees the Stone of Light, he declares, "That is the stone that shall give new life to Deianara." Though the apple toss is followed by the two men reaffirming their friendship, Hercules returns to Ecalia with an air of defeat—and, the next time we see him, Theseus boasts that he would rather kill the demigod, whom he just followed into Hades, than forsake the love of a woman he has just met. These profiles would only make sense had Theseus thrown away not the Apple but the Stone of Light, Deianara's only chance for restored life, and if Theseus himself was under the spell of Persephone. (Of course, the Stone does appear in a later scene to awaken Deianara—but it may have been shot late in the schedule, after a further rewrite.) The film never broaches the possibility that Theseus is literally spellbound, perhaps because it would seem redundant in light of the Lico/Deianara situation, and as a result, Theseus seems a shallow, fickle, poorly written character, made likeable solely through the ebullience of Ardisson.

Speaking of Lico, he is perhaps the most ill-defined major character in the Bava canon. Even Christopher Lee appears to have been confused about the character, "who was not a vampire," he once declared, "in spite of the fact that some of the posters had me with long teeth." [14] Despite Lee's insistence to the contrary, Lico is a kind of proto-vampire. The Lord of Darkness promises him power and immortality if he will drink the blood of Deianara at the moment of the lunar eclipse. Had he not been defeated in his venture, the story might well depict the pre-Christian origin of vampirism. Lico is also given some vampiric qualities in the dubbing: Lico's face is shown reflected in a woman's spilled blood, Deianara has a prophetic dream about "an evil mouth red with blood," and during the climactic battle, Lico implies that he is actually undead ("You cannot slay the dead, Hercules!"). Surely, it would have been desirable on the part of the production to exploit Lee's presence in his first "vampire" role since Dracula il vampiro, but for whatever reason—perhaps Lee's own aversion to playing another vampire—this angle was uncertain at best during production and all but completely dropped in post-production, adding to the film's tapestry of confusion.

So who and what might Lico be? Lee has said that he played the character under the impression that he was "King of the Dead." In the film, Lico is introduced as the brother of the late King Uretes, and the film also offers some visual evidence that he is also a High Priest at the Temple of Jove. In the only scene that tells us anything about him, he stands in the Temple of Jove beneath the palace, striking a bargain with the forces of Evil. The fact that Jove was worshipped in Ancient Rome as the sky god seems to shed light on the murky symbolism of the lunar climax, but Jove has nothing to do Lico's ceremony, which is more rooted in Balkan superstitions. Lico's sacrifice is scheduled for the moment when "the Great Dragon devours the moon"—that is, the phase of the lunar eclipse when darkness becomes dominant. According to Montague Summers, quoted in Leonard Wolf's The Annotated Dracula, eclipses were thought by some Balkan cultures to be evidence of a great dragon capable of devouring the sun and the moon; this creature was called a "vârcolac." As time passed, this mythic species evolved into the proper name Vrkolak, which was given to the dragon, whose appetite was traditionally discouraged by peasants during the full phase of the moon by banging pots and pans together. Thus, in the fine details of Lico's ceremony, we can see a connection between the dragon that is the symbol of the Vajda family, the wurdalak legends that would figure in Bava's later film I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath, and Dracula himself.

Another possible clue to Lico's identity can be found in Tessari's Arrivano i titani/My Son the Hero. In this film, a demigod observes, "In every Temple of Jove there is an entrance to Hades." Might Lico be a priest who discovered this entrance to Hades and unwittingly unleashed the evil forces that laid Ecalia low? Perhaps he struck a deal with Pluto to sacrifice his family, in exchange for eternal dominion over a new Hell on Earth? Such a scenario would also explain why Hercules is suddenly attacked by demons, in a setting identical to what we've seen of Hades, after pursuing Lico through the rooms under the palace. The idea of an unsuspected passage to Hades under the palace is also very Bavian—a potent parallel to the family hearth at Castle Vajda in La maschera del demonio, which connects to the family crypt, a subterranean annex, as it were, between the living and the dead.

The two curses that afflict Ecalia impose another source of bewilderment. During their first meeting, Lico explains to Hercules that Deianara's "madness" is the result of a curse placed on the descendants of King Uretes, whose father once banished the forces of Evil from the city. Halfway through the film, when Hercules returns from Hades, he is met with a traitor's welcome by the people of Ecalia. Hercules later realizes that the curse is Pluto's revenge for Theseus' abduction of the underworld god's daughter, Persephone. While the first explanation is acceptable, the second is one curse too many. One suspects that the Persephone subplot may have been added to the script late in the schedule, because the second curse could well be an invention of the dubbing. On close examination, the Ecalians' apparent displeasure during Hercules' second homecoming is suggested entirely by jeers and boos on the soundtrack; the people do not look at all displeased to see him. In a brief scene omitted from the American version, Hercules is even greeted by one Ecalian couple who plead with him to help save their dying crops.

As we navigate this treacherous, but ultimately rewarding path, an admonition spoken to Hercules by one of the Hesperides begins to assume a special significance: "Do not believe in what you think you see." Note that she does not say "Don't believe in what you see"; indeed, much of what we think we see in this film is actually what we have heard.

If we examine Ercole al centro della terra closely, on a purely visual level, it is possible to construct a more sensible, satisfying, and mythologically sound plot than the film actually delivers. Try it this way:

Hercules takes a chariot to the Hesperides in search of the fabled Golden Apples, which he hopes to present to Deianara as a wedding gift of immortality. During his absence, the kingdom of Ecalia is conquered by armies of the dead, who have emerged from Hades through an opening in the Temple of Jove. They were unleashed by Lico, High Priest of Jove, who usurps the throne from his slain brother and consigns its true heir, Princess Deianara, to a state of living death. When Hercules returns victorious to Ecalia, he goes to the palace and meets Lico. He is told that Deianara has not been sane since her father's demise. Hercules consults the oracle Medea, who advises him that Deianara has been placed under an evil spell by Lico, who is in league with Pluto and plans to sacrifice her to the God of the Underworld during the coming eclipse. By drinking her blood, he will be made immortal and all-powerful. The only means of awakening Deianara is the light within the Stone of Pluto, found in Hades.

HERCULES hurls the columns of Lico's sacrificial altar at the approaching army of the dead.

14 Pohle and Hart, 86.

THE FILM*'s picturesque climax finds Hercules under attack by all manner of flying, taloned, cobweb-covered monstrosities.*

Hercules and Theseus sail to Hades. After surviving numerous illusory obstacles, they find the Stone of Pluto. Matters are complicated when Persephone, Pluto's wife, falls in love with Theseus and uses him as a ticket out of Hades. A terrible storm rages around their ship, and Persephone explains that Pluto knows that they have stolen his Stone of Light. They will be drowned unless they throw it back. Theseus, desperate with concern for Persephone, throws the stone into the sea, and the waves are calmed as the dark sky breaks into day.

Hercules returns to Ecalia without the stone and separates from Theseus, who has stolen from his hands Deianara's only hope for cure. Dejected, Hercules turns to Medea once again for advice. She tells him that the woman with Theseus is the bride of Pluto, and that her return to Hades is essential. If Hercules can persuade Persephone to forsake Theseus and return to Hades, Pluto will spare Deianara's life in gratitude. Hercules goes to Persephone and tells her what the oracle has said. Theseus is outraged that Hercules should suggest that his love for Deianara is more important than his love for Persephone. As Lico carries Deianara to the sacrificial altar, the two friends fight until Theseus is knocked unconscious. Hercules pursues Lico to the Temple as the eclipse gets underway.

Persephone realizes that love cannot be commanded—it must be given freely—and in a final, loving gesture, she kisses Theseus goodbye and returns to Hades. Hercules fights with Lico, made strong by the consumed blood of the Princess, knocking him to the ground. As the sun fills the sky, the vampire bursts into flames—Jove condemning him to eternal hell. Deianara and Theseus awaken—without any memory of what has happened.

This revised order of events (wholly my own invention) reflects the story that Ercole al centro della terra might have told, had it been truer to what it shows than to what it says. I do not offer it as an improvement on Bava and Mario Serandrei's final cut—quite the contrary. While this alternative scenario makes greater sense of the characters' actions, and is somewhat truer to Greek mythology, Bava's version works better as cinema. Some of the revisions may have been made to compress the narrative for dramatic or budgetary reasons. (For what it's worth, Tessari's Arrivano i titani—which contains two trips to Hades—runs almost 20 minutes longer than Bava's film.) By contrasting the actual scenario with this theoretical one, I intend only to promote a better appreciation of the creative decision-making that underlies the construction of all movies, and to point out how masterfully Bava and Serandrei worked together to disguise the flaws of a film that was rushed into production with a half-baked script.

That the film was extensively revised during post-production is obvious from the dialogue, as well as from the cutting. Note that, upon his first arrival in Ecalia, Hercules mentions to Keros (who meets him) that he would have returned sooner, but "the Gods placed many obstacles in my path." The way the film is cut, with his return to Ecalia preceding his encounter with the Hesperides, the film doesn't show Hercules' homeward trek impeded in any way, and the whole point of films like this is to show the hero's victory over such obstacles. Furthermore, while Reg Park and Christopher Lee speak their lines in English, only selected lines match their lip movements, and some important dialogue is spoken with their faces averted from the camera. Even the name "Persephone" is spoken only in fragmented close-ups, indicating a tile-like replacement of footage in which the oft-reported name "Myosotide" was originally spoken.

The character of Telemachus has the feel of a late addition, and was perhaps introduced to lend a more deliberately comic or diversionary aspect to a film that Bava may have feared was becoming too ponderous or unintelligible. Telemachus is primarily shown in separate cutaways, and his general absence from the Underworld scenes (perhaps filmed before Franco Giacobini was hired) is explained by showing him aboard the ship, where he is shown guarding the Golden Apple at Hercules' request.

The most awkward portion of the revised continuity occurs near the climax, when Deianara temporarily blinds Lico by thrusting the Stone of Light at his face. We cut away to Hercules confronting Theseus and Persephone, a scene that runs for nearly 4 minutes. When we cut back to Deianara at the palace, Lico is still recoiling.

Despite the choppiness of its continuity, Ercole al centro della terra contains only two major dramatic flaws. First, Hercules' trip to Hades and his escape are so excitingly staged that they feel like the true climax of the film; unfortunately, at this point, we are only halfway through the picture. The second half cannot begin to approach the satisfactions of the scenes in Hades. Secondly, presented as it is without any suggestion of enchantment, Theseus' mad love for Persephone seems appallingly exaggerated, as if Theseus himself is willing it, rather than Persephone. When he swears that he would kill his friend rather than forsake his love for this fresh acquaintance, he goes too far and loses our respect.

None of the other structural weaknesses I have discussed are very apparent on first or second viewings, because the eye is constantly held in thrall as each scene moves briskly to the next. Only after a long acquaintance with the film, and after comparing the US and British versions, does one begin to notice that the film's dialogue and visuals existed almost independently of one another.

The film's performances are generally vivid. In his second portrayal of Hercules, Reg Park exudes a convincing array of emotions: humor, dedication, humility and determination. His scenes with Giorgio Ardisson—as Hercules expresses his gratitude to Theseus for making his mission victorious, and when he tries to persuade him to surrender Persephone without resorting to violence—are especially good. The only emotion that Park doesn't successfully convey is love for Deianara, but the lovers are given only two brief scenes together in which Deianara is conscious, so his reserve can hardly be faulted. That said, his performance is not lacking in warmth.

Giorgio Ardisson makes a strong impression, too, though his performance suffers from rewriting and poorly matched dubbing in the English versions. His piercing blue eyes, sculpted features, and natural agility made him an ideal leading man for Bava's adventure films, and he would receive his definitive heroic role in Bava's next feature, Gli invasori/Erik the Conqueror.

Christopher Lee's performance, while believably amoral, ambitious, and rich in what the actor has called "the loneliness of evil," cannot avoid being compromised by the much-revised nature of his character. Had the role been more solidly written, Lico might have become the male counterpart to Princess Asa in La maschera del demonio. Like Asa, Lico is the scion of a royal family, avenging his outcast status by incestuously preying upon the blood of favored relatives, bent on claiming the immortality of his family line for himself. Both films are set in palaces surrounded by haunted landscapes, and once again, the forces of Good and Evil confront one another in a sacred ruin, where the forces of Good mysteriously assert themselves in a setting that would appear to have forsaken God. Even the Great Dragon formerly emblazoned on the chest of Javuto reappears to devour the moon.

The film's supporting performances vary in quality. One feels that Bava could have done without the grating comic relief of Franco Giacobini, but Leonora Ruffo, Ida Galli, and Gaia Germani are all suitably graceful and decorative in their hauntingly passive roles.

Mino Doro has a short but outstanding supporting role as Keros, the informant of the court. In one shot, Bava frames him lurking in the shadows behind a column—reprising a shot of Arturo Dominici that he filmed for Le fatiche di Ercole—and in another scene, as Keros uses paranoid body language in response to Hercules' inquiries, he moves exactly as Max Lawrence [Luciano Catenacci] moves when he dares to speak aloud about Villa Graps in Bava's Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!. Their movements are so similar, that one can easily imagine Bava acting them out for his actors' benefit.

Despite its narrative confusion and impossibly drawn-out finale, Ercole al centro della terra is one of the few fantasy films truly deserving of the word "dazzling." Just as Ercole e la regina di Lidia represented a tremendous leap of visual imagination over its predecessor, this film contains sequences that catapult from the baroque mise en scène of that earlier film into outright delirium. In basic narrative terms, it leaves something to be desired, but it exploits Technicolor in ways that would remain without parallel until Dario Argento's Suspiria (1977). It is perhaps closer to a living painting or a magic act than a traditional movie, and it delivers a greater sense of "spectacle" than almost any other film of its kind.

If La maschera del demonio proved that Italians could make a successful horror film, it did so while adhering to certain stylistic rules which had governed the fantastic cinema since its earliest days. The most basic of these was Bava's decision to shoot the film in black-and-white. It was a conservative move. Hammer Films had been making horror films in color since 1957, but in films like The Curse of Frankenstein and Horror of Dracula, the aims of cinematographer Jack Asher were more realistic than fantastic; every color was keyed to be blown offscreen by the bold color of blood.

The mythic context of Ercole al centro della terra granted Bava the opportunity to push his color scales way over the top, beyond reality, beyond Technicolor, until they burn off the screen like a form of radium. The result is a film whose colors are alive, feverish, irrational, mad as a Van Gogh painting. With this film, Bava discovered how to photograph horror subjects in color. It was a matter of intensifying color to a point that suggested madness, or the uncanny presence of the supernatural.

LICO prepares to sacrifice Deinira at the height of the lunar eclipse.

GERMAN A0 poster, art by Engel.

Variants

Ercole al centro della terra exists in two distinct English-language versions: Hercules in the Center of the Earth (the Italian export cut, which was released in Great Britain in February 1963) and Hercules in the Haunted World (the re-edited, rescored American version, which followed in April 1964).

Viewers familiar with the English-dubbed versions will find Bava's original Italian version, viewed with English subtitles (as is now possible on Fantoma's DVD), more serious in tone; in this context, even Franco Giacobini's slapstick performance is seasoned with world-weary irony, making it much more palatable. Armando Trovajoli's score is more prominently mixed in the Italian version, making the images even more scintillating; the dialogue is more graceful ("Believe in what you do, and not in what you see"), and it is much more apparent that Theseus has been possessed by Myosotide/Persephone. On the other hand, there is no explanation of the screaming, bleeding vines in Hell (such as the English versions offer in voiceover), and the dialogue points out some significant details in the early scenes that go undiscussed in the export versions.

During their first meeting, Lico explains to Hercules that, during his long absence, Ecalia was threatened in a supernatural war with the forces of Evil. Without explaining how, Lico tells Hercules that King Eurestes succeeded in defeating the devil-worshipping hordes and banished them to the neighboring Hill of the Dead. From that hill, these shadowy beings bestowed a curse on the ruler of Ecalia and all his descendants—resulting in the King's death and in the state of "walking death" which has overtaken Deianara. When Hercules pays his first visit to the Sibyl, it is to ask for a weapon effective in a battle against shadows, that he might free Deianara from her curse. The film's climactic scenes during the lunar eclipse take place on this Hill of the Dead, with Lico revealed not as Deianara's uncle, but as (to quote Lee's own understanding of the role) the King of the Dead, and the hellspawn attacking Hercules are the demons who tried to conquer Ecalia. It's one of the movie's great sleights of hand that one doesn't really question this sudden uprising of the damned in the English versions, which offer no explanation whatever. When Lico is cremated at the end of the eclipse, in the Italian version, Hercules raises his arms to the sky and offers praise to Pluto: "Oh, God of Hades, give peace to the Earth!" Indeed, Pluto has taken his own High Priest as sacrifice, satisfying the needs of Evil while also restoring order to Ecalia. The later English versions would conveniently forget that it was a lunar eclipse and pass off the burning orb in the sky as the sun, for whose purifying rays Hercules would thank his father Zeus.

As with Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide and its original English version Hercules Conquers Atlantis, Achille Piazzi funded the preparation of an English version of Ercole al centro della terra, which was recorded at Renato Caldonazzo's International Dubbing Studios in Rome and given the title Hercules in the Center of the Earth. Like Reg Park's previous Hercules film, it too was acquired for US distribution by Bernard and Lawrence Woolner, who decided—once again—that it wasn't quite acceptable, as it was, for the American market.

Again, Hugo Grimaldi—who had reshaped Hercules Conquers Atlantis into Hercules and the Captive Women for the Woolners—was hired to make Hercules at the Center of the Earth more commercially attractive and playable. When the movie was belatedly released in the United States in March 1964, on a double bill with Antonio Margheriti's Castle of Blood [Danza macabra, which reunited the stars of La maschera del demonio, Barbara Steele and Arturo Dominici], it bore a new title: Hercules in the Haunted World.

Hercules in the Center of the Earth is somewhat closer in tone and design to Bava's Italian version. Hercules in the Haunted World, on the other hand, is a distortion. For example, Grimaldi recut Gaia Germani's two appearances as the oracle Medea into four, turning her into an ersatz narrator to keep short attention spans on track.

The two English versions of the film are immediately distinguished from Bava's cut, which begins with ordinary main titles, by a prologue sequence involving Lico. Hercules in the Center of the Earth opens on the "sacred" hill at Ecalia (formerly the Hill of the Dead), the camera panning down from the sacrificial stone altar, past a gnarled tree as a woman's scream pierces the night. Clearing the tree, we see a blonde woman lying supine on the ground, her face mostly averted and her throat covered in blood—though the sequence unfolds under a hot red tint that effectively erases the blood from view. The camera continues its pan to reveal Lico standing over the woman. He speaks:

> "The time shall come when day shall turn to night and night shall rule our lives. Then will the cries of the tortured become as music, their shrieks and cries will become sounds to soothe us. The time will come when the moon, devoured by the Great Dragon, shall bring eternal darkness and I shall become the Lord of Darkness and Light. When the sun burns up the harvest, when the rivers run dry, and every mortal soul will be damned forever, then Evil shall triumph—even over the Gods—to dominate the Earth!"

GERMAN A1 poster, art by Engel.

Having intoned this incomprehensible hogwash (which does not fully match Lee's lip movements), Lico turns his eyes to the full moon above, which undergoes a full eclipse. Under cover of night, the open crypts of the dead at the base of the hill close, the corpses inside them evidently biding their time.

Hercules in the Haunted World opens with much of the same footage, though without the red tinting (restoring Bava's actual color lighting scheme, and the bloody wound on the woman's throat) and intercut with recycled shots of the masked oracle Medea, who is reinvented here as a narrator of events:

SHOT of gnarled branches CUTS to establishing SHOT of Ecalia.

"This is Ecalia, a kingdom city of ancient Greece in an age of myth and legend . . ."

SHOT of Lico's altar.

"It is a time when Gods and demigods rule over the elements of Nature and control the destinies of men . . ."

The camera PANS down, past a large gnarled tree, as we hear the SCREAM of a woman. The camera clears the tree to reveal a blonde woman, supine, still moving but with blood on her throat. CUT to Medea.

"I am Medea, official oracle of the immortal Gods and sorceress of Ecalia. It is I who will tell what has happened in this kingdom; it is I who will foretell what will come to pass. Many years ago, the Gods were offended by the King of Ecalia . . ."

SHOT of lunar eclipse effect.

"A curse was cast over the land and a terrible force of Evil was brought down upon the people . . ."

SHOT of reanimated dead, standing still.

"This curse was ordained to remain until the last descendant of the King was ordered to descend into the haunted realm of the Dead . . ."

Two SHOTS of Lico follow, both outtakes from later appearances.

"And now there is one in this kingdom who has joined forces with the Gods of Evil—the fiendish Lico, a diabolical vampire.[15] He would become ruler of Ecalia at any price . . ."

CUT back to Medea.

"And there is another who can save the kingdom from this fate . . ."

CUT to Hercules, image taken from the later scene of his consultation with Medea.

"Only he has the strength and courage to challenge the Gods, because he is more than just a man . . .

CUT back to Medea, followed by SHOT of Hercules raising his arms to the heavens, thanking Zeus at the end of the picture.

"He is the son of Zeus! He is Hercules!"

15 In Hercules in the Center of the Earth, the voice of Medea was dubbed by a British voice actress. In the US version, Medea's narration was dubbed by an American woman who pronounced the villain's name as "Lie-co." It is pronounced "Lee-co" elsewhere in the picture, even by Medea.

After this confounding preamble, Hercules in the Haunted World segues into an excellent, neo-psychedelic main titles sequence, with lots of hypnotic spirals and surging spooks, designed by the Los Angeles animation company, Filmation Associates. The credits seen in Hercules in the Center of the Earth are far less evocative, with plain lettering superimposed over the stone surface of a tomb. The original Italian credits are simple white text on black, but combined with Trovajoli's splendid, shimmering overture, this brief spell in the dark is an effective warm-up for the adventure to come.

While the British version of the prologue is perhaps "purer," in the sense of not being recut, the post-production tinting seriously damages its meaning and its pedigree. The footage seen in the prologues appears to be a sequence extracted from its original position amid the film's climactic events, in which Lico has kept his promise to drink the blood of Deianara. (In the film's continuity, as it now stands, we see Lico descend upon the fainted Deianara after she fails to subdue him with the Stone of Light, in a chilling subjective shot that implies, rather than illustrates, his consumption of her blood.) Since lunar eclipses are so uncommon as to be unlikely to occur twice in the same movie, the woman in the prologue (whose face is averted, for the most part) is almost certainly Deianara, played by Leonora Ruffo or her stand-in. (The clothing worn by this sacrificial victim matches that of Deianara.) In accordance with his deal with the Lord of Darkness, this vampiric act would give the mortal Lico the immortal strength necessary to challenge the demigod Hercules in a physical battle, and also explain why he subsequently bursts into flame when touched by daylight. Neither of these details are explained in the final film, which eschews the sanguinary aspects promised by most of its international release titles.

The Woolners may have altered Lico's original narration to make it less obtuse for young American matinee audiences ("When the moon is devoured by the Great Dragon?"), but surely the words imposed on Medea are even more confusing. Besides muddying the matter of whether this story is meant to be enjoyed in the past or present tense ("It is I who will tell what has happened in this kingdom; it is I who will foretell what will come to pass"), Medea's incantatory speech raises some valid questions. If the King had banished the forces of Evil from Ecalia, how is it that Lico occupies the seat of power? Is Deianara under a spell because she is her father's descendant or, as the rest of the film presumes, because Lico has placed her under his spell? The new narration also suggests that Ecalia has been cursed for generations; in truth, this curse is restricted to the royal line, but the US narration makes the film's second curse (brought on by the abduction of Persephone) redundant. The second curse is merely awkward in the original context, but here, it becomes something of a continuity error.

The second point of variation is found after Theseus hurls the Golden Apple into the sea to placate Pluto's anger. In Hercules in the Center of the Earth, Hercules thanks him ("Without you, I would never have succeeded in this venture.") and there is a cutaway shot to Telemachus, comically entwined in the ship's rigging. This shot dissolves to a nicely ominous scene prefacing Hercules' return to Ecalia. The scene opens with a tracking shot of cattle skulls strewn across a barren landscape. People are walking in desultory fashion along a road in the middle field, away from Ecalia. Hercules comes along on horseback and greets an Ecalian couple.

DANISH program booklet cover.

MEXICAN lobby card.

HERCULES
Greetings, my friends!

MAN
These are sad times, Hercules.

HERCULES
What has happened?

MAN
The Gods have abandoned us. The heavenly fires have burned our fields and dried our rivers. Someone has offended the great gods of Olympus.

WOMAN
Intercede for us!

MAN
Our cattle have all died.

The couple continue walking, and Hercules rides on.

The scene then dissolves to Hercules being jeered by the people of Ecalia, who blame his adventure for the curse blighting their land. It is a jarring turnabout, the reverse of the opening scene of the Ecalians extending to Hercules a hero's welcome. It is also jarring because the couple he greeted on the road did not blame him for the curse; on the contrary, they appealed to him for salvation. (As noted earlier, the Ecalians look quite pleased to see him, despite the angry recriminations dubbed into their mouths.)

In Hercules in the Haunted World, there is a curt splice after "Without you, I would never have succeeded in this venture" that takes us to the nocturnal establishing shot of Ecalia that opens the film. We hear the voice of Medea:

> "And so it came to pass that courageous Hercules [CUT to familiar recycled footage of Medea] captured the Stone of Light from the Kingdom of the Dead, and with the aid of the Golden Apple of the Hesperides, he and his friends passed safely through the gates of Hades. But new perils await Hercules on his return to Ecalia. The great Olympian god Pluto has been offend [sic] and out of revenge has thrust the forces of Evil upon the land."

At this point, we return to the establishing night shot of Ecalia she interrupted, which is hardly onscreen before it too inexplicably cuts away—night tripping over an emulsion fault into the sun-scorched day of the demigod's homecoming.

Many liberties were taken with the film's translation into English, but easily the worst is the film's last line, spoken by Hercules to Deianara as the frisky Theseus chases after Jocasta, the shapely fiancee of Telemachus: "As long as Theseus steals other men's girls, I have nothing to worry about." It is a very generous audience that can overlook the gargantuan stupidity of that line.

Despite its gaffes and guffaws, Hercules in the Haunted World is commonly regarded by genre devotees as one of the very best peplum adventures. This, however, is a response to the film's inherent values—the triumph of Bava's vision—not an approval of the distortions imposed on it by its American distributor. Compared to the original version's continuity, it heaps sloppiness and confusion on a narrative already rendered vague by last-minute rewrites. By recycling the shots of Medea, Grimaldi dilutes the value and impact of her brief appearances and makes a tired joke of her exotic presence. The oracle becomes a pitchman.

US one-sheet, which compensated a lack of four-color printing with spectacular graphics.

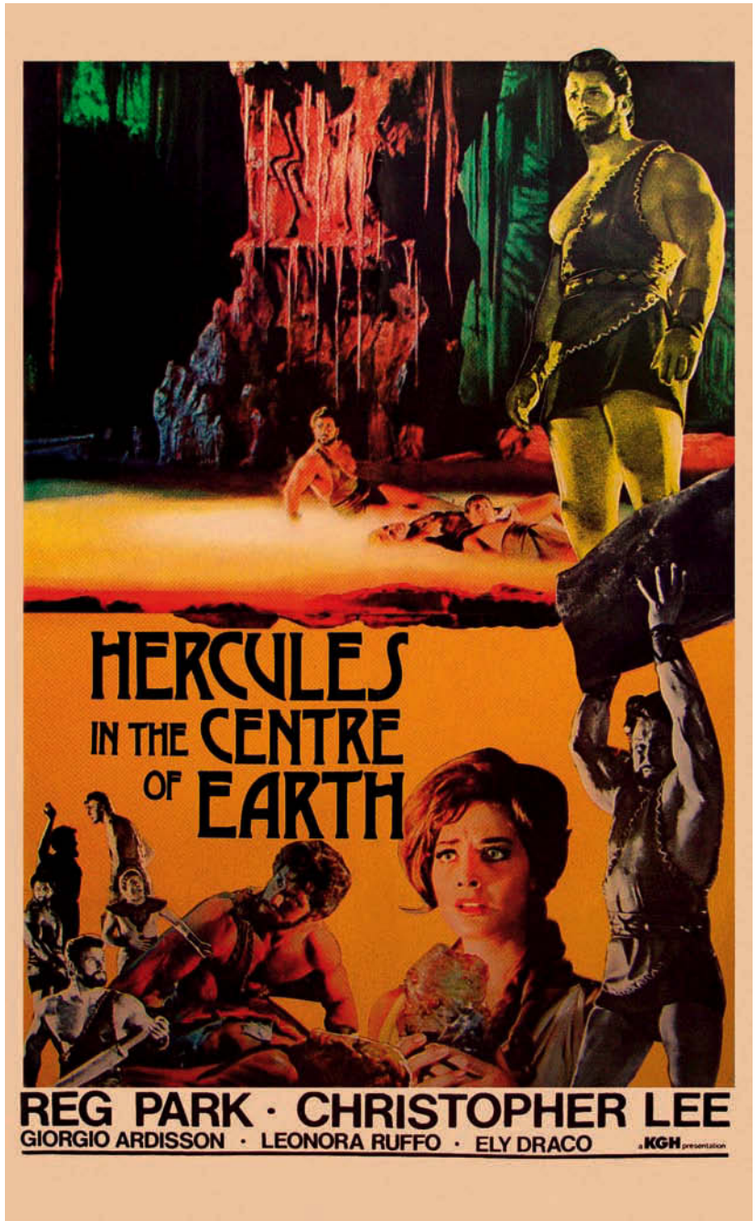
For this reason, Hercules in the Haunted World should not be mistaken as the American release of a Bava film, but as an American revision of a Bava film: an unflattering distortion of his original achievement—and a harbinger of worse transgressions still to come.

Reception



For some reason, even critics normally sympathetic to Bava's work received this epic of eye-scalding beauty with something less than enthusiasm. Following the film's release in Paris as Hercule contre les vampires in early May 1962, the French periodical Midi-Minuit Fantastique ran a review by its own editor, Michel Caen, which looked upon it with something like exasperation:

"Even after Les Mille et Une Nuits [Le meraviglie di Aladino], we still felt there was hope for Mario Bava. Alas, his latest vampires, and there are plenty of them—in the Italian cinema, vampires are always plural—are enough to discourage the true fans who have been schooled in the works of Browning, Lambert Hillyer, Terence Fisher . . . and Mario Bava! As it should be—it is one of the charms of the peplum—the scenario is reduced to a more or less incoherent succession of ill-defined actions. Once again, the sympathetic Hercules must descend into Hades, but this time, he is unfortunately accompanied by an anemic Flash Gordon . . . Who directed the admirable La maschera del demonio?"

The only response from the British press seemed to damn the picture with faint praise. An anonymous critic writing for Monthly Film Bulletin suggested that Hercules in the Center of the Earth "may well be the first mythical-horror-spectacle." Not knowing that Bava worked largely on his own to create these images, the critic proceeded to note that "the film . . . provides designers and special effects men with a field day—horrid, bubbly lava, several natty transformations, turbulent seascapes, brooding clouds and a gaggle of misshapen monsters are included in the mixture," before concluding with this jaw-dropping comment: "The trouble is that Bava's brand of spookiness is neither very frightening nor very original, and no amount of shock cutting or jazzy zoom lens shots can compensate for the absence of a real style." [16]

Regardless of which version of the film one sees, Bava's work on Ercole al centro della terra is invested with such striking color, imagination, and delirious imagery that it is impossible to imagine it failing to impress an audience. A triumph over budget (as well as a triumph over a vacant set), it has endured to become a film of lasting aesthetic appeal and influence. The 16 "Hercules in the Center of the Earth," Monthly Film Bulletin 30:349, February 1963.

AUSTRALIAN one-sheet poster.

"Silver Age" of the peplum would last in Italy for another few years, but with Ercole al centro della terra, Mario Bava—who, moreso than any other creative instigator, had spearheaded the genre—felt that he had made his ultimate "something out of nothing" and abandoned the playing field to his many imitators.

When Bava's film played in Austria as Herkules gegen die Vampire, it is said to have made a powerful impression on a certain 14-year-old boy, who left the theater idolizing Reg Park and determined to someday become a champion body-builder and actor. Young Arnold Schwarzenegger kept this promise to himself, winning his first Mr. Universe competition in 1970. Even more remarkable than his victory was the fact that he managed to triumph in this competition over his own idol—Reg Park—who was making his fourth (and final) grab for the title.

La sfida dei giganti

There is another variant of Ercole al centro della terra that warrants mentioning, if only parenthetically. On September 13, 1965, a fourth Hercules film starring Reg Park was released in Italy, entitled La sfida dei giganti/Hercules the Avenger.[17] In addition to a token amount of original footage, the film incorporated numerous entire scenes from both Ercole al centro della terra and Cottafavi's Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide, which were redubbed in the service of a new plot.

Directed by Maurizio Lucidi (the editor of Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide) under the pseudonym "Maurice A. Bright," this film was a co-production of two Roman companies, Plaza Film and Schermi Riuniti. The film's producer was undoubtedly Achille Piazzi, though his name appears nowhere on the final production. It was uncommon for co-productions of this period to be jointly financed by companies from the same country, so it seems likely that Piazzi once again ran out of funding and sold his interests to another producer, who worked with Lucidi to complete the film with footage borrowed from the two previous Piazzi productions. The names of Bava and Cottafavi also appear nowhere in the film's credits, although they directed about one-third of the picture between them.

The following synopsis details Enzo Gicca's screenplay, with the footage taken from Ercole al centro della terra printed in bold:

After the death of her husband, the palace of Queen Leda of Syracuse (Gia Sandri) is descended upon by a number of ambitious suitors, led by the slimy Eteocles (Franco Ressel). When the priestess at the Temple of Jove prophesies danger, Leda follows her advice to solicit the help of Hercules (Reg Park). Xanthos (Luigi Barbini), the teenage son of Hercules and Deianara ("Audrey Amber" a.k.a. Adriana Ambesi), is brutally mauled while lion-hunting with Theseus (Gianni Solaro) and succumbs to delirium. Hercules consults with an oracle (Gaia Germani), who warns him that he can restore Xanthos' soul only by freeing it from the chains of Hell. In footage from the Cottafavi film, rewritten in the dubbing, Hercules and crew sail to the entrance of the Underworld but the others cower and try to abandon him during a brief visit to shore. He pulls the ship back to shore by its anchor chain and, leaving the crew behind, sails on to Hades alone.

Inside a cavern, the ancient Earth Mother Gia tells her son Anteus (Giovanni Cianfriglia) that Hercules will not return from his voyage, and recommends that he seize control of Syracuse by impersonating the son of Jove. Queen Leda arrives at Hercules' home only to be told by Deianara that he is away. A storm destroys Hercules' ship*, but he rides the wreckage to his destination. Cutting back to Cottafavi footage, Hercules is greeted by an old man who transforms into the reptilian monster Proteus, whom he fights and slays. Meanwhile, Queen Leda's caravan encounters Anteus on the roadside, and his arrogance provokes an attack from her guards. He kills them, offers to accompany her to Syracuse, and introduces himself as Hercules.*[18] In Hades, Hercules encounters the Queen of the Sons of the Sun (Marisa Belli), and passes a test of worthiness by successfully felling a fabled Golden Apple from a precarious perch. Anteus quickly evicts Eteocles and Leda's other suitors and

La sfida dei giganti

"Challenge of the Giants"
Filmed at Vides Studios (Rome) and on location
Early 1965.
First released: August 13, 1965.
Technicolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 94 minutes

Production: Schermi Riuniti and Plaza Film. Distributor: Schermi Riuniti.

Belgium: De Strijd Tussen Reuzen, Cosmopolis Films
France: Le Defi Des Geants, Mondial Film
Mexico: El Desafio del Gigante
Spain: El Desafáo de los Gigantes
US: Hercules the Avenger

BELGIAN affiche for LA SFIDA DEI GIGANTI.

assumes the late King's throne and place in the Queen's bed. Hercules crosses a lake of fire and is attacked on the other side by an army of the dead, which he defeats by clobbering them with the slab-like stones of an altar. The voice of Jove advises him to place no credence in the illusions of Hell, and Hercules dives into the ocean of fire, finding only sea water. He swims until he sees the place where Xanthos' soul is chained, but he succumbs to the deadly gas enveloping the region.

Anteus terrorizes Syracuse by torturing the daughters of his prisoners and freeing the murderers in the jails. The temple priestess prays to Jove and Jove answers: Hercules revives and embraces his son's soul, which returns to his body, causing Xanthos to awaken. Word reaches Deianara and Xanthos that Hercules has been ruling Syracuse by Leda's side, which makes his homecoming from Hades awkward. After another consultation with the oracle*, Hercules makes his way to Mt. Etna and triggers an eruption of the volcano by dropping large boulders into its maw. An immense stock footage eruption bathes Syracuse in lava. Anteus escapes when his father, the Earth, opens at his feet to provide a subterranean exit, but Leda dies in the crumbling Temple of Jove. Hercules pursues Anteus underground and, after a lengthy wrestling match, successfully strangles him to death while holding him up off the ground, depriving him of the contact with earth that makes him immortal.*

Despite its frankly larcenous construction, La sfida dei giganti is a clever and occasionally effective piece of work. It's also quite attractive (the art direction and wardrobe were handled by Giorgio Giovannini and Tina Grani, both members of the Bava squad at this time); its original Technicolor widescreen presentation, now preserved on a Retromedia Entertainment DVD, is occasionally eye-popping, even in its new footage—some of which has the look of Bava's work about it, and not solely for matching purposes. One of the film's finest components is a rich score by Ugo Filippini, and it is fascinating to see whole scenes from Ercole al centro della terra—such as the Hesperides sequence—scored differently by someone other than Armando Trovajoli. Gicca's script offers a thoughtful rumination on difficult father–son relationships, using those of Hercules, Xanthos, and even Anteus to view the subject from opposing angles. Park is fine in the role of Hercules, as usual, though this final outing offers him fewer opportunities to exhibit his range of humor, warmth and sensitivity.

After the passing of nearly a decade, footage from Ercole al centro della terra also turned up in Gilberto Martinez Solares' Mexican film Santo y Blue Demon en el Mundo de los Muertos ("Santo and Blue Demon in the Land of the Dead," 1970). Most of the film's environmental views of Hades—bubbling lava lakes, skeletal hands emerging from tombs, and so on, were taken without acknowledgment from the Bava film.

17 Not to be counted is Antonio Margheriti's Ursus il terrore dei Kirghizi (1964), a non-Hercules picture which was released directly to American television as Hercules, Prisoner of Evil.

18 Casting Giovanni Cianfriglia as an impersonator of Hercules is a marvelous inside joke, as he had broken into films by working as Steve Reeves' stunt man in the original Hercules films by Pietro Francisci.

US one-sheet poster.

Il gladiatore invincibile

The Invincible Gladiator

1961 WAS BY FAR the busiest year of Mario Bava's career—so busy that it is sometimes impossible to determine, from the release dates of the many films he directed and assisted, the precise order in which they were made. There are instances when the release dates of these pictures sometimes coincide on the same day, or within a week of one another. At some point during the year, either between the two Hercules films, or immediately following them, Bava provided some maquettes and additional special effects photography to yet another sandaloni costume drama called Il gladiatore invincibile/The Invincible Gladiator, produced by Italo Zingarelli. Of the many supporting characters in the story of Bava's career, Zingarelli is comparatively minor, at least on the surface, but he is deserving of special attention because, of the numerous members of the Italian film community who prevailed on Bava during this period for his help, he was the only colleague from Bava's prime years to attend his very private funeral in 1980.

Italo Zingarelli was born on January 15, 1930, in Lugo di Romagna, Italy. The son of two academics, a secondary school teacher and a professor, he was a husky, athletic child who did some semi-professional boxing as a young man. He broke into motion pictures as a stuntman on Quo Vadis (1951), then produced his first film in Britain: Night of the Silvery Moon (1954), a 67-minute B-picture starring Kathleen Byron and Dermot Walsh. When it failed to make his career, Zingarelli returned to Rome and determined to learn more about the film business from the inside, working first as a production secretary and then as a production manager. By 1960, he was finally in position to produce once again. The result was Le legioni di Cleopatra/Legions of the Nile, a critically and popularly well-received picture directed by Vittorio Cottafavi.

Although the direction of Il gladiatore invincibile is credited to "Anthony Momphlat" (the Spanish director Antonio Momplet), it is further described onscreen as "A Film of Alberto De Martino." Born in Rome in 1929, De Martino was a young but experienced screenwriter and assistant director who stumbled into sword-and-sandal pictures by directing some second unit material for Silvio Amadio's troubled mythological opus Teseo contro il Minotauro/The Minotaur (1960), which revealed his aptitude for such material. Il gladiatore invincibile was De Martino's veiled directorial debut. The star of the film was another comparative newcomer: a young American actor named Richard Harrison—who happened to be the son-in-law of American International Pictures president James H. Nicholson.

Born in Salt Lake City, Utah, on May 26, 1935, Richard Harrison was a member of the Muscle Beach crowd of the 1950s and early '60s. He worked as a fitness trailer at one of the local gyms and also worked as a professional model for muscle magazines. He never achieved the hyperbolic musculature of a Steve Reeves or Mark Forest or won titled competitions, so his earliest screen appearances were low-profile roles in fairly high-profile movies, including the widescreen science fiction picture Kronos (1957), Joshua Logan's mammoth movie version of Rodgers and Hammerstein's South Pacific (1958), and Logan's own Tall Story (1960), which introduced Jane Fonda to the screen. However, as he says, "It was always my dream, since childhood, to go to Europe." Harrison got his chance after befriending Lou Rusoff—a producer and screenwriter at American International Pictures, also the brother-in-law of Sam Arkoff, who met the handsome acting hopeful at Muscle Beach while researching the screenplay that would become Beach Party. Harrison's features were too mature to work in a juvenile scenario like that, but Rusoff was also preparing to produce Goliath and the Dragon, and felt Harrison would be perfect in the lead. The role of Goliath would have cast Harrison opposite Debra Paget and taken him to Italy, but the project fell apart, for reasons discussed earlier in this book, before he could board the plane for Rome.

AIP's Arkoff and Nicholson apologized to Harrison for this disappointment by signing him to a three-picture deal—at a reduced per-picture rate. The first and only job that came out of this contract was a supporting role as Alistair, the stripe-shirted helmsman of the militantly anti-war aircraft The Albatross, commandeered by Robur (Vincent Price) in the Jules Verne adaptation Master of the World (1961). The role of Alistair was so minor that the director (Republic serial king William Witney) neglected to shoot a single close-up of the future star AIP was supposedly grooming. It was on the set of Master of the World that he met Loretta Nicholson, the 17-year-old daughter of James H. Nicholson, whom he married six months later. It was around this time that Harrison received the offer from Italo Zingarelli to star in Il gladiatore invincibile. (Mark Forest had been announced as the star of the forthcoming film in trade publications, but the deal fell through.) It is important to note that the film was neither co-produced nor distributed by American International. Technically, Harrison walked out on his AIP contract by boarding the plane to Italy—and he did so as a man newly married to the daughter of one of the company's founding partners. (Richard and Loretta would later divorce, after having three children together, sometime in the 1970s.) Harrison was as happy in Europe as he hoped to be, and he would reside and work steadily in Rome for the next twenty years, starring in more than 70 of his eventual 110 features.

Harrison has said that his most important contribution to the Italian cinema was turning down Sergio Leone's offer of the lead role in Il magnifico straniero—which became Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars (1964)—but, like many actors, Harrison has not actually seen most of the films he has made, so he's hardly the best judge to assess his impact on his chosen profession. As an actor and as a heroic archetype, he is hardly negligible. As can immediately be seen in Il gladiatore invincibile, his first and arguably best peplum, Harrison brings a cerebral quality to his performance that distinguishes him as much as Steve Reeves was distinguished by his physical perfection, or as Gordon Scott was unique in his ability to handle challenging stunts. This is not to say that Harrison was not an equally convincing physical performer; on the contrary, his swordsmanship and horsemanship were excellent, as was his fight choreography, but his characters' most remarkable traits are their integrity, their resourcefulness, and their sensitivity. If he pales in comparison to his co-stars in I sette gladiatori/Gladiators 7 (1962), it is a fault of the screenplay that the starring role is the blandest of the bunch, a bonding agent rather than a standout character role. As an actor, when given encouraging material, Harrison has a command of subtlety that lets the audience see him thinking, scheming, surviving. This aspect of consciousness sometimes teases the outskirts of self-consciousness, which makes Harrison's characters modern and vulnerable as well as interesting. Clint Eastwood—laconic, flinty, and squinty—was the better choice to play Leone's Man with No Name; Harrison, on the other hand, would have made a superb Ulysses.

While living in Rome, Harrison was drawn to the company of other artists working in the business, befriending fellow actors as well as the likes of artisans like Carlo Rambaldi (whose studio was near his apartment) and Mario Bava. "I liked Bava very much," Harrison says, "and my father-in-law Jim Nicholson was also a big admirer of his. When I think back to the days when I was working on my early films in Italy, I can remember that Bava was sometimes there on the sidelines, doing matte paintings on big sheets of glass. I thought he was a very, very talented man. He could make a picture look big, but as he confided to me, he hated doing big pictures."

The place is Icastus and the year is 3 A.D. The rise of Christianity is having an impact on the life-and-death sports of the arena, as well as the larger world of politics. Icastus is presently under the rule of the child king Darius (Edoardo Nevola); until he comes of age, his decisions are made by his regent, Rabirius (Leo Anchóriz). Under the instruction of his master Itus (Livio Lorenzon), Rezius (Harrison) has become the finest and possibly "the last of the gladiators." The son of a king before he was captured and enslaved, Rezius is a civilized warrior; not only can he recite the poetry of Horace from memory, but he has used it to form a philosophy of life: "Seize the day." He and his close friend Vibius (José Marco) dread the day when the arena may demand them to cross swords with one another, and that day finally comes . . . but Rezius is saved from having to take his friend's life by an attempt on the life of Rabirius, whom Rezius saves by hurling his weapon at the would-be assassin. In gratitude, Rabirius grants the gladiator his freedom and places him in charge of finding and conquering the band of brigands who camp in the mountains and plot to overthrow the regent. Rezius insists that Vibius also be freed, and Rabirius—joyous to be given a second lease on life—overlooks his arrogance and agrees.

Rezius is attracted to Sira (Brigitte Corey), the young king's older sister, but she resents him for his role in saving the corrupt and evil Rabirius. As Rezius discovers after locating the rebels' encampment, Sira is one of their number. After speaking with her and becoming more familiar with the truth of Rabirius and his abuse of the public trust, he

Il gladiatore invincibile

"The Invincible Gladiator"
Filmed at INCIR–De Paolis Studios (Rome) and Seville Studios (Madrid)
April – June 1961
First released: October 13, 1961
Technicolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 92 minutes

Production: Film Columbus (Rome) and Atenea Films S.L. (Madrid). Distributor: Variety Film.

Spain: El Gladiator Invencible, 7/2/62
Germany: Der Unbesiegbare Gladiator, 1/5/62, 91m
UK: The Invincible Gladiator, Gala Film Distributors Ltd., 1/66, 91m 12s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: The Invincible Gladiator, Seven Arts, 9/63, 92m determines to keep their secret and work for them against his liberator from inside his official circle. But Rabirius does not trust his new officer or the young king's liking for him. The regent arranges for King Darius to ride with Rezius in a sabotaged chariot during a race through the countryside. Turning a sharp corner, their chariot comes loose from its horses and goes plummeting with both passengers over a high seaside precipice. Fortunately, Rezius is able to save the king and takes him to the secret care of the rebel leaders inside the palace.

With Rezius and Darius presumed dead, Rabirius wastes no time in arresting Sira as a traitor and arranging his own immediate coronation. Meanwhile, Rezius carries the unconscious king for miles to the rebels' encampment, which he discovers has been located by Rabirius: dozens of rebels are crucified across the face of the mountain where they once concealed themselves, tied to stakes where they were burned alive. Rezius takes a horse and rides back to Icastus, where he presents the comatose king to the leaders of the rebellion, who are in fact Rabirius' advisors. Overjoyed by the king's survival, they plan to stage a revolt at the worst possible time for the evil pretender, announcing the king's return to Icastus on the day of coronation. Rezius and others find their way into the palace dungeons, where they find and free Vibius (arrested in the wake of Rezius' "death") and also Sira, who refuses to be freed until everyone imprisoned for her cause can be freed also. Rezius also finds imprisoned his former gladiator master Itus, no longer recognizable as the pillar of strength he once was. Before the liberation of the rebels can get properly underway, Rezius and Vibius are captured and thrown into a sealed dungeon. The presence of a mouse alerts them to a concealed point of entry, a small hole leading outside, which Vibius enlarges into a suitable crawlspace to freedom. As Rabirius prepares to wear the crown, the young king is shown to the people of Icastus outside the palace, exciting everyone into an all-out assault against the palace. Rezius and Rabirius have their expected showdown in the arena, but when Rezius corners his enemy, the final strike comes from an unexpected direction—from Itus, claiming his right to take the life of the man who destroyed him. Itus, truly the "last of the gladiators."

CAPTIVE PRINCESS Sira (Brigitte Corey) is threatened with the blinding of Rezius (Richard Harrison).

Rezius and Sira marry, and the son of a king becomes the brother of one and his most trusted advisor.

The work of six credited screenwriters, Il gladiatore invincibile is not a particularly unique story but it is told with great feeling and fortified with strong and often poignant dialogue. This, in turn, leads to some memorable performances. Harrison and Anchoríz were such memorable opponents that they would be cast opposite one another again. Marco is a staunchly likeable secondary hero, and Brigitte Corey (real name: Luisella Boni) stands in ethereal, milk-white contrast to the well-tanned he-men surrounding her. Perhaps most impressive in his few scenes is Livio Lorenzon, who would become a fixture not only of Harrison's subsequent pepla but of Italian gladiator films in general on the strength of his performance as Itus, until the genre petered out circa 1965. (That year, Lorenzon would work under Bava's direction in Ringo del Nebraska/Savage Gringo, using the pseudonym "Charles Lawrence.") Though the direction of the film is variously credited to Antonio Momplet and Alberto De Martino, there is nothing ambivalent about it; it has all the positive traits of a consistent vision. Richard Harrison explains this by revealing, "The true director of Il gladiatore invincibile was Italo Zingarelli, who sat over that picture like a mother hen."

Mario Bava's contributions to the film were limited to matte paintings and hanging maquettes. Two hanging maquettes are noticeable: the first is the palace exterior, and the second is seen late in the film, during the climactic scenes in the arena, as a camera angle reveals a stone village on the mountainside in the distance beyond. During the film's chariot race, Bava used glass mattes to enliven the country scenery with stone houses, sometimes lending dimension to these illusions by augmenting the glass with branches and greenery obtained from a local florist. The most memorable of the film's trick shots, however, is the panoramic shot of the murdered rebels whom Rezius finds displayed across the face of their mountain hideout. This shot appears to be a creative combination of actual props (one or two stuffed figures mounted to stakes here and there), glass matte painting (to multiply their number and add grislier examples), and possibly some hand-drawn additional paper cutouts, with smoke provided onset on both sides of the glass to integrate the various components. I've never had the privilege of seeing an excellent quality print of Il gladiatore invincibile in its correct aspect ratio, but this shot produces an emotional impact even in cropped presentations of fuzzy delineation. It's the ultimate illustration of Rabirius' villainy, and the reason anyone watching the film will want to see him vanquished.

ITALIAN due-foglia. Of all Bava's films, the most exquisite promotional art attended the release of GLI INVASORI.

GLI INVASORI

Erik the Conqueror

MARIO BAVA'S recollection of how his next film got started was a bit of a jumble: "When the first Viking film with Burt Lancaster came out, they said 'Now it's time to make a Viking film; let's get started. So we made Gli invasori with Giorgio Ardisson and Cameron Mitchell, on location at Lavinio, which—along with Tor Caldara—was the country of Vikings. Since I was fast and required very few horses or anything else, I made the producers a lot of money." [1]

Bava's casual comments stand in need of correction. First of all, Richard Fleischer's The Vikings (1958) did not star Burt Lancaster, but rather his frequent co-star, Kirk Douglas. Secondly and most importantly, The Vikings was not the first Viking film of this trend, though it may well have been the first to play in Italy. The trend was actually launched by Roger Corman, who directed the heroically titled The Saga of the Viking Women and Their Voyage to the Waters of the Great Sea Serpent in the autumn of 1957 with the express purpose of taking advantage of the Fleischer film's pre-publicity and beating it into theaters, which is succeeded in doing in November 1957—seven months before The Vikings' World Premiere. Furthermore, Gli invasori was not the first Italian Viking film; that distinction, as we have seen, belongs to Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ultimo dei vichinghi (1961), also starring Mitchell and Ardisson, which Bava had actually helped to complete.

It was a few pictures after this rescue mission that Bava was given the opportunity to direct a Viking picture in his own right, and its narrative does indeed owe a great deal to Fleischer's film. The Vikings is the story of an enmity between two adversaries—one a Viking leader named Einar, the other a Viking slave named Eric. Unbeknownst to the two enemies, they are in fact brothers, Eric being the offspring of the Queen of England, who was raped by Einar's father. Eric becomes the most hated enemy of Einar when the slave's falcon gouges out one of his eyes. After surviving the punishment doled out to him, Eric meets and falls in love with a Princess (Janet Leigh) abducted by Einar's hordes, who knows the secret of Eric's true paternity.

CAMERON MITCHELL and Giorgio Ardisson as Iron and Erik, two Viking brothers separated by war.

When Einar challenges Eric to the death, the Princess tries to spare them by confessing their true relationship to the Viking leader, confirmed by the family amulet they both wear. The two men duel outside the British castle occupied by the Vikings, and Einar throws away his chance to kill his brother; Eric, unaware of their fraternity, deals Einar a mortal blow. The film ends with Einar's Viking funeral, his body is set adrift on a burning ship, as Eric and the Princess look on.

Compare this, if you will, to the narrative of Gli invasori . . .

BELGIAN affiche.

Gli invasori

"The Invaders"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
August 22 – October 28, 1961
First released: December 7, 1961.
Eastmancolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 98 minutes

Production: Galatea (Rome), Societé Cinématographique Lyre, Criterion Film (Paris). Producer: Lionello Santi. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Francesco Prosperi, Tonino Teodoro Ricci. Story and screenplay: Oreste Biancoli, Piero Pierotti, Mario Bava. Continuity: Anita Borgiotti. Camera: Ubaldo Terzano. Assistant camera: Enrico Fontana. Second unit camera: Gianni Narzisi. Second unit assist camera: Giuseppe Berta. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini. Set decoration: Massimo Tavazzi. Props: Massimo Tavazzi. Special effects: Tonino Cacciottolo. Wardrobe: Tina Loriedo Grani. Costume design: Mario Giorsi. Costumes: Rancati, Tigano Lo Faro, Pompei. Hairdresser: Mara Rocchetti. Choreography: Leo Coleman. Production manager: Massimo De Rita. Production secretary: Arturo Padovani. Production associates: Paolo Mercuri, Armando Govoni. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Assistant to the editor: Lina Caterini. Music: Roberto Nicolosi, conducted by Pier Luigi Urbini [Nazional Music]. Sound recorder: Rolando Mattioli. Second unit sound: Pietro Vesperini. Third unit sound: Aldo Zanni. Cashier: Dante Brivi. Distributor: Unidis, Jolly Film.

Cameron Mitchell (Iron), Giorgio Ardisson (Erik), Alice Kessler (Rama), Ellen Kessler (Daia), Andrea Checchi (Sir Rudfort), Folco Lulli (Floki), Franco Giacobini (Rustichello), Raf Baldassare (Black), Enzo Doria (Bennet), Franco Ressel (Lotar), Françoise Christophe (Queen Alice), Livia Contardi (Hadda), with Jean-Jacques Delbo, Gianni Solaro, Joe Robinson.

Argentina: La Furia de los Vikingos, Industria Argentina
Belgium: De Stormloop der Vikings, Elan Film
Denmark: Normannemes sidste Togt, "The Normans' Last Expedition," Schmidt-Film, 1965
France: La Ruée des Vikings, Francinor, 7/10/63, 80m
Germany: Die Rache der Wikinger, "The Revenge of the Vikings," Rolei-Nobis, 12/7/62, 90m
Spain: La Furia de los Vikingos, "The Fury of the Vikings," Izaro Films, Eastmancolor/CinemaScope, 85m
Turkey: Buyuk Istila
UK: Fury of the Vikings, Compton-Cameo Films Ltd., 4/21/63, 89m 49s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Erik the Conqueror, American International Pictures, Colorscope, 6/1/63, 88m

Synopsis

In the year 736 AD, Viking hordes attack the coast of England. They are effectively defeated by the British regent Sir Rudfort, who commands his bowmen—led by Floki—with bloodthirsty pleasure. Two young boys, the sons of Harald, King of the Vikings, are separated during the massacre, during which their father is killed by Floki's volley of arrows. After the battle, King Lotar and his Queen ride through the body-strewn battlefield and condemn Rudfort for so cruelly exceeding his orders, which were to negotiate peace by offering Harald sole sovereignty over the North Seas. Rudfort covertly signals for the King to be shot with an arrow, which fatally pierces his neck. A dead Viking is quickly blamed for the assassination. That night, Queen Alice discovers the young abandoned son of Harald on the beach and notes the mark of royalty—a serpent in the figure-eight of Infinity—on his breast. She adopts the child as her own.

Twenty years later, the Viking leader Olaf has become too old to lead his people into battle against England, and a new leader must be chosen—either the proud soldier Garion . . . or Iron, the grown son of Harald. Iron wants to be King so that he can free his beloved Daia from her fate as a vestal virgin. When a vote of thrown axes results in a tie, Garion and Iron must cross swords for the right to rule—forging the weapons they must then use against their opponent. Iron wins this contest, but refuses to kill Garion, who gratefully pledges his life to his new King.

At the same time, Queen Alice makes her adopted son Erik the Duke of Helford. Erik leads his soldiers into sea-faring battle against Iron and is defeated, Garion losing his life in the skirmish. Erik is washed ashore near a Viking camp not far from his own castle, now occupied by Iron. Cared for by Rama—the twin sister of Daia—Erik soon falls in love with her, and she notices that he wears the same crucifix around his neck as the Queen being held prisoner in the castle; thus, Erik learns that his mother has been betrayed by Rudfort, who spitefully let the Vikings into the castle when she rejected his proposal of marriage.

Iron uses his newfound power to free and wed Daia. Witnessing their wedding, Erik believes that his beloved Rama is being untrue to him—and he disrupts the marriage of her twin. He is promptly arrested and abused in the dungeon, until Rama cleverly drugs his sadistic guards by delivering a jug of wine, supposedly for the prisoner, which they drink themselves. Erik and Rama escape and Iron abandons his own wedding to pursue them, swearing to show them no mercy. However, when a bridge of vines breaks and leaves Iron dangling over a deep ravine, Erik goes back to rescue him. With Erik's help, Iron is able to hold on until his own men arrive to effect his rescue.

Banding with additional men from Scotland, Erik soon returns to his occupied castle, but finds their combined army still outnumbered two-to-one by the Vikings. Erik then challenges Iron to a duel. The two men cross swords until Iron defeats the Duke, at which point he throws away his sword, declares them even, and hurls himself into barehanded battle. During their fight, Iron discovers the serpent emblazoned on Erik's breast, the mark identifying him as a long-lost brother. Emerging from battle arm in arm, Iron declares peace—but Rudfort's men fire an arrow at Erik, which Iron heroically takes in his stead. Rudfort raises the drawbridge and holds Iron's new bride Daia hostage inside.

Dying, Iron desperately wants to see his wife one last time. While Rama poses as her sister to comfort him, Erik gains access to the castle by heroically pulling himself up a ladder of arrows fired into the outer walls by his and Iron's soldiers. He regains the castle, and Rudfort dies as King Harald did so many years before—his chest shot through with dozens of arrows. In a downbeat ending, Iron dies before he can be reunited with Daia, but she shares his final voyage, immolating his body, his ship and herself, as Rama and Erik look mournfully on from the shoreline.

CLOTHED in white, vestal virgins attend the joint crucifixion of one of their sisters and the lover for whom she forsook her vows.

As should be readily apparent from comparing the two synopses, Gli invasori borrows so much from The Vikings that it stands as a virtual remake, with Mitchell and Ardisson respectively cast in the Kirk Douglas and Tony Curtis roles. Einar becomes Iron, Eric becomes Erik; the untouchable Princess loved by both men becomes twin vestal virgins loved by Iron and Erik; Einar's penchant for axe-throwing is reborn as a Viking method of casting votes; the amulet of fraternity becomes a physical brand or birthmark; both films build to a climactic brawl between the two male stars, as their respective

1 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

ALICE and Ellen Kessler as Daia and Rama.

PICTURE sleeve for one of the Kessler Twins' popular German 45 rpm singles, "Honey-Moon."

armies look on; and lastly, both films end with the Viking funeral of the top-billed actor.

Regardless of the similarities between Gli invasori and The Vikings, Bava's film seems to owe at least as much to Corman's Viking Women and the Sea Serpent (to use its condensed advertising title), which proved that epic historical adventure stories were not necessarily off-limits to meager-budgeted productions, as long as they were approached with imagination and technical know-how. Corman's film had the advantage of some excellent matte paintings by Irving Block, Louis DeWitt and Jack Rabin which gave it a dimension of scenic class uncommon in Corman's early filmography, but Corman and his crew (led by Science Fiction Theater cameraman Monroe Askins) didn't have the technical finesse to otherwise conceal their threadbare budgeting. Therefore, its viewers are basically left to decide whether or not they are going to suspend disbelief and follow where the movie means to take them. One imagines that, if Bava had seen Viking Women, he would have known instantly that the film worked on its own level, and that, working on that same level, he could do much, much better.

As with Bava's previous two directorial assignments, the title of Gli invasori was an ironical knock-off of a fairly recent Italian release; in this case, William Cameron Menzies' Invaders From Mars (1953), which did not arrive in Rome until the late 1950s, and then under the title Gli invasori spaziali. The script was written by Oreste Biancoli (1897–1971), a former director from Bologna whose most famous movie, Nozze vagabonde (1936), had been the first 3-D picture of the sound era. A screenwriter since 1932, Biancoli had co-written a number of notable peplum scripts, including Maciste nella valle dei Re/Son of Samson (1960), Antonio Leonviola's Maciste nella terra dei ciclopi/Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops (1961), and Riccardo Freda's Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan (1961). Gli invasori appears to have been the final project of his long career. The script is co-credited to Piero Pierotti (1912–70), a Pisa-born filmmaker who worked as an assistant director and/or co-writer on films directed by Giacomo Gentilomo (Enrico Caruso) and photographed by Mario Bava (La donna più bella del mondo), before becoming a director in his own right. He specialized in pepla, costume pictures, and Spaghetti Westerns, and sometimes signing his work "Peter E. Stanley."

Cast

By his own admission, Mario Bava had little affinity for actors. Consequently, while he worked faithfully with the same crew members for much of his career, it was unusual for him to work with the same performers more than once. He would re-use certain character actors time and again—like Gustavo De Nardo, Harriet White Medin, Luciano Pigozzi ("Alan Collins"), and Piero Lulli, whose faces form distinct constellations in his universe—but only one male star was invited back to carry the weight of three films: Cameron Mitchell.

It wouldn't be correct to suggest that Mitchell was to Bava what Cary Grant had been to Hitchcock, or De Niro to Scorsese: an alter ego. It is more likely that Mitchell simply knew enough about his craft to be left alone, allowing Bava to concentrate on his greater concerns of lighting and cinematography. On the level of production where Bava toiled, he was sometimes required to work with all manner of unprofessionals: alcoholic actors, temperamental starlets, producer's girlfriends, and faded stars bent on reaffirming their former celebrity at the expense of their directors and co-stars. Under these circumstances, Bava would have considered an actor like Mitchell—who was serious about his craft, always prepared and never complaining of the material he was given—a welcome relief. Bava may also have interpreted the actor's name as a sign of good luck: his favorite tool was the rock-steady 35 mm Mitchell camera he used for filling special effects, and here was an actor whose name sounded like "Camera Mitchell."

The role of Erik marked the final collaboration of Bava and actor Giorgio Ardisson, who in many ways steals this picture. In his later work, Ardisson would become a staple of the Spaghetti Westerns of the 1960s, but his most visible work includes Antonio Margheriti's I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (1964, opposite Barbara Steele), Nick Nostro's Operazione controspionaggio/Operation Counterspy, (1965), Albert Band's made-for-television Hercules and the Princess of Troy (1965), and a supporting role (with his natural, darker hair color) in Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965). He remained active in Italian films until his death in 1995, when he suffered a fatal heart attack during a screening of his last picture.

Ellen and Alice Kessler, the twins who respectively played Daia and Rama, were born on August 20, 1936, in Leipzig, East Germany. As children, Ellen dreamed of becoming a dancer, while her more academically inclined sister studied drafting. In 1952, at the age of 16, they fled to West Germany with their parents and jointly decided to support themselves by following Ellen's star. They first entered the public forum with a popular stage act at Les Foliés in Paris, their routine built around dances in which they mirrored each other's meticulously choreographed movements. They made their first screen appearance in 1955's Solang' es hübsche Mädchen gibt/Beautiful Girls, and made the jump into French films by playing the Dolly Sisters in 1957's Les Garçonnes. They became very popular in Italy as "le gemelle Kessler," making numerous singing and dancing appearances on prime time television programs, then proceeded to add the Italian cinema to their list of conquests. They appeared as featured players in Le bellissima gambbe di Sabrina/The Beautiful Legs of Sabrina, directed by Camillo Mastrocinque; surprisingly, Sabrina was played by Mamie Van Doren, who was hardly as celebrated for her legs as the Kesslers were. Around this same time, the Kesslers recorded a series of German pop singles with Peter Kraus (as "Alice, Ellen and Peter," for the Polydor label)—"Honey-Moon," "Mondscheim und Liebe," "Hallo Blondie"—and showcased their shapely legs in a series of commercials and advertisements for OMSA stockings.

US lobby card: After Sir Rudfort (Andrea Checchi) helps Iron and his men gain access to the Queen's castle, the tables are turned on him.

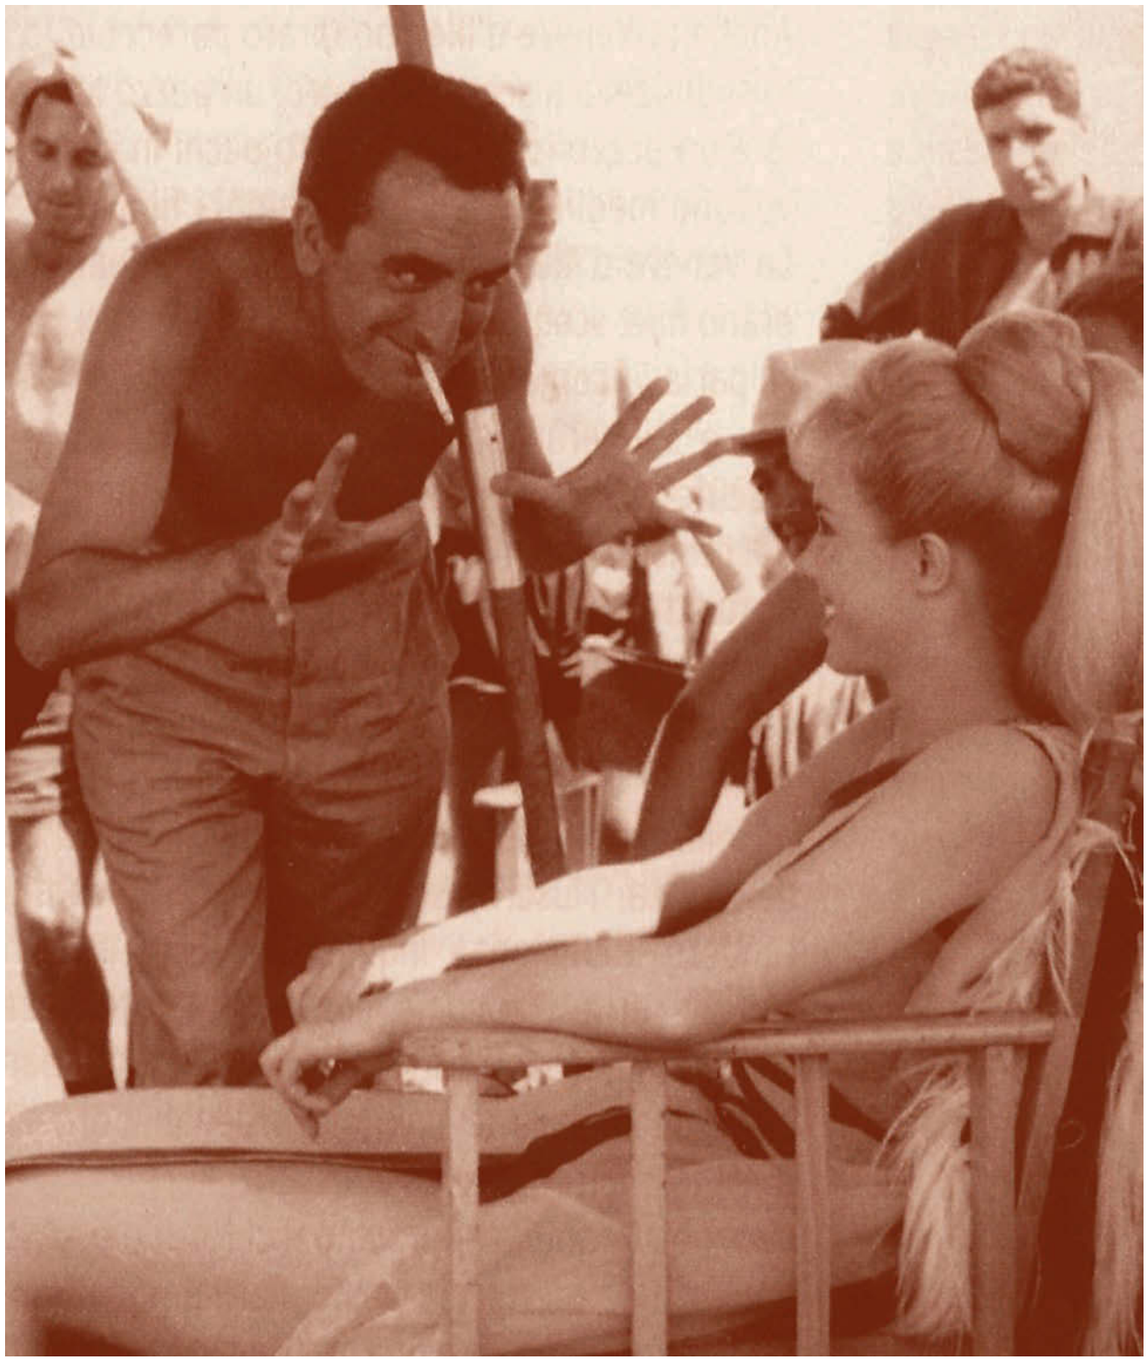
"They were really quite nice and also very sympathetic," recalled their co-star, Cameron Mitchell. "They tried, and I thought they were very good. I also thought they were beautiful, graceful, and feminine—certainly a lot nicer than Charlie's Angels! But I also thought that Bava helped them. They were what I guess you'd call 'cabaret stars,' but Bava made them human and believable. They weren't just pretty showgirls."



On the set, Bava was fond of teasing Alice and Ellen. He would walk past them, feign a double-take, roll his eyes at them, and insist that they were a hoax, that they really looked nothing like each other, that they were probably were not even related. After their appearance in Gli invasori, the Kessler Twins brought their act to America, where a performance on The Red Skelton Show made them an overnight sensation and catapulted them onto the 2/23/63 cover of Life magazine—the issue on national newsstands the week of President John F. Kennedy's assassination. Afterwards, the sister act continued to make films—most notably, Robert Aldrich's Sodom and Gomorrah (1962)—but they began to shy away from motion pictures after playing "the Tiddy Sisters" in Die Tote von Beverly Hills/That Girl From Beverly Hills (1964). After appearing as themselves in their last film, I complessi (1965), they worked for a time in Las Vegas and made other bids for celebrity in America, including appearances on The Ed Sullivan Show (they happened to share the bill on the night of The Doors' one and only Sullivan show), but their greatest success was always in Germany.

Given special billing as Queen Alice, Françoise Christophe came to Gli invasori with an impressive career in French films behind her. Two of her most interesting early credits were Jean Sacha's Fantômas (1947) and Jean Cocteau's Le Testament d'Orphée/The Testament of Orpheus (1960), in which she played the Nurse. Christophe's naturally patrician appearance landed her several royal parts, including Austria's Queen Anne in a two-part feature adaptation of The Three Musketeers in 1960, and a Duchess in Philippe de Broca's popular Le Roi de coeur/King of Hearts (1966). She was terrorized once again by "The Genius of Crime" in Fantômas contre Scotland Yard (1967, opposite Jean Marais), and she was featured in Antonio Margheriti's giallo film La morte negli occhi del gatto/Seven Deaths in the Cat's Eye (1973).

Christophe, whose casting in Gli invasori helped it to attract co-production funding from France, was still working in films as recently as 1992.

Cast against type as the villainous Sir Rudfort was Andrea Checchi, who had played Dr. Kruvajan in La maschera del demonio, as well as a major role in L'ultimo dei vichinghi. (For some reason, in all print references, the name of his character is given as "Gunnar," though he is never called by this name in either of the English versions.) Gli invasori was the last collaboration of personal friends Bava and Checchi, though the actor lived a dozen more years and made a good many subsequent films. He passed away on March 31, 1974, from a rare viral infection at the age of 58.

Folco Lulli, the lean-featured actor who plays Rudfort's sadistic first officer Aello ("Floki" in English-language prints), was born July 3, 1912, in Florence and made his first screen appearance in Un pilota ritorna (1942). Despite an important mainstream appearance in Federico Fellini's directorial debut Luci del varietà/Variety Lights (1950), Lulli's adeptness at horsemanship and action stuntwork made him a fixture of Italian historical dramas in the 1950s—beginning with Ulisse (1954) and Nel segno di Roma (1958) and continuing through the peplum cycle of the 1960s: La regina dei Tartari/Queen of the Tartars (1960), Romolo e Remo/Duel of the Titans (1961), and Maciste, l'eroe più grande del mondo/Goliath and the Sins of Babylon (1963), to name a few—and the Spaghetti Westerns of the 1960s. He played the role of Tobias in Esther and the King (1960). He died at age 57 of a heart attack on May 23, 1970—just a few years after writing and directing his first film, Gente d'onore ("Gentlemen of Honor," 1967). Folco's younger brother Piero Lulli also appeared frequently in Bava movies, playing important supporting roles in L'ultimo dei vichinghi, Operazione paura, Ringo del Nebraska/Savage Gringo (1966), and I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger (1966)—enough to qualify him as one of Bava's favorite faces and most frequent collaborators.

Production & Special Effects

For the most part, Gli invasori is shot without a lot of illusory spectacle, which may have been a welcome change after a film like Ercole al centro della terra, which was almost nothing but. Nevertheless, it does contain some trick shots worth pointing out.

Cameron Mitchell remembered: "When we were making [Gli invasori], there was only one place on the coast where we could shoot, near Anzio, because that coastline was pretty well populated. There was only one hill, one angle, we could use. Bava said to me, 'Camerone'—he called me 'Camerone'—and called me over to look through the camera. He had taken a photograph of an old castle and mounted it on a pane of glass before the camera, to make it look mounted on the top of that hill! He did that scene literally with pictures from National Geographic! It was incredible!"

BAVA teasing Alice Kessler and (opposite) clowning around with his good friend Cameron Mitchell.

The English castle can be seen cleverly positioned atop the hillside at Lavinio—a seaside resort near Anzio which legend holds to have been one of the original dwellings of Aeneas—serving as a dramatic backdrop to the final confrontations of the film. At one point, to really sell the illusion, Bava photographs Mitchell's and Ardisson's stunt doubles crossing their swords high on the hill, looking for all the world as though they are fighting immediately outside the barricades of the massive structure.

Bava was reluctant to employ special effects methods that he could not absolutely control, but Gli invasori includes a few blue screen travelling matte shots that, given his other responsibilities, may have been entrusted to other hands. They are fairly well-done, and show that advances had been made since Le meraviglie di Aladino, which was subject to quite a few ragged edges in this department. During the sequence featuring the castle matte, there are at least two close-ups of Cameron Mitchell that show the actor waving his sword in front of an optically printed background of the castle matte. Blue screen work was also utilized for one of the film's most exciting moments, when the bridge of vines collapses under Iron in his pursuit of Erik and Rama—allowing a view of the Mediterranean to be inserted behind the bridge suspended over the mountain chasm, which was built and photographed in the studio.

"THIS can't work!" Cameron Mitchell said, but Bava managed to stage a sea battle without ships in GLI INVASORI.

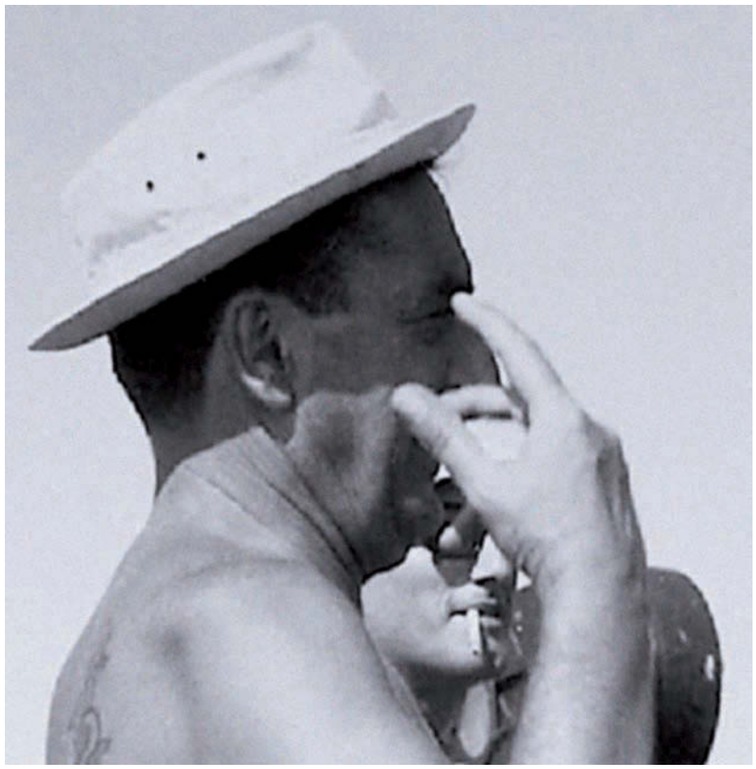
"He had an eye for scale, and he knew by looking exactly how far from the camera he needed to be to fake a ravine or a chasm," Mitchell said.



"What was physically there were the actors, whatever props we came into contact with, and the rest was trickery. We jumped from one platform to another. There was a [gap and a drop], but it wasn't that high; it wasn't that dangerous. And the sea behind us? There wasn't any, not when we were doing the shot. He could take his actors and place them on wooden planks, make that platform look like the sides of a ravine, and he could place the water where he needed the water! I don't know how the hell he did it; I can't tell you."

When Sir Rudfort fires upon Iron and closes all entrances to the castle, there is a brief shot of the castle's drawbridge closing. This is obviously a miniature, but what is interesting is that this elaborate miniature is used in only in this single shot, as we are never shown anyone entering or exiting the castle via this drawbridge.

Considering the time and expense involved in the building of such a prop, and how dispensable this shot is, it may be that the miniature was built as a setting for other shots as well—perhaps effects shots—that were ultimately not used.

The film's most exciting sequence is Erik's heroic scaling of the castle walls to rescue Daia, using arrows carefully fired by his compatriots as handholds. For this sequence, another background plate of the sea was photographed from a steep high angle, with Ardisson climbing a not-particularly-steep sea wall; this was then incorporated into a blue screen shot, whose foreground element was a slanted, albeit basically horizontal surface of planks suggesting the castle wall. As Ardisson disappeared behind the foregrounded element on the optical plate, the actor was photographed on the set, climbing atop the castle's facade. Bava used a similar procedure—and the same location—years later in Diabolik/Danger: Diabolik (1968), to depict the master criminal's stealthy scaling of the wall of a seaside house hosting a millionaire's dinner party.

By far the most elaborate of the film's illusions was the sea battle between the English and the Vikings, which—apart from some second unit shots—Bava filmed entirely indoors. The sequence was reserved for the end of the production schedule, and found the director outdoing himself once again with absurdly minimal means. "I shot the entire naval battle using only a couple of wooden tables carved into the shape of ships' sterns, with a dozen Viking shields along the sides, all propped up against soap crates, while some crew members rocked the camera in imitation of the sea!" he later recounted. "And then there was Cameron Mitchell, having buckets of water thrown at his face by an off-camera technician! And the ship looked far more convincing than the ones shown in Cleopatra!" [2] The sequence also includes some cutaway shots of miniature ships, which were shot in a water tank at Cinecittà. "Those Viking ships were constructed out of planks of Buitoni pasta, with a sort of prow leading the way," Bava pointed out. "The stagehands threw water on dry ice to produce a fog, and a bellows went up and down, puffing out big, black smoke." [3] Incredibly, Bava estimated the total cost of the battle sequence at approximately 150,000 lire [$94].

KING of his set: Bava's shoulder was painted with the brand of Viking royalty during the filming.

The sequence does work surprisingly well, being largely sold by the graceful camera dollying along the length of ships we never actually see, which gives the static set an illusion of being truly at sail.

The actor at the helm of the table was likewise impressed. "Bava used fairly close shots for that sequence, and he moved the boat by moving the camera," Cameron Mitchell explained. "The camera would slowly move back and the 'ship' seemed to be moving forward. I kept saying to myself, 'Jesus, this can't work!' but it does work. He made it work. The things he did were miracles. In all my years in Hollywood, I never saw anyone else who had what Bava had—this great knowledge and skill of cinema magic. He was a . . . 'cinemagician.' That's a pretty good word for him."

Bava seems to have had a wonderful time making the picture, whose leisurely production lasted throughout the summer. An abundance of behind-the-scenes photos show Bava in generally high spirits, posing for gag shots with Mitchell and playing the clown for the pretty girls, scowling only at the persistence of the stills photographer. When working on location under the hot Roman sun, the male crew members dispensed with their usual dress protocol and often stripped down to their undershirts or bare skin as they went about the day's work. One photograph of Bava shows him shirtless and standing in profile, a tattoo of a snake adorning his left shoulderblade. When I asked Lamberto Bava about this decoration, he rejected the very idea: "I am sure that Mario never had a tattoo!" On closer study of the adornment, I recognized the tattoo as the same serpentine figure-eight which identifies Iron and Erik as royal-born brothers in the movie. Thus, Bava's tattoo was not permanent, but rather an affectionate gift from the film's makeup artist, identifying him to one and all as the king of the set.

Assistant director Franco Prosperi remembers Bava as being quite an easy-going and benevolent King, at that: "I remember that it appealed to Mario to play scopone scientifico [an advanced form of bazzica scopa, requiring four players]. At times, he would actually hold up the shooting in order to play another hand with the machinists and electricians; it appealed to him more than his work." [4]

The Invaders & Erik the Conqueror

As usual, to encourage an American sale, Galatea produced an English-dubbed version of Gli invasori entitled The Invaders. The film was quickly acquired by Samuel Z. Arkoff and James H. Nicholson of American International Pictures, for whom it was something of a consolation prize. The moguls of AIP had been so pleased with the boxoffice performance of Black Sunday that they extended a personal invitation to Mario Bava to relocate to Los Angeles and sign a multi-year contract to direct motion pictures exclusively for them. Bava was vastly complimented, but declined their offer.

Arkoff felt that Bava's refusal to leave Italy prevented him from achieving all that he might have done as a film director. "I believe, had he either lived or worked in the US or the UK, Bava might have become as well-known as Hitchcock, at least as a prominent horror director," Arkoff declared. "We tried to get him, but he was basically an Italian and didn't feel comfortable in English. We even tried to interest him in moving to the UK and working there, but basically, he felt at home in Italy."

"I always refused to go to America, and that was a big mistake," Bava admitted later in his career. "I'm too much of a homebody; I would hate America. Still, it was very wrong of me to turn them down . . ." [5]

The reasons behind Bava's refusal were probably more involved than he would have acknowledged in a print interview. It is true that he was insecure about his English—"He could speak it better than he thought he could," as Arkoff well knew—but even in his native language, Bava was more of an observer than a public speaker. He thought visually and worked instinctively; speaking aloud meant having to translate the things he understood innately into a verbal form that others could appreciate. Even Bava's Italian co-workers sometimes had difficulties understanding exactly what he wanted them to do. This was one obstacle. There was also love of country, and another factor was undoubtedly age. "Bava was pushing 50," Arkoff agreed. "Maybe if he had been 30 or even 35, he could have done it."

US half-sheet, art by Reynold Brown.

But the prevailing reason for Bava's decision to remain in Italy was unquestionably family. His children were now at the age where they were embarking on adult lives of their own, and moving would mean leaving them behind in Rome. This would have been unacceptable to Mario, and certainly unacceptable to his wife Iole, who—one imagines—would never have agreed to such a move even if her husband accepted AIP's invitation.

"In order for him to come to America, it would have meant breaking up the family," concurs Mario's friend Andrea Piazzesi. "He preferred to live a modest life; he was not an ambitious person. His wife never really wanted to go anywhere with him, never wanted to go to any sort of party, which must have been a problem for him in terms of his career because, as a director, if you can show up in certain social circles where you can meet producers, your luck comes much more easily than if you live privately, as he did, staying home with his wife. But maybe he preferred doing that."

AIP wanted to stake their claim on Bava, and as soon as Achille Piazzi was out of the way, they pounced on the next Bava film offered by their Italian liaison, Fulvio Lucisano. There was some disappointment that The Invaders

2 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

3 Abruzzese.

4 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

5 Abruzzese.

AS KING of the Vikings, Iron must preserve the integrity of vestal virgins such as Daia and Rama, but he romances Daia (Ellen Kessler) by night.

wasn't another horror picture, but costume pictures were still hot and, they had to admit, Bava had worked wonders with the budget (officially $100,000 and almost certainly less). Nevertheless, the picture needed some work, Arkoff and Nicholson felt. In 1963—nearly two years after they bought the rights—AIP released their own English-dubbed version of the picture: Erik the Conqueror. The entire film was recut and redubbed at Titra Sound Corporation, with Brett Morrison providing the voice of Iron.

The original dub, The Invaders (first released in America on home video by Panther Entertainment in the mid-1980s), contains some awkward translation ("The filthy blight of the Vikings is at last extirpated, never more to befoul our glorious Britain!"), but for the most part, the wording of its dialogue was retained by Titra's redubbing. Compared to The Invaders, AIP's theatrical release Erik the Conqueror was further reconfigured, being extensively cut, re-edited, and re-scored. Even so, AIP's cuts were not so drastic as was supposed by their pressbook, which listed the running time as 81 minutes; the actual running time of Erik the Conqueror was closer to 88 minutes—10 minutes shorter than the original.

The Invaders opens with the main titles superimposed over a view of the sea at magic hour. Erik the Conqueror opens with abbreviated titles on a velvet blue backdrop, as magenta-colored smoke rises from below camera. After the credit for the Kessler Twins, there is a visible splice on all prints, suggesting that the remaining credits may have been intended—as with many other AIP films—to be shown at the end of the movie, with the smoke recalling the conclusive image of Iron's funeral pyre. Dirt cheap but very effective, this active background was first utilized by AIP under the end titles of Goliath and the Vampires and was subsequently reused on several of their direct-to-television sword-and-sandal releases of the 1960s. Nothing more than smoke and color, the backdrop manages to be redolent of mystery, alchemy, fantasy, and Bava's own unique personality.

Erik proceeds to omit The Invaders' awkward opening narration, which is heard as we are made to stare for a few static minutes at a crudely drawn map of the British Isles:

> "In the year 786 of the Christian era, off the rocky shores of England in the county of Dorset, there appeared for the first time three great long vessels. Blonde giants, thirsty for blood, eager for conquest, overwhelmed the island destroying every fortification and spreading death and terror. The Vikings were invading Britain. Many of us followed that first landing and the sight of their huge prowed, square vessels came to mean disaster. A long iron lance was their fearful weapon. And from their icy land those fierce, invincible, pitiless heads established themselves solidly on those shores. And so were born small kingdoms whose strength came out of blood and slavery. The only Viking king desirous of peace and justice was Harald of the order. Thus, King Lothar of Britain had charged Sir Rudford [sic] to negotiate with him for peace."

Without this opening dialogue, Erik the Conqueror forfeits the desired irony when we cut from the allusion of peaceful negotiations to a Viking settlement being raided and massacred by Sir Rudfort's troops. Erik also eliminates much of the raid's original brutality, omitting (for example) the truly shocking sight of a young mother fleeing her hut with an infant, and being shot with an arrow—right through the wailing baby in her arms. [6]

The preparations for Iron's duel with Garion were abbreviated, as was a conversation between Daia and Rama, in which Daia confessed her love for Iron and her hopes that he would become King and free her from her commitments as a vestal virgin. Rama tells Daia that if he should die in the coming war, she will be absolved of her sins. More significantly, nearly all of Franco Giacobini's supporting role was cut from AIP prints. Giacobini—returning from Ercole al centro della terra—plays Rustichello, a silly but inventive soldier who is teased by his shipmates for anticipating trouble at sea and preparing a makeshift belt of bladders to use as a life saver.

RUSTICHELLO
I'll be floating on top of the sea!

SOLDIER
Like a—!

RUSTICHELLO
Spare me the word!

This scene is absent from Erik—perhaps due to the unwholesome exchange quoted above—so when Erik is found washed ashore on Viking land and is saved from certain death by Rustichello (who quickly manufactures a story that they were both overturned at sea while fishing), the viewer is confused, because the film has neither previously introduced Rustichello nor his affiliation with the Duke.

What is most surprising about the AIP version is that, for the most part, Roberto Nicolosi's original music score—his most robust orchestral work to date—was allowed to stand. That said, at least one scene was given different music. In The Invaders, the sequence in which Erik is named Duke of Helford by the Queen is scored with two Christian hymnals, whereas in Erik, the ceremony is accompanied by, of all things, Gregorian chanting. This is an absurd revision, as Gregorian chants date from the 16th century, an historic distance of nearly a millennium from the story at hand. The gnostic quality of this music also makes the scene more ponderous, whereas the original cues fostered a more favorable, celestial atmosphere; it also obscures the film's pointed subplot about the religious motivations of the English in regard to conquering the pagan Vikings. Furthermore, Nicolosi's specific use of recognizably Christian music establishes the religious underpinnings of the relationship between mother and son, and lends resonance to the crucifixes which links the two of them in Rama's eyes, and brings about their reunion.

After Iron is mortally wounded, Erik deletes an extended dialogue scene between the two reunited brothers, in which Iron embraces Erik, holds him close, and tells him that they are finally together as they were always meant to be, and that he is sure their father awaits him in Valhalla. He makes clear to everyone that Erik is to succeed him as King of the Vikings, and then feeling his strength subsiding, he gasps his need to see Daia, which is where Erik resumes the scene.

Ultimately, Erik the Conqueror is—once again—a sad and pointless reduction of Bava's original work: less fluid, less coherent, less feeling, and less poetical than the director's cut. Only the elimination of the awkward opening narration effects a noticeable improvement.

AIP released dozens of sword and sandal films directly to television, but relatively few were shown in US theaters. Though Erik the Conqueror does not exactly qualify as one of that genre, and perhaps because it doesn't, the company's handling of the picture was somewhat unsure and misleading. Legendary poster artist Reynold Brown came up with an eye-grabbing advertising campaign for the picture, which curiously depicted Erik as the evil aggressor, and Rama as a formidable Viking Queen! ("In his bloodpath of conquest there stood only one temptation . . . Rama, Queen of the Vestal Virgins!")[7] The ads also camouflaged the film's Dyaliscope/Eastmancolor process as "Colorscope," an AIP-coined term that disguised a great many anamorphic (and non-anamorphic) prints over the years; it can be seen on the posters for Goliath and the Barbarians, Guns of the Black Witch, and numerous other AIP releases. The campaign was such a complete fiction that it hearkened back to the early days of the company, when Arkoff and Nicholson pre-sold concepts with poster art, and once the films were booked into theaters for the upcoming season, had the films made.

Similarly confused is the original AIP pressbook synopsis, which bears so little resemblance to the actual storyline that one cannot help but wonder if AIP's copywriter actually saw the movie:

"During the tenth century,[8] a Viking colony in Britain is attacked and overwhelmed by the English King, Lotar.[9] All are killed, including the Viking monarch, Aello, with a little Viking boy with a strange marking on his breast apparently the only survivor.[10] The English Queen, Alice, befriends the little boy, adopts him and makes him her godson. Years later, the boy has grown up as the Duke of Helfort and the Queen rules in the place of her late husband.

"The warriors from the North are now ruled by Flaki,[11] brother of the King killed in the English attack, with his armies led by the King's nephew, Iron, who dreams of avenging the massacre in which his father and young brother Erik were killed.[12] Iron is in love with Daia, young priestess of the god Odin, who has a twin sister Rama. Daia urges Iron to regain the English colony kingdom held by his father, since as 6 This shot presages the shocking moment in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve when a couple are impaled with a spear during the act of lovemaking.

7 In fact, it is her sister Daia who becomes Queen, when she marries Iron.

8 Actually, the eighth century.

9 King Lotar arrives after the battle is won.

10 His brother also survives, rescued by his uncle, Olaf—otherwise, there would be no movie.

11 The Viking chief is called Olaf in the film. Floki (not Flaki) is Sir Rudfort's chief bowman.

12 Iron is the son of the late Viking King, not his nephew. His wish to be King is not driven by a thirst to avenge a battle held twenty years earlier, but to free his beloved Daia from her vows as a vestal virgin.

ERIK is temporarily defeated by Iron.

King, he could free her from her vows as a priestess. [13]

"Meanwhile the English fleet, under the Duke of Helfort, goes out to stop the Viking fleet under the command of Iron, which has set out to avenge the earlier defeat. [14] In the course of the battle, the Duke's ship is sunk and he disappears in the waves while the Vikings continue to another English conquest. During the land battle, the Queen's minister, Gunnar, goes to the Viking camp to betray his ruler in an effort to save his own life. [15] The English Queen thus becomes a captive of the Vikings and Iron becomes a King, enabling him to free Daia from her religious vows and make her his Queen. [16]

"In the meantime, Rama comes across a young man on the seashore near her home who claims to be a shipwrecked Viking. [17] He is the Duke of Helfort and he reveals his true identity to Rama when they fall in love, knowing she will not betray him. [18] Later, the Duke (the boy Erik, adopted by the English) meets Daia, thinking it is her twin sister. When she finds that he is English, she exposes him and he is imprisoned. [19] During the night, he is freed by Rama and taking the Queen with him, the three put to sea in a small boat and return to England. [20] There he regroups the English armies and they recapture the Queen's castle, killing the faithless Gunnar. [21] In a climactic battle, the Vikings under Iron battle the Erik-led English in an effort to recapture the castle and also bring Rama back to Viking justice. [22] In a duel to the death between Erik and Iron, they see that each bears the same strange markings on their chests, the mark of royal Viking brothers. As the two brothers rush into each other's arms, an arrow kills Iron, leaving Erik to assume his rightful rule and to claim his love, Rama." [23]

The film appears to have attracted little critical attention in its travels around the world, perhaps because its historic nature prevented it from being caught in the net of Midi-Minuit Fantastique.

When it was distributed in the United Kingdom by Compton-Cameo in June 1963, under the title Fury of the Vikings, it was briefly noted by an uncredited reviewer in the pages of Monthly Film Bulletin: "The highly unlikely story has some of the charm of (and devices) of a minor Shakespearean play, with identical twins loved by muscular enemies who turn out, by the tattoos on their chests, to be brothers . . . Otherwise, it's all treachery, tournament, torture, duel and battle, savagely effective in its Gothic way and enhanced by Mario Bava's luridly filtered photography and fluid camera technique, and his effortlessly eclectic direction . . . Apart from a shattering soundtrack, the technical credits are above average, as is some of the acting . . ." [24]

Commentary

Undertaken immediately after the completion of Ercole al centro della terra, Gli invasori was not a carefully planned picture and its haste sometimes shows. Unlike Bava's previous directorial efforts, the film does not look seamless; just as L'ultimo dei vichinghi is a patchwork adventure co-directed by Giacomo Gentilomo and Mario Bava, Gli invasori could almost as easily be the same thing. Individual scenes have the look and feel one expects from the Bava/Terzano/Serandrei triumvirate, but others could pass for the impersonal work of hacks. The film's conflicting, piecemeal textures might be explained by lack of time and money, but considering Bava's habitual victory over such constraints, it seems a more plausible explanation that there was more than one cook in the kitchen—or if Bava's fatigue at the end of production (to be discussed in the next chapter) kept him from participating in the final editing.

The opening raid, for example, has moments worthy of Bava's visual sense—the picturesque low angles, the moments of unexpected savagery, the battlefield scattered with artfully arranged bodies, and so forth—but the bulk of the sequence is so chaotically filmed that, being placed so early in the film, it registers less as an epic attack than as a sustained blur with only occasional images of real staying power.

The subsequent scene of the assassination of King Lotar is more interesting, in that it introduces the important character of the two-faced Sir Rudfort, but this villainous character is himself almost immediately subordinated by the more evil-looking toady Floki, who fires an arrow through the King's throat at the subtle command of Rudfort's nod. Despite Andrea Checchi's best efforts, Rudfort's cold politeness is never really given the necessary showcase to seem genuinely evil; even in the last reel, as he explains the device that will unleash a poisonous spider on Daia's beautiful skin when a sand-weighted bowl raises a partition of glass between them, he seems to take more delight in the gadget than sadistic pleasure in the torture. In the final analysis, Rudfort is eclipsed as the villain of the scenario not once, but twice: first by Floki, and then by Iron—thanks to a Cameron Mitchell performance that taps into the bloodthirst that resides even within good men who are determined soldiers.

Gli invasori doesn't really grab the viewer until it moves past its prologue scenes, when the Dyaliscope panorama suddenly fills with an array of skulls, crowned with uncanny emerald green light, introducing a ceremonial dance heralding the crucifixion of a vestal virgin and her lover. In this sequence, the mise-en-scène is charged with some of the same dramatic currents that informed the pre-credits sequence of La maschera del demonio, as two lovers are being sentenced to death by a conservative tribunal—in this instance, the couple have been tied together, back to back, by barbed vines that arrange their near-naked bodies in the shape of a human crucifix. Though the sequence is hindered by some not terribly inspired choreography, highlighting the dancing talents of the Kessler Twins, the astounding set—dominated by the trunk of an immense tree bathed in the same dazzling, emerald light—and the bold lighting sustain one's interest until Iron is introduced. Though miscast as a young man of 25, Cameron Mitchell (who was 42 at the time of filming) nevertheless tackles the role of Iron with verve and virility; his vitality is as responsible as Bava's contribution for making the film as watchable as it is.

The film shares other touchstones with La maschera del demonio that help us to define those threads which Bava himself was likely to have contributed to the screenplay. Once again, the heroine has a twin image; in this case, both Daia and Rama are pure and virginal, but Daia is compromised as a vestal virgin who, like the condemned woman of the scene which introduces Iron, is engaged in forbidden romance. "Iron never should have set his eyes on you," Rama reproaches her twin sister, interpreting their love in visual terms. Later, when Erik encounters Rama on the beach the second time, he does much the same thing when he says (in the uneven English dubbing), "All men carry within them the image of the perfect woman in their heart." (The names Daia and Rama have their origins in the Greek words dia and horama, which together mean "through seeing," and it should also be mentioned that the Greek prefix di appears in words pertaining to things either doubled or divided.) Just as the sisters are as one in terms of that image, the two brothers are alike in terms of the feminine ideal they carry in their hearts—and by the serpentine "birthmark" both of them bear on their chests. Once again, as in La maschera del demonio and Ercole al centro della terra, Bava's symbol of compromised nobility is reptilian. And when we first see Daia in the clutches of Sir Rudfort, the strap on her dress has been torn, suggesting that the villain has taken some erotic liberties with his prisoner—as Javutich did upon delivering Princess Katia to Asa's tomb.

While Gli invasori has certain themes in common with La maschera del demonio, it shares actual props in common with Ercole al centro della terra. The upright stone slabs adorning Lico's altar appear here adorning the marriage altar of Iron and Daia, and they appear again later, encircling the ceremony where the Baron of Scotland pledges his army to the service of Queen Alice. During the climactic battle scene, we see the large, wheeled catapult stand that Hercules raises above his head and throws so hyperbolically against his foes in the earlier picture, as it tips over in the midst of battle; it also provides the skull-adorned, wheeled platform that displays the two doomed Viking lovers.

Gli invasori is the first of Bava's films as director to open as Mio figlio Nerone did, with a contemplative view of the sea—and many such films would follow: La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon and Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve. All of these films deal with matters of family, predestination, and systemization to some degree, and Bava seems to find generations in the lapping waves, and a force of nature in the recurring motions of the sea from which no wave can ever break free. There is also something elemental, eternal, and implacable about the sea, as Bava's eye uniquely depicts it; an ironic counterpoint to human travails indicative of where all life began and where all life—in this case, Iron's—eventually returns. There may be no meaning in the symmetry, but there is beauty in it, which may be enough.

It is another of the film's weaknesses that Iron's death scene is

IN A HEROIC act of fraternity, Iron leaps into the path of an arrow fired by one of his own men, meant for Erik.

13 Daia urges no such thing.

14 After twenty years???

15 Though Sir Rudfort must have made arrangements with the Vikings, no such meeting is shown in the film. Instead, he opens the castle to the Vikings and allows the Queen to be taken captive. He does this in exchange for power, not as an act of cowardice.

16 Iron does not become King by invading the castle of Queen Alice, but rather in an earlier duel.

17 Erik makes no such claim.

18 Erik never does reveal his identity to Rama, so to speak. Instead, when she mentions that the Queen is held captive, Erik reveals himself as her son to arrange her escape.

19 Erik is not "exposed" by Daia, nor does she have him imprisoned. This is the doing of Iron, whose wedding to Daia is disrupted by Erik.

20 They are already in England!

21 True, but this synopsis places these details a bit prematurely. Sir Rudfort (i.e., "Gunnar") signals for the arrow to be fired which kills Iron.

22 There is no climactic war, only a battle between Erik and Iron.

23 This implies that Iron was preventing his younger brother from having his rightful rule, which isn't the case. As Iron's younger brother, he would have ascended to the Viking throne only after his brother's death.

24 Monthly Film Bulletin, 30:353; June 1963.

FRENCH grande affiche, art by Jean Mascii.

dragged out to lengths that begin to seem comic, the film's climactic momentum sapped by the constant cutting away from the splendidly composed, dynamic shots of the castle siege to the dying Viking's delirious mutterings. That said, the death scene does have two peculiar points of interest. As Iron lay dying, he calls for his wife Rama, who is unavailable, as she is being held prisoner in the castle; with a nod from Queen Alice, Rama's twin sister Daia steps in and provides the embodiment of the image shared in the hearts of both brothers, much like the shared birthmark they wear over their hearts. But what Bava tells us in this scene is that images needn't be sincere to offer comfort; it is the illusion, and the way we receive it, that matters. Secondly, as Iron feels death approaching, he pushes his "wife" away, boasting that he will have only one companion in death—"my sword." He dies leaning on it, his hands sliding numbly down the blade and falling away with his open palms in bloody tatters. The finale finds Daia rescued from the castle only to join her dead husband on his flaming death ship to Valhalla, while Erik and Rama look on—both now individuals, yet also a new couple.

Marriage, then, in the view of Bava's film, is a contract with death. Indeed, the marriage ceremony of Iron and Daia is predicated on death: an animal sacrifice, which Bava cannot bring himself to depict onscreen. (Indeed, elsewhere in the story Bava's respect for animal life is reflected by Rama's discovery of a tiny starfish washed ashore, which she carries back to sea, just prior to discovering Erik, who has been similarly brought aground.) Rather than show the marital sacrifice, we hear the off-camera bleating of an animal, and then a pool of red—exactly matching the color of Daia's striking wedding veil—is poured across the phallic hilt of Iron's sword to symbolically unite them. Later, as Iron dies, Bava focuses on the grip of his hand, sliding painlessly down the length of his sword's blade, blood once again staining it to the hilt.

In its final reels, Gli invasori makes an unusual narrative choice by having Sir Rudfort capture Daia rather than Rama, which puts Erik in the curious position of taking extraordinary measures to rescue his brother's wife, rather than the woman he loves—which would have increased the imperative of the climax. In the meantime, the dying Iron is comforted by Rama, who responds to his gasping pleas for Daia and pretends to be her in his final moments. The fact that traditional narrative demands would be ignored, in favor of showing the dying Viking being comforted by a lie is interesting, especially in that the plot depicts the essential meaninglessness and interchangeability of Church and State. The two sisters, both vestal virgins sworn to Odin, reject their religious obligations in favor of a more gratifying sexual relationship with the two brothers, one of whom is a Viking raised to spearhead the British resistance. When the two brothers recognize each other's true identities on the battlefield, the Vikings do not automatically win; instead, a truce is called, leaving only Sir Rudfort as quickly disposed villainous leverage. What is most interesting about the painstaking rescue of Daia is that she is saved from Rudfort's clutches only to be sent to her death anyway, aboard her dead husband's funeral ship.

SIR RUDFORT*'s dreams of power come to dust in a volley of arrows, Kurosawa-style.*

As always with Bava's work, Gli invasori is well-stocked with intoxicating images, especially on the big screen, where Bava's attentive furnishing of the entire Dyaliscope frame is most apparent and where its colors burn most brightly. (To date, no video presentation exists that does this film jssssustice.) The somber shot of the silhouetted Queen Alice and her handmaiden crossing the corpse-strewn battlefield—a juncture between billowing clouds and fallen men—toward the sounds of a crying child; the giant tree setting, where Iron and another Viking settle a tie in an axe-throwing vote by forging their own swords to fight to the death; the sinuously filmed scene of Iron's clandestine romantic meeting with Daia (the actors kissed on a circular set wreathed with twisting bracken, which the camera tracked around on a makeshift dolly, apace with the actors' carefully choreographed movements); the coronation of Erik; the marriage of Iron to Daia, (an apparition in red scarves with two white hands crossed over her breast); Iron's near-death as he falls into the chasm, gripping a cluster of vines; Erik's heroic scaling of the castle wall on arrows fired into it from below; Rudfort's violent death, as he is pierced by a half-dozen arrows from all directions, recalling Toshiro Mifune's death in Akira Kurosawa's Kumanosu jo/Throne of Blood (1957)—these are all first-rate. But these imagistic jewels are strung together by a derivative, weakly constructed screenplay that consists of little more than voyages back and forth across the sea, contrived meetings and revelations, and perfunctory solutions.

Perhaps because it owes too much to Fleischer's The Vikings, and because it offers too few opportunities for Bava to explore his greatest gifts as a filmmaker, Gli invasori is not one of Bava's first-rank achievements. It is well-acted, at times dynamically directed, and it contains moments of great visual splendor, painterly lighting, and so forth, but much of what it does is done better—with more exuberance and personality—elsewhere in the Bava canon. Ironically, it was one of Bava's few films that performed better in Italy—where it earned 326.3 million lire [$203,000], probably recouping double its cost—and other European countries than in America, where the Viking craze never really caught on.

Vacation in the Arena

Maciste all'Inferno
I Normanni
I sette gladiatori
Le sette spade del vendicatore

IN THE TWO YEARS which had now passed since La maschera del demonio, Mario Bava had gone about his business, following his usual, unambitious inclinations—that is to say, taking whatever work was offered to him and collecting his pay, without giving any larger thought to the arc of his career, or to his own physical limitations.

Gli invasori, with its vast number of extras and logistical demands, was a more difficult film than any Bava had directed to date. By his own admission, after filming the illusory sea battle on the final day of shooting, Bava—who had been working non-stop for more years than he could count—collapsed from what he termed "nervous exhaustion." Perversely, Bava would often boast of this breakdown in later years, in personal conversations and in interviews, describing how his inhalations of the noxious fog used to fill the stage had nearly driven him mad.

KIRK MORRIS seeks escape from Hades through a flaming portal in Riccardo Freda's MACISTE ALL' INFERNO.

"I finally got an infection and had to stay in bed for six months," he later claimed. "I almost ended up in a padded cell! Nello Santi rewarded me with a bonus of 5 million lire [$3,100]. Those were the days . . ." [1]

Bava's colorful anecdote took on a life of its own as it was repeated from one person to another, and eventually, the Italian film industry was rife with whispers about how Bava, who made such horrific films, had suffered a nervous breakdown and was hospitalized, that he had been straitjacketed and sent to a madhouse. But Mario's family deny that anything of the kind ever occurred.

"I can assure you that Mario never suffered a nervous breakdown," his granddaughter Georgia insists. "Of course, there were times when he was very upset, sad, and even depressed, as when his father died. I am not telling you this to hide anything; I really am convinced of what I am saying. If it were true, I would not mind telling you; I really don't mind talking about any kind of problem, concerning either myself or my whole family. You also must consider that, for better or worse, fortunately or unfortunately (because maybe I would have preferred at times to have been omitted from knowing all the personal problems of my family), we all know every single problem about each other in our family. The only time Mario ever went into the hospital (for a check-up—blood test/urine/blood pressure/heart, etc.), the doctors said he was perfectly well and had nothing to worry about—and then he died."

The insistence of Georgia and other members of the Bava family that Mario never suffered a nervous breakdown is supported by facts that have since come to light, which place him during the next six-month period as a contributor on various film sets, though never in the capacity of director. Reading between the lines, it seems that, in the wake of his busiest year ever—culminating in a picture so physically demanding as Gli invasori—Bava suffered some kind of collapse or emotional crisis that persuaded him to take a six-month leave of absence from directing. He took things easier, but he did not stop working. Because his activities were unofficial and uncredited, the rumors continued to circulate and, eventually, had an unfortunate impact on his career.

Maciste all'Inferno

With Mario Bava's Ercole al centro della terra awaiting its November release, screenwriter Ennio De Concini suggested to producers Luigi Carpentieri and Ermanno Donati that they continue their Maciste revival with a remake of the 1925 classic Maciste all'Inferno. For reasons unknown, De Concini opted to take no story credit, instead using the alias "Eddie H. Given," but a screenplay was developed by Oreste Biancoli (fresh off of Gli invasori) and Marco Polo director Piero Pierotti.

The opportunity to direct was given not to Pierotti but to Riccardo Freda. Though he would continue to reside and work in Italy through 1967, Gordon Scott chose not to continue in the role of Maciste; as his later acting choices demonstrate, he now preferred to concentrate on opportunities that might advance him as an actor rather than roles that were primarily physically demonstrative. His rejection of the script may have also had something to do with the fact that Maciste all'inferno would require him, at one point, to wrestle two live boa constrictors—he had nearly been strangled to death while wrestling with one such reptile during the making of Tarzan's Fight for Life in 1958.

Replacing Scott as Maciste was Kirk Morris, who had already portrayed the hero onscreen in three movies since 1960: Guido Malatesta's Maciste contro I cacciatore di teste/Colossus and the Headhunters (1960), Tanio Boccia's Trionfo di Maciste/Triumph of the Son of Hercules (1961), and Mario Mattoli's Maciste contro Ercole nella valle dei guai/Hercules in the Valley of Woe (1961). Born Adriano Bellini in 1938, Morris was a former Venetian gondolier turned bodybuilder who was given his new moniker by the man who discovered him, film producer Giorgio Marzelli. In a 1993 interview conducted by Emanuela Martini and Stefano Della Casa, Riccardo Freda reflected, "The best of the body-building actors were Steve Reeves and Gordon Scott. More problematic was Kirk Morris, who was a Venetian lifeguard [sic] and absolutely in no position to speak his lines without being defeated by them. I worked around the problem as best I could by making him a nearly mute hero, one who lives by action rather than words, and leaving the verbal side

Maciste all'Inferno

"Maciste in Hell"
Filmed at Cinecittà and at the Castellana grottoes in Bari, Italy
Late 1961
First released: April 11, 1962
Technicolor, CinemaScope, 2.35:1, 90 minutes

Production: Panda Cinematografica (Rome). Distributor: Regionale.

France: Maciste en Enfer, Comptoir Française du Film Production, 86m, 1962
Germany: Maciste der Rächer der Verdammten, "Maciste the Avenger of the Condemned," Constantin Film, 12/7/62
US: The Witch's Curse, Medallion Pictures, 12/63. Video: Maciste in Hell

I Normanni

"The Normans"
Filmed at Titanus Studios and on location
Early 1962
First released: August 23, 1962
Eastmancolor, Dyaliscope, 2.35:1, 91 minutes

Production: Galatea (Rome), Societé Cinématographique Lyre (Paris). Distributor: Lux Film.

Denmark: Normännens Raseri, "Sword of the Normans," 7/2/65, "Cinescope"
Finland: 11/29/63
France: Les Vikings Attaquent, Societé Cinématographique Lyre, 1963, 85m
Germany: Die Normannen, Karpat-Film, 10/19/62, 82m
UK: Invasion of the Normans, Compton Film Distributors, 2/8/63, 87m 13s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Conquest of the Normans, American International Pictures, 80m

I sette gladiatori

"The Seven Gladiators"
Filmed at INCIR–De Paolis Studios (Rome) and Seville Studios (Madrid)
Spring 1962
First released: October 11, 1962
Eastmancolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 98 minutes

Production: Film Columbus (Rome) and Atenea Films S.L. (Madrid). Distributor: Variety Film.

Spain: Los Siete Espartanos, Chamartín, 9/9/63
Germany: Sieben Gladiatoren, 12/20/63, 92m
UK: Gladiators 7, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 7/64, 92m
US: Gladiators 7, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 5/6/64, 92m

Le sette spade del vendicatore

"The Seven Swords of the Avenger"
Filmed at Castello di Borghese and on location in Rome
Spring 1962
First released: October 30, 1962
Technicolor, Screenscope, 2.35:1, 90 minutes

Production: Adelphia Compagnia Cinematografica (Rome), Comptoir Français du Film Production, Francisco Film (Paris). Distributor: Cino del Duca.

Belgium: 7 Degens voor de Koning
France: Sept Epées pour le Roi, 4/8/64
Germany: Die 7 Schwerter der Rache, Iris Films, 1/17/64, 86m
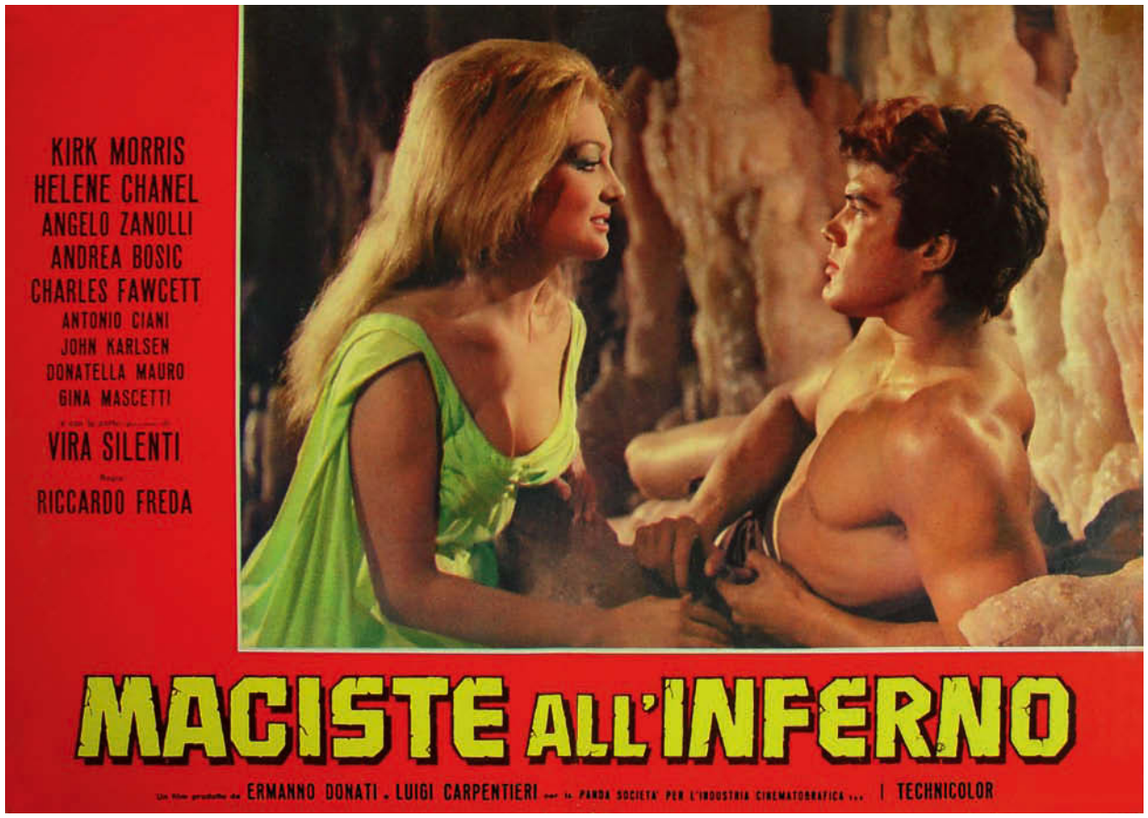
UK: Seventh Sword, New Realm Pictures, 7/63, 84m 27s, Certificate "A," passed with cuts of Maciste all'inferno to Andrea Bosic, who was a real actor."

If the recognition of Bava's international success in his native industry needed any proving, one need look no further than Maciste all'inferno, which opens with a scene that is not only loosely modeled on the pre-credits scene of La maschera del demonio but which was executed with the assistance of Bava himself.

In the 17th century, the villagers of Loch Laird, Scotland are incited to burn an accused witch, Martha Gaunt (Hélène Chanel), whom they tie to the trunk of a tree. Before her death, the aged crone accuses the local magistrate, Justice Parris (Andrea Bosic), of provoking this veiled act of murder to avenge himself against her, who rebuffed his romantic attentions when she was a young and beautiful girl—and she rails her curse against the villagers and their descendants. One hundred years later, a desperate young woman named Mary Bloom attempts to hang herself from a dead branch of the tree where Martha was burned alive, and it bursts into bloom and witnesses of this bizarre magic are driven made by it, proving that the witch's spirit continues to be active. This episode coincides with the arrival of Charlie Guy (Angelo Zanolli) and his new bride Martha (Vira Silenti), a descendant of the witch who is bringing her husband to her family estate of Castle Gaunt. Learning that Martha Gaunt once again inhabits the castle, the village burgomeister (John Karlsen) orders it be sieged and the innocent woman is nearly burned alive. Fortunately, Maciste (Kirk Morris)—always on the alert to oppose evil—intervenes and demands that the woman be given a fair trial. Martha is placed in a cell by the cowed locals, and Maciste decides to prove her innocence by searching for the real source of evil at its root. He uproots the tree of undead blooms and discovers beneath it a direct route to Hades.



Far beneath the earth's surface, Maciste sees many appalling sights of torture and torment. He sees an old man about to be crushed under the weight of a massive boulder and accepts the burden from him, not realizing that the damned one is merely a guise of Justice Parris, mocking Maciste's goodness. Parris dwells in Hell with Martha Gaunt, who spends her eternity haunting and punishing him mercilessly. Martha resents Maciste's altruistic descent into the place of her eternal punishment and presents herself to him as a seductress, Fania. In this guise, she persuades him to partake of a delicious apple that saps his memory and all sense of the purpose of his mission. He follows Fania deeper into Hell, fighting off deadly serpents and a laughing giant, leaping over rivers of fire just to be nearer to her. Losing sight of her, Maciste comes to the aid of Prometheus, doomed to an eternity of having his liver pecked out by an eagle for his transgression against the Gods, and Prometheus helps him to recover his memory. When Maciste succeeds in staving off a herd of bulls intent on pushing him over a precipice into a pit of flames, Martha can no longer deny his worthiness and falls in love with the essential goodness of the hero. She confesses to Maciste, who distrusts her intentions, that one kiss from her lips is all that is needed to discharge her curse. He kisses her, and she vanishes into thin air.

Meanwhile, the people of Loch Laird have grown tired of waiting and are preparing to burn Martha at the tree where her ancestor met her fate. (It has magically risen to reseal the pathway to the Underworld.) As the witch's curse is lifted, the flames engulfing Martha and Charlie are extinguished by providential rains. Maciste emerges from an opening in the ground and frees the couple. The rains also seem to wash away the madness engulfing Loch Laird, and with peace restored to the community, Maciste mounts his horse and gallops away toward his next adventure.

ACCUSED WITCH Martha Gaunt (Hélène Chanel) prepares to be burned alive in the Bava-inspired prologue of MACISTE ALL'INFERNO.

1 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

MACISTE (Kirk Morris) meets a rejuvenated Martha Gaunt in Hades, in this Italian fotobusta.

For this ambitious production, Freda once again turned to Bava with a request that he oversee the film's special effects photography. Recovering from overwork, Bava agreed but within set limitations; consequently, the picture is not nearly so steeped in special effects as one might imagine or hope. Maciste all'inferno carries a special effects credit for Serse Urbisaglia, who specialized in fire, fireworks, and other explosive effects, rather than opticals and trick shots. The majority of the film's magic consists of precisely of such pyrotechnic effects—the Bible bursting into flames, the shower of sparks, the pockets of open flame seen here and there amid the craggy walls of Castellana grottoes where the Hell sequences were filmed. Relevantly, Urbisaglia's earliest recorded screen credit was for Totò all'inferno, a spoof of the Maciste silent starring Totò (of course), made in 1954. At some point in the production, it would appear that Freda himself gave up trying, because chunks of narrative seem to be missing and the restoration of Maciste's memory, after he partakes of Fania's magic apple, is conveyed with a risible parade of clips from other movies. As if to embarrass Kirk Morris, none of the clips are from the backlog of Maciste adventures in which he starred; instead, flashbacks to the derring-do of Gordon Scott, Gordon Mitchell and Mark Forest (all produced by Carpentieri and Donati) are dredged up, with their own familiar faces clearly visible on occasion, though Morris was required to participate in foolish and unconvincing "insert" shots to suggest these clips as fragments of his own earlier adventures.

Among the shots which Bava supervised for the film: the 45° angled glass shots used to superimpose live flame over the shots of the actors being burned alive; an elaborate glass matte seen during a shot of the newlyweds' coach approaching Castle Gaunt, that masks a clear view of the familiar Castello di Balsorano with a more haunted-looking woods; another view of the castle, as supposedly seen from a local tavern, which shows a large illuminated window where the actual castle has none; the optical shots of the gigantic flaming iron door and the charging steers; and Maciste's rather laughable leap across the river of flames (it's the leap that's funny, not the effect). Aside from the wooded view of the castle, none of these contributions are particularly notable and, when one compares this film's river of fire to the one in Ercole al centro della terra, one can measure exactly how much more Bava was able to achieve in a controlled studio environment, versus an actual location. Indeed, Freda's decision to film so much of the picture in the sameness of the Castellana grottoes is one of many elements that detract from what should have been a much better picture.

One curiosity about Maciste all'inferno is that it somehow got around the "curse of Maciste" when it was released in America and other English-speaking territories as The Witch's Curse. Acquired for US release by a small outfit called Medallion Pictures Corporation, the film was allowed to keep its original export dub, so Maciste was called "Maciste" in one of the character's recent spate of adventures for the first time. The English version of the film was one of the first directed by newly expatriate American actor Mel Welles, best known for his tongue-in-cheek performance as florist Gravis Mushnik in Roger Corman's shot-in-two-days extravaganza, The Little Shop of Horrors (1959). Born Ira Meltcher in New York City in 1924, Welles had been active in film and television since 1953, appearing mostly in uncredited character parts until becoming an outstanding member of Corman's repertory. The record shows that he made only three other pictures for the notoriously thrifty producer-director—Attack of the Crab Monsters (1957), The Undead (1957), and Rock All Night (1958)—before deciding that these sorts of pictures weren't doing his career any favors. Welles' real ambition was to direct.

"I graduated from college as a doctor of psychology, got bored with it and became a writer, and then someone asked me to act," Welles told me in 2001. "I was good at it but didn't find it terribly fulfilling, so I decided to direct." After many years of trying, Welles succeeded in writing and directing a low-budget crime picture called Code of Silence (1957), starring Terry Becker, Ed Nelson, and himself, but it was never properly distributed. "In order to direct [again], I had to become a producer—to hire myself as director! I left America for Europe because, at that time, television had cut into the movie business by about 40 per cent, and I got tired of working at places like Screen Gems. In Europe, they were still making feature films. I bought a short story from Playboy magazine called 'The Skindiver and the Lady,' and I made a deal with some German producers to produce it for me while I directed it. In return, I would direct one of their pictures.

Neither picture got made, but that's how I got to Europe. When I first got to Rome, I was asked to dub a picture called The Best of Enemies [I due nemenici, 1961], as an actor. I dubbed every actor in the picture except for Alberto Sordi and two Africans. A bit later, they did a picture called Barabbas [1962]; the director, Richard Fleischer, was going to take the film out of Italy to England or America to dub [it], but to satisfy Dino De Laurentiis, he agreed to audition a few of us [dubbing actors]. I ended up doing twenty-something voices for the picture!" [2]

Welles would eventually succeed in his ambition to make more films as a director—La isla de la muerte/Island of the Doomed (1966) and Lady Frankenstein (1971) remain popular with collectors of choice horror arcana—but it was his work as a dubbing director and actor that would always be his real bread and butter. He remembered that his first work as a dubbing director was done for Riccardo Freda, and The Witch's Curse—in which his voice is heard many times, notably as the doctor who befriends Charlie, played by Charles Fawcett—was possibly his first such assignment. Welles would subsequently become acquainted with Mario Bava and dub the English versions of a number of his films.

I Normanni

Bava was lured back to work after the holidays to contribute to another Galatea/Lyre co-production: I Normanni, an historical drama starring—once again—Cameron Mitchell. He may have been entreated to return to work as a personal favor to producer Nello Santi, or to Mitchell. Whatever may have motivated him, I Normanni was an extremely minor assignment, little more than a means of further easing Bava back to active duty.

I Normanni is set at the beginning of the ninth century, when—an opening scroll tells us—the once-piratical Normans gave up their plundering ways and began to settle on English soil. It chronicles an attempt by Wilfrid, the Baron of Saxony (Mitchell), to unseat King Dagoberto (Raf Baldassare) and wed the Queen (Franca Bettoja) while diverting the blame for his intrigue onto Olivier, the Count d'Anglon (Ettore Manni), who has kindly allowed the Norman tribe of Olaf (Philippe Hersent) to build homes on his feudal lands. Two of Wilfrid's men kidnap the King and plant evidence from the abduction on Olivier's property, for which the Queen promptly orders him to be hanged. With the help of two Norman friends, Olivier's sadistic jailer is hanged in his place and the Count conspires with Olaf and his people to clear his name, while confessing his love to Olaf's beautiful daughter Svetania (Geneviève Grad). Learning of their betrothal, Olaf admits to a lifelong secret: Svetania is not his daughter, but the daughter of King Dagoberto, whom he discovered being smuggled to safety aboard a ship he pirated many years earlier. Armed with proof of her heritage, Svetania goes to the Queen and persuades her of Wilfrid's covetous plans, so that the castle is won from within—as it is being won from without by attacking Normans.

DANISH poster for I NORMANNI.

The director of I Normanni was Giuseppe Vari, who began in the movie business as a film editor in the late 1940s, cutting such films as Camillo Mastrocinque's Il vento mi ha cantato una canzone/The Wind Sang Me a Song (1947) and Federico Fellini's Il bidone (1955). He made his directorial debut in 1951 with the historical costume drama Messalina, and resumed his work in pepla nearly a decade later with La vendetta dei barbari/Revenge of the Barbarians (1960), an Oriental Film production starring Daniela Rocca, Anthony Steel, Robert Alda, and Arturo Dominici. In later years, Vari sometimes worked under the pseudonyms Joseph Warren and Al Pisani.

Bava's primary contribution to I Normanni was preparing a glass matte for the exterior shots of the Saxon castle. The castle is virtually identical to the castle seen during the climax of Gli invasori, but while the same photographic reference was used, it is not exactly the same matte. Here, the castle is larger and occupies more of the hillside; a flag can be seen flapping from one of its towers—a live prop planted at the top of the hillside, at a great distance behind the matte. The matte appears several times during the course of the picture, unchanged, but during the Normans' climactic attack on the castle at dusk—a sequence that incidentally recycles other footage from Gli invasori—Bava amends the basic matte with dusk-blue tinting and a background of ominously dark, airbrushed clouds. (Vari's handling of the dusky sequence is so careless that every other shot appears to take place in strong daylight.)

Bava's singular approach to lighting also stands out in two shots set inside the rowing cabin of a ship, during the sea battle which opens the picture. Here, the rowers occupying the right half of the Dyaliscope screen are saturated in emerald green light, while screen left shows a man bathed in the same incendiary red gel lighting seen in Ercole al centro della terra and L'ultimo dei vichinghi, pounding a drum to keep the rowers' movements synchronized.

Bava may also have had something to do with filming the sequence of the Saxons' raid on the Norman village, which resembles the opening sequence of Gli invasori in its camera set-ups and attention to brutality; indeed, shot on the same seaside location with what might well be the same costumes, it might easily consist of outtakes from that earlier sequence. The rest of the film, however, is visually lacking in character or interest. The cameraman was Marco Scarpelli (1918–95), who photographed many Steno comedies of the 1950s, including Tempi duri per i vampiri/Uncle Was a Vampire (1959); his camera assistant on I Normanni was a young man receiving his first credit on a feature film—21-year-old Vittorio Storaro, who go on to direct the photography of such films as L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage (1970), Il conformista/The Conformist (1970), Ultimo tango a Parigi/Last Tango in Paris (1973), Novecento/1900 (1976), and Apocalypse Now (1979), becoming the most revered Italian cinematographer of his generation.

2 Tim Lucas, "Father of Lady Frankenstein," Video Watchdog 78, December 2001, 35-36.

RECONSTRUCTION of Mario Bava's panoramic glass matte of Sparta and environs for I SETTE GLADIATORI.

I sette gladiatori

I sette gladiatori was another side project for Bava, reuniting him with producer Italo Zingarelli and actor Richard Harrison. The film's direction is credited on all prints to Spanish director Pedro Lazaga, best known among devotees of the fantastic for his stylish La Mansión de la Niebla/Murder Mansion (1972), but Harrison insists that the picture was entirely directed by Alberto De Martino.

Made exactly one year after their previous collaboration Il gladiatore invincibile, I sette gladiatori is not as satisfying, yet it was notably the first Italian film to establish the precedent of remaking a genre film in a different generic setting. In 1960, director John Sturges and screenwriter William Roberts had unofficially remade Akira Kurosawa's medieval samurai epic Shichininin no samurai/The Seven Samurai (1954) as a Western entitled The Magnificent Seven. I setti gladiatori, based on Zingarelli's idea, takes the same essential story shared by these earlier pictures and applies it to a band of gladiators in 1st century A.D. Sparta. Though the film would be serious (yet high-spirited) in tenor, it was scripted by De Martino with a group of other seasoned screenwriters mostly experienced in the craft of writing comedy: Giovanni Grimaldi (Buonanotte . . . avvocato!), Bruno Corbucci (Sergio Corbucci's brother, who, with Grimaldi, had written numerous Totò comedies), and Sandro Continenza (Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova, Mio figlio Nerone, not to mention Ercole al centro della terra).

Darius (Harrison), son of the first emperor of Sparta, suffers the rule of his father's successors in servitude as a Roman gladiator. After helping five of his Spartan comrades to escape, he is punished by being thrown into the arena in a life-or-death contest with numerous adversaries. He defeats them all within an inch of his life, and the Roman emperor is pressured by the spectators into granting his freedom.

Darius rides back to Sparta, determined to reclaim the life and love that is rightfully his. There, the beautiful Aglaia (Loredana Nusciak), daughter of Milon (Eduardo Toliolo), looks forward to the day of his return. Darius finds his father's once-regal house fallen into ruin, and his former nurse Ismene (Emilia Wolkowicz) informs him of his father's murder and the rise to power of the new Spartan emperor, the corrupt Hiarba (Gérard Tichy). Ismene presents Darius with his father's only bequest, the Emperor's sword, which she preserved for him. Hiarba, who covets Aglaia's love as much as he coveted the throne, learns of Darius' freedom and sends a group of soldiers to kill him—following to ensure that the job is done properly. During the attack, the overwhelmed Darius is joined by Ismene's son Livius (Enrique Avila); the attackers are slain, and the intervening Hiarba suffers a cut arm before making his stealthy escape—with the sword of Darius. Attempted murder having failed, Hiarba uses the sword to murder Milon and then frames Darius for the killing, turning Aglaia against him in the bargain.

Darius flees Sparta and rounds up the five men whom he helped to escape from slavery, outstanding gladiators all: Panurgus (Livio Lorenzon), the eldest; Flaccus (Bernabe Barta Beri), who loves to drink; Xeno (José Marco), who has the strength of three men; Mados (Antonio Rubío), an expert archer who leaves his comfortable private life of wealth and privilege to help Darius, and Vargas (Nazzareno Zamperla), the youngest, whom the others free from the arena during a contest with a bull. Joined by Licia (Franca Badeschi), the lovely daughter of Panurgus, they camp in the mountains and make their plans to help Darius recover his rightful command of Sparta. Macrobius (Antonio Molino Rojo), the ambitious right-hand of Hiarba, discovers the location of Darius' encampment and goes to the Emperor with the information. Aglaia, still consumed with hate for her father's murderer, promises to wed Hiarba—and he promises her the head of Darius as a wedding present. Macrobius later dares to remind the Emperor of how important he has been to him, and Hiarba slays him for his insolence. Aglaia, having overheard their harsh words, witnesses the killing and realizes that Hiarba was in fact her father's murderer.

RICHARD HARRISON stars as rebel leader Darius in I SETTE GLADIATORI.

AGLAIA (Loredana Nusciak) romances Darius.

She rides to the encampment of Darius, where the attack has been successfully repelled, and finds only Licia there—the gladiators are en route to the palace. Licia, who also loves Darius, begs Aglaia to leave him alone and refuses to pass along any message of reconciliation; as Aglaia leaves in tears, Licia calls after her the truth—that Darius still loves her. Meanwhile, Darius and the gladiators reach the towering palace and set about scaling its sheer stone walls to its very peak. The ensuing battle climaxes with the death of Hiarba and the restoration of Sparta's proper and honest rule, with Darius and Aglaia once again in each other's arms.

I sette gladiatori is an entertaining if shallow peplum that makes up for its thin plot with lots of amusing little set pieces and a cast of lustily laughing characters whom it's impossible not to like. By the very nature of its story, Richard Harrison's Darius—after a promising introduction in the arena that ends with him exhausted but compelled to crawl across the ground to collect the key to his freedom—is eclipsed by the more flamboyant, distinguishing talents and personalities of his fellows. Though it is Darius who stands to win all from the gladiators' efforts, his presence is hardly felt as one of the seven, which is less a fault of Harrison's earnest performance than of the writing and cinematography, neither of which emphasize his stake in the story sufficiently. Once again, Livio Lorenzon proves himself a valuable addition to the cast, observing his daughter's devotion to Darius as one who knows her heart will be broken, but knowing better than to advise her in such matters. Aglaia, unfaithful to our hero for most of the film, is a difficult heroine to champion but there is something of the appeal of the late Sylvia Lopez in Loredana Nusciak, whose subsequent film career continued to be haunted by the number 7: Sette a Tebe/Seven From Thebes (1964), Sette dollari sul rosso/Seven Dollars to Kill (1966), and Rembrandt 7 antworted nicht . . ./Z7 Operation Rembrandt (1966).

Mario Bava's uncredited contribution to I sette gladiatori finds him working on a more ambitious scale than was apparent in Il gladiatore invincibile, actually extending the possibilities available to the craft of glass matte painting. The film is credited to two cinematographers, Adalberto "Bitto" Albertini and Eloy Mella, but Bava replaced them both for a series of trick shot exteriors. The first is Darius' first look at Sparta as he rides into view of his homeland—the ancient city is elaborately painted into the hollow of a lush, green valley. A second glass matte adds a row of ancient rooftops behind the tall barricades that surrounds the city, and as Darius is shown galloping toward his home, he passes a hanging maquette of a rather imposing central building, which is shown a few more times in the wake of the attack on Darius. It is immediately before the sequence of the rescue of Vargas from the arena that we get our first glimpse of the film's most memorable matte painting: a view of the Emperor's palace from Hiarba's throne overlooking the arena. It's an impressive piece of architecture—an almost pyramidial structure made up of immense stone slabs, thorn-like spires, and cantilevered exterior staircases, standing staunchly atop a pile of boulders. Another painted view of Sparta is glimpsed as Vargas and the other gladiators make their escape, and as Darius and his men prepare to stage their final assault on the palace, there is a magnificent complementary painting of the palace's backside that is followed by a camera pan to the assembled faces of the men about to brave it. But the most startling of the film's trick shots is a view of Sparta (from approximately the same angle it was first viewed by Darius) that unexpectedly pans right, up the mountainside, to include the towering majesty of the palace. Filmed on location, this approximately 160° matte shot would have required the careful arrangement of three or four layered glass arrangements, placed before the camera in such a way as to omit any clue of their separation and to refuse any glimmer of light that might cause an unwelcome reflection. Bava had previously toyed with the placement of foregrounded objects to make his mattes more believable as compositions in depth, but now he was pushing his matte technique toward a new spatial frontier—one that could extend his illusions well beyond the already maximized widescreen ratio of 2.35:1. One is reminded by this shot of Bava's use of 360° camera turns to involve, rather than erase the "fourth wall" and render the atmospheric artifices of a film set more credible. In this moment, I sette gladiatori succeeds in vaulting into the arena of a truly epic vision.

Le sette spade del vendicatore

Riccardo Freda's next film assignment was Solo contro Roma/Alone Against Rome (1962), a remake of Fabiola whose direction was shared by Freda, who supervised the arena sequences, and Luciano Ricci, directing under the Anglocentric alias of "Herbert Wise." Starring an earnest but shallow-chested Lang Jeffries (billed as "Jeffries Lang") as Brenno, and the conversely voluptuous Rosanna Podestà as Fabiola, the film was produced by Podestà's husband, Marco Vicario, and photographed in Eastmancolor and Total-Scope by Luciano Trasatti. The look of the film is highly naturalistic and, with the exception of some moments in the arena when the number of extras appears to have been multiplied with multiple exposures, it would have offered Bava no reason to offer his services. Though well-acted—particularly by Philippe Leroy as the conqueror Lucio Silla and Gabriele Tinti (in one of his more prominent roles) as the imprisoned brother of Fabiola—Solo contro Roma is a somewhat leaden picture outside the arena, yet it possesses the gravitas necessary to set it somewhat above the usual pepla. Freda's arena sequences are appropriately rousing, and one can see him aspiring to trump some of the cards he had played in Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan—once again, a defenseless hero is pitted against a blade-accessorized chariot, but in this case, there are two such death devices.

ITALIAN fotobusta depicting Beatrice Altariba as Isabella and Brett Halsey as Don Carlos di Bazan.

Freda's next fully-fledged film as a director, L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock, was another of his "bet" films with Luigi Carpentieri and Ermanno Donati. Freda had failed to complete a feature in ten days with I vampiri in 1957, but with this production he succeeded in completing a picture in twelve days—to the horror of screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi—by simply throwing away several important script pages of exposition when he fell behind schedule! Filmed in and around a villa in Parioli, it tells the Gothic horror story of a 19th century surgeon (Robert Flemyng) whose necrophilia fetish compels him to drug his wife Margareta ("Teresa Fitzgerald" a.k.a. Maria Teresa Vianello) with an experimental anaesthetic he has developed. After accidentally overdosing her to his horror, he flees his castle and returns twelve years later with a new bride (Barbara Steele, returning to Italy after starring in Roger Corman's Pit and the Pendulum), who soon becomes aware of an unknown presence in the castle and her husband's increasing distractions. The final reel reveals that Margareta didn't die after all but was driven mad by being buried alive, and Hichcock—driven completely mad by guilt—promises to restore her youth and beauty with the blood of his younger and more beautiful wife. Mario Bava is not known to have assisted Freda in any capacity on this important Italian horror film—neither Bava nor Barbara Steele acknowledged working together a second time—but the film, shot in ravishing Technicolor by Raffaele Masciocchi, contains a couple of hallucinatory scenes lit with potent color gels, including a nightmare sequence in which Flemyng's face swells into the likeness of a demon. This effect is a comparatively early instance of a latex mask being distorted with air bladders inflated by secreted tubing and bellows, a technique introduced in Russia (Ilya Muromets/The Sword and the Dragon, 1956) but which did not become standard until Dick Smith revived and modernized it for use in Scanners (1981). Considering his ongoing collaborations with Freda during this period, it is possible that Bava was involved in the creation of the scene, at least as a technical advisor, but we cannot be sure.

However, Bava is confirmed to have been present on the set throughout the filming of Freda's next film, a remake of his directorial debut Don Cesare di Bazan (1942) in Technicolor and widescreen. Titled Le sette spade del vendicatore, it was lensed—again by Masciocchi—in the spring of 1962. "I remember meeting Bava during Seven Swords For the King," confirms its star, American actor Brett Halsey, who would star in two of Bava's later films at the end of the decade. "That was my first Italian film and I didn't speak Italian at that time, so I didn't know exactly what his function was, but I remember him [there] as a friend/consultant of Freda's."

TRADEMARK Bava lighting and a familiar composition herald the moment of Don Carlos' arrest.

In 1580, King Phillip II of Spain (Gabriele Antonini) signs a truce that brings an end to his country's fifteen-year war with the Turks. Don Carlos di Bazan (Brett Halsey), a man of privileged birth who has spent many years fighting in foreign lands, returns to the castle owned by his family. There, he learns from his cousin Don Luís (Giulio Bosetti), the Duke of Saavedra, that his father passed away during his absence and his properties have been claimed by the throne. Insisting on his rights, Don Carlos retires to the master bedroom (in the King's absence) and falls asleep, only to be awakened during the night by the sounds of agonized moaning coming from elsewhere in the castle—sounds which alert him in time to resist an attack by a knife-wielding intruder. Don Carlos pursues the would-be assassin through the castle until the stranger is intercepted and killed by Don Luís, who reasons that it was a case of mistaken identity and an attempt on the life of the king.

The next day, the king is due to return to his acquired home in the company of his guest, the Cardinal of the Inquisition (Mario Scaccia). Prior to his arrival, Don Carlos and his manservant Sancho (Alberto Sorrentino) are riding in the woods when they come to the rescue of Isabella (Beatrice Altariba), whose coach has been accosted by enemies of the throne. Imagining her savior to be a servant of the castle, Isabella—announcing herself as a guest of the king—rewards Don Carlos with a meager sack of coins, which he returns to her coachman with orders that they follow him. He leads them to the castle, where the haughty Isabella continues to treat him like a commoner. That night, Don Carlos is made to sleep in servants' quarters, in half of a bed divided down the center by a wall of cloth. While preparing to sleep, he feels a presence on the other half of his mattress and, suspecting another attempt on his life, he unsheathes his blade and cuts through the cloth barrier dividing the bed in two—revealing the surprised face of Isabella, who is not as noble as she pretended to be! They both laugh and spend the night as lovers.

Another attack on his life leaves Don Carlos in possession of a document specifying a time, place, and password for a meeting of those conspiring to kill the king. Don Carlos takes the mask of his assailant and crashes the assembly, but he is identified by the ringleader of the conspiracy—his cousin, Don Luís—and arrested by the Duke and his right-hand man, Corvo (Gabriele Tinti), who accuse him of masterminding the plans for assassination. The King, believing the charges made by his trusted advisor, condemns Don Carlos to death. Knowing of their love, Don Luís breaks the spirit of his cousin by telling him that Isabella is a harlot brought to the castle with the intention of seducing the king. He suggests that they marry, prior to the execution, so that Isabella can have a more pleasant future—and become a more appealing mate for the king. She later comes to Don Carlos' cell and weds him, a ceremony that hurls Don Carlos into deep despair. King Phillip II is enchanted by Isabella and the Duke's evil plan to gain control of the throne appears to be playing out . . . but Don Carlos is freed by a group of patriots, made aware of the Duke's two-faced campaign by Sancho. Don Carlos, thought to be dead, reveals himself to Isabella and initially scorns her, but he is soon persuaded that she truly loves him when, discovered by Corvo, she aims a pistol at Don Carlos—but fires at the Duke's cohort instead.

Don Carlos and Isabella are apprehended nevertheless and taken by Don Luís to a torture chamber, where Don Carlos is nipped by a hand-held piranha and threatened with worse—a fate graphically demonstrated by the Duke, who orders one of his own men to be caged and lowered into a pool teeming with the carnivorous fish. During a theatrical performance staged for the King's pleasure, Don Carlos makes his escape and arranges to expose the Duke. The resulting mêlée leads our hero back to the torture chamber as the two cousins cross swords amid many other dangers, including suspended vats of flaming oil. Emerging victorious, the King declares his eternal indebtedness to Don Carlos and returns his bride and his properties.

BRETT HALSEY and Giulio Bosetti cross swords in the film's ravishing climax, lit with lollipop colors by an uncredited Mario Bava.

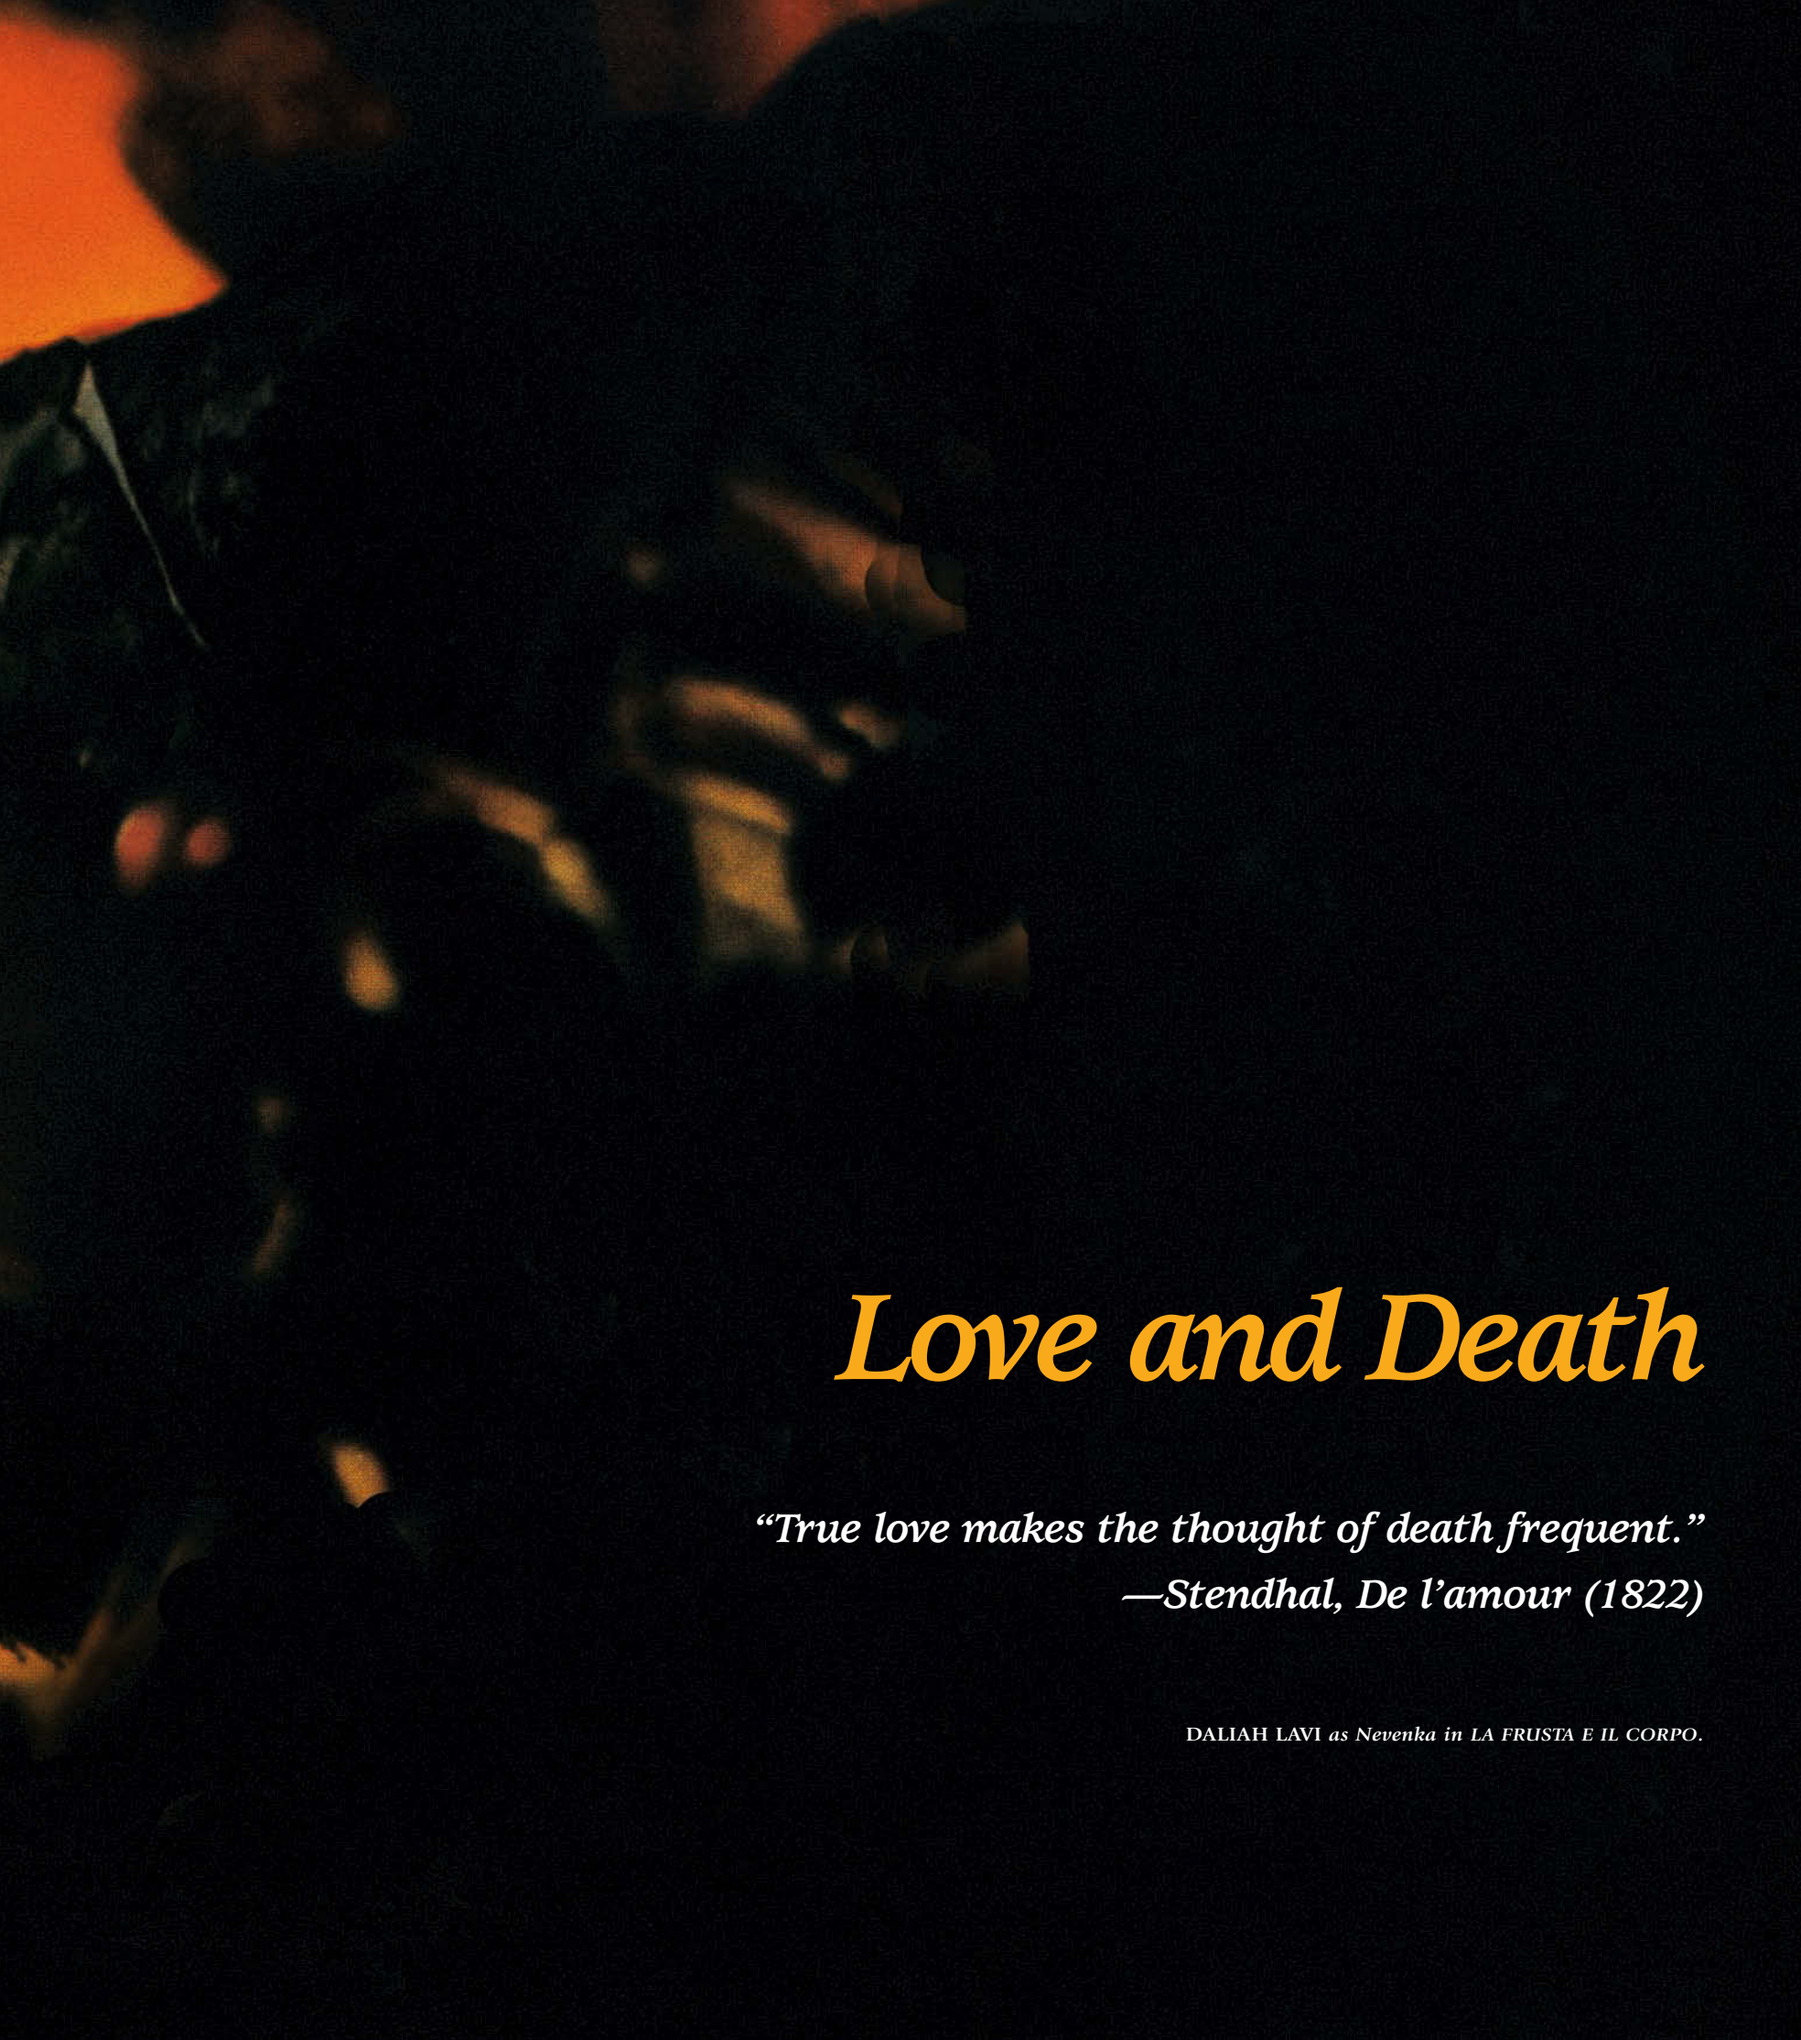
As a disoriented newcomer to the world of Italian film production, Brett Halsey was unable to specify Mario Bava's role on the set of Le sette spade del vendicatore, but a viewing of the film is sufficient to explain everything. In addition to a couple of quickly-executed glass mattes showing the exterior tower of the castle silhouetted against the night sky, with soft golden light illuminating a single cut-out window, and a trick model shot of a horse-drawn carriage exploded by its own cargo of gunpowder, the film is fairly rampant with Bava's lollipop lighting techniques. At no time does the film feel like it was photographed by Bava, but it has the consistent and unmistakable feel of a film painted by Bava. He was, in essence, the film's lighting director—as, in fact, he was and would be on the films he directed, with Ubaldo Terzano or Antonio Rinaldi credited as the directors of photography.

Nowhere else is Bava's command over the film's lighting and atmosphere more apparent than in the climactic torture chamber swordfight between Brett Halsey and Giulio Bosetti, which is introduced with a close shot of an enormous turning wheel of spikes glowing in hellish red, the camera panning away to reveal surrounding cavernous walls hued with unnatural splashes of amber and green, and suspended vats of flaming oil, which Don Luís strategically spills in wondrous yet lethal torrents to nudge his cousin toward greater dangers.

"I remember very well the swordfight scene in the torture chamber," offers Halsey. "There was a trick set up where pots of flaming oil were suspended from overhead cables. [Bosetti], the heavy, was supposed to trap me in certain positions where the oil could be dumped on me during the fight. Anyway, during a 'dry' rehearsal, I realized that I was positioned in a place where I would have really been trapped when they dumped the oil. Freda was offended when I insisted on a 'live' rehearsal, but changed his mind when he saw I was right and would have been doused by the burning oil. They didn't like losing half-a-day to reset the trick, but as you can imagine, I didn't give a damn."



Seen in a proper 35 mm Technicolor print, this sequence ranks with Mario Bava's most breathtaking work. (When New Realm Pictures released Le sette spade in Great Britain as Seventh Sword, the advertising boasted with good reason that it was "in Glorious Technicolor!") Many other scenes are also impressive from a lighting angle, and not always for chromatic impact—for example, Don Carlos' swashbuckling rescue of Isabella's coach, where the exciting sword choreography plays against a backdrop of diffuse sunlight showering down through the treetops, an effect reprised from the earlier Freda/Bava collaboration Agi Murad il diavolo bianco.

It would be unfair to discuss Le sette spade del vendicatore at any length without commending its extraordinary, intimate yet stirring score by Franco Mannino, with featured soloists Mario Gagni (flamenco guitar), Franco Cataina (staccato trumpet), and Franco Giordano (percussion). Perfectly evoking a period texture and somehow all the more electrifying for it, the music must have been one of Freda's personal favorites as he would reuse the most striking cues in his next picture, Oro per i Cesari/Gold for the Caesars (1963, co-directed with Andre de Toth and Sabatino Ciuffini), though its story took place in a different country, more than fifteen centuries earlier.

After the completion of Le sette spade del vendicatore, Bava was still hesitant about returning to work as a director, because he knew there was only one course of action available to him. He understood that to surrender the director's chair and return to the work as a full-time director of photography and special effects technician would mean a loss of money and prestige and be generally perceived as a sign of professional failure. He might have procrastinated longer, but American International turned up the pressure. Determined to have more Bava movies, AIP's Sam Arkoff and Jim Nicholson followed the example of what their former Boston office manager, Joseph E. Levine, had done with Steve Reeves. No longer content to merely import and exploit foreign pictures, AIP proposed to become the principal investor in a consortium of independent production companies joining forces to actively co-produce Bava's next feature.

Though his films had yet to generate any commercial heat in his homeland, Mario Bava was the first Italian director—before Vittorio De Sica, before Federico Fellini, before Michelangelo Antonioni—to attract this level of commitment from an American film company.

Love and Death

"True love makes the thought of death frequent."
—Stendhal, De l'amour (1822)

DALIAH LAVI as Nevenka in LA FRUSTA E IL CORPO.

JOHN SAXON gallantly protects Leticia Roman from an alphabet murderer in LA RAGAZZA CHE SAPEVA TROPPO.

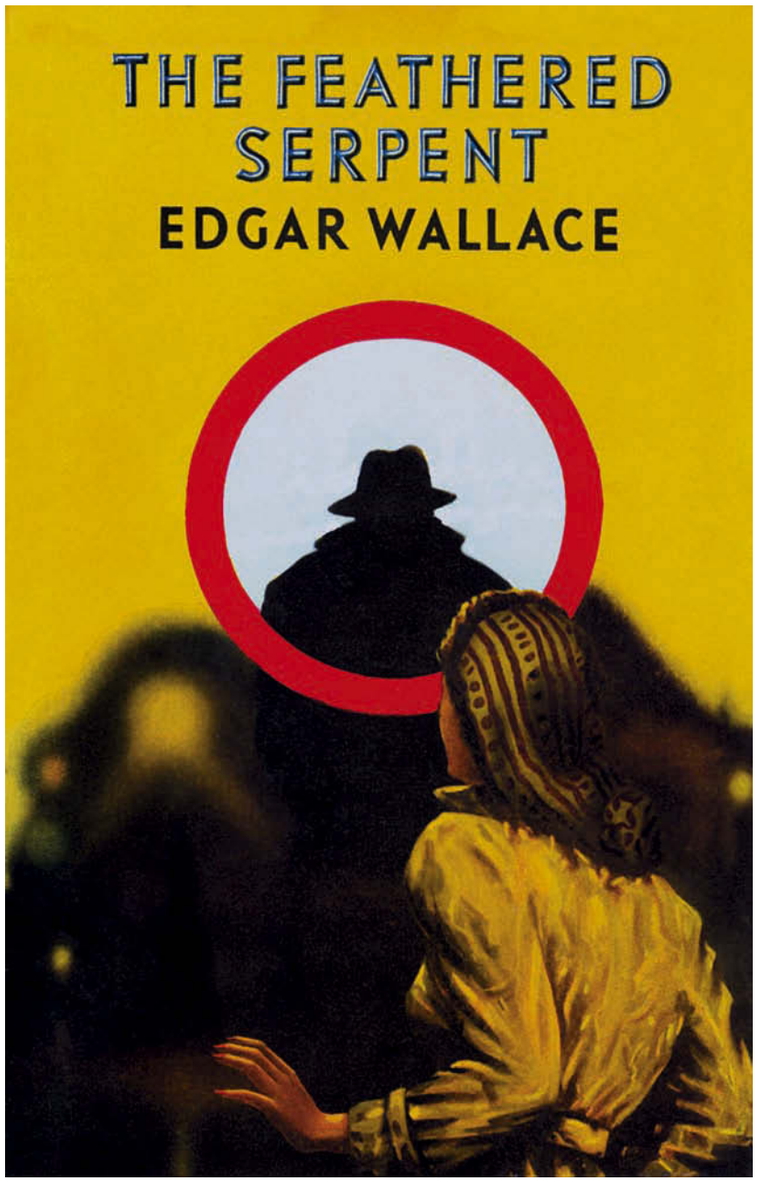
LA RAGAZZA CHE SAPEVA TROPPO



Evil Eye

IT IS A TESTAMENT to the worldwide impact of La maschera del demonio that Mario Bava became—for many devotees of the horror genre—synonymous with black-and-white cinematography. And yet, of the twenty-plus films he directed, only two were filmed in monochrome. The second was La ragazza che sapeva troppo, an important film in his canon—though perhaps more for historical reasons than for its intrinsic value. Despite two or three sequences that rank with Bava's finest suspense set pieces, it's an uneven picture, due in part to the fact that it exists in two very different versions, and perhaps also due to the director's state of mind during production.

Bava claimed that he was approached to direct the film when he was recovering from a nervous collapse. Certainly no other filmmaker on the continent, perhaps nowhere else in the world, was more entitled to one. In the three years since 1959, Bava had done triple-duty on more than a half-dozen films: directing them, photographing them, and executing their special effects—and you could add to that number another dozen pictures to which he lent a lesser or greater covert hand. 1961 had been his busiest year to date, with three features bearing his name and at least another seven that were forbidden to boast his involvement—certainly enough work to precipitate a nervous breakdown. From November 1961 (when the editing of Gli invasori was completed) through the spring of 1962, Bava vowed to take it easier and refused all invitations to direct. Just as La maschera del demonio became a huge international hit and his services as a director became more desirable in his home country, he withdrew from the limelight and took a little holiday. When producers called, he told them that he was sick in bed . . . but when friends called, he was only too ready to help them solve technical problems, or to work on the occasional maquette or trick shot. This kind of work he found relaxing. But most of this six-month holiday was spent at home, with Mario alleviating his anxieties by losing himself in books.

All of his life, Bava had been a devoted bibliophile. His preferred reading was the great Russian classics, but in the wake of La maschera del demonio's international success, he felt a responsibility to learn more about his chosen field and began to delve more deeply into the mystery, horror, and science fiction stories which were collected by Edizione Mondadori in various digest magazines each month. Mario's wife Iole may have tolerated his devotion to the classics, but whenever she caught him reading "trash," he was mocked. Consequently, as he told Ornella Volta, "When I have to read vampire stories, I cover the outside of the book so nobody notices." [1] Bava's literary vacation would become a source of inspiration for his next picture.

Another significant thing occurred during Bava's hiatus. Since he had

A SAMPLE of Hodder & Stoughton's "Yellow Jacket" mystery covers—the inspiration for Mondadori's "gialli."

La ragazza che sapeva troppo

"The Girl Who Knew Too Much"
Working title: L'incubo.
Filmed at Titanus Farnesina Studios and on location
May 3 – July 1962; reshoots December 1962.
First released: February 10, 1963
B&W, 1.66:1, 88 minutes

Production: Galatea, Coronet (Rome). Producer: Massimo De Rita. Associate producer: Salvatore Billitteri. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Franco Prosperi. Assistant to the director: Enrico Checchi. Story and screenplay: Ennio de Concini, Enzo [Sergio] Corbucci, Eliana de Sabata, with the collaboration of Mino Guerrini, Franco Prosperi, Mario Bava. Continuity: Neda Matteucci. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Ubaldo Terzano. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini. Set decoration: Luigi D'Andrea. Props: Fratelli Cimino. Costume Design: Tina Loriedo Grani. Dresses: Emilio Schubert. Makeup: Euclide Santoli. Hairdresser: Mara Rocchetti. Production manager: Paolo Mercuri. Production inspector: Armando Govoni. Production secretary: Neda Matteucci. Line producer: Massimo De Rita. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Assistant to the editor: Lina Caterini. Music: Roberto Nicolosi. Song: "Furore" (Adricel/Vivarelli), sung by Adriano Celentano [Edizione Nazionalmusic], released by Jolly Records. Distributor: Warner Bros.

Additional US credits: Music: Les Baxter. Mixing: Eve Newman, Al Bird, Kay Rose, Ernest Reichert. Dubbing: Titra Sound Corporation, New York NY.

Leticia Roman (Nora Davis/Drowson), John Saxon (Dr. Marcello Bassi), Valentina Cortese [US: Valentina Cortesa] (Laura Craven Torrani), Dante Di Paolo (Andrea Landini), Gustavo De Nardo (Dr. Facchetti), Robert Buchanan [Walter Williams] (Dr. Alessi), Gianni Di Benedetto (Prof. Torrani), Jim Dolen (priest), Luigi Bonos (hotel clerk), Virginia Doro (housekeeper), Shana/Chana Coubert (Ethel), Peggy Nathan, Marta Melecco, Lucia Modugno (nurse), Franco Morigi a.k.a. Franco Ressel (narcotics officer), Adriana Facchetti (dishwasher), John Stacey (Pacini), Milo Quesada, Tiberio Murgia, Titti Tomaino, Pini Lido, Dafydd Havard and Mario Bava (Uncle Augusto, US version only).

Belgium: Het Meisje dat te Veel Wist, Cosmopolis Films. Reissue: Duivelse Obsessie, "Diabolic Obsession"
France: La Fille qui en Savait Trop, Les Films Marbeuf, 1/29/64
Mexico: Noche del Demonio, "Devil Night," Distribuídora Sotomayor S.A., 1964
UK: The Evil Eye, Anglo Amalgamated via Warner Pathé Ltd., 7/64, 92m 31s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts US: Evil Eye, American International Pictures, 5/20/64, 92m. DVD: The Girl Who Knew Too Much turned down American International's earlier invitation to relocate to Hollywood and make pictures for them, the proverbial mountain now decided to come to Mohammed. AIP joined forces with Galatea to become active co-producers of Bava's next film.

Sam Arkoff communicated with Galatea's Nello Santi about possible projects, and it was decided—considering the current vogue for movies made in the style of Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho (1960)—that a "Hitchcockian" thriller would be highly exploitable. During this period, a large number of films in the Psycho mold were released: Homicidal, Anatomy of a Psycho, Scream of Fear, Maniac, Paranoiac, The Couch, as well as a contemporary reinvention of the original film about madness, The Cabinet of Caligari. Given the popularity of Black Sunday, as long as Mario Bava was at the helm, AIP could be counted in—so the picture became a joint venture between Galatea, AIP, and Coronet Produzioni of Milan.

"I was recovering from a nervous breakdown; I didn't feel like directing it, but I needed the money, so I did it," Bava told Luigi Cozzi. "It was supposed to be a romantic thriller, but the very idea seemed absurd to me. Such a thing might have worked with Kim Novak and James Stewart, but I had . . . never mind, I don't remember who they were! Anyway, I decided to film it seriously, as though it were a truly macabre story, and somehow it worked out. It was actually somewhat successful."

When Bava returned to work, he did so gingerly, bringing with him some of the comforts of home. Upon arriving on-set, he now changed from his regular shoes into a more comfortable pair of slippers. He was also frequently accompanied by the great passion of his home life—a pet basset hound, named Centi—short for Centingar Clelium, a bewildering moniker which no one in Bava's family understood or is able to explain. Supposedly a puppy from the first litter of this dolorous breed to be imported into Italy, Centi (the Italian word for "100") was as freakishly long of body as he was in name. Centi went everywhere with his doting master, whose great pleasure was to pamper him like a baby, ordering special dishes for him in restaurants and making a comic show of feeding him, while amusing onlookers by comparing the animal's sad visage to his own.

Gialli

Like La maschera del demonio, which is sometimes described as the "missing link" between Universal and Hammer horror fare, La ragazza che sapeva troppo represents an important step in the evolution of Italian movie thrillers. Today, it is widely regarded as the first example of the subgenre known as the giallo—a particularly lurid brand of murder mystery named after the yellow (giallo)-jacketed crime pulps published by Edizione Mondadori since 1929. This is accurate enough in broad terms, but as in most things, the truth is more complicated. In Italy, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is regarded as neither the first Italian thriller nor the first giallo.

Part of the confusion is caused by the fact that, over the years, the words "giallo" and "thriller" have become synonymous in popular Italian usage. In his excellent book I Colori del Buio: Il cinema thrilling italiano dal 1930 al 1979, Luca Rea chronicles the entire history of Italian thrillers, which he traces as far back as 1916's Carmela, la sartina di Montesanto, directed by Elvira Montari; indeed, given Elena Bava's description of its opening scene of abduction, Eugenio Bava's own L'amante della luna (1919) would probably qualify, as well. These were thrillers made in the spirit of the great French innovator of the fantastic action serial, Louis Feuillade. Rea's text proceeds through a series of films produced between 1930 and 1959, which the author classifies as telefoni neri ("black telephone" movies), comparable to American gangster pictures and police procedurals.

The giallo cinema produced in Italy during this period reflected the kinds of stories and novels that were appearing inside the yellow covers of the Mondadori gialli. It is important to mention that the concept of these pulps originated in Great Britain; the format of Mondadori's covers—a lurid illustration framed by a red circle on a wraparound yellow binding—was adapted from the British "yellow-jacket ninepenny" paperbacks published by Hodder & Stoughton, the red circle establishing a kinship with Edgar Wallace's highly successful 1922 novel The Crimson Circle. Wallace was among the first thriller-men to be published in translation by Mondadori, along with Agatha Christie, Raymond Chandler, and James M. Cain. These British and American writers are thus the very essence of gialli to the Italian people, which is why they regard giallo cinema as a tradition that existed long before Mario Bava entered the picture. They can hardly be counted wrong, when the record shows that an Italian thriller called Giallo, co-directed by Mario Camerini and Mario Soldati, was produced in 1933 (based on Edgar Wallace's Hodder & Stoughton-published The Man Who Changed His Name).

ITALIAN locandina, Style A, art by Sandro Simeoni.

1 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

NORA is shocked to discover her Aunt Ethel (Shana Coubert) dead.

In America and other English-speaking countries, however, the term giallo is more closely bound to what the Mondadori gialli became. This transformation took place during the years of Mussolini's nationalistic ban on international imports, when the gialli began to be written exclusively by Italians. These books were not so successful, and to excite the interest of the public, Mondadori began to publish novels—and also short stories, which were collected in weekly digests—distinguished by increasingly lurid and sensational content, encompassing vice, sado-masochism, and erotic violence. After the ban on imported literature was lifted, the luridness remained and many of the Italian contributors to these magazines adopted English names to survive in the business. As the term giallo has come to be understood outside of Italy, it denotes a particularly lurid brand of thriller that dotes more on the details of cruel and outrageous murder than on the art of detection.

The more decadent forms of gialli did not begin to influence Italian cinema until 1954, when Ernesto Gastaldi—a student at the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica—shocked his instructors by proposing to write and direct a film inspired by the Mondadori pulps as his graduate project. Expressive of his love for the films of Alfred Hitchcock, and visually patterned after the lurid cover art and ironic stories of the gialli, Gastaldi's student film La strada che porta lontano ("The Road to a Distant Door") became the first authentic Italian giallo movie. However, it was only a student film; a single print was struck, and because it was shot without sound, the dialogue and sound effects had to be performed live, behind the screen, at every performance. Gastaldi had great belief in the possibilities of cinematic gialli and wrote a feature script, A . . . come Assassino ("A . . . for Assassin"). Unable to launch it as a film, he produced it as a stage play in 1959, whereupon it became a great success. It was not filmed until Angelo Dorigo directed a version in 1966. Gastaldi would later work with Bava, scripting La frusta e il corpo (1963), and go on to become one of Italy's leading specialists in gialli in the 1970s.

Luca Rea's book points out some other titles that slightly preceded or were contemporary to Bava's film—including Bernardo Bertolucci's La commare secca/The Grim Reaper (1962)—but these are either traditional mysteries, dark existential dramas, or police procedurals. Even La ragazza che sapeva troppo is not quite a giallo in the sense this term is used today; it doesn't possess all the necessary generic criteria, most conspicuously in its lack of color and graphic violence. However, it was the earliest theatrical release to acknowledge the gialli, not only as an influence on its storytelling and mise-en-scène, but as part of the story it tells.

As its title makes plain, La ragazza che sapeva troppo was undertaken in emulation of the films of Alfred Hitchcock, not the yellow-bound gialli—but because it is the story of a young woman addicted to lurid paperback mysteries, Bava's handling of this material could not help but be informed by the world of giallo fiction, as he was an avid reader and collector of the Mondadori series himself. The movie not only looks at the world through the dilated paranoid sensibilities of someone who consumes such books like popcorn, but—as the narration of an observing male voice establishes with the very first shot of this young woman reading her book—it may also represent for us the very story she is reading.

Synopsis

Nora Davis—a young American secretary, 20 years of age—is flying to Rome to spend her summer vacation with an old friend of her family, the elderly and ailing Ethel Vignal Bartocci. On the plane, she reads a mystery paperback—the title of this novel appears to be The Knife*, but closer inspection reveals that her book is a "two-fer" of* After He Got the Knife and Didi's a Doll*—which unnerves her to the point of wanting a cigarette. Finding herself fresh out, she warily accepts a Kent cigarette from the gentleman seated beside her. He insists on giving her the entire pack. Upon arriving at the Fiumicino Airport, Nora witnesses this same gentleman as he is apprehended by the Roman police—who identify him as Pacini, a drug trafficker. Before her eyes, his luggage is opened and rifled, revealing a suitcase full of Kent cigarettes laced with marijuana and talcum powder cannisters loaded with cocaine. When Nora tries to get rid of the contraband he passed to her, a helpful guard retrieves the pack of Kents that she dropped, and she nervously puts them back in her purse.*

Nora makes her way to Ethel's apartment, where she is greeted by a handsome young doctor, Marcello Bassi. Before taking his leave, Marcello tells Nora that he is always available at a nearby hospital at night should he be needed. That night, during a thunderstorm, Ethel screams Nora's name and is found dead. Nora throws her coat over her nightgown and races into the night for help, but while running past the deserted Trinità dei Monti atop the Piazza di Spagna, she is attacked by a mugger who snatches her purse and knocks her unconscious. During the night, Nora awakens at the sound of a scream . . . She sees a woman stagger out of the shadows with a knife in her back, falling face forward into a puddle of blood. Nora conceals herself as a man steps forward to remove the knife. Nora faints and remains unconscious till dawn. An anonymous man happens by, pours whiskey into her mouth, and rushes away as a policeman arrives. Smelling her breath, the patrolman commits her to the hospital as a case of advanced alcoholism. There, she is eventually discovered by Marcello, who vouches for her and arranges for her release.

NORA is charmed by the Old World courtesies of Dr. Marcello Bassi.

No one believes Nora's account—some believe she was drunk, others blame her appetite for murder mysteries and overactive imagination, while others, like Marcello, find nothing to believe because there is no evidence of a killing. Revisiting Trinità dei Monti with Marcello (where they are spied upon by a derelict man wearing a jacket with patched elbows), Nora sees a woman coming out of an apartment adjacent to the Piazza di Spagna, whom she initially mistakes for the murder victim. She later makes this woman's acquaintance at Ethel's funeral; she is Laura Craven Torrani, a woman of early middle age who lives in an apartment on the right side of Trinità dei Monti with her husband, Prof. Torrani, who is often away in Switzerland on business. Laura wishes to join him and, since Nora now has no place to stay in Rome, she offers her the use of the Torrani apartment during her absence. She requests that she not try to enter the one room in the apartment that her husband keeps locked—"so one less room you have to worry about!"

After moving into the apartment, Nora accidentally discovers a secret compartment in an armoire, which contains a metal storage box containing a set of alphabet blocks and old newspaper clippings about a series of "Alphabet Murders" that occurred ten years before. All of these articles were written by the same journalist: Andrea Lampini. Emily Craven (Laura's sister) was the third victim, following Gina Albert and Maria Baccati—and she was killed in the exact same spot where Nora witnessed the murder! Could she have somehow had a vision of what occurred on that spot a decade earlier? As she fingers a block bearing the letter D, the telephone rings. The caller asks her name, and she answers "Nora Davis."

"Did you say Davis?" the caller inquires. "Is that D . . . as in death?" (In Italian, the line is "D . . . come Delitto?"—"delitto" being the word for "murder.")

Becoming fearful of possible intruders, Nora borrows an idea from a mystery she once read: she rigs a protective trap around her bed, shaking talcum powder onto the floor and tying up a webwork of string to trip anyone who might enter the apartment unbidden. As she settles down to sleep, she hears the front gate creak . . . sees a cloaked shadow trying to peer inside, and checking the doors for an unlocked entrance. The figure finds the front door open, and Nora screams—but it's a policeman keeping an eye on the place. He is suddenly attacked from behind by Marcello, who has also been keeping Nora under surveillance! The two men scuffle in confusion until Marcello stumbles into Nora's powdered web trap, breaking his finger.

Nora and Marcello—his finger bandaged—continue to date. And Nora is continually stalked at a distance by the man with the patched elbows. One night, after seeing Nora home, Marcello lingers to light a cigarette and is surprised to see her leave again almost right away. He follows her to a seemingly abandoned building where she has been summoned. On an upstairs floor inhabited only by swinging lights, swaying shadows, and a disembodied voice, Nora is suddenly seized . . . by Marcello, who is rewarded for his concern with a black eye. They find the place empty, inhabited only by a tape recorder—but the contents of the tape, the "disembodied voice," confirm Nora's story for the first time. They learn that the empty apartment was rented to a man named Landini—the author of the Alphabet Murders articles. They follow his lead to a printer's shop, but Landini no longer works there. Nora and Marcello return to the Torranis' apartment, where they are startled to discover a man waiting for them inside—a man with patched elbows: Andrea Landini, the very man they are seeking!

Landini explains that he was the man who poured whiskey into Nora that morning on the Trinità dei Monti, in hopes of reviving her. He explains that his articles were widely read and put pressure on the authorities to arrest someone for the Alphabet Murders before more were committed. After the murder of Emily Craven, Landini was befriended by Laura's husband, Prof. Torrani, a psychiatrist. Torrani convinced him that the killer had to be a pervert, a psychopath, and pointed out a likely suspect:

a homeless man called Straccianeve.[2] Landini persuaded the police to arrest Straccianeve, who was subsequently tried and sentenced to life in prison, where he screamed his innocence. Ever since, Landini has suffered from uncertainty: what if Straccianeve was telling the truth? What if he was innocent? When he overheard Nora talking to Marcello about the murder she witnessed, Landini became convinced that she had a true psychic vision of the event and would be able to identify the killer. Against Marcello's counsel, Nora decides to show Landini the box of clippings and blocks she found—but they are now missing from the cupboard!

United by a common purpose, Nora and Landini go to the prison to speak with Straccianeve; unfortunately, they are informed that he died of coronary thrombosis in 1959. His only survivor is a daughter, Maria, who works as a cleaner at the Foro Italico. But Maria is no longer there; a co-worker explains to them that Maria disappeared from work one day, evidently having finally earned enough as a prostitute to leave town in a Fiat. Afterwards, Landini mentions having another appointment and directs Nora to the bus stop; on her way out, she notices Landini talking once again to the cleaning lady. Nora goes back, but Landini is gone and the working woman is no longer helpful. This baffles her. When Landini calls her later, she puts him on the spot, demanding to know what happened. He says that he knows the truth now, and asks Nora to meet him in one hour at his apartment, where he will explain everything.

At Landini's apartment, Nora is met by three shocks: a typewriter loaded with paper reading "To save myself, I would have had to kill again . . ."; a series of file folders on each of the three Alphabet murders, including one labelled "Fourth Murder" which contains a photograph of herself; and in the adjoining room, Landini's dead body, a bullet fired through his temple—evidently self-inflicted.

Nora decides to leave Rome, and Laura Craven Torrani returns from Switzerland in time to see her off. Marcello brings Nora some newspapers, and her eye is caught by an article illustrated with a photo of the woman she saw being murdered! She visits the morgue, where she identifies a corpse as the victim of the murder she witnessed.

MARIO BAVA looks annoyed to be photographed while conferring with jovial assistant director Franco Prosperi.

When she is shown a small box containing the dead woman's belongings, Nora's attention is caught by a single button—a button that did not match the clothing the woman was wearing when she was found. She is allowed to take the button with her, in hopes that it will help her to recover the memory of where she saw it before.

She returns to find the Torranis' apartment uninhabited, and senses that the locked room may harbor the answer to this mystery. She finds a key and goes inside . . . and sees the man from the murder scene—staggering towards her! He falls forward, a knife implanted in his back! This is Prof. Torrani. As she turns to flee, Nora notices a discarded sweater adorned with buttons like the one she obtained from the morgue. As she reaches out for it, her arm is clutched—by Laura!

A raving lunatic, Laura explains that she was in fact the murderess, that her husband was merely a cowardly accomplice. She had to kill her first victim because her name started with the letter A ("You can see that, can't you?") . . . she killed her sister Emily because she disapproved of her actions, looking at her judgmentally "with her evil eyes" . . . she killed Landini because he had discovered her secret, and she killed her final victim—Straccianeve's daughter—because she too knew the truth and was blackmailing her. Prof. Torrani was not the killer, but the disposer of the body—and now even this accomplice had outlived his usefulness. As Laura prepares to shoot Nora, she is shot twice in the back by her dying husband.

Atop the Pincio, looking across the breadth of Rome to St. Peter's Basilica, Nora and Marcello reflect on their past adventures and future wedding plans. Marcello runs out of cigarettes and accepts a Kent from Nora . . . who snatches it out of his mouth abruptly when she remembers that they are drugged. She remembers that she smoked one on the night of the murder—perhaps it was all a dream, an hallucination? She resolves to quit smoking from that moment on and throws the packet away. It lands on the street below, where it is picked up by a passing seminarian like manna from Heaven.

Production

The screenplay for La ragazza che sapeva troppo is signed by six writers: Ennio De Concini, the principal screenwriter of La maschera del demonio and the Steve Reeves Hercules films; his girlfriend Eliana de Sabata (they never married); Sergio Corbucci, who subsequently wrote the metaphysical Danza Macabra/Castle of Blood (1964) for Antonio Margheriti, and went on to become Italy's second great master of the Spaghetti Western (after Sergio Leone), directing Minnesota Clay (1964) and Django (1966); Mino Guerrini, who subsequently directed the astonishing Italian horror film Il terzo occhio ("The Third Eye," 1966); Franco Prosperi, Bava's assistant director at the time, who later became a director in his own right with the spy spoof Dick Smart 2.007 (1967); and Bava himself. According to Prosperi, Mino Guerrini "was never seen and never felt" in the scripting process, which originated with a four-page treatment by Corbucci.

It is tempting to connect each of these contributors to different threads in the finished work, based on their other achievements. De Concini, as we have heard, was principally an idea man and may have been the first to suggest that the time was right, in the wake of Psycho, for an Italian imitation or send-up of Hitchcock. Corbucci was likely responsible for the concept of witnessing a murder revealed to have taken place a decade earlier, as his script for Danza Macabra is about a man who accepts a bet to spend the night inside an empty house on the anniversary of a grisly event, and witnesses the events as they are replayed before his eyes. Given the diabolical imagination displayed in Il terzo occhio, as well as its interest in morbid psychology, Guerrini would be the likeliest instigator of the details of the film's murders, and the motivations of the killer. As for Bava and Prosperi, they were surely responsible for developing the character of Nora, given Bava's interest in gialli fiction and Prosperi's later interest in spy spoofs; thus, many of their specific contributions may survive only in the American version known as Evil Eye (to be discussed later). Given Bava's track record of rewriting and improvising new directions on the set, there was very likely a certain amount of revision and reshaping also going on throughout the production.

The film began shooting under the working title of L'incubo ("The Nightmare"), which was changed to avoid a conflict with another black-and-white thriller announced by Hammer Films. Even with the financial input of an additional American company, it was a fairly low-budget undertaking, with a good deal of the filming taking place at Trinità dei Monti, the famous public square in the Lazio district of Rome. Here, the twin church towers of Trinità dei Monti look down on the Piazza di Spagna—an oblong oval area on the street below, to which they are joined by a pair of complementary, curving stairwells, famously known as "the Spanish steps." The stairs also lead up to a French academy for artists, a magnificently restored villa and garden that forms the entrance to the Villa Borghese park (the location of the eponymous feature that Bava photographed in 1953), and today, Rome's biggest McDonald's. Trinità dei Monti, like much of Rome, is a conglomeration of buildings from many different centuries; it was once the centerpiece of an artists colony, due to its proximity to the academy, but at the time Bava made this film, it was becoming a tremendous tourist attraction, in the wake of films like La dolce vita, which romanticized the Roman scene. (Fellini himself lived only a short distance from the Spanish Steps, in Via Margutta.)

THIS EARLY publicity portrait of Leticia Roman finds the actress striking an Ann-Margret-type pose.

Today, Trinità dei Monti remains one of the most popular attractions and meeting places in Rome, though it is now impossible to live there unless you are a millionaire. It continues to play an important decorative role in contemporary motion pictures, including Bernardo Bertolucci's Besieged (1998) and Anthony Minghella's excellent thriller The Talented Mr. Ripley (1999, which is set during the period in which Bava's film was made). Thanks to its prominent placement in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Trinità dei Monti has also become a monument of sorts to the golden age of Italian horror, and is the first stop many Bava fans make when they first sojourn to Rome.

Except for a few other landmarks seen during a light-hearted montage, the film's only other major location is the Foro Italico, a Fascist stadium built in 1932 at the base of Monte Mario, encircled with statuary depicting athletes of all kinds in the manner of ancient Roman gods. All of the interiors were shot at the original Titanus Studios in Farnesina.

In retrospect, it may seem strange that La ragazza che sapeva troppo was not shot in color. However, in 1962 when the film was in production, black-and-white was standard issue for the myriad psychological thrillers that poured forth in the wake of Psycho. (AIP's 1964 pressbook for Evil Eye makes an overt pitch to sell the picture along these lines, describing it as a "terror mystery in the tradition of Psycho and other entertainment masterpieces," while Bava himself—then at age 48—is misleadingly sketched as "Italy's young master of shock and terror who has been acclaimed as the equal of Hitchcock.") During this time frame, black-and-white was considered the proper key for psychological suspense and kitchen sink violence; indeed, there had never before been an Italian thriller lensed in color. La dolce vita, also a black-and-white film, was another point of reference.

The monochromatic look of the film is very much in the classic film noir mode of the 1940s, luxurious and distinctive, and some of its scenes (Nora's visit to Landini's office, for example) would not have worked so well in color. That said, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is actually less imitative of Psycho than of Hitchcock's color thrillers of the 1950s; it owes more to Dial M for Murder, Rear Window, To Catch a Thief, and of course, The Man Who Knew Too Much. Color would have brought more sparkle to its travelogue aspects, and made its horror sequences more lurid. Given the adjustment to color he would make with his next giallo ("The Telephone" in I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath), one imagines that Bava also recognized this basic error in judgment.

Cast

La ragazza che sapeva troppo assembles what was probably Mario Bava's most thoroughly talented cast up to this time. The principal players are attractive, likeable and capable, the supporting characters are colorful and interesting, and peppered throughout the movie are cameo appearances by actors whom Bava used on other occasions.

Cast as Nora Davis was 22-year-old Leticia Roman, who was born Letizia Novarese in Rome on August 12, 1941. She was the daughter of former stage actress Giuliana Gianni and screenwriter–costume designer Nino Vittorio Novarese (Cleopatra, The Greatest Story Ever Told), who had dressed some of the films Mario Bava photographed in the '40s and '50s, including La donna più bella del mondo and Nel segno di Roma. Roman started her screen career with a small part in the Elvis Presley movie G.I. Blues (1960, in which she romanced co-star James Douglas, not Presley) and had just completed supporting roles in The Charge of the Black Lancers (1963) and Un tentativo sentimentale (1963), opposite La maschera del demonio stars Arturo Dominici and Barbara Steele, respectively. In her first starring role, Roman sparkles as Bava's naïve, impish, hyper-imaginative heroine—especially in Evil Eye, the more light-hearted US version of the film.

2 In Italian, the name Straccianeve has connotations of a tramp who wears rags.

After finishing La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Roman relocated to West Germany, where she made several films—including Russ Meyer's infamous one-shot collaboration with producer Albert Zugsmith, The Memoirs of Fanny Hill (1964) and the Karl May Western Old Surehand (1965), before marrying and retiring from the screen in 1966. According to her friend and co-star John Saxon, Roman is now divorced and working in the real estate business in the Los Angeles area. While studying at UCLA in the early 1990s, Mario Bava's grandson Fabrizio "Roy" Bava was approached one night in a Los Angeles restaurant by a stranger who turned out to be Roman, who remarked on his amazing resemblance to someone she used to know—Mario Bava! That she would remember Bava's appearance so well after thirty years indicates that Roman must regard the film as one of her most memorable acting jobs.

As co-producers of the film, AIP insisted on complementing Roman's untried lead casting with a "known quantity" co-star in the role of the handsome young doctor, Marcello Bassi. Roman herself suggested her friend John Saxon. Saxon was himself an Italian-American, born Carmine "Ricky" d'Orrico in Brooklyn, New York, on August 5, 1936. After playing a couple of unbilled bit parts in George Cukor's It Should Happen to You and Vincente Minnelli's A Star Is Born (both 1954), Saxon's brooding good looks brought him teen stardom in Running Wild (1955), Rock Pretty Baby and The Unguarded Moment (both 1956). In 1961, Saxon made his first Italian film, Mauro Bolognini's Agostino, based on a story by Alberto Moravia, the celebrated author of Two Women and The Conformist.

"Letícia was a friend, part of the Italian community out here in Hollywood," Saxon explains. "She called me up one day, and said in her Italian accent, 'John! How would you like to star with me in a 'ar' film?' Well . . . I had never done an art film before, but I was game. Only later did I find out that, with her thick accent, she was actually saying 'horror film'!"

"When I went," Saxon told Fangoria magazine, "I was not aware of [Bava] as someone regarded as a master. I found him interesting, but I don't think I was interested enough in him at the time to explore what he did as a director. Sometimes it seemed like he lived in his own personal world of superstition. He was filled with almost occult beliefs about anything: [one] didn't do [certain things] because it was bad luck."[3]

According to Saxon, Bava was in an uncharacteristic bad humor during the production. "One day we were filming on the beach," he recalls, "and while we were standing around waiting for the next take, I decided to warm up with a few karate exercises. Bava made some kind of crack, loud enough for everyone to hear, like, 'Oh, look at the big shot karate expert!' That was kind of sharp and uncalled-for, I felt. I later wondered if might have been under the impression that Letícia had got me the part because I was her boyfriend, which I wasn't. Or maybe he had his eye on her?"

My own interpretation of Bava's behavior toward Saxon is that it was rooted in a mutual misunderstanding. First of all, Bava felt contempt for anyone who did anything to draw attention to themselves. Athletic competition seemed to Bava the height of narcissistic conceit, and we can see this feeling expressed elsewhere in the AIP version of the film, during the scene at Foro Italico. The only thing worse than an offense to Bava's sense of humility was an offense to his sense of craftsmanship. Bava therefore had little patience with actors and actresses whom he believed—rightly or wrongly—got their roles by sleeping with producers and other influential people. Oblivious to recent trends and stars in the American cinema, Bava knew nothing of Saxon or his career, just as Saxon knew nothing of Bava's list of accomplishments or, indeed, his personal character. Knowing that Roman had arranged for Saxon to be cast, and hearing that they were friends, Bava may well have been under the false impression that Saxon had been cast for reasons that were other than professional. And to see Saxon demonstrating his karate prowess on the set where he and others were trying to work, especially if he was recovering from overwork, Bava might well have cut loose a remark. As for Saxon's interpretation . . . While it is possible—perhaps even necessary—for a director to be somewhat infatuated with his leading actress, it is extremely unlikely that their relationship went beyond that, especially since Roman was the daughter of an old colleague. Thus, Bava and Saxon embarked on their collaboration having the wrong idea of each other, and they never had or took the time to sort out their misunderstandings. Saxon's real-life situation on-set—always aiming to please and getting snubbed for his efforts—works well in the service of his portrayal, as Marcello's devotion to Nora results in a series of ironic injuries and embarrassments.

MARIO BAVA directing Leticia Roman.

Saxon, of course, has enjoyed a highly diverse and visible career that has endured to this day, including such features as Curtis Harrington's Queen of Blood (1966), Enter the Dragon (1973) with Bruce Lee, Umberto Lenzi's Napoli violenta/Violent Protection (1976) and Apocalisse domani/Cannibals in the Streets (1980), Dario Argento's Tenebrae/Unsane (1982), Wes Craven's A Nightmare on Elm Street (1984, as well as its second and fifth sequels), and Robert Rodriguez' From Dusk Till Dawn (1996). When Saxon appeared at "The Haunted World of Mario Bava" retrospective at Los Angeles' American Cinematheque in October 1993, he admitted after the screening of a clip from La ragazza che sapeva troppo that he had never seen the film, and applauded the style and suspense of the footage shown.

Also stealing a number of scenes are Valentina Cortese and Dante Di Paolo. Cortese, born in Milan on the first day of 1925, was the most experienced member of the cast, having already appeared in close to fifty films, though she was not yet 40. Like Bava, Cortese had devoted her youth to painting, but began to participate in open air plays at Milanese village feasts when she was 15. Her work in one of these programs was seen by some important critics, who recommended that she audition for the Academy of Dramatic Art in Rome. When she applied, her interview was conducted by a film director who promptly gave her a screen test and signed her to a longterm contract. She was too busy giving stellar performances—such as her Oscar-nominated work as Severine in François Truffaut's La Nuit Americaine/Day for Night (1973)—to ever study acting. It's possible that Cortese was courted for her role in La ragazza che sapeva troppo by screenwriter Sergio Corbucci, who had previously directed her in the all-star Italian war parody The Shortest Day (1962), though she was also one of at least five actors in the film who were also featured in Richard Fleischer's Barabbas that same year, which may be even more indicative of an agent's "package deal." (The others were Gustavo De Nardo, Gianni Di Benedetto, Jim Dolen, and John Stacey.) Cortese's performance as Laura Craven Torrani is splendid, alternately tender, morbid, and exuberant; even in her greatest displays of madness she conveys a special luminosity, a kind of open-hearted madness that invites the viewer to participate. Cortese later played the Queen of the Moon, to Robin Williams' King, in Terry Gilliam's The Adventures of Baron Munchausen (1989)—which, like La ragazza che sapeva troppo, featured art direction by Giorgio Giovannini.

MARIO BAVA conferring with Valentina Cortese during the filming of the cemetery scene.

The film's second male lead was Dante Di Paolo, who had just completed a three film contract for producers Ermanno Donati and Luigi Carpentieri, which had included Irving Rapper's Giuseppe venduto dai fratelli/Joseph and His Brethren (1960), Antonio Leonvila's Maciste nella terra dei ciclopi/Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops (1961), and Riccardo Freda's Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan. Born in Frederick, Colorado on February 18, 1926, Di Paolo's background was as a dancer. He had worked as an unbilled hoofer in Abbott & Costello Meet Dr. Jekyll & Mr. Hyde (1953) before stepping up to the classic MGM musicals Meet Me at the Fair (1953) and Seven Brides for Seven Brothers (1954). After dating singer/actress Rosemary Clooney for several years, the couple were separated by work opportunities and married other people; Clooney began raising a family with husband, actor José Ferrer, while Di Paolo left Hollywood to dance professionally in Las Vegas, where he fell in love with Tropicana showgirl Nadine Ducassé. She adopted the first of many professional names, Nadine Duca—later Nadine Ducas, then Nadine Sanders and, finally, Nadia Sanders—and was recommended to Italian producer Virgilio De Blasi by a common friend. De Blasi admired her Nordic good looks and invited her to Rome in 1961. There she tested and won the role of Queen Gaia in Riccardo Freda's I giganti della Tessaglia.

3 William Rabkin, "A Cop on Elm Street," Fangoria 44, 1985, 11.

"She went over there to do that," Di Paolo explains, "and I wanted to go to Italy too, because I wanted to see my father's home, which I'd never seen. You see, I'd never been to Italy and I had a home there, a three story home in the Abruzzi mountains! My dad had told me all these stories about it and I decided, 'I'm gonna go.' The house was like my gold ticket. So we went and had dinner with the producer and his girlfriend Maria Barto, and he said to me, politely, 'What do you do?' I happened to mention Seven Brides for Seven Brothers, and that happened to be one of their favorite films of all time! They just loved it, and that helped me a lot at the beginning."

Di Paolo was overjoyed to work in Rome because no one there questioned his ability to act, just because he had been a dancer. He also found his footing as a dramatic actor thanks to some peculiar advice from a director: "When I was making Joseph and His Brethren, Irving Rapper told me, 'Look, I've got plenty of actors in this thing, so I want you to just be yourself. I don't want you to act.' I based almost everything I did after that on that advice. That became, more or less, my formula as an actor—for the screen, anyway."

Hearing that Mario Bava was preparing an English-language film, Di Paolo's agent called the production office to tell Bava about his American client and arrange for a screen test. "We were told to meet him at his office and we found him outside, coming across the street from somewhere," Di Paolo recalls. "He called out to my agent Livio, 'Troppo giovane, troppo giovane!' which means 'Too young, too young!' He thought I was too young for the part. Livio suggested, 'Well, let's see what can be done to get him into the part, with makeup or whatever, and see what happens.' So he managed to talk Bava into giving me a test. On the day of the test, I went there and thought I was going to be the only actor there, but there was one other guy making a test also; he was on before me. I didn't see his test, but it seems that everyone thought that this other guy had the part because he was a known theatrical actor and he played the part for these people almost as if he were onstage, giving them a performance, you know? That was very impressive, but he wasn't doing it for the camera, and when they screened our tests—Leticia told me this later—there was no question that I had it, because I had underplayed the hell out of it."

ANDREA LANDINI (Dante Di Paolo) is accompanied by Nora and Marcello to a prison, where the warden informs them of Straccianeve's death.

Bava immediately voiced his approval. Di Paolo: "After he picked me out, he said 'You did more with that [character] than I was going to give you. I like it, keep doing what you're doing. Whatever you have in your mind about this character, it's right." So I felt really good about that. All the way through the film, he'd give me my marks so I would know where to stand, where to walk from here or there or whatever, and the rest he'd leave to me. That was it. There were no fussy little directions with lines about this and that—nothing, never. I liked working with him so much; he gave me so much freedom, you know?"

Di Paolo is perfectly cast as the mysterious reporter Andrea Landini, a shabbily dressed witness to the crimes of this great city, not unlike the narrator of the famous American radio show (and subsequent Columbia B-noir film series of the '40s), The Whistler. It should be admitted that some of Landini's early appearances in the movie, which viewed him only from behind, were played by a stand-in crew member (with visibly black hair). Di Paolo's dialogue scenes, however, are superb and he perfectly embodies a haunted writer of extinguished promise, his life destroyed by professional guilt and self-doubt.

Asked what he drew upon to create this performance, Di Paolo replies, "I was thinking of the kind of guy Landini was, and about being 'on the spot.' When you're preparing to play a character, you analyze different things about him in your mind, and sometimes you'll put yourself right in that spot, and that's when you know how to react. You really become that character, and that's what decides what you do. I don't know exactly what I thought about him, really, but I knew that, on the screen—especially that kind of a part—you had to show some thinking. It couldn't just be theatrical acting. I don't know how to go about describing that; it's just an inner thing that you feel about the character, and you just suddenly become that character and go through whatever it is they're going through."

GIANNI DI BENEDETTO makes a surprise reappearance as Prof. Torrani.

Di Paolo remembers that becoming Landini could be a little tough on his lungs. "In one scene, I had to smoke a cigarette in that house… God, it went on forever; it was a long scene, where I'm describing what happened in the past and all this… and I had to smoke all the way through it! And the cigarette had to match each time [for the sake of continuity]. Instead of dousing each cigarette out between takes and lighting up another one of that size, I used to smoke the whole cigarette down! So when I finished shooting that day, I didn't smoke again for awhile."

Bava was sufficiently impressed by Di Paolo's work to cast him again in his next giallo feature, Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace, in which he played the cocaine-frazzled antiques dealer, Frank. Forty years later, Di Paolo's performance as Landini was used to lend a grace note to his supporting role in the HBO series Unscripted (2005), produced by Steven Soderbergh and Di Paolo's nephew, George Clooney. Cast as the grandfather of series regular Jennifer Hall (playing herself), Di Paolo gave a touching performance—his first in many years—as an ex-hoofer suffering from Alzheimer's Disease. In the first season's final episode, Di Paolo's character dies, willing his few possessions to Hall, who finds among them a couple of reels of 16 mm film. That night, Hall threads them up and watches this evidence of her grandfather's glory days—his performance in La ragazza che sapeva troppo. More than just a convenient use of some film footage, the scene was obviously intended by Clooney as an affectionate tribute to his uncle.

Gianni Di Benedetto, cast in the purely photogenic role of Prof. Torrani, had previously appeared in La Romana/The Woman of Rome (1954), L'arte di arrangiarsi (1955), and played a police officer in Roger Vadim's Et mourir et plaisir/Blood and Roses (1960). His casting in La ragazza che sapeva troppo was evidently fortuitous, because in subsequent years, he appeared in numerous gialli, including the first three features of Dario Argento: L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage (1970), Il gatto a nove coda/The Cat o' Nine Tails (1970), and Quattro mosche di velluto grigio/Four Flies on Grey Velvet (1971).

The film also contains a number of familiar (if briefly seen) faces from Bava's earlier and subsequent work. Walter Williams, working once again under his screen name of Robert Buchanan, plays hospital chief Dr. Alessi; he had previously appeared as the Eunuch in Esther and the King and would be subsequently featured in Diabolik/Danger: Diabolik (1968). Franco Ressel—billed here as "Franco Morigi"—is glimpsed leading the narcotics squad that apprehends the drug-dealing Pacini at the airport; he had previously played King Lothar in Gli invasori and would play the Marquis Riccardo Morelli in Sei donne per l'assassino.

La ragazza che sapeva troppo also marks Bava's earliest collaboration with Gustavo De Nardo, who plays Dr. Facchetti. De Nardo would eventually appear in more Bava films than any other supporting actor—playing the detective in the "La goccia d'acqua" ("The Drop of Water") episode of I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath, the bed-ridden patriarch of the Menliff house in La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, the ill-fated doctor at whose office Baron von Kleist seeks treatment in Baron Blood, and a gas station owner in Cani arrabbiati/Rabid Dogs/Kidnapped. Active in small Italian films since the mid-1950s, De Nardo's previous film work had included Christian-Jacque's La Legge è legge/The Law Is Law, Henry Koster's The Naked Raja (1959), Nunnally Johnson's The Angel Wore Red (1960), and Andrew Marton's It Happened in Athens (1961). It is difficult to chart De Nardo's career with much accuracy because a number of his film appearances, including Baron Blood, were uncredited.

CLAD IN leopard skin, Valentina Cortese has a memorable climactic scene as the mad Laura Torrani.

ITALIAN fotobusta.

Cast as the priest presiding over Ethel's funeral was Jim Dolen, a white-haired actor who was quite active in Italian films from 1958–1964. His appearances include Totò nella luna ("Totò on the Moon," 1958), Antonio Margheriti's Il pianeta degli uomini spenti/Battle of the Worlds (1961), Il crolla di Roma ("The Fall of Rome," 1962), and the Gothic giallo, La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle (1963), as well as an unbilled role in 1964's Gidget Goes to Rome.

Also appearing briefly, for the first of two times in Bava's filmography, is Lucia Modugno, who has a charming memory of the production: "In the film I played a nurse and had a couple of lines. After that, I listened to the dialogue between two other characters and did the expressions that I thought were right. At a certain point, after he called "cut," Bava said to the bystanders: "Who is this clever young girl? Who found her? She did some incredible bits of business!" and made a gesture like kissing his hand. I was just starting out; nobody had told me what to do or anything, so he was surprised by my timing and my expressions. It was Bava who later called me back for Diabolik: my role was that of a prostitute, who had witnessed something and went to do an Identikit. I remember Bava as a very paternal man; even his appearance was a bit paternal—homely, how else can I say it? He wasn't slick nor a philanderer—I've met quite a few of those! He was serious, very serious . . ."[4]

Commentary

Mario Bava's last feature film to be shot in black-and-white, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is a gem of stylistic execution that falls short of complete success due, once again, to inconsistencies of narrative. It's easy to believe that each of its half-dozen screenwriters contributed something to its sometimes wildly conflicting makeup. The greatest problem with having so many cooks in the kitchen is that the solution to the mystery—though logical—does not complement the evidence as satisfyingly as other, more fantastical, less plausible explanations also pondered in the course of the storyline.

As the movie unreels, the viewer is never certain whether Nora witnessed a murder or experienced a psychic vision. Did she witness the killing of Emily Craven, as it happened ten years earlier—and if so, how? Was it a product of her overexcited, mystery-fuelled imagination? A bump on her head? A drug-induced hallucination? Or merely a nightmare, as suggested by the original shooting title? Or might it have been provoked in her suggestible nature by her overstimulated immersion in the waking amalgam of past and present that is Rome? One imagines that each of these explanations was treated as valid in the storylines proposed by the six different contributors.

The film offers too many possibilities, all equally enticing—and consequently, while the final solution (that she witnessed the murder of Maria Straccianeve, who just happened to resemble the woman who was murdered by the woman she is now suddenly blackmailing all these years later) may seem more logical, it is also less dramatically satisfying. Over the years, countless mysteries on the page and screen have managed to juggle multiple false leads and red herrings, but the mysteries that endure tend to be those which offer the most unexpected explanations. If La ragazza che sapeva troppo falls short, it is not due to any failure of technique, but because its discarded explanations are more attractive than the one finally proposed, precisely because the solution is merely logical, while everything that comes before has an aspect of magic.

So deep was Bava's own personal dislike of travel—which worsened in the wake of his Le meraviglie di Aladino misadventure—that virtually all of his horror films can be reduced to the baleful consequences of arrivals and departures. La maschera del demonio is the story of a trip to a medical convention gone awry; Ercole al centro della terra is the story of a hazardous journey, and Gli invasori deals with a series of voyages bent on conquest. Of his later works, 'I wurdalak' from I tre volti della paura finds a family wracked with fear about the impending return of their patriarch from a dangerous trip; La frusta e il corpo begins with the return of a prodigal, much dreaded son from a long voyage; Baron Blood and Lisa and the Devil are both about American tourists who travel abroad, only to reactivate evil forces from the past; Cani arrabbiati is about what could happen to anyone reckless enough to leave their house . . . the theme is rigorously consistent, right up to his final feature Schock, in which the film's heroine succumbs to a mental breakdown following her return to her old house after many years spent away, in an asylum.

ITALIAN fotobusta depicting Nora's visit to the morgue, attended by Dr. Facchetti (Gustavo De Nardo).

Like these characters, Nora Davis finds danger and destiny, rather than escape, abroad. Her presence in Rome provokes an hallucination that reactivates an old, unsolved murder case, and her fated place in this story is emphasized by how well her own surname fits into the alphabetical itinerary of the killer, and the fact that she finds herself occupying the home of the last victim. Here and elsewhere in Bava's films, the fear of travel is not simply a matter of knowing where one belongs and feeling that we are all put where we are born for a reason; it is also usually connected to a superstitious fear of stumbling into a larger, karmic reality and discovering the other destinies that may await one elsewhere. This persistent—indeed, *in*sistent—theme carries with it a dread of recognizing, and being unable to resist, the path not taken.

From the very beginning, the narration of La ragazza che sapeva troppo discusses Rome in terms of being "a dream destination" and Nora is heard to enthuse, "It must be a dream to live here." Thus, she is bound on a journey not unlike that of Lisa Reiner in Bava's later Lisa and the Devil, made ten years later. Both heroines are young, blonde, and beautiful tourists who come to Europe anticipating a dream and, after spending time amid its antiquities, become lost in time and veer into the parallel dimension of nightmare. While Lisa's nightmare takes her to a previous lifetime, Nora's is not quite so severe; it only takes her back ten years (or so we spend most of the film believing). Nora and Lisa (at least in the revised version of her story, The House of Exorcism, 1975) also share a common stimulus, in that both embark on their respective adventures after bumping their heads on the ground of a public plaza.

Given the way the story is constructed, Nora's theoretical dislocation is treated as authentic for most of the running time, only to be abandoned in the final reel in favor of a more pragmatic explanation that comes out of left field. (Bava may have appreciated the irony of naming the murder victim Maria, as he could then tell people that he was making a movie about a girl who has "a vision of Maria" in front of a church!) Even after it is explained that Nora witnessed a murder in the present tense, while dazed by a mild concussion, the movie continues to embellish its explanation with needless, compensatory details. For example: in her final scene, Nora recalls smoking a marijuana-laced cigarette prior to witnessing the murder in Trinità dei Monti—but while this scene is present in the American cut, it is not present in the Italian version, making the addendum particularly pointless. In the Italian version, she smokes only one supposedly drugged cigarette—while on the plane—and experiences no apparent after-effects whatsoever. Furthermore, marijuana is not an hallucinogen, which makes the idea seem all the more ill-conceived.

Another of Bava's chief contributions to the scenario was to explore the schism he perceived between the sunniness of Rome and the dark, sinister imaginings of people who come there from cooler climes—an elaboration on his aforementioned quote that Calabrese workmen go to the cinema to laugh or cry, because they have the sun and care nothing for movies that take place in the dark. As Marcello shows Nora around the city in the wake of her presumed hallucination, he says, "Just look around you—does this look like the kind of place where women get stabbed? Come, this is the real Rome, where the sun shines bright and the air is clear! A dream, perhaps—a nightmare, never!"

Despite Marcello's claims, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is deceptive in its appearance. It is set in then-contemporary Rome, yet it cannot be said that it is set in the real world, as Bava's later Cani arrabbiati clearly is. Marcello Bassi, whose name evokes not only Marcello Mastroianni but also Rosanno Brazzi (at the time, the two leading matinee idols of Italian cinema), looks at the world with surprising naïveté for a doctor who works the late shift in a hospital near the center of Rome, who should be as familiar as anyone with what really occurs there under cover of night. Instead, the film explores the fantasy that was Rome in 1963, in the wake of La dolce vita, when it captured the international imagination as "Swinging London" would a couple of years later.

Given its emphases on the beauty of Rome, on Rome as a "dream," La ragazza che sapeva troppo would have been a more satisfying and germane picture had Nora's vision of the murder on Trinità dei Monti been provoked by her being overwhelmed by her visit to the Eternal City, where

4 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

Vespa motorbikes co-exist with the Colisseum. This metaphysical possibility, which is briefly considered in a scene that appears only in the American version, is clearly what happens to Lisa in Lisa and the Devil, and seems related to the phenomenon which would later become the deux ex machina of Dario Argento's 1996 film La sindrome di Stendhal/ The Stendhal Syndrome. First described by Stendhal (Marie Henri Beyle, 1783–1842), the author of Le Rouge et le Noir and Le Chartreuse de Parme, this syndrome refers to people who are so susceptible to beauty that, in the presence of great works of art or architecture, they can become faint, disoriented, or delusional. In Florence, Italy—the home of the Uffizi Gallery—the nearest hospital is said to keep three beds available for tourists who fall victim to the intensity of Vermeer and Botticellli, when seen live, up-close, and in person. Of course, one of the film's early drafts—my guess would be Corbucci's—may have told such a story, in which the hallucinations of a young and impressionable tourist help to solve a crime that occurred in Rome ten years earlier. (Nora's surname in the US version—"Drowson"—carries associations of "drowse on," an encouragement to keep dreaming.) Instead, Bava's final cut settles for a more mundane—and ironically, less believable—account, as the ten-year gap between the original Alphabet Murders and the attempted blackmail by Maria Straccianeve seems more than a little far-fetched. Worse yet, the murder of Maria breaks the pattern of the killer's psychosis ("I had to kill her, don't you see? Her name began with the letter A!"), turning Laura Torrani's hot-blooded madness cold-bloodedly sane and practical.

La ragazza che sapeva troppo may have its roots in the works of Alfred Hitchcock, but it is far more representative and revealing in regard to the work of Mario Bava. Hitchcock had previously noted the irony of shy, high-strung people who read murder stories for relaxation; Hume Cronyn plays such a person in Shadow of a Doubt (1943, scripted by Thornton Wilder) and Bava was such a person himself. In the hands of another director, Nora Davis might have become a silly caricature, but Bava recognized elements of her in himself: addicted to mysteries, anonymous (Nora = n'aura, "no face"), with a deep-seated unease regarding travel and unfamiliar cultures. Consequently, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is one of Bava's most personal films and Nora—especially as she is more richly depicted in the English-language version, Evil Eye—emerges as one of his most accessible and appealing of his heroines; a neurotic Nancy Drew (with the same initials!), always on edge but never incapacitated by her fears. Bava must have felt a deep affinity for her, because he later helped to create another, similar young heroine for his screenplay Cry Nightmare in 1967—a character who managed to survive the rewrites and was eventually played by Sally Smith in Antonio Margheriti's eventual filming of the project as Nude . . . si muore/ The Young, the Evil and the Savage (1968).

The Italian version of the film presents Nora as a more sober-minded heroine than does the quite different, and ultimately more satisfying, American recut. The most obvious difference between the two presentations of the character is that the Italian version is narrated by a third person male voice, placing the story in the tense of the novel Nora might be reading on the plane, while the American version is narrated—in giddy, girlish, "Dear Diary" exuberance—by Nora herself. Consequently, the Italian version conveys only her surface reality, resulting in a cooler, more sophisticated heroine. In Nora's first scenes, she wears an eye-popping snakeskin coat by Emilio Schubert, which seems an uncharacteristically showy and sophisticated thing for such a naïve young girl to wear. Perhaps by covering his heroine in the dermis of a cold-blooded serpent, Bava was venturing comment on her status as a foreigner to sunny Italy, or as a reader of stories that chill the blood, or her announced resolve to stop reading these books that excite her imagination, to shed them like a skin.

THE STRIKING snakeskin coat worn by Nora on her arrival in Rome.

After surviving air travel and her encounter with a drug smuggler, Nora's next stop is the apartment of Ethel—wonderfully furnished by Giorgio Giovannini with objects of superstition (a horseshoe hangs on the back of her front door) and antique portraits of long-dead, solemnly gazing children. Likewise, our first view of Ethel prefigures her coming death: she's covered in a ghost-like sheet, inhaling vapors, which curl all around her like a fog when she emerges from this makeshift tent to greet her guest in jolly fashion.

The film's first highlight comes early, about seven minutes into the picture, with Ethel's death and the murder that Nora witnesses (or imagines) outside Trinità dei Monti. The death scene is a tour de force, fascinating not only for its compositional adroitness and wildly escalating tension, but for the many trappings it shares with the scene of Miss Chester's visit to the medium's deathbed in the "La goccia d'acqua" episode of I tre volti della paura: the stormy night, the squeaky bed, the cat, the staring face of the old dead woman, the strobing lights, the bedside glass of water which both Nora and Miss Chester drop to the floor in fright. As Nora shakes Ethel's dead body in disbelief, a portrait of a morbid-looking male child is thoughtfully included in the shot, so that it appears to be peering over her shoulder.[5] This eerie grace note foreshadows the dolls littering the floor of the medium's domicile, as well as the Victorian-era ghost child of Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!.

Nora has changed into a nightgown prior to this scene, so before running outside toward the hospital to fetch Dr. Bassi, she covers herself in a shiny black raincoat (which, in the monochrome cinematography, complements the black cobblestone streets that gleam under rainfall). The purse snatcher awaiting her wears a striped shirt that echoes the earlier striped lighting on Nora's face, as the lamps in Ethel's bedroom flickered on and off in the moments after her death. When Nora is knocked to the ground, the camera lingers on her generous show of bare leg—a shot reminiscent of the (highly fetishistic) death of the title character's governess in Luis Buñuel's Ensayo de un Crimen/The Criminal Life of Archibaldo de la Cruz (1955)—and then dissolves to a point later in time (or space).

A scream awakens Nora, whose distorted perception of the murder she witnesses is conveyed by manipulations of Bava's cristallo d'acqua, or "water glass." The use of the water glass is particularly interesting in this context, because the murder is framed by intermittent rain, and it sets up beautifully the closing shot of the sequence, which pans away from Nora's collapsed form to a rain puddle in which Trinità dei Monti is reflected—its stately, inverted facade then distorted by a cloudburst. Fifteen years later, Dario Argento (or perhaps his director of photography, Luciano Tovoli) echoed this shot prior to the first murder in Suspiria (1977), as a woman splashes through the reflected image of the building in which she is about to be killed.

ITALIAN manifesto incorporating the image of Landini trying to revive Nora with whiskey.

The film's alphabet murders are indebted to Agatha Christie's 1936 Hercule Poirot mystery The ABC Murders (filmed in 1966 by Frank Tashlin), perhaps by way of Ernesto Gastaldi's 1959 stage play A . . . come Assassino ("A . . . as in Assassin"). Even today, the alphabet continues to occupy a central place in the mythos of murder mysteries, thanks to Sue Grafton's best-selling series of novels, launched with A Is for Alibi in 1982. The particular magic of alphabetical murders stems from their implication of a cold-blooded, systematic approach to crime, as well as the implicit promise of a potentially large number of killings. Bava takes the idea further by having the killer collect newspaper clippings of her "triumphs" in a box filled with an old, incomplete set of alphabet blocks, giving her modus operandi a Freudian dimension of childhood trauma that is never explicitly addressed (nor does it need to be). A major component of the giallo as it later developed, especially in the hands of Dario Argento—the killer's private shrine of childhood talismans and other souvenirs of a primal, mind-shattering trauma—can be traced back to the use of these specific props.

As a stranger in Rome, Nora Davis discovers her sense of belonging in the killer's own annihilistic template: not only is she the "D" that is required for the campaign of murder to continue, but she discovers the tools of the killer's trade while residing in the home of the previous victim, in whose footsteps she seems fated to follow. Further cementing her fated relationship to the killer is their similarity of names, Laura being the face (l'aura) that Nora (n'aura) is unable to identify as the one threatening her. It is then appropriate that Laura's face—the face—is one of the few openly examined among the film's gallery of supporting players, which consists to a great extent of people viewed in silhouette, out of focus, or with their faces somewhat averted from the camera lens. Laura's face is also significant because it is her resemblance to the murder victim that first attracts Nora to her as she steps outside her apartment on Trinità dei Monti—a detail that makes no sense if Nora did not actually witness the death of her sister Emily. If she had witnessed the murder of Maria Straccianeve, as the film ultimately decides, then there is no point to the resemblance and the coincidence that Laura's sister was an earlier victim in the series of murders becomes too far-fetched.

Nora's adventure reaches its zenith of disorientation with the introduction of Landini—a magician-like name for a character who exists half the time in empty rooms on pre-recorded tapes. For a while, Landini's own enigma threatens to overwhelm the murder plot, especially in the striking sequence in which Nora responds to his invitation for a meeting at his apartment. Her harrowing visit to his empty digs—a series of rooms, all unfurnished and of a menacing whiteness, with a main corridor adorned with bare, swinging bulbs that tip the shadows left and right so that the walls appear to wobble and sway—is shot from abstract angles, incorporating only fractions of Nora's frightened expression. Nora follows Landini's disembodied voice through this expressionistic labyrinth, only to discover a tape recording which immediately dispels a believable encroachment of the supernatural, a moment anticipating Leandro's surprise revelation of the tape recorder inside the musical carousel in Lisa and the Devil.[6]

5 The same painting can be seen hanging in the home of Marcello Mastroianni's character in Pietro Germi's occasionally thriller-ish Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce, Italian Style (1961).

6 In the Bava canon, tape recorders tend to appear as demystifying contraptions and objects of betrayal (see 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto and Lisa and the Devil), which probably says a good deal about the man's aversion to interviews.

This sequence is daring not only for its avant-garde framing, but for its perversity in generating chills from a setting that is the polar opposite of the traditional frightening atmosphere. It is bright rather than dark, clean rather than a chaos of cobwebs, clearly uninhabited, and it conjures its atmosphere of horror through distinctly contemporary trappings—lightbulbs, a typewriter, and a tape recorder. (In another of his films, 1982's Tenebrae, also starring John Saxon, Dario Argento would play at this game as well, staging all of its murders in broad daylight.) It's La ragazza's most remarkable sequence, and one that ultimately exonerates Bava's decision to film in black-and-white; like the red and green makeup effects in I vampiri and La maschera del demonio, this sequence could not work so effectively in color. In color, Nora's own natural coloring would take the edge off the menace of this setting; in black-and-white, Nora is also colorless, and the more intensely colorless environment threatens to overwhelm her gray scales with opposite energies of black-and-white that seem powerful enough to absorb her very substance. Bava ends this sequence on a jolt of ironic comedy, by having Nora and Marcello activate the tape recorder they find, only to hear the comically accelerated playback of Adriano Celentano's sultry theme song, "Furore." One imagines that Bava may have conceived this wicked dénouement as a way of exacting revenge against a pop song that he was obliged to use.

The search for Landini continues at the printer's shop, and the subsequent scenes at the morgue and prison demonstrate Bava's gifts for cinematographic sleight-of-hand and economical mise-en-scène in the manner of the clinic scene in I vampiri. The bustling print shop consists of only two conjoined walls with opaque panels, through which the shadows cast by two crew members are visible, one of them operating an unseen piece of machinery (suggested by cardboard cut-out) while another walks in and out of view, carrying different things. Onscreen are the hero and heroine, a young woman who works there, and another figure bent over in the background of the shot; the illusion is completed with sound effects of an actual printing press. Likewise, later in the film, a courtroom is suggested by a single desk, a jail is evoked by a single framed set of bars, and a morgue is provided by a completely black set furnished with only four white-drawered cabinet fronts. These examples show how Bava and Giorgio Giovannini were able to conjure environments with a stark minimum of set decoration. At the same time, this reliance on scenic reduction—which recalls the expressionistic "bare essentials" mise-en-scène of William Cameron Menzies' Invaders From Mars (1953, revealed in the final moments to be a dream of its young hero)—could also reflect an abandoned intention of explaining the entire story as a literal nightmare (a theory supported by the film's abandoned original title).

When Landini finally steps out into the open to share his story with Nora, he is almost never lighted in a conventional, naturalistic manner. He stands out as a theatrical character—half haunted, half apparition himself. His reminiscences of the original Alphabet Murders investigation are illustrated entirely with distorted angles, lenses, and filters. The first (depicting the A murder) is an uncantered, slightly unfocused shot, with Vaselined periphery, filmed with a 40 mm lens to allow movement and composition in depth; the second (depicting the B murder) combines low-angle camera placement with a wide-angle 28 mm lens, bending the periphery and throwing the depth of the composition out of focus; the third (the Emily Craven murder) is a 24 or 25 mm lens shot, distorting the wide angle even more, while using the statically held "water glass" to mottle the image; the apprehension of Straccianeve is depicted in long-shot with a crystal-clear 40 mm lens, but the image is rendered liquid by the water-glass, which Bava (as always) manipulated in front of the lens himself. The remaining, expressionistic shots of Straccianeve's trial and cries of innocence are depicted with a series of close-up shots, similarly distorted with the water glass—each shot economically composed for maximum narrative impact, not unlike the panels of a comic book story.

The film's finale provides other opportunities for inventive lighting and suspense. According to director Jonathan Demme, Roger Corman once told him that the most psychologically unsettling image that could be put on the screen was a slightly angled shot of a closed door.[7] In this movie, Bava plants a locked room in the center of the Torranis' apartment and it looms so overtly in the set design (and scenario) that it fairly screams with psychological portent. Here, and in the cabinets and cupboards where Nora makes other shocking discoveries, we see the first signs of what would become a recurring touchstone in Bava's oeuvre—secrets that lurk inside cupboards or behind ornately carved doors. It is impossible to know their specific relevance to Bava, but he offered one possibility when he once described the unpredictable atmosphere of his father's workshop, where he spent so much time as a child—a place where "you could open a drawer and find a wax figure inside, or find a lathe inside a cupboard, or a ball somewhere else."

A CLEAR view of the flashback to the original Alphabet Murders, seen in the film through Bava's "water glass."

When Nora finally enters this forbidden place, the lighting is made disorienting by the rocking luminance of a knocked-over lamp, which is doubled by its reflection in a mirror on the wall. As Nora sees, and reaches out to, the sweater whose fastenings match the button clutched in the dead hand of Maria Straccianeve, her outstretched arm is grabbed by Laura, whose face framed in a sphere (a button?) of light. (As is, incidentally, the dead face of Ethel, much earlier in the film.) Indeed, our Alphabet Killer is ultimately defeated by an outpouring of light, which is shown issuing through two bullet holes fired into her back through the once-locked study door. Two decades later, in the wake of Joel and Ethan Coen's Blood Simple (1984) and Lawrence Kasdan's Silverado (1985), shafts of light beaming laser-like through bullet-riddled walls became an action film cliché, particularly in Hong Kong movies. La ragazza che sapeva troppo stands out as one of the earliest uses of such imagery.

Tastefully and economically designed by Giovannini, Bava's film conveys much the same atmosphere of rococo elegance as their subsequent collaboration on the "I telefono" segment of I tre volti della paura, which would take Bava's giallo experiment to the next level. A close examination of the Torranis' apartment reveals that AIP donated some set dressing to the picture: in particular, a cloverleaf-patterned partition previously glimpsed in the dungeon catacombs of Roger Corman's Pit and the Pendulum (1961), which Giovannini would subsequently use again to dress Michèle Mercier's apartment and outer corridor in the "Telephone" segment of the AIP coproduced I tre volti della paura. But the film's outstanding set is undeniably Trinità dei Monti and the Spanish Steps, one of the few exterior locations ever filmed by Bava that truly seems an extension of his cinematic universe.

A PATROLMAN revives Nora, only to find her hysterical at the memory of the murder she witnessed.

La ragazza che sapeva troppo was the last of Bava's films to credit Ubaldo Terzano as "camera assistant." For his remaining collaborations with Bava, Terzano would always be formally credited as "director of photography," which would seem to confirm Armando Govoni's view that Terzano has not received his due recognition for what he contributed to the look of Bava's 1959–65 period. It is true that, neither before nor after that time frame, can anything be found in Bava's work to parallel the strikingly fragmented, cubist framing of the sequence of Nora's visit to Landini's vacant apartment; however, such framing can be found in Dario Argento's Profondo rosso as a heavily perspiring David Hemmings attempts to bait a killer by sitting at his piano—and Luigi Kuveiller's "assistant cameraman" on that picture was none other than Ubaldo Terzano.

Nevertheless, all cinematographic decisions were dependent upon Bava's ultimate approval, so the look of the films remained under his firm guidance. As Govoni explains, "Mario was a born director of photography, and that aspect of his personality was always the most important." Perhaps, just as novice screenwriters in the Italian film industry of the day broke in by signing their scripts with the names of their teachers, Terzano's credit was assigned to Bava during a period of professional apprenticeship.

One thing is undeniable: the films that Bava made with Terzano—produced at a time when his own additional responsibilities as director forced him to relegate more and more responsibility to his camera assistant—are his most lavishly beautiful works. These films all share a certain velvety quality of lighting and suave assuredness of camera movement that Bava never achieved with other cameramen, including himself.

After La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Bava would not work again as a nominal director of photography until Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon in 1969. Considering what his status as a cameraman had been throughout the 1950s, one cannot help but wonder what a career Bava might have enjoyed, had he not accepted the opportunity to direct. But he was hereafter committed to his identity as a director.

7 Demme says this in his audio commentary for the Criterion Collection's LaserDisc and DVD release of his film The Silence of the Lambs.

Music

La ragazza che sapeva troppo follows the pattern of many popular features of its era by having a theme song, though it does not lyrically address either the title or the shooting title of the movie. Written by the songwriting team of Adricel and Vivarelli, "Furore" was recorded by Italian pop phenomenon Adriano Celentano.

Born in Milan in 1938, Celentano first entered the public eye in 1957, at the Italian Rock 'n' Roll Festival, where his well-received performance resulted in his signing by the Saar label. His first release, "Ciao Ti Dirò," was a major local hit, and it was not long before Italian producers sought him to appear onscreen. Celentano made his screen debut in I frenetici (1958), and he subsequently made a memorable cameo appearance as himself in La dolce vita. By 1962, contemporaneously with "Furore," he had become successful enough to found his own recording label, Clan Celentano—almost a decade before The Beatles made international headlines by announcing the formation of Apple. Throughout the rest of the '60s, Celentano became as beloved as an actor in Italy as a recording artist, though his work never had much cachet for export. One of his better-known screen roles is as the hapless hero of Dario Argento's Le cinque giornate/The Five Days of Milan (1971). He continues to act and make top-selling recordings today.

"Furore" is a sultry, urban ballad similar in execution to Gene Pitney's chart-topping hit, "Town Without Pity." Pitney's song, composed by Dmitri Tiomkin and Ned Washington, was itself the Oscar-nominated theme of a 1961 feature by director Gottfried Reinhardt, and it was re-recorded in a special Italian language version ("Città spietata"), so the resemblance of the Celentano recording may not be purely coincidental. "Furore" was prominently used in the film's promotion, and provided the sole soundtrack of the movie's Italian trailer.

The remainder of the score was written, once again, by Galatea's resident composer Roberto Nicolosi. Like Nicolosi's earlier scores for Bava, La ragazza che sapeva troppo consists mostly of short accent cues, used primarily to soften transitions from one scene to another, or to emphasize suspense and other interior tensions. Consequently, while it doesn't amount to a terribly aggressive or memorable score, it occasionally packs tremendous atmospheric value. The murky, churning, hypnotic accompaniment to the murder, for example—with its gradually accentuated, soaring strings (recorded with the sweet severity one associates with Riz Ortolani)—is a standout cue, and Bava wisely replays it under the scene in Trinità dei Monti when Nora recounts the details of the murder to the incredulous Marcello. (Incidentally, Bava himself makes an Hitchcockian cameo appearance during this sequence, passing behind Roman and Saxon.) During the scene of Nora preparing a trap of string and talcum powder, the extended accompaniment takes the form of a bluesy jazz piece, suggesting that Nicolosi's real passion may have been for less orchestral, more contemporary forms of music.

FRENCH grande affiche, unsigned though the anonymous stone lithographer based his design on the original Italian due-foglia by Sandro Simeoni.

Variants

La ragazza che sapeva troppo was released in Italy, by Warner Bros., on February 28, 1963. It was a poorly timed premiere, as the world was riveted that weekend to television coverage of the escalating tensions between the United States and Russia, as the discovery of an estimated 17,000 Soviet troops stationed in Cuba edged the two world powers toward the frightening possibility of nuclear war. Consequently, Bava's innovative thriller closed after a single week, earning only 55 million lire [$34,000], thus failing to recoup its budget, and making it the lowest-earning release of his directorial career. The poor performance of the European release did nothing to hasten American International's release of the picture stateside; in fact, the picture would wait fifteen months, enduring radical tinkering, before seeing the light of a movie theater projector.

For all its points of interest, La ragazza che sapeva troppo is not the definitive version of this production. Especially when compared to Evil Eye, the alternative cut that AIP would eventually release, La ragazza seems not only incomplete, but possessed of such an entirely different character that one can't help pondering which of the two versions is most authentic. For example, throughout the Italian version, the heroine is called "Nora Davis," but the AIP version contains a scene that gives her surname as "Drowson"—so which do we accept?[8]

The early part of the Italian version, in particular, is hobbled by a preponderance of abrupt jump cuts and impatient, hastening dissolves, offering a rare glimpse of the usually gifted editor Mario Serandrei working at wit's end. The Italian version was also pruned of several ironic asides to Italy's Fascist past, and caricatures significant to Bava and his personal life, which suggest that the director may have felt capable of speaking more freely to audiences abroad. AIP's reworking of La ragazza che sapeva troppo was not simply a matter of cutting explicit gore and maudlin romance and rescoring the picture. This time, the American edition is actually longer, rescuing some excellent scenes from the cutting room floor, which flesh out the story and characters in valuable ways, while also conveying the sense of the romantic thriller that Bava personally thought ridiculous.

Unfortunately for film historians, the professional correspondence of American International Pictures is presently under the strict lock-and-key of Sony Entertainment, and is not accessible for research purposes. In most cases, it is possible to make an educated guess about what transpired between Bava and AIP during the productions on which they were partnered, either on the basis of the finished product or from comments made by Bava or others in interviews. In the case of La ragazza che sapeva troppo and its transformation into Evil Eye, however, there is less documentation than usual to tell us what happened, and why. But by connecting some dots, we can learn a bit more.

The fact that the film began shooting in the spring of 1962 (according to Armando Govoni's production diary) and was not delivered to the Italian censor until February 10, 1963—nearly a full year afterwards—indicates, at the very least, that some additional post-production filming was done later in the year. (One scene that appears only in the AIP version shows Leticia Roman and Robert Buchanan bundled up in warm-looking overcoats, which would not have been necessary for spring shooting in Rome. John Saxon is also conspicuously absent from the scene, though he accompanied them in the dinner scene immediately preceding it.) The ending of the American version differs from that of the Italian one, but Govoni recalls that both were filmed during principal photography in the spring, and both do feature Saxon—who, if reshoots were done, was evidently not flown over for them.

Evil Eye is sometimes touted as a "comic" version of La ragazza che sapeva troppo, but this is not entirely accurate. Whereas the Italian version is more or less a straight, if somewhat overwritten, suspense picture, Evil Eye is more of a suspense soufflé—a "brilliante horror thriller," as John Saxon has aptly termed it—lighter in touch, more representative of the expectations of a young American tourist visiting a foreign country, and it is built around a far more vivacious and spirited heroine. Of the two versions, Evil Eye also seems more expressive of Bava's own personality—a complete turnabout from the usual state of AIP's "revised" versions of his films.

US one-sheet poster, art by Albert Kallis.

8 To further complicate matters, the Warner Pathé pressbook for the film's British release refers to the film's heroine as "Nora Dralston."

The following is a list of the points where Evil Eye differs from La ragazza che sapeva troppo:

• The first obvious change is that Evil Eye has been rescored by Les Baxter. The opening shot of the TWA jet (like the shot that opens Bava's 1972 film Baron Blood, though here the plane is flying right-to-left) is scored with light, piquant music that turns spooky as the title Evil Eye looms onscreen.

• Inside the plane, the camera travels down the aisle, eavesdropping on the thoughts of passengers: an old woman in a flowered hat is knitting, telling herself that she will learn to do this, even if it kills her; an intense man in sunglasses signals for a stewardess while adding up figures in his head; a plain, middle-aged woman daydreams about Italian fashions ("the best in the world now") and buying a dress in Rome that Jackie Kennedy might wear; an elderly man thinks in Italian; a man with a nervous stomach worries about the jet's engines; and then we come to the stern, cold countenance of a beautiful young woman, thinking, "What an idiot! He should never have washed the blood off that knife in a bathtub! Even a public washroom would have been better . . ." This is our heroine, Nora Drowson, and before we get the wrong idea about her, the camera pans down to the giallo paperback tightly held in her white-knuckled hands. (The Italian version cuts almost immediately to Nora, and is narrated by a third-person male voice; the AIP version is narrated entirely with Nora's own thoughts, bringing the viewer much closer to her. Leticia Roman dubbed her own performance.)

• The scene between Nora and her fellow passenger was acted in English. Whereas the Italian version cuts to the airport after she accepts his cigarette, giving a cold impression of her, the AIP version moves into a close-up as she smiles to herself: "Smooth, isn't he? But nice. Ah, Rome . . . Michelangelo, da Vinci, Marcello Mastroianni! The sun, the ruins . . . A whole month! No typewriter, no switchboard, just Rome! I know it will be wonderful!" She reaches for a map of the continental boot in the pocket in front of her, and the camera zooms in—followed by a shot of the jet landing. (Only in the AIP version do we learn the length of Nora's projected stay, or details of the kind of life she leads in America.)

THE PORTRAIT of Uncle Augusto was modelled by Mario Bava himself, hiding behind a false handlebar mustache.

• There is an additional shot of the team of narcotics officers conferring with airport security police before locating the queue where they make their arrest of Nora's fellow passenger. Baxter's accompaniment is nonstop, energetic, and upbeat. All references to drugs are eliminated from the dialogue as the man is arrested, as is the shot of multiple packs of Kents hidden inside his suitcase; consequently, we don't understand why Nora is so eager to get rid of the packet of smokes passed on to her.

When the packet she drops is returned by a helpful guard, we cut outside as a rush of new arrivals bolt for taxicabs. Nora is knocked out of a cab by one pushy man, and bumps heads with another, knocking her to the ground. She opts to take a bus instead, but refuses to let the driver carry her luggage, being fearful of foreigners. (When she bumps heads with Marcello on their first meeting a moment later, it mirrors this earlier bump.)

• The dialogue during Nora's reunion with Ethel is also different. Though she refuses to kiss Nora in the Italian version for fear of giving her a cold, here her first words are, "Well? Aren't you going to kiss me?" (With the English dubbing in place, it's easy to see that all three actors in this sequence were speaking English on-set.) Ethel's conversation turns immediately to her late husband, Uncle Augusto: "Somehow I haven't been well since Augusto died. You knew him, didn't you? Of course not; you weren't even born then . . . His picture is hanging in your room. I couldn't bear looking at his picture; it made me too sad." She excuses Nora and throws a feather boa around her shoulders as Nora and Marcello leave the room, saying, "And Marcello—pretty girl, isn't she?" The scene ends with a shot of the feathered Ethel stroking her cat.

After Marcello advises Nora on the precariousness of Ethel's health and exits, she steps into close-up and gushes, "Two hours in Rome and I've already had my hand kissed twice! Ahhh!" Fade to black.

We then fade in on a scene later that night: Nora is lying in bed, on her stomach, reading her book on a stormy night. There is a storm raging, causing the lights to go on and off—mostly off, so she has lighted a candle. She reaches into her purse for a cigarette and finds her own pack empty. Using the candle, she lights one of the Kents she was given on the plane instead. She continues to read the thriller, written in the blunt style of Mickey Spillane, the hard-boiled prose segueing in and out with rhapsodic thoughts of Marcello Bassi and how he kissed her hand. She decides to go to bed.

Nora takes off her robe, revealing a short black nightgown, and extinguishes her Kent cigarette after wincing at its odd taste. As she bends over to check her face in a mirror, the oval portrait of Uncle Augusto on the wall leers at her jutting backside. As she walks from one side of the room to another, the eyes of the antique photo pursue her, and when she bends over again, she feels her late uncle's heated gaze and turns about—only to see his eyes feigning innocence. "Oh no, you don't—you Peeping Tom!" she admonishes, covering the portrait with a cloth.

This is an outrageous scene for several reasons, but mostly because the portrait of Uncle Augusto is played by Mario Bava himself, wearing a false handlebar mustache for this second (and far more noticeable) Hitchcockian cameo. The scene is evidently modelled after a comic scene in Preston Sturges' Sullivan's Travels (1941), in which the portrait of a dead husband reacts to his widow's amorous overtures toward her hobo handyman (Joel McCrea); it is interesting to note, too, that the man in that earlier portrait was Paul Jones, Sturges' associate producer—in other words, a similar private joke. Since Bava had no public recognition value at the time, especially not in America, his cameo was surely intended as a private joke, yet he did not sanction it to be included in the version distributed in Rome, the only place where the joke could have been fully appreciated for what it was. Bava was, I believe, using his anonymity—consciously or unconsciously—to venture a personal statement. The character of Augusto's wife Ethel—overweight, jovial, but also reclusive, hypochondriacal, fretful about her heart palpitations, fearful of excitement—corresponds perfectly to the kind of person Bava's wife Iole had become at this stage of her life, and Bava's depiction of himself as a man with a "roving eye" (indeed, as a photograph with a roving eye!) would seem to make an admission of the pleasure he took in voyeurism.

This "sight gag" clearly impressed Arkoff and Nicholson at AIP, whose Edgar Allan Poe and "Beach Party" series had separately evolved a tradition of scenes involving peculiar family portraits. In Bikini Beach (1964), made almost two years after La ragazza che sapeva troppo, a portrait of Keenan Wynn's father responds to his son kissing Martha Hyer in a series of similar reaction shots.

• After Ethel dies, there is an additional shot of Nora rushing to the window, where she looks outside and is illuminated by flashes of lightning. There is also a much longer shot of her running outside and down the steps of the Piazza di Spagna. After she revives from being knocked out by the purse snatcher, there is an additional sustained profile shot of Nora as she steps out into the open, where she hears the woman's scream. As Torrani pulls the knife from the woman's body, Nora faints—the shot of Torrani throwing the knife away and dragging the corpse back into the shadows is cut.

When the patrolman rushes to Nora's assistance, the dialogue is rewritten so that her original, vivid rantings about the body lying in a pool of blood (all presumably washed away by the rain) are replaced by incoherent, alcoholic ravings. Likewise, in the scene of Marcello revisiting the Piazza di Spagna with Nora, his effusions about Rome are replaced by upbeat music. Nora's painstaking description of the murder she witnessed is also presented in shorter form.

• The funeral sequence opens with an additional low-angle shot of the pallbearers lowering the coffin into the ground. (One of the men looks quite a bit like actor Andrea Checchi, and may be his son Enrico, who served as Bava's personal assistant on the production.) There is also an additional shot of Landini, viewed from behind, watching the proceedings at a distance, from behind a tree. Nora also additionally discusses with the priest the murder she witnessed, and is brought to tears by thoughts of the murdered woman in whom the police have refused to believe. After Nora is taken inside the Piazza apartment by Laura, there is a longer shot of Landini watching from the steps outside—it actually shows his face, as opposed to the Italian version, which picks up the shot only after his back turns to climb the stairs in retreat. (Though Baxter scored the murder scene with original music, for this shot of Landini he employs a vertiginous theme very much like the theme Nicolosi used to score the murder.)

• The shot revealing the photograph of Torrani (the apparent murderer, at this point in the story) is introduced differently. The Italian version cuts away from Laura's insistence that Nora stay in her apartment while she's away in Berne ("Your mother will be more than happy!"), gathering her in a friendly embrace and walking her offscreen. The AIP version continues the shot, to reveal the framed photo displayed atop a piano. The Italian version cuts from the ominous shot of Torrani's locked study door to the shot of the photograph, implying that the photo (and the truth of Torrani's identity and role in the murder) resides behind that door. Bava also executes a lap dissolve, so that the photo vanishes from the frame before our eyes. In the AIP version, we cut from the door to the empty picture frame. Instead of listening to "Furore" on her record player, Nora listens to a Les Baxter instrumental. The scene with the portière is followed by an exterior shot of her exiting the apartment and locking the gate, which extends into the shot of Landini hesitantly walking down the steps.

• When the phone rings after Nora's accidental discovery of the newspaper clippings and alphabet blocks, the caller says nothing in the AIP version—eliminating the important line "D . . . as in Death?"

• The restaurant scene with Dr. Alessi is also altered. The AIP version opens with a close shot of a turkey being carved as Alessi describes a form of brain surgery used to solve mental problems. As it appears in the AIP version, the scene suggests that Alessi harbors some lustful feelings for Nora, as he repeatedly clutches and holds her hand, much to Marcello's annoyance. (The Italian version explains these reaction shots as expressions of Marcello's pragmatic impatience with supernatural mumbo-jumbo.)

ITALIAN fotobusta.

• This scene is followed by another, which does not appear in the Italian version at all—and, as mentioned earlier, appears to have been added to the picture later in post-production, closer to the end of the year. Here, on a different night, so cold that you can see the actors' breath in the night air, Dr. Alessi arranges a private meeting with Nora at "a place that provokes in me an effect much as that which you experienced the other night, a form of resurrection of the memory . . . As I stand here, I can feel a toga on my shoulders, a wreath of laurel upon my brow, I stand awaiting my chariot . . ."

He pats, smooths, caresses her hands, but she breaks away and confesses her fear that she is going to become the killer's next victim.

"But my dear!" Alessi says, "the last killing was more than ten years ago, and the killer vanished after the Craven murder! And even if he were to reappear, it would be a long time before he got to the letter R!"

Nora pivots to face the camera and says, "But you don't understand, Professor—my name isn't Rowson, it's Drowson with a D!" (Naturally, this scene could have no counterpart in the Italian version, in which Nora's surname is Davis.)

She then steps out of frame, revealing in the far distance the famous Bocca della Verità ("Mouth of Truth") at the Chiesa di Santa Maria in Cosmedin, a mask-like stone carving with an open mouth, which Gregory Peck famously used to tease Audrey Hepburn in William Wyler's Roman Holiday (1953).

• This exchange is directly followed by a long-shot of Nora returning to the Torrani apartment after dark; Landini, again viewed from behind, steps into the foreground to light a cigarette. Nora brightens the room, closes the door, and looks cautiously about the apartment, before and after locking the door. A wide-angle lens mildly distorts the interior. She walks to her bed, turns on a lamp and removes her coat—and the phone rings, until she unplugs it. After testing the locked room's door handle, she proceeds to set the string and talcum powder trap, but in this version, there is no narration (not even Nora's interior monologue) to explain what she's doing. Baxter's musical accompaniment here is mechanical and a bit slapstick, with repetitive, honking horns, woodblock, xylophone, and underpinnings of woozy trombone—it sounds very much like a recycled cue from Jacques Tourneur's The Comedy of Terrors, which AIP released the same year.

• The montage of Marcello (his finger bandaged after he falls into the trap) guiding Nora around the historical landmarks of Rome contains a few additional shots; one shows Marcello indicating a main thoroughfare and pantomiming a Nazi goose-step, another finds them shopping, another shows the poor beau weighted down with toys and other presents, straggling along after Nora, who is delightedly riding in a pony wagon.

• After Marcello takes Nora back to her apartment, there is an additional shot of him walking down the Spanish steps and pausing to light a cigarette. His bandage interferes with the procedure long enough for him to see Nora dash back out in answer to Landini's message. Once she steps out of the elevator in his building, her approach to his apartment is extended by a couple of extra atmospheric shots. When Marcello catches up with her and they discover the tape recorder, the joke Bava made at the expense of "Furore" is missing, replaced by a different shot of the couple playing the tape recording that Nora heard resonating through the empty apartment. The following scene at the Torrani apartment is extended by Nora's suggestion that they stay awake (it's 5:30 a.m.) and track down Landini at his hotel in the morning ("Why don't you wait for me there, and I'll go take a shower, okay?").

• At the hotel, the desk clerk's assumption that Marcello and Nora have come for a room, and Marcello's offended reaction, are both cut. After the scene at the printers' shop, there is an additional scene where they follow the printer's lead to a restaurant, where a dishwasher tells them he "just left a few minutes ago" in search of "a waiter who owes him some money."

• This scene is then followed by the very strange beach scene—where Marcello's sullen stare and advancing moves momentarily frighten Nora into thinking that he's the killer, when in fact he's just boiling over with sexual frustration. The scene is made all the more peculiar by an awkwardly filmed kiss that shows Saxon and Roman rolling down the beach in a clutch, being struck by the surf, and standing in the foam, before resuming their kiss. In both versions of the film, this scene feels gratuitous and awkwardly placed, as if AIP had urgently telegraphed Bava to find some way of getting Leticia Roman into a bikini. The placement of the scene, after a sleepless night and the couple's early morning pursuit of Landini, drains all the urgency out of their search, and it's unflattering (especially to herself) for Nora to show such sudden distrust of Marcello's intentions, when he has already suffered so much just to be near her.

THIS US lobby card pictures the alternate American ending.

• Their kiss cuts to their goodnight kiss on Nora's doorstep, where Marcello presses to be invited inside. When she sends him away with another kiss of her hand ("You'll know when the time is right by the sound of my voice, by the way I say your name . . ."), the shot is extended by a close-up of Nora smiling fondly after him, and an additional shot of Marcello stepping into a shot of the Trinità dei Monti, his shoulders slumped with dejection. When she calls Marcello back because there's a man in her apartment, she calls his name twice—the way he expects it will sound when she's ready to make love—and there's an additional shot of him turning around, looking incredulous at his good fortune, an impression soon to be corrected. It's a clever moment.

• Aside from some minor re-editing of shared scenes, there are no more obvious divergences from the Italian continuity until the scene at the Forte Italico. Here, after Nora and Landini go their separate ways, Nora is pursued by a burly stranger, causing her to walk faster and faster past the ornamental statues of athletes. She finally halts out of terror and exasperation, and the brute turns out to be an ordinary masher ("Hey, beautiful, you've sure got some shape on you, all right!") She turns and clobbers him with her purse—which Bava follows with a zoom into a soccer ball gripped by one of the ornamental statues (the "kick in the balls" symbolism of this shot is actually quite daring for the time)—and as she storms away, the man calls to her from the racing track: "Hey, American, let me know if you get lonely!" Again, one gets the sense that Bava was expressing himself more candidly with this scene than he cared to be heard in his homeland—juxtaposing the brutish reality of Roman athletes with the propagandistic exaggerations of the Fascist era statuary, and perhaps also venturing a comment of Rome's Fascist past, as well—and thus, the scene only appears in the AIP version.

THIS ITALIAN manifesto curiously shows Milo Quesada riding a cable car with his murdered lover—a scene not included in the Italian version of the film.

• A terrible miscalculation in both versions of the movie is the reintroduction of Laura before the climax, as she returns from Berne to console her housesitter. In the AIP version there is additional dialogue between Laura and Marcello, in which it is confirmed that Prof. Torrani will be returning to Rome that evening. Marcello suggests that they all have lunch the next day. Nora's discovery of the newspaper story about the dead woman found in the river, whom she recognizes as the victim of the murder she witnessed, is extended with a close-up of her shocked expression.

• There are additional shots of Nora returning to the Torranis' apartment, which is now strangely unoccupied, and longer deliberation before she decides to try the door handle of the locked room. The subsequent scene of Laura's crazed confession is also longer, providing a more effective showcase for Valentina Cortese's alternately tender and savage performance (which she dubbed herself). She wears a leopard skin dress in this scene, which contrasts nicely with the snakeskin coat worn by Nora in the early scenes.

• Finally, the AIP version is distinguished by a completely different ending. Bava executes a clever match-cut from the twin bullet holes shining light through the study door with the twin lenses of a man's binoculars. The man is a jealous husband, spying on his beloved, whom he sees riding the sky rail with her lover. Nora and Marcello are also on the sky rail, planning their future together. He promises to marry her on the condition that she give up murder mysteries ("No more reading about them, no more talking about them . . ."). When the jealous man boards the rail himself and fires several bullets into his wife and the other man, Marcello calls out to other witnesses that he's a doctor and will come right back to be of assistance. He tells Nora not to be upset, to which she coquettishly asks, "Why? Did something happen?"

In addition to depicting side-by-side a possible "before and after" of marriage, this alternate ending roots the proceedings even more explicitly in fantasy and hallucination, by suggesting that Nora's insatiable appetite for murder mysteries, her overactive imagination, have been traceable to her lack of a sexual outlet. Now, with a lover, she has no need for other sources of arousal. Indeed, the Freudian interpretation would be to relate the movie's central image of horror—the knife planted bloodily in Maria's back—to a fear of sexual penetration. Now that Marcello (who has proven his patience and gentleness) has consented to be her husband, Nora can stake a claim in the real world, so to speak—but the dreamy, kittenish look on her face (and the fact that she failed to see an attempted murder that took place in plain sight, in broad daylight) indicates that Nora has simply exchanged one fantasy for another, and is probably already imagining herself as she will look in her wedding gown.

In both versions of the finale, Marcello takes advantage of their marriage plans to insist that Nora give up her diet of murder mysteries. It is an aspect of the scene that surely had personal resonance for Bava, whose wife did not approve of the "trash" he read at home.

Although the version eventually released by AIP was lighter in tone, more tongue-in-cheek than the Italian version, the company rejected a direct translation of its original, parodic title in favor of the more ominous-sounding Evil Eye (or The Evil Eye, as print campaigns called it). It may seem odd that the spoofy title would appear on the more serious cut, and vice versa, but La ragazza che sapeva troppo adhered to the ongoing pattern of ironic (one might even say "post-modern" or "recursive") titles given to each of Bava's Italian releases thus far. When it was released in May 1964, Evil Eye was treated to one of the most uninspired and poorly executed AIP ad campaigns ever; the artwork also committed the cardinal sin of revealing the killer's identity. For whatever reason—bad campaign, black-and-white photography, indifferent word of mouth—Evil Eye did not fare well commercially.

Bava's thriller found its most enthusiastic reception in auteur-conscious France, where La Fille qui en Savait Trop was released in the summer of 1964. In the pages of Midi-Minuit Fantastique, critic Jérome Caulandre published an influential review that put forth a Freudian analysis of the film's imagery. "The matter of Mario Bava . . . is in fact much more subtle than one might lazily suppose when confronted by the vision and superficial approach of this film," he wrote. "Much more than a common 'banal police procedural' or a 'fourpenny thriller,' here we are presented with a film that needs to be interpreted entirely on the level of its images, a film that provides nothing less than the illustrative details of a psychopathological case transposed to the romantic level. In this way it portrays, let us not be afraid to say the words, the loss of a young woman's virginity . . . That is the true subject of La Fille qui en Savait Trop (a title which I personally find sufficiently explicit), a particularly bold and perilous subject that Bava, thanks to his skilled and incisive use of transparent symbols, milks with unusual control and a grand sense of humor."[9]

In a point worth making, Caulandre's short but insightful review was accompanied by a cast and credit listing which identified Leticia Roman as playing "Nora Drowson" (the character's name in the AIP version) and Valentina Cortese as playing "Laura Curtis." These Americanized names, and Caulandre's reference to the film's humor, would suggest that the French release was a dubbed version of the AIP recut, but it was in fact a French-dubbed version of the original Italian director's cut. The only explanation for Caulandre's comments is that the French version may represent a third version of the film: the more serious Italian cut made lighter and wittier in the French dubbing, which incorporated the Americanized names concocted for the AIP version.

Perhaps as a result of the film's poor US performance, and because its black-and-white photography gave it the look of a B-picture by the mid-1960s, Evil Eye was further withheld from a British release until the autumn of 1965. The belated Warner Pathé/Anglo-Amalgamated release actually followed Bava's next two, highly colored films into UK release, which further worked against it, giving it the appearance of an anachronistic, creative retreat. Even so, their unchronologic exposure to Black Sabbath and Night Is the Phantom primed the British press to take any new film from Bava with a measure of seriousness it might not have been accorded if released three years earlier.

ITALIAN manifesto emphasizing top-billed John Saxon.

An unsigned review appearing in Monthly Film Bulletin pegged Evil Eye as "a tolerably silly but really quite enjoyable thriller . . . individual scenes are often given an electric charge by the broodingly atmospheric photography . . . Leticia Roman is adequately distraught as the harried heroine, but the film really belongs to that excellent and much-neglected actress Valentina Cortese, whose final 5 minutes of gleeful histrionics are quite in the Joan Crawford class."

In the September 1965 issue of Films & Filming, Raymond Durgnat expressed what may have been the earliest signs of Mario Bava being taken seriously by the English press: "Mario Bava, like Roger Corman, is an intelligent director who's often betrayed by his subjects. Is he too content to accept the subjects he's given, or does he lack a really good script sense? Too often, as in Black Sabbath or The Wonders of Aladdin, he seems ready to take on slightly rehashed clichés and 'try to do something with them' by little variations of style when he would do far better to tear up his scripts and have them rewritten by a first-class writer . . . Without trying to start a Bava 'cult' (though it would be as justified as a Corman one), his films, like Corman's, zigzag from fascinating to awful, for much the same reasons . . . It's a pity because Bava has tried many fascinating things. He photographs familiar Roman tourist-spots so as to give them a macabre, deserted atmosphere. Memory images are treated to some rather fetching distortions, Leticia Roman's lightly agreeable personality . . . keys the film's offbeat humor, like the girl's doctor–admirer continuously pointing his ridiculously bandaged finger at her as they chat. The film mischievously touches on a sore point or two in Italy's history, as when the camera strays through the huge, ugly Fascist era statuary at the Mussolini forum . . . if Bava needs a really good scriptwriter, he certainly deserves one."[10] Durgnat's review also made reference to some of the Freudian analysis given the film by Jérome Caulandre in Midi-Minuit Fantastique, unaware that he had seen a substantially different version of the picture.

Never wasteful, AIP had registered the Girl Who Knew Too Much title with the Writers Guild of America while the film was still in production. Though they never used it in connection with Bava's film, they later awarded it to a completely unrelated picture which they co-produced with British impresario Harry Alan Towers. Distributed under the Commonwealth United soubriquet. The Girl Who Knew Too Much (1969) was a spy spoof starring Adam West, Nancy Kwan and Robert Alda, directed by Francis D. Lyon (Cult of the Cobra, Destination Inner Space). Released into a marketplace distinguished by a new breed of progressive adult releases like Midnight Cowboy, The Girl Who Knew Too Much looked quite a few years out of date when it was brand new, and it also fared poorly.

MEXICAN lobby card.

In October 2002, when Turner Classic Movies showed it as part of a four-title Mario Bava retrospective, La ragazza che sapeva troppo was revealed as another title significantly altered to enable a 2000 copyright for its acquisitor, Alfredo Leone. Though the dramatic content of the picture remained untouched, the opening titles were once again relocated to the end of the movie, with only Leone's presentational credit and "A Mario Bava Film" preceding the story. To be absolutely accurate, the credits were removed entirely and recreated over a freeze-frame of the closing shot of the seminarian, as the end music played. This change appears to have been affected in order to wholly remove Adriano Celentano's song "Furore," a loss that deals an important blow to the film's atmosphere and its story's specific time and place in history.

The film was released (as The Girl Who Knew Too Much) on DVD in the United States in 2001, marking the long-overdue US debut of Bava's director's cut, with the Celentano song intact. One hopes that this revised 2000 edition will not eventually replace the more integral version in circulation. One also hopes that the superior Evil Eye version will someday resurface, but since AIP's (now Sony's) American rights to that unique version have expired, no one seems to know exactly who, if anyone, owns the US edition.

Legacy

Though Evil Eye went unrecognized in America, La ragazza che sapeva troppo inspired a filmic revolution in Italy. The film was a major inspiration for the young Dario Argento, though he now vehemently denies it.

"I do get rather bored with people going on about Mario Bava," Argento complained to Alan Jones. "We didn't really meet properly until I started my fifth picture, Profondo rosso. Some influences in his costume design, perhaps . . . but we worked differently. Bava is more baroque than I normally like. Bava's first work was in the pepla and he could never lose that obvious style. I was never influenced by Bava's La ragazza che sapeva troppo, as some have said." [11]

These protests aside, when one watches La ragazza che sapeva troppo today, the archetypes of Argento's "universe" are present everywhere: the American-in-Rome protagonist who witnesses a crime their perceptions have not fully grasped or processed . . . the killer's infantile shrine of talismans to his/her primal trauma . . . the crank phone calls from evil people with high, squeaky voices . . . the typewriter loaded with a sheet of paper bearing the words, "I must stop myself before I kill again" . . . the series of amusing, everyday characters met along the way of investigating the crime . . . the unresolved clue that cannot be fished free of the backtides of memory . . . "I'm sure I've seen this button before—but where?" Argento's entire career has been built upon protagonists who ask such questions, and showing these things.

Argento is a Maestro in his own right—he is, without question, the most important sustaining force in the history of the giallo—but his disavowal of Bava's influence is preposterous. Thanks to torchbearers like Argento, Lucio Fulci, and Sergio Martino, the giallo would become the most enduring of all film genres native to Italy, outlasting neorealism, white telephone movies, pepla, even the Spaghetti Western.

Ultimately, La ragazza che sapeva troppo marks a birth pang of the giallo, but not the birth itself. The genre would not achieve full flower for another couple of years, when it reached the defining moment of Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino.

9 Jérome Caulandre, "La Fille qui en Savait Trop," Midi-Minuit Fantastique 9, July 1964, 119–20.

10 Raymond Durgnat, "The Evil Eye," Films & Filming 11:12, September 1965, 27–28.

11 Alan Jones, Mondo Argento (London, UK: Midnight Media, 1996), 1-74.

FRENCH affiche for Alberto De Martino's PERSEO L'INVINCIBILE, art by Constantin Belinsky.

PERSEO L'INVINCIBILE

The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules

IN THE AUTUMN of 1962, between the main shooting schedule of La ragazza che sapeva troppo and the reshoots that followed in the winter, Mario Bava agreed to assist his friend Italo Zingarelli on his next production, Perseo l'invincibile, which he and co-producer Emo Bistolfi were about to make in tandem with Copercines of Madrid. The Italian-Spanish co-production would reunite Richard Harrison and Leo Anchóriz, the stars of the successful Il gladiatore invincibile. Mario's father Eugenio was also recruited to serve as a technical advisor, Perseo being one of very few films on which he accepted screen billing.

Although the main titles list five screenwriters—Mario Guerra, Alberto De Martino, Ernesto Gastaldi, Luciano Martino, and José Mallorqui Figueroa, and a sixth individual credited with having the idea (Edoardo Giorgio Conti)—the author of the original treatment was Gastaldi, a 28-year-old screenwriter who had authored the first commercially successful Italian horror film: Piero Regnoli's L'amante del vampiro/The Vampire and the Ballerina (1960).

"I had previously written another movie for Alberto De Martino—Akiko [1961]," Gastaldi says, "but it was during my 'black' period and I wasn't able to sign it; Ugo Guerra did." To explain Gastaldi's words: at the time he entered the Italian film industry, it was customary for new screenwriters to break into the business as ghost writers, delivering scripts that were signed by established screenwriters. In this case, Gastaldi's early scripts (about twenty of them, by his count) were signed by Ugo Guerra (b. 1920), one of his teachers at the Roman film school, Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica. In the Italian vernacular of the time, this phase was called a "black period," a non-PC term denoting a period of professional servitude. With this in mind, we can see that it is possible that the highly prolific Ennio De Concini may not have been personally involved in some of the pictures bearing his name as screenwriter.

"Perseo l'invincibile was a story of mine," Gastaldi continues, bemoaning his association with the picture. "I wrote only the treatment, but the producer Emo Bistolfi listed me as one of the screenwriters. When Bistolfi died, our Tax Service began to persecute me, demanding that I somehow prove to them that I didn't write the script! I told them, 'I couldn't have written the script, because I have no contract,' et cetera. This persecution has lasted to this very day, because my name is there on the screen, among the other suspects who didn't pay their taxes!"

Produced only a year or so before the pepla phenomenon reached its dead end, Perseo l'invincibile is a surprisingly vital chapter in the genre's latter-day history. It is one of the most cleverly scripted films of its type, incorporating matters of geography and politics as well as the usual tenets of myth and mysticism, but it sticks in the memory for two particular reasons: the enormously likeable and humanistic performance of Richard Harrison, and the monsters created by Carlo Rambaldi, the best of which offers a fresh and visionary reinterpretation of one of the most frightening characters in Greek mythology.

RICHARD HARRISON as Perseus in the valley of the Medusa, standing before a cyclorama supervised by Mario Bava, followed by two glass mattes painted by Bava.

The kingdom of Seriphos is in crisis. Its only direct route to the nearest seaport is through a dreaded valley inhabited by two monsters: a fire-breathing dragon and the Medusa, a living thing of snaking tendrils whose gaze can turn men into stone. During a conflict with King Acristus of Argos (Arturo Dominici) and his son Prince Galanore (Leo Anchóriz), Prince Alceus of Seriphos is forced into the valley of

Perseo l'invincibile

"Perseus the Invincible"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location in Rome and Estudios Ballestreros (Madrid)
Fall 1962
First released: February 7, 1963
Eastmancolor, Totalscope, 2.35:1, 95 minutes

Production: Emo Bistolfi (Rome), Copercines (Madrid). Distributor: Warner Bros.

Argentina: Perseo el Invencible, 4/2/64
France: Persée l'Invincible, 11/18/63
Germany: Perseus—der Undesiegbare, 5/22/64
Spain: El Valle de los Hombres de Pietra, "Valley of the Stone Men," 8/30/65
UK: Perseus Against the Monster, Miracle Films Ltd., 4/64, 89m 56s, Certificate "A," passed with cuts
US: The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules, Embassy TV, 1966
Venezuela: El Valle de los Hombres de Piedra, 1964

the Medusa, where he and his troops are gorgonized, badly decimating their country's ability to defend itself from attack. In a phony show of generosity, Acristus grants the people of Seriphos the right to use Argos as a route for sea trade, but he exacts a heavy toll for the privilege. At the same time, he sends Galanore to woo Princess Andromeda (Anna Ranalli), in the hopes of gaining control of Seriphos through marriage rather than outright conquest. Queen Danae of Argos (Elisa Cegani) is possessed of mediumistic gifts and, in a violent outburst, she announces to her stepson Galanore that his father was responsible for the murder of her husband, the previous King of Argos. She promises that the King's murder will someday be avenged by her own true son—presumed dead since his infancy in wartime—who will be recognized by the three marks on his shoulder, "the sign of Jupiter."

While courting Andromeda in Seriphos, Galanore runs afoul of a peasant fisherman, Perseus (Richard Harrison)—Andromeda's true love, who has been flirting with the Princess for some time without knowing her true identity and royal status. When Perseus' pet deer is slain by Galanore, the hero challenges him in anger and is whipped nearly to death. Andromeda intervenes and insists that the two men fight one another on equal ground. When Perseus gains the upper hand in battle, his shoulder—and thus the sign of Jupiter—is exposed, frightening and cowing Galanore. Acristus is offended by his son's cowardice and insists that he abduct the Princess; he nearly succeeds, but Perseus follows his flight on horseback and manages to retrieve Andromeda. The conflict between the two cities now out in the open, war is imminent and Seriphos' only hope of triumph rests with Perseus, who must enter the valley of the Medusa and slay the indomitable creature, in order to free the city's soldiers from their stony sleep.

RARE American publicity card for Giacomo Gentilomo's SIGFRIDO, a film featuring the talents of Eugenio Bava and Carlo Rambaldi.

Perseo l'invincibile was filmed over a two-month period, with the final week of shooting devoted to special effects. Working anonymously, Mario Bava contributed some glass matte paintings and oversaw the preparation of a scenic cyclorama for the production. Officially in charge of the film's special mechanical effects was Carlo Rambaldi, with whom Eugenio Bava had worked previously on Giacomo Gentilomo's Sigfrido (1957). But according to Richard Harrison, Rambaldi never set foot on the set. At this point in time, Rambaldi was still viewed by many people in the film business as an anomaly; he was specializing in a method of special effects—lifesize, and larger-than-lifesize, mechanical creations—that had no real precursor in the history of Italian cinema. Producers liked his results well enough, but they didn't understand why his creatures were so expensive to make, or why they needed Rambaldi to operate them on-set once they were built. Therefore, in the case of Perseo l'invincibile, Eugenio Bava joined the production as a kind of insurance policy. He oversaw the work that Rambaldi was doing, and when Emo Bistolfi could not reach acceptable financial terms for Rambaldi to operate his creations, Eugenio came to the set to interpret the machinery and explain to other crew people how to bring these creatures to life, as best they could. Eugenio may have also had a hand in creating the sculptures representing specific actors in the cast who fall victim to the Medusa's gaze.

Harrison, who was a personal friend of Rambaldi, recalls the aggravating circumstances under which the film was made: "Rambaldi lived about a block and a half away from me, in Rome, so we became good friends. I used to go over there just to talk with him and watch him work. It's funny; I picked up right away that this man was really good, and I did everything I could to get him into films with me, but nobody wanted to pay to use him. Carlo wasn't cheap! On Perseo, Bistolfi paid Carlo the money to build these things, but he wouldn't pay him to operate them! So while the monsters were built very well, in my opinion, they weren't properly operated. We just had regular crew people manipulating them, and they didn't know what the heck they were doing. So you never got to see all the great movements that were built into the monsters, because [Bistolfi] didn't want to spend the money."

Harrison's story about the difficulties of operating the creatures on-set are supported by the film itself, which showcases Rambaldi's dragon in three very choppy, awkwardly shot scenes that hardly allow it to interact with the stunt men raising their swords against it. At the same time, the footage also reveals the dragon as a remarkable construction—not only fully submersible, but also able to emerge from a lake and project a steady blast of flame from its fully articulated head.

SPANISH poster art for SIGFRIDO.

THIS combination of frame enlargements illustrates the perfect fusion of Bava's glass matte painting (positioned above the actors on horseback and plaster statues in the valley) with the painted landscape extending the territory of the Medusa's valley.

Nevertheless, it is Rambaldi's Medusa that is most impressive. A startling new interpretation of the snake-haired spinster of Greek mythology, Perseo's Medusa is an ambulatory tree, fleshed in bark of cobalt blue, its branches actually slithering, snapping snakes, with a single eye glowing from a knothole like a bloodshot sun. As this evil, repellent thing lunges toward the camera with its insinuating movements, it's easy to understand how the soldiers of Seriphos could have stood transfixed by the sheer surprise of it. Composer Carlo Franci accompanies its every appearance with an unforgettable theme of jittery strings, such a perfect complement to the creature that it seems a sound issuing naturally from its hypnotic orb.

Impressive as it is, Rambaldi's Medusa would have been no more than a mechanical prop without a convincingly desolate environment to reign over, and this is where Mario Bava's talents came into play. Richard Harrison: "I didn't know Mario well at that time, but I remember him painting some mattes for that picture and others that I did. Bava and I used to laugh . . . We were making this movie at Cinecittà at the time Cleopatra was also happening there, and it seemed that every movie in town was stealing from it—stealing props, costumes, or whatever. Also, the Americans didn't know what anything really cost in Italy, so they were being overcharged for everything. I knew one fellow who produced an entire film by overcharging Cleopatra for water. Water!"

For the scenes in the valley of the Medusa, Bava accentuated the natural scenery with a series of glass mattes reconfiguring the entire valley and peopling it with the gorgon's petrified conquests, man and horse alike. We see the first of the matte paintings early in the film as Prince Alceus and his army are shown riding into the valley; the camera shows them in long-shot riding on a dirt road along the edge of a sparsely wooded lake. The road, the lake, and the extras on horseback were real, but Bava capped the scenery with a dramatic desolate-looking mountain range, placed above the action on a large pane of glass.

Bava also painted an impressively stylized cyclorama on glass to serve as a backdrop to the valley of the Medusa. It depicted an ominous-looking cave whose entrance shows a gaping maw of stalactites and stalagmites positioned like hideous, needle-sharp teeth. This matte was impressively extended to encompass an approximately 160° view of the entire valley, furnished with a combination of actual plaster statues and paper cut-outs affixed to glass. "Those Plaster of Paris things were so cheap, they put 'em out there for nothing," Harrison notes.

When Perseus arrives in the valley late in the movie, he is shown walking through a haze (partly suggested by a thin coating of Vaseline applied to the bottom of the camera lens), passing a series of petrified men as he moves toward the central area dominated by the image of the cave. The camera begins to move with him as he passes a large, pointed boulder that nearly reaches to the top of the frame. By watching the scene closely, it is possible to see Harrison step onto a slightly higher platform as he passes this boulder, which actually marks the edge of a long, curving, scenic cyclorama that seamlessly replaces the actual location backgrounds for the rest of the shot. The cyclorama is used in concert with the matte painting of the cave, but now the lower area—the valley of petrified men and horses—is painted on the cyclorama, with the brushstrokes diffused by the haze. It takes Harrison eleven steps to traverse the length of this backdrop, and as it begins to curve, he passes behind a foregrounded boulder—a technique often used by Bava to sell matte paintings with a false aspect of dimension, which here also helps to conceal the curving of the backdrop. As Harrison passes behind the plaster rock, and seems to stare out at a field of petrified bodies that stretch as far as the eye can see, he is actually staring at painted cardboard and sandwiched between two layers of illusion scarcely far enough apart to accommodate his shoulders. While the majority of the stone figures were painted directly onto the board, the filmed evidence shows that director De Martino may have wished for more, as others were painted on paper, clipped, and added to the painted vista on location. (They can be seen flapping slightly in the breeze in the shot where the Medusa's spell is broken.)

Elsewhere in the film, Bava also executed a glass matte that placed the kingdom of Seriphos—a huddle of ancient buildings bookended by two columned structures—on the hillside overlooking a lush, green, rustic valley.

The movie contains other basic illusions which did not involve Bava. For instance, there are a few close shots of Perseus and other characters riding on horseback, in which the horses are visible only in the backgrounds of the shots. "There was no blue screen work, not on that one," Harrison attests. "For that, I remember there was a truck on the backlot, and I climbed onto the back of it." As the truck drove side-by-side with costumed extras on horseback, Harrison was photographed jogging along on the back of the truck. The actor also remembers that the movie was so cheap that other "effects" scenes had to be done for real—for example, the sequence in which Galanore's troops surprise Perseus and his men by attacking them from above with a hail of flaming tumbleweeds and logs. In the uncut European version of the film, one of the flaming logs can be seen falling onto a horse's face, blinding the poor animal.

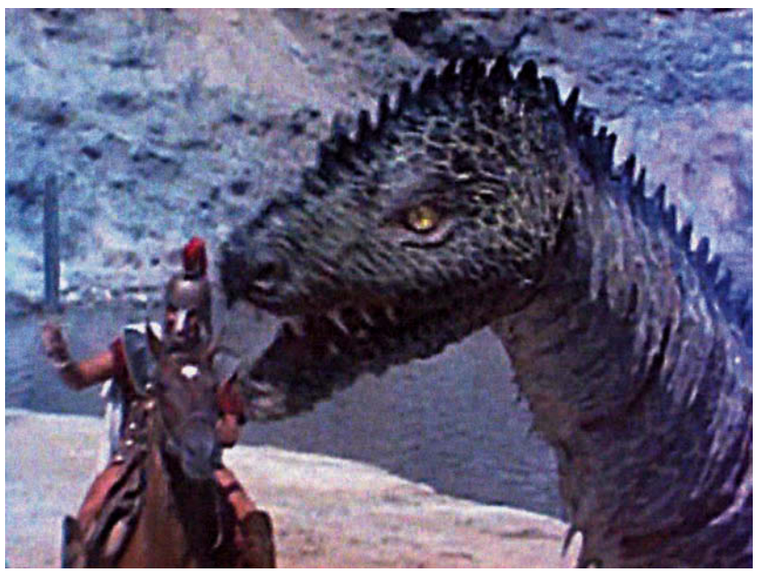
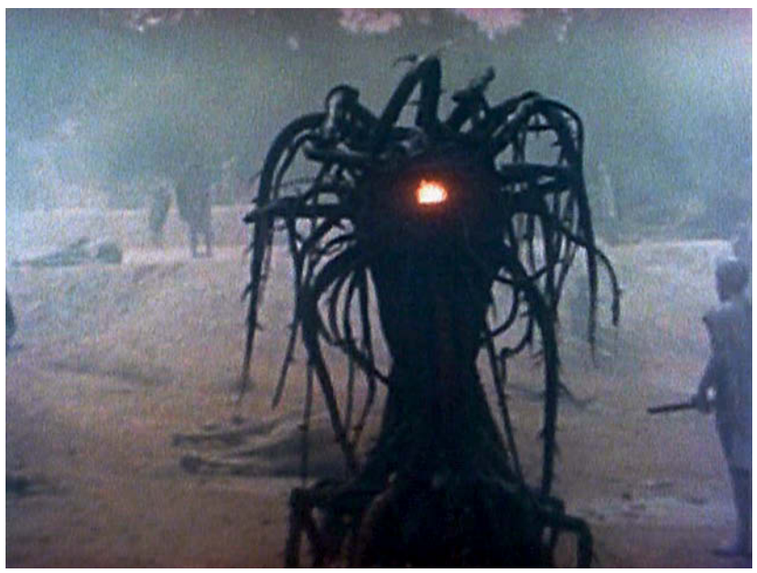
"I can't tell you how crazy that was," Harrison marvels. "None of the stunt men wanted any part of that scene. Bistolfi got really upset, so I rushed in and those flaming logs and bushes were falling right on top of us! It wasn't just the horses; it was all of us!"

Elsewhere in the film, Perseus' pet deer is actually shot in the throat by an arrow; Harrison's anger in the scene seems quite sincere, but he claims to have not been present for the animal's death—though he admits to witnessing a great deal of animal abuse on film sets during the course of his career, "especially in the Far East."



The film's skillful Totalscope cinematography is jointly credited to Dario Di Palma and Eloy Mella, a fact lending further mystery to the production. With the exception of a single set-bound romantic drama (Vittorio Caprioli's Parigi o cara, 1962), Dario Di Palma had only worked as an assistant cameraman up to, and for some time beyond, 1963. Typically, he seconded his more accomplished brother Carlo Di Palma on such films as Sergio Corbucci's Romolo e Remo/ Duel of the Titans (1961) and Michelangelo Antonioni's Il deserto rosso/ Red Desert (1964). Di Palma is not credited at all on Spanish prints, where the photography is attributed to Eloy Mella, a Spanish cameraman with screen credits dating back to the late 1930s, who would not have been involved in the filming in Rome or at Cinecittà.



Richard Harrison has no recollections of Dario Di Palma, but he remembers working with Eloy Mella in Madrid, primarily because Mella had also co-photographed, Il gladiatore invincibile. "I remember Eloy well because he once told me, in his heavy Spanish accent, that I should change my name," he laughs. "I asked him why he thought so, and he said my name: Hrrrrickarrrd Hrrrrgasso! He said I should have an easier name to pronounce, like Hark Hablay. You know who that is, don't you? Clark Gable!"

Harrison was never paid for appearing in Perseo l'invincibile. "I've always been very cooperative with film companies, if I know that money is tight," says Harrison. "There have been times when I've been put up in luxury hotels, and I don't need all that, so sometimes I've volunteered to change hotels, because I'd rather see the money on the screen. If a producer is genuinely broke and can't meet my salary, I can understand that, and I'm willing to work something out. But with Bistolfi, I resented it because he always had a classy-looking lady on his arm and he always ate in the finest restaurants, and he really made me chase my money down and made me feel desperate. He died shortly after that film was completed, incidentally, of cancer."

Various past and future cohorts of Bava also worked on the picture. Screenwriter Mario Guerra had been a chief contributor to Steno's Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (1955), the production was designed by Franco Lolli (Ercole al centro della terra), it was edited by Otello Colangeli (La morte viene dallo spazio), and the assistant cameraman was Alberto Spagnoli, who would later serve as the director of photography on Bava's final feature, Schock/Beyond the Door II (1977).

CARLO RAMBALDI*'s monsters for PERSEO L'INVINCIBLE: two shots of his submersible fire-breathing dragon, and one of his remarkable Medusa.*

PERSEUS fights the Medusa, whose death releases its gorgonized victims from stony slumber.

Perseo l'invincibile was given a theatrical release in most world countries, but not in America, where it has yet to be screened anywhere, even on video, at its full length or in its correct 2.35:1 screen ratio. Instead, it was released directly to television in the mid-1960s as part of Embassy Pictures' Sons of Hercules TV package, a series which misrepresented a whole assortment of unrelated pepla as the adventures of Hercules' various offspring. The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules (prepared by the dubbing director–writer team of Richard McNamara and John Hart) was shown in two-hour commercial timeslots, and it was also sold to some outlets in an hour-long format that presented the film in primo/secondo tempi. (In Italy, all films of this period were broken into two parts—Primo Tempo and Secondo Tempo—and shown with an intermission, during which candy and cigarettes were sold. The film was cut slightly from its original 95-minute length, because the main and end titles (which depict Benvenuto Cellini's famous bronze sculpture of Perseus and the Medusa) were extended to accommodate the Embassy series' theme song, and furthermore, the first two minutes were devoted to a narrative lead-in that was more or less a part of every Sons of Hercules picture. As shots from the movie are presented in a baiting montage, the narrator (Bernard Grant) intones:

> "Through the centuries, in olden times, there lived the Sons of Hercules—heroes supreme! They roamed the Earth, righting wrongs, helping the weak and oppressed, and seeking adventure. They were the mightiest of mortal men. One of them was . . . Perseus! It is of his deeds we tell now, of his struggle against . . . the Medusa!"

This, of course, is an utterly garbled précis of the original Greek myth. Perseus was not the son of Hercules; he was his half-brother. Like Hercules, he was sired by the immortal Zeus with a mortal mother, Danae, the daughter of King Acrisius. After being foretold that Perseus would someday kill him, Acrisius set mother and son adrift, and the two of them were saved by the king of Seriphos. The myth offers many opportunities for special effects of which De Martino's film doesn't avail itself: Perseus ultimately conquered the Medusa—beheading her, not by gouging out her eye—with the help of Hermes and Athena, who provided him with winged sandals and a cloak of invisibility; he also first encountered Andromeda while rescuing her from a rock to which she had been chained as fodder for a dreaded sea monster. Many of these aspects would later be covered in Ray Harryhausen's version of the story, Clash of the Titans (1981).

In the case of Perseo l'invincibile, the filmmakers took intelligent license with the myth, and were wise in omitting these additional flights of fancy, which could have depleted its confrontations of man against monster of all dramatic tension. The film's success is due in no small way to the characterization of Perseus as a common but resourceful man; it's better that he faces these monsters armed with nothing more than his own sweat and strength, rather than overwhelm these aberrations of nature with his own aberrant arsenal of magic. While not a front-rank example of the peplum cycle, Perseo l'invincible represents the very best of the second-rank efforts in the genre. Though he received no credit for his contribution, it is a worthy footnote in Mario Bava's ongoing career.

FRENCH affiche, art by Boris Grinsson. A magnificent example, highlighting the beauty of (left to right) Jacqueline Pierreux, Michèle Mercier and Susy Andersen.

RÉALISATEUR MARIO BAVA

I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA

Black Sabbath

IN 1962, EUROPE began to invade American theaters with anthology films. It was the year of the De Sica/Visconti/Fellini omnibus Boccaccio '70 and also Love at Twenty, which collected short variations on a common theme by François Truffaut, Max Ophuls, Andrzej Vajda, and other international filmmakers. Meanwhile in America, television was becoming a haven for short form entertainment, particularly in the field of horror and suspense, represented weekly by such programs as Alcoa Presents (later renamed One Step Beyond), Alfred Hitchcock Presents/The Alfred Hitchcock Hour, The Twilight Zone, and Thriller. Given these circumstances, it was inevitable that someone would pick up the ball dropped by Dead of Night in 1946 and produce a new horror film in the episodic format.

This finally happened when Roger Corman made Tales of Terror (1962)—an omnibus of three Edgar Allan Poe stories scripted by Richard Matheson—for American International Pictures. That same year, AIP's Samuel Z. Arkoff and James H. Nicholson signed horror legend Boris Karloff to a multi-picture deal beginning with Corman's horror comedy The Raven (1963). Karloff had just completed a two-year stint hosting (and occasionally starring in episodes of) NBC's Thriller, as well as a short-lived British anthology series, Out of This World. Having Karloff under contract was an enormous incentive for AIP to follow Tales of Terror with a second shock triptych, in which the venerable actor could star as well as host. As with La ragazza che sapeva troppo, AIP combined forces with Galatea and Emmepi Film of Rome, as well as Societé Cinématographique Lyre of Paris, to produce this horror omnibus with Mario Bava at the helm. The idea was to take advantage of the European basis of production to assemble a cast that would satisfy not only horror fans, but followers of the European nouvelle vague, as well.

THIS uninspired Italian poster art is one of the few publicity designs from any country to feature the likeness of star Boris Karloff.

Bava was an excellent choice to direct this project because he had always been a voracious reader; furthermore, since becoming a director, he had become increasingly interested in horror and mystery fiction. He was always looking for new stories, new ideas, and new images to spark his imagination. "Read, read, read," says his son Lamberto Bava, when asked how his father spent his time between movies. He subscribed to various Italian giallo (mystery) and science fiction story digests, but in preparing for this new assignment, Bava's grounding in the classics proved most helpful. In selecting stories for the film, Bava was encouraged by AIP to stay away from Poe, as a courtesy to Roger Corman. They urged him to seek out works by other overlooked, classic practitioners of the macabre. "Classic" because neither AIP nor his Italian/French producers were interested in acquiring the rights to stories protected by copyright.

Bava's next film had its genesis in a concept that he shared with screenwriter Alberto Bevilacqua (b. 1934), whose only previous credit was Anton Giulio Majano's well-photographed Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960), a film often misidentified as a film produced by Bava. [1]

As Bevilacqua recalls, "Mario told me, 'I have a project I want to make: to follow a chain of terror, by first setting it in a contemporary metropolis, and then tracing it back to an ethnic, historical setting, telling three different stories [in three different times] about the different ways terror can strike mankind. So bring me some stories, inspired by books.'"

The terror anthology got underway as La paura ("The Fear"), a title shared by two stories that Bava found particularly inspirational; one written by Guy de Maupassant (1850–93), the other by Anton Chekov (1860–1904). Neither story lent itself to narrative padding, but elements of the Maupassant story—no more than a sketch, really—were absorbed into the film's eventual centerpiece "I wurdalak" ("The Wurdalak"), while refractions of Chekov's tale can be seen in "La goccia d'acqua" ("The Drop of Water"), whose subject may have originated in Bevilacqua's own name. Both writers received screen credit, as the authors of tales "liberally adapted."

Any attempt to trace the stories of I tre volti della paura to their true literary origins inevitably leads one into a Bavian labyrinth of smoke and mirrors. "I wurdalak"—which Boris Karloff mistakenly attributes (in the AIP version, Black Sabbath) to the nonexistent author "Ivan Tolstoy"—is in fact an adaptation of "La Famille du Wurdalak" ("The Family of the Wurdalak"), a story written in French by the Russian Count Alexei Constantinovich Tolstoi (1817–75). [2] "La goccia d'acqua" was, according to Bava's own later confession, "my own concoction, written with a lot of Dostoevsky and a

I tre volti della paura

"The Three Faces of Fear"
Working title: La paura, "The Fear"
Filmed at Titanus Studios (Cinecittà) and on location in Cianciano and Canale Monterano
February 4 – March 30 1963
First released: August 17, 1963
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 99 minutes

Production: Galatea, Emmepi (Rome), Societé Cinématographique Lyre (Paris). Director: Mario Bava. Screenplay: Marcello Fondato, Alberto Bevilacqua, Ugo Guerra, and Mario Bava, based on stories by Anton Chekhov, Alexei Tolstoi and Guy de Maupassant. Director of photography: Ubaldo Terzano. Camera operator: Mario Mancini. Camera assistant: Enrico Fontana. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini. Set decoration: Francesco Bronzi. Wardrobe: Tina Grani. Makeup: Otello Fava. Hairdresser: Renata Magnanti. Production manager: Paolo Mercuri. Production associate: Armando Govoni. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Assistant editor: Lina Caterini. Music: Roberto Nicolosi. Sound: Fausto Ancillai, Nino Renda. Distributor: Warner Bros.

Additional US credits: Music: Les Baxter. Production assistant: Salvatore Billitteri.

Boris Karloff (host). Il telefono ("The Telephone"): Michèle Mercier (Rosy), Lidia Alfonsi (Mary), Milo Quesada (Franco/Frank). I wurdalak ("The Wurdalak"): Boris Karloff (Gorka), Mark Damon (Vladimir), Susy Andersen [Maria Antonietta Golgi] (Sdenka), Glauco Onorato (Giorgio), Rika Dialina (Giorgio's wife), Massimo Righi (Pietro). La goccia d'acqua ("The Drop of Water"): Jacqueline Pierreux (Miss Chester), Milly Monti (housekeeper), Harriet White Medin (Miss Perkins, the concierge), Gustavo De Nardo (inspector).

Argentina: Sábado Negro
Austria: Der Ring der Verdammten, "The Ring of the Damned"
Belgium: De Driehoek van de Angst, Rank Organization, Eastmancolor
Denmark: Tre Raedselsnaetter, "Three Nights of Horror," Kawall-Film, 6/9/69
France: Les Trois Visages de la Peur, Rank Organization, 1965, 92m
Germany: Die Drei Gesichter der Furcht, Pallas Film, 8/21/64; Drei Mysterien der Furcht, "Three Mysteries of Fear," Atlas (16 mm), 90m
Spain: Las Tres Caras del Miedo, Distribuciones Cinematograficas Rosa Films S.A.
UK: Black Sabbath, Anglo-Amalgamated via Warner Pathé Ltd., 12/6/64, 95m 29s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts pinch of de Maupassant."[3] His confession was apparently not a full disclosure, as Italian critic Antonio Bruschini—heroically—was later able to trace the story's origin to Dalle tre alle tre e mezza ("Between 3:00 and 3:30"), a story attributed to P. Kettridge, that was published in the 1960 Einaudi anthology, Storie di fantasmi ("Ghost Stories"). In his filmography for Troy Howarth's book The Haunted World of Mario Bava, Julian Grainger has identified Kettridge as a pseudonym for Italian writer Franco Lucentini (b. 1920), and offered "Ghosts Don't Kill" as an English title for the story, but without revealing its whereabouts in print.
US: Black Sabbath, American International Pictures, "Color by Pathé Color," 5/6/64, 95m 26s

The most difficult story to pin down is "Il telefono" ("The Telephone"). It is credited to Guy de Maupassant in the AIP credits while foreign press materials name F. G. (or Howard) Snyder as the source author, though no publication data for such a story has ever been determined. It is widely assumed that the Snyder story, if it exists, originated in the pages of a Mondadori ITALIAN locandina shows Frank closing in on Rosy, whose headboard may look familiar to eagle-eyed Bava fans.

1 American prints of Atom Age Vampire open with an animated title card of a bat, flapping halfway across the screen, at which point it becomes the "V" in "Mario Fava Presents." No one of this name appears in the Italian credits.

2 In 1971, "The Wurdalak" was refilmed by Giorgio Ferroni as La notte dei diavoli/Night of the Devils, a modern-day interpretation that is truer to Tolstoy's tale than Bava's version, at least in terms of structure. Like the story, La notte dei diavoli is told in flashback, with a lumber merchant (Gianni Garko) reliving in memory his encounter with Gorka's family while being treated with electroshock therapy in a mental hospital. This crudely filmed adaptation is hardly recognizable as the work of the man who made the elegant Il mulino delle donne di pietra/Mill of the Stone Women (1960); it suffers from an unnecessarily static first half, but manages to present a handful of memorably visceral images before reaching its bitter climax, as when Gorka's wurdalak granddaughter embraces her mother only to tear out her throat and savage her bared breasts with tiny talons. The film is presently available only on Spanish-language cassettes, under the title La Noche de los Diablos, a censored version dating from its Franco-era release. Holland's Video for Pleasure label offers an English-language version of the film with Dutch subtitles, which is uncut. The Japanese video release (label unknown) is also in English and complete, save for the optical censorship of full frontal nudity. Tolstoy's story was also twice made into films by Lenfilm Studios of Russia: Pyushchiye Krov ("Blood-Suckers," 1972), directed by Yevgeniy Tatarsky, and Papà, Umer Ded Moroz ("Daddy, Santa Claus Is Dead," 1973), directed by Yevgeniy Yufit and Vladimir Maslov.

3 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

MARIO BAVA directs Michèle Mercier in "Il telefono."

giallo magazine—whose Italian contributors sometimes lurked behind English pseudonyms. (The story's theme of intimidation by telephone has been a hallmark of the mystery genre since Lucille Fletcher's 1940s radio drama Sorry Wrong Number was filmed in 1948, starring Barbara Stanwyck.) Whatever the truth may be, the F. G. Snyder name does not appear on Italian prints of I tre volti della paura, so its origin is a moot point. As screenwriter Bevilacqua has admitted, "As for 'Il telefono,' based on Maupassant and 'La goccia d'acqua,' based on Chekov, they were basically invented; those two names were just to protect ourselves . . . while Tolstoy's short story, 'I Wurdalak,' had a seed that was really literary."

Bevilacqua's recollections of working on the screenplay with Bava are happily vivid: "I thought of Mario as a kind person, but he could also be strong-willed. He would tell me: 'Listen, you must write the screenplay the way I want it.' He wanted to shoot in Chianciano during the fall, when it becomes a totally spooky place. We worked mostly at night, because in I tre volti della paura it was the night, the dark, that had to stick out. We had our script meetings in his den, which was dominated by his dog, a very long basset hound that laid at our feet and kept staring at us. I must say that, more than the things we were creating, it was this dog that scared us—or me at least!

"Our starting point—before we began to write—was always some questions from Mario. For example: 'What is the scariest thing for the viewer to watch?' He had an answer for this: 'An intravenous injection.' If, in particular, the camera shows an injection in close-up, everybody will lower their gaze, and so on. He had this list of top scares that he was constantly updating: 'Now this is scarier than the other thing.'"

After Bevilacqua had completed the initial draft of the screenplay, other writers were brought in to develop the property further. One of these was Marcello Fondato (b. 1924), whose only previous genre credit was Steno's horror spoof Tempi duri per i vampiri/ Uncle Was a Vampire (1959), starring Renato Rascel, Sylva Koscina, and Christopher Lee. His other previous credits included several films for director Luigi Comencini, including Mogli pericolose (1958) and Le sorprese dell'amore (1959)—both of which also starred Sylva Koscina—and the international co-production Tutti a casa/ Everybody Go Home (1960). His most recent credit at the time was Totò Diabolicus (1962), which must have intrigued Bava, as it was a parody of Angela and Luciana Giussani's popular fumetto nero (noir comic book) Diabolik, which had published its first issue early that year. In the film, Totò played no less than six different characters, many of whom were killed off by the super criminal Diabolicus. (Five years hence, Bava would later direct the first official adaptation of the Giussani sisters' creation: 1968's Diabolik.) Fondato and Bava worked so well together that they would continue their collaboration on Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace in 1964.

However, as Bevilacqua explains, his duties were not yet over: "No doubt the script was very detailed, with all the progressions of the story very clear. Then, once [Bava] was on the set, he called us—me and the other screenwriters who were with him then—and we did rewrites on the set. We rewrote the film during production . . . very often throwing away some takes and very effective sequences. I can remember, for example, a sequence that we created in the studio, of two young lovers making love in bed; but the eye of the viewer, while all this was happening—and this was the power of Bava!—the viewer's attention was subliminally drawn to a shape on a chest of drawers. When their lovemaking was at its height, this shape came to life . . . it was a sewer rat, a very long rat that jumped onto the edge of the bed and then, suddenly, onto the man's back! The woman looked in the red eyes of the big rat and the man was thunderstruck. I think this was one of the most incredible sequences I ever saw Bava shoot, but it was never shown in its entirety."

A useful index to the film's production is the Italian theatrical trailer for I tre volti della paura, which, like many trailers, was compiled from alternate footage and unused material to spare the production the expense of reprinting and the trouble of recutting the "good" takes. In the trailer, all of the footage is different to what is seen in the finished film, except for the scenes from "Il telefono," featuring Michèle Mercier and Lidia Alfonsi. This subtle detail confirms that "Il telefono" was the first story to be shot and handed over to Mario Serandrei's editing table. It was followed in production by "La goccia d'acqua," and then by the arrival of Boris Karloff and Mark Damon for the filming of "I wurdalak" and Karloff's various "introductions" in his role as host.

Because American International again took an active role in the film's production, as they did with La ragazza che sapeva troppo/Evil Eye, no English-language version of Bava's original director's cut—no The Three Faces of Fear, so to speak—exists. However, as with the earlier movie, an entirely different AIP-sanctioned version exists: Black Sabbath, a re-edited, rescored and extensively reworked variant that was concocted for release in America and other English-speaking markets, such as the United Kingdom and Australia. Though this version is much loved by those who were chilled by it in childhood, it is—like Hercules in the Haunted World—a distortion of Mario Bava's original intentions, of value only for preserving Boris Karloff's vocal performance.

Il telefono

Rosy is an attractive social climber whose late-night homecoming is terrorized by phone calls from an anonymous source capable of spying on her every move. When a newspaper clipping detailing the escape of Frank Rainer, a lover whom she helped send to prison, is slipped under her door, Rosy phones Mary—an estranged lesbian friend—and pleads with her to come over and spend the night, to lend her support and protection. Unknown to Rosy, Mary has been placing the calls in a disguised voice in order to gain just such an invitation. As Mary writes an apologetic note to her sleeping lover, Frank breaks into Rosy's apartment and strangles her, holding her responsible for the alienation of Rosy's affections. Seeing Rosy in bed, Frank then lunges for her—only to be stabbed by a knife that Mary placed under Rosy's pillow for her protection.

MICHÈLE MERCIER as Rosy, a high society call girl troubled by the persistent ringing of "The Telephone."

"Il telefono" opens the Italian version of the film, but was repositioned as the second story when AIP prepared their alternate version. By placing it first, Bava may have been echoing (or parodying) an earlier Italian anthology film directed by his former colleague Roberto Rossellini. L'amore (1948) opened with "La voce humana," an adaptation of Jean Cocteau's dramatic monologue, starring Anna Magnani as a woman conversing with her lover on the telephone. Of Bava's three stories, "Il telefono" suffers the most in its American reinvention. English-speaking audiences commonly regard this episode as a terrible disappointment, but they base this opinion on a story that bears little resemblance to the one told in the Italian version.

As Bava filmed it, "Il telefono" serves as an intermediary evolutionary step between Bava's black-and-white thriller La ragazza che sapeva troppo and the brilliantly colorful, full-blown giallo, Sei donne per l'assassino. Technically, "Il telefono" is the first color giallo, very much in the spirit of a short story from a Mondadori giallo pulp, glacéed with a fabulously stylish mise-en-scène. Its visual style is actually a reversion from Bava's then-current expressionistic color style to the method he introduced in his first color film, Steno's Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova, in which he lit the sets and actors as if he were shooting in black-and-white—with lots of moody shadows and scrim-work, and far fewer color gel effects, limiting himself to an appropriately rose-colored gel (to bring out the best in Michèle Mercier's skin tones) and an occasional amber spotlight. Bava also appears to have begun experimenting here with keylight diffusion and cross-lighting, which gave the episode a sexier, velvety look that enhanced its ambiance of sin and criminality, à la the cover art of giallo paperpacks. Because so much of the episode is set in a single room, the intricate cross-lighting had a practical value other than lending more sculptural lighting accents to the actors; it allowed Bava to light the set in a manner that would require few, if any, adjustments when shooting the action from different angles.

The amount of attention lavished on the look of the piece is appropriate given the fact that it posits the audience at the same vantage as that of the unseen voyeur who is harassing Rosy (Mercier), who has been driven mad by her beauty. The concept of a mind driven mad by feminine beauty was evidently a personal one for Bava and/or Fondato; they would summon this same modus operandi once again in Sei donne per l'assassino, when Inspector Silvestri (Thomas Reiner) supposes, "Perhaps the sight of beauty makes [the killer] lose control of himself and kill?" The entire aspect of this episode, and the restricted viewpoint of the camera—we can see only the main rooms of Rosy's studio apartment (our eyes cannot follow her into her bathroom, for example)—imply that we are viewing the action through her tormentor's own covetous eyes, which would occupy a specific vantage point. This is perhaps the most important mutation of giallo technique proposed by the episode; whereas La ragazza che sapeva troppo was necessarily told from the standpoint of Nora, all the details filtered through her fantasies and phobias, "Il telefono" extends the examples of John Brahm's The Undying Monster (1942) and The Lodger (1944), as well as Robert Siodmak's proto-giallo classic The Spiral Staircase (1946) by viewing the action from the standpoint of the threat. Hereafter, the use of subjective camera would become an essential ingredient of all gialli.

The prowling camerawork has all the character of a roaming, excited eye, thirstily drinking in every detail of Rosy's apartment and her curvaceous figure; its level of interest makes what is actually a fairly limited set more interesting. The eye is also kept active and alert by the sheer variety of Giorgio Giovannini's set decorations, which are attractive and fanciful and not far removed from those of Laura Craven Torrani's apartment in La ragazza che sapeva troppo; the two sets actually share some of the same furnishings, notably the clover-patterned partitions that the earlier film seemingly imported from the set of Roger Corman's Pit and the Pendulum. (AIP was known to fly props and set decorations abroad when filming overseas.) The ornate, rococo headboard of Rosy's bed dates back to I vampiri (it's the same headboard of the Duchess du Grand's bed, where Wandisa Guida is seen recovering in the film's penultimate shot) and Le meraviglie di Aladino, and it would resurface again, years later, in Bava's Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon (1970) and Lisa and the Devil (1973). Another enticing detail are a number of carved angels scattered around the apartment, which carry a constant subtextual reminder of the tenuous partition separating life and afterlife, while also providing a visual reminder that Rosy's actions are under constant observation from without. In Sei donne per l'assassino, similar (perhaps identical and repainted) prop statues of angels and cherubs would be used to provide ironic counterpoints to the aftermath of murder.

But once the telephone starts ringing, the wide range of visual interests constricts to that single appliance—a red telephone with a black receiver—and this sudden constriction, in itself, generates fear. Rosy herself also adds to the atmosphere when, convinced by his words that the caller has the ability to peer into her apartment, she moves a living room lamp onto the floor to make it more difficult for spying eyes to see her—which also has the desired cinematographic effect of throwing the apartment's shadows off-kilter and creating a spookier environment. Because the lateral movements of the camera are necessarily restricted, Bava and Ubaldo Terzano occasionally interject surprise by changing the height of the camera as one shot cuts to another. For example, after the first call is depicted from a low-angle vantage, the shock of the second ringing is accentuated by the camera's unexpected leap to a higher vantage. We therefore anticipate the next call almost as nervously as Rosy, knowing that another call will come, but not from which direction.

A SHOT that should please Rosy's watchful admirer.

All three episodes of I tre volti della paura make marvelous use of ambient sound—the original Italian cut, that is, for which the soundtrack was supervised by Fausto Ancillai and Nino Renda. "Il telefono" and "La goccia d'acqua" are particularly strong in using natural sounds to evoke menace. Ancillai and Renda understood the value of silence in generating suspense and terror, and working in concert with Roberto Nicolosi's spare but effective "crime jazz" score, "Il telefono" becomes a textbook example of how to unsettle an audience with sound manipulation. Earlier suspense films centered around the telephone, such as Sorry Wrong Number and Midnight Lace (1960), relied more on the respective performances of Barbara Stanwyck and Doris Day than on manipulated sound, but Bava's innovation went unrecognized; instead, William Friedkin received acclaim for shocking audiences with a calculatedly loud telephone ring in The Exorcist (1973), and another decade further on, Sergio Leone generated even more critical discussion for opening his C'era una volta . . . America/Once Upon a Time in America (1984) with the insistent ringing of an unanswered telephone, which is exactly the way "Il telefono" opens.

The episode also uses sound to indulge Bava's predilection for backstory, by having the telephone ring before the story properly begins—just before Rosy returns to her apartment after an evening on the town. Depending on which version you see, Rosy is depicted as either a social climber (English), the mistress of a wealthy executive (French), or—pun presumably intended—as a high-class call girl (Italian); each of these interpretations lends its own interesting shade of meaning on Michèle Mercier's facial expression in her first close-up. The fact that the phone is heard ringing before she returns establishes that her caller's harassing calls are based more on guesswork than on any real ability to peer into her world. Mary's subsequent "all-seeing" comments about Rosy's behavior are based solely on how well she—in her own thwarted romantic obsession—knows and can predict her nightly routines and reactions where Frank is concerned.

Apart from its sly emphases on sound and subjective camera, "Il telefono" relies on backstory to such an extraordinary degree that it is less a story in its own right than the postscript of a story delineated solely through allusion. This method of storytelling adds to the uneasiness of the narrative, which has the feel of being governed by things in the past—that is, by invisible forces.

Both actresses in "Il telefono" had worked with Mario Bava before: Michèle Mercier as Princess Zaina in Le meraviglie di Aladino (1961), and Lidia Alfonsi in Vita da cani (1950) and as the crimson-cloaked Sibyl in Le fatiche di Ercole (1958).

After Le meraviglie di Aladino, Mercier co-starred in Domenico Paolella's Il giustiziere dei mari/Avenger of the Seven Seas (1960) opposite American actor Richard Harrison, who describes her even today as "the most beautiful woman I've ever seen." At the time of filming "Il telefono," Mercier was married to André Smagghe, an assistant and second unit director on such films as Richard Fleischer's The Vikings (1958), Billy Wilder's One Two Three (1961), and David Lean's Lawrence of Arabia (1962). Her subsequent brushes with Italian horror include the Spaghetti Western Cimitero sensa croci/Cemetery Without Crosses (1968, co-scripted by Dario Argento) and Antonio Margheriti's Nella stretta morsa del ragno/Web of the Spider (a 1970 remake of his 1964 Danza Macabra/Castle of Blood, with Mercier playing the Barbara Steele role). Despite a talent nearly equal to her beauty, Mercier's screen career was ultimately a disappointment, and she voluntarily withdrew from the screen, supposedly to escape being typecast as a result of her Angélique films of the late 1960s. She and Smagghe eventually divorced, and she remarried to the American film director Arthur Hiller, from whom she is now also divorced. Today, Mercier resides in France. Her recently published memoirs—Je ne suis pas Angélique (Paris: Denoel, 2002)—contain no reminiscences of her work in I tre volti della paura.

Lidia Alfonsi's role as the Sybil in Le fatiche di Ercole stereotyped her to a degree. After that performance, she was cast in Gli amori di Ercole/The Loves of Hercules/Hercules and the Hydra (1960, with Mickey Hargitay and Jayne Mansfield), and two Steve Reeves films from 1961, Morgan il pirata and La guerra di Troia/The Trojan Horse, a Giorgio Ferroni film in which she gave a superb performance as the mad prophetess Cassandra. After I tre volti della paura, Alfonsi began to work more and more on stage and television, though she made a return to the big screen in Roberto Benigni's international success, La vita è bella/Life Is Beautiful (1997).

Milo Quesada, who plays Frank in one brief scene, was born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, on April 16, 1930. Active in films since 1958, he appeared in a number of films released by AIP over the years, beginning with an unbilled appearance as the lover of the woman assassinated by her jealous husband in the alternate ending of Bava's Evil Eye (the US recut of La ragazza che sapeva troppo) and continuing with bits in Roger Corman's The Young Racers (1963) and Jeremy Summers' House of 1000 Dolls (1967) and a larger part in Jess Franco's El processo de los Brujas/Night of the Blood Monster (1969). One of his more visible roles was as Rudi, Ursula Andress' handsome escort in La decima vittima/The 10th Victim (1965), and several years further on, he would be featured in another film starring Boris Karloff, the Spanish-made La Colleccionista de Cadáveres/Cauldron of Blood (1970).

Although the film credits its studio locations as Titanus Studios, I tre volti della paura was in fact filmed at Cinecittà. Present on the set throughout the production, as a representative of American International, was Salvatore Billitteri, a former editor and dubbing director at the New York-based Titra Sound Corporation. Billitteri had been in charge of cutting all of the company's overseas acquisitions since Black Sunday, and had stepped up to the nominal role of producer with Prisoner of the Iron Mask and Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World.

"We used to bring Sal every Italian picture we wanted to release theatrically," recalled Sam Arkoff. "Sal would cut 'em down to our specifications and redub them—because the Italians' English dub was done without much care, to make easy sales to Hong Kong and Africa and other action-seeking countries. Later, when we started coproducing in Italy, Sal would often go over while a picture was going on."

Credited as "production assistant," Billitteri's job was to observe the filming from an editorial viewpoint, to be alert to potential problems, and to suggest mutually acceptable ways of dealing with them. He helped Bava to keep the story within the guidelines of AIP's specific tastes and needs—not in an interfering way, but pointing out whenever an alternate take or approach to a scene or shot might be required. Bava resented the interference, but was professional enough not to let his feelings show.

THIS TINTED British front-of-house card shows an anonymous caller encouraging Rosy to wear less.

One of the major problems that AIP needed to nip in the bud, at least as far as their version was concerned, was the lesbian subtext of this episode. "Il telefono" never makes clear whether Rosy and Mary are former lovers, or former friends estranged by Mary's expression of desire for Rosy, but Mary's sexual profile is unmistakable—and that alone was forbidden subject matter in an AIP entertainment. Billitteri devised an approach that allowed Bava to shoot the episode as he wanted, and by shooting only a modicum of additional footage, would also provide AIP with the material they needed to neatly sidestep the issue. In Billitteri's revision, Frank Rainer is not a criminal sent to prison by Rosy's testimony, but the vengeful ghost of a dead lover. To AIP's way of thinking (which was not necessarily misguided), "The Telephone" also wasn't "spooky" enough; by adding a ghost, it became a more suitable companion for the film's other two stories, which were supernatural in nature. Since the only references to lesbianism were verbal, they could be erased by rewriting the dialogue of the telephone conversations between the two actresses. Remarkably, the rewritten/redubbed dialogue doesn't seem to affect Alfonsi's performance in the least; she was playing a sly, predatory lesbian, but in this altered context, the tenor of her acting seems to deliberately project the airs of mystery and suspicion commonly found in "red herring" performances.

The following is a side-by-side comparison of the French and English dialogue scenes from this episode, revealing the full extent to which Billitteri revised the story for domestic audiences. I have chosen the French track over the Italian one, to represent the original source, because it more accurately reflects the dialogue as it was spoken on-set between Mercier and Alfonsi, whose performances alternated between English and French.

The Telephone [4]

FIRST PHONE CONVERSATION

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR		BLACK SABBATH
ROSY:	Hello? Hello?	Hello? Hello?
VOICE:	How pretty you are, Rosy. A little too pretty, perhaps . . .	Hello, Rosy. How are you?
ROSY:	Who's calling? Who are you?	Who is this speaking?
VOICE:	You'll find out who I am, a few seconds before dying. I can see the shape of your body. The tension of your arms. The line of your perfect legs. Don't cover them! A build like yours. Enough to drive someone crazy! I'm going to kill you.	Don't you know? Think, Rosy. How nice you look with that towel around you. You always did have a beautiful body. Beautiful! A body to drive someone crazy. No! Don't cover yourself. I like seeing you this way. Are you listening, Rosy?
ROSY:	But who are you? Who? Hello?	But who are you? Who? Hello? Hello?

After the first phone call, CAMERA PANS DOWN to the red telephone.

CUT to a LONG SHOT of Rosy by her bed, smoking a cigarette.

The following shots do not appear in the European version:

- LONG SHOT of Rosy putting on her white robe. She walks around the apartment. Lights cigarette from box on table. Goes to sofa, looks at window. Turns on lamp. Paces.
- CUT to ZOOM-IN to CLOSE SHOT of telephone.
- CUT to Rosy walking back over to the bed.

SECOND PHONE CONVERSATION

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR		BLACK SABBATH
ROSY:	Hello?	Hello?
VOICE:	Why did you put on your dressing gown? I told you to stay as you were. I really like you better when you're almost nude. That's how I want to see you when I return. Soon I'll be knocking on your door.	Why did you put on that dressing gown, Rosy? I told you to stay just as you were. I like you better when you have nothing on.
ROSY:	But who are you? What do you want of me?	Who are you? What do you want of me?
VOICE:	I told you. I want to kill you. I want to make you suffer. That's how I'm going to make you die. Understand, Rosy?	Everything. Everything that you have. But for now I just want you to take off that dressing gown. I want to watch you. Embrace you with my eyes. See you.

THIRD & FOURTH PHONE CONVERSATIONS

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR		BLACK SABBATH
VOICE:	Rosy . . . Rosy . . . Rosy! You know I'm right beside you. I saw you. You hid your money and jewelry. You're so stupid. I'm not after your money! You really don't understand anything. It's not your money I want, it's you. I want your magnificent body. And I'll get it. No, not to caress it, but to feel your throat in my hands and strangle you. I'm going to kill you, Rosy . . .	Rosy . . . Rosy . . . Rosy! Why did you hide your money and jewelry? How stupid of you! You always did think money was the answer. It can't help you. Nothing can help you. Because I want you. I want that beautiful body of yours. And I'll get it. I want us to be joined together . . . and we will be. Soon.
ROSY:	But who are you? Who are you, answer! I beg you, answer! Hello, answer! But what have I done to you? What have I done to you? Ah, if this is some stupid joke . . . !	But who are you? Who are you, tell me! I can't stand it any more, I can't stand it! What have I done to you? What have I done? You're driving me mad! Please, tell me!
A letter tumbles through the mail slot. Rosy climbs stairs. Picks up letter.		Rosy climbs stairs. Sees letter on floor. She picks it up, then opens door to check the hall. Entire following sequence of neighbor walking dog and talking to Rosy is not in European prints.
Rosy opens the envelope. Inside, she finds a newspaper clipping with a photograph of a man under the headline "FRANK RAINER HAS ESCAPED!"		Rosy opens the envelope. A blank sheet of paper is enclosed, upon which a note writes itself (in animation) before her very eyes, as if in reappearing ink: "There's no way of avoiding it, Rosy . . . it won't be long now! Frank." [5]

The telephone rings.

ROSY:	Hello?	Hello?
VOICE:	Hello, Rosy. You're beginning to understand. Tell me the truth. You didn't expect this. I swore I'd find you. And now I'm near you at last. Very near, Rosy. And there's nothing you can do to me. Even if you call the police, I'll be there before they arrive. Remember, I'm very near.	You're beginning to understand now, aren't you, Rosy? You didn't expect me, did you? I had to come and find you. I'm near you at last. Very near. There's nothing you can do, Rosy. Nothing in this world. You can't call the police. They won't be able to help you. Because I'm much closer to you than the police. Remember that! Much closer!
ROSY:	Frank, listen! Listen to me, Frank!	Frank is dead! This can't be Frank!

ROSIE CALLS MARY

	THE THREE FACES OF FEAR	BLACK SABBATH
MARY:	Hello?	Hello?
ROSY:	Mary! It's me, Rosy!	Mary! This is Rosy!
MARY:	Oh! Good evening. I wasn't expecting you to call. You told me you never wanted to speak to me again.	Oh? What happened? Whatever made you call me, of all people?
ROSY:	Oh, I beg you! Forget that! Frank has escaped!	Mary, it's important. Frank just called me!
MARY:	Yes, I saw it in the papers. But that's none of my concern. You're quite free to go back to him.	What are you talking about? You worry me. You know as well as I do he's dead.
ROSY:	But you don't understand. I'm afraid. Because he wants revenge. I'm certain of it. Come and keep me company, I beg you!	No! He's alive! [MARY: Take it easy.] Oh, Mary! Mary! I'm afraid. He wants to get even. I know he does. Come over here. Right away! Please. You can't imagine the things he said when he spoke to me.
MARY:	You want . . . [SIGNIFICANT PAUSE] me to come over? Did I hear you right?	What? He spoke to you? Did I hear you right?
ROSY:	Yes, yes! I beg you, Mary! Come quickly, please! And spend the night!	Yes, yes! I beg you! Come right away. He's been threatening me!
MARY:	I understand, my dear. I'll be over in just a few minutes. But calm down, I beg you.	All right, I'm coming. I don't have any hard feelings. I will be over right away.
ROSY:	Thanks, I'll be waiting for you.	Thanks. Hurry!
	The telephone rings again.
VOICE:	Rosy? Why did you call your friend Mary? Did you imagine she could help you? You thought I wouldn't know?	Why did you call our old friend Mary? How she loved me! But I gave her up for you. So you could turn me in! Now call whoever you want. It won't help because . . . you'll be dead before dawn!
	CUT to a shot—not in AIP prints—beginning with a CLOSE SHOT of the telephone jack, then PANNING along the phone cord to a MEDIUM SHOT of Mary on the phone, speaking to Rosy through a voice-distorting handkerchief! [6] She continues:
	And so you called over there. But it was useless. Because I'm near you. I told you that. Very near. Call whomever you like, Rosy, it won't do any good. Even if you have a hundred people around you! Before the next sunrise, you will die. You understand, Rosy? Before the sun rises again, you'll be dead.

MARY (Lidia Alfonsi) is reviled as the caller terrorizing Rosy.

MARY'S ARRIVAL

Mary's arrival at Rosy's apartment does not appear in AIP's version. It follows:

There is a knock at Rosy's door.

MARY: Rosy, it's me! Open up!

ROSY: Ah, it's you? Is it really you, Mary?

MARY: Good evening. Something bothering you?

ROSY: Yes. If you only knew how afraid I've been!

MARY: Good evening.

Mary walks languidly into the apartment, caressing Rosy's chin as she passes by her.

MARY: Oh! So much light! My word, Rosy! [UNINTELLIGIBLE] Oh, forgive me! I forgot that your lovers tend to be such important people. You're the mistress of a chairman of the board. I see things haven't changed much. Everything's just as it was when we were friends.

Mary strolls over to the bed and seats herself on the edge while Rosy brings a couple of cocktails. The AIP version resumes here.

MARY and Rosy toast their rekindled relationship.

4 Translated from the French by Alan Upchurch.

5 Bava created this trick "magic writing" shot himself, animating Frank's elegant handwriting as it fills a beautifully-lit sheet of blank paper. It was not an insert shot filmed in the US.

6 Bava's knack for color-coding visual information shines through in this shot: Mary's telephone is black, like the receiver of Rosy's otherwise red telephone; when Mary disguises her voice to call Rosy, the handkerchief she speaks through is also red.

MARYS VISIT

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR		BLACK SABBATH
MARY:	Let us drink to renewed friendship. Come on over here and tell everything to your old friend.	Rosy, take your time. Let's hear the story.
ROSY:	Please! It's not a joke, you must believe me!	I can barely talk about it, it's so awful.
MARY:	Fine. Very well. Just as you wish. We'll be serious.	You say he threatened you? How could he?
ROSY:	He's alive, I tell you! I heard him speak. With a cold and menacing voice. He said terrible things to me. He knows everything I do in the house, he . . . he knew my every movement. The first time he called, I wasn't wearing a stitch of clothes. And he knew it. Then I put on my dressing gown and he knew that, too. He even knew immediately that I had called you. As though he were in this very room. Finally, he even threatened to kill me.	I tell you he's alive. I know it was him. I heard him on the telephone. He spoke in a nightmarish voice and he said such frightening things to me. He knows everything I do, move by move. Even when I took off my dress and was wearing a dressing gown. How is it possible, Mary? He died three months ago! We both knew about the same time. I'm sorry, Mary. Sorry for what happened. I never meant to hurt you. But you must help me now. You can't imagine how he sounded. It was terrifying. He's after me.
MARY:	Crank calls. [ROSY gasps.] Coincidence. Nothing but coincidence.	Frank is dead. You're distraught . . . imagining things.
ROSY:	That's what I thought, too. But how did he know I called you? He called me right afterwards. He always knew we had been . . .[SIGNIFICANT PAUSE].	He's alive, I tell you. Why, he knows I called you! He called me right afterwards.
MARY:	There's one thing he doesn't know. That you swore never to see me again.	Don't. Don't think about it. Listen to me. What you need is to go to bed and relax.
ROSY:	He said . . . that I would die before dawn.	He said . . . that I would die before dawn.
MARY:	You know very well that he won't come back here. You can believe that. He only said that to scare you.	[LAUGHS] Probably a crank call. And if it were him, why would he want to kill you?
ROSY:	Mary! Don't forget that I was the one who turned him in! And he knows it. I am afraid!	Mary, I was the one who turned him in! And he knew it! I'm scared.
MARY:	You're not alone, Rosy. You have no reason to be afraid. I'll stay with you tonight and tomorrow we'll go to the police. The telephone can ring as much as it likes. Be so kind as to find me a nightgown. I'll go make us some camomile tea.	You are all right. I'm here now. And tomorrow we'll go together to the police. Now. No one can call you. Get me a nightgown now, and I'll go make us something to drink.
	Rosy spies Mary in the kitchen holding a butcher knife. She gasps.
ROSY:	Why the knife?	What are you doing? What's that for?
MARY:	One never knows! Still afraid?	You never know. Still scared?
ROSY:	No. I feel safe with you.	I . . . feel better now.
MARY:	That's better. Come on, let's go to bed.	I'm glad. Get to bed.
	Mary prepares the tea.
ROSY:	What's that?	What's that?
MARY:	Poison . . . from Frank. Only a seasoning, you idiot! Here, drink it down. All of it this time. You have too much imagination, Rosy. Come on, hurry up. Drink.	Poison . . .from Frank. It's a tranquilizer. There! You drink this and you won't feel a thing.

MARY'S LETTER

Next morning. Rosy is sprawled sideways on the bed. CAMERA PANS LEFT and DOLLIES across the room to a small writing table, where Mary is writing a letter. In the European version, the shot is a long and unbroken take—unlike the AIP version, which bluntly CUTS from Rosy to the end of the DOLLY-IN on Mary. CUT to a CLOSE SHOT of the letter she is writing.

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR

"Dear Rosy,

I'm so sorry to have caused you such a fright, but it was the only way I had of making you break your oath, which had caused me such pain. It was the news of Frank's escape that gave me the idea. His voice . . . that was me. Don't hold it against me."

BLACK SABBATH

"Dear Rosy,

I put the tranquilizer in your tea not only because you needed it, but also because it would give me the opportunity to consult a psychiatrist about your disturbed state of mind before you could awake. These hallucinations about Frank's being alive . . . talking to you . . . threatening your life . . . are obviously signs that you need help."

FRANK'S ARRIVAL

THE THREE FACES OF FEAR

The scene of Frank strangling Mary contains two shots cut from the AIP version:

• Following the CLOSE SHOT of Mary's face while being strangled, there is a MEDIUM SHOT of Frank violently choking her and lowering her limp body to the floor. CUT to a CLOSE SHOT of Rosy recoiling in terror on the bed. CUT to MEDIUM SHOT of Mary dead on the floor, Frank poised above her. He releases his grip on her.

• Frank grabs a fistful of Mary's hair and mutters . . .

FRANK: Ugh! Filthy bitch! You're always hanging on my sleeves!

Frank looks at Rosy menacingly. He comes toward her. No dialogue.

Frank is stabbed by Rosy through bedsheet. Camera PANS left, rotates on phone, continues left to rest on MEDIUM SHOT of Mary's dead body.

No dialogue.

No zoom.
No scream.

BLACK SABBATH

ROSY: No! No, Frank! It's not you! You're dead! Don't you understand? You're dead!!

Camera PANS left, rotates on phone, still off the hook, then continues left to rest on medium shot of Mary's dead body. We hear Frank's voice filtering through the telephone, still off the hook.

VOICE: Rosy! You can't kill me. I'll always be here. Close to you. I'll be talking to you every night, no matter where you are. I'll be calling you. On the telephone!

ZOOM-FREEZE on telephone.
Offscreen, Rosy screams.

ROSY does not suspect Mary's true motives coming to her rescue.

In addition to the dialogue changes shown here, AIP's "The Telephone" includes footage directed by Bava that is not found in the Italian cut. Both versions of the episode unreel at approximately the same length, so each version contains an equal amount of exclusive material.

In both versions of the story, when Rosy breaks down in tears on her couch after the third call, the camera pans across the room to a pair of blue eyes peering through her venetian blinds. In the Italian version, the shot is never explained (and, it seems, was included by mistake); in the AIP version, the shot of the eyes cuts back to Rosy weeping, and the camera pans back to her door—then cuts to the outside corridor (the only noticeable decoration is the same set of the cloverleaf-patterned partitions seen in Rosy's apartment), where we see the rear view of a tall, thin, 50-ish man in a dark hat and overcoat walking down the hall in sinister fashion. Abruptly, he turns to the camera, crouches, and calls to his dog, Deke, whom he's taking for walkies. (The dog's name was an in-joke directed at Louis M. "Deke" Heyward, a former staff writer for The Ernie Kovacs Show who had recently joined American International as a writer and script doctor—indeed, he may have had a hand in writing the revised dialogue for Black Sabbath—and soon after became the head of the company's London office and their European "watchdog" line producer.) The camera follows this funny little man outside—it's the same building exterior Bava would later use, redressed with some camera trickery, as the exterior of Castle Menliff in his next picture, La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body—and as he passes out of frame, admonishing Deke ("What are you barking at? There's nobody there!"), we see the shadow of a man lurking behind a shrub.

Later, after picking up the envelope containing the "magic writing" message from Frank, Rosy opens the door of her apartment and comes face-to-face with her dog-walking neighbor, whom she addresses as "Colonel." He sees how upset she is and seems genuinely eager to be of service, but the flustered young woman explains, "I'm sorry, I was frightened—frightened by nothing at all!" and slams the door in his face.

Though these additional scenes explain the eyes peering into Rosy's apartment, they also seriously defuse the episode's claustrophobic tension and—due to the quirky performance of the uncredited player cast as the Col.—introduce an unwelcome dimension of light comedy.

Unfortunately, Billitteri's rewrite created more narrative problems than it solved. How could a ghost haunt anyone via the telephone? How could a supernatural entity assume corporeal form to strangle its victims? Why would someone guard themselves against a ghost by placing a knife under their pillow? How could Rosy kill Frank when he was already dead? Furthermore, by changing the identity of the caller to eliminate the story's lesbian subtext, the rewrite makes nonsense of certain shots retained in the final cut: Mary's stalking move behind Rosy as she monologizes her fears, Mary's mysterious additive to Rosy's cup of camomile tea, the shot of night turning into day through the transom window (in the Italian version, the equivalent of an averted gaze as Mary takes advantage of Rosy's drugged body) and, most significantly, the shot of Mary's black-gloved hand extracting a butcher knife from a kitchen drawer and pausing to admire the play of light on the blade as she tilts it left and right. It's a throwaway shot for Bava, but another seminal moment in the definition of the cinematic giallo. Dario Argento would base his entire career on the reiteration of this single image.

MARY is caught unaware by the surprise return of Frank.
MARIO BAVA directs Lidia Alfonsi and Milo Quesada in the scene.

The hopelessly jumbled nature of the rewrite betrays the haste with which it was improvised during production, and in the context of Black Sabbath (where "The Telephone" is repositioned as the second of the three stories), the episode's muddled quality causes the middle of the movie to sag badly, despite its prettiness.

As originally scored by Roberto Nicolosi, "Il telefono" defines this composer as better suited for this kind of small combo band music than for classical orchestra. Using a limited jazz ensemble of saxophone, bass, trombone, vibes, and drums, Nicolosi accents the story with suggestively sinful underpinnings, alternatively romantic and menacing, which perfectly support the story's themes of thwarted love, transgression, and revenge.

Once again, AIP hired Les Baxter to replace the Nicolosi score, and his work for "The Telephone" is a particular disappointment. Unlike the Nicolosi score—which is typically spare, allowing Bava to generate suspense with the sharp contrast between silence and the invasive trilling of the telephone—Baxter's score is one of those wall-to-wall, "we want to hear what we're paying for" scores that never lets up, and resorts to an idiot card ethic which orchestrates the viewer's desired responses to the action: silken provocations as Rosy undresses, dithering passages in the wake of false alarms, and blasts of brass as Frank twists a discarded nylon stocking around Mary's neck. It's the equivalent of the laugh track on an old TV sitcom. The rest of the score is the typical, truncheon-swinging police drama score of the day.

JACQUELINE PIERREUX as the covetous Miss Chester.

In all fairness to Baxter, there is every indication that he was obliged to score the film quickly, possibly without being certain of its final content. As late in post-production as the preparation of Black Sabbath's pressbook, AIP was apparently still undecided about whether or not to use Billitteri's version. In AIP's campaign manual, the synopsis of the episode describes Frank only as a man whom Rosy has betrayed, not as a ghost. So while Nicolosi had the advantage of scoring an episode he had actually seen, Baxter probably had to proceed blindfolded and against the clock.

In a final irony that Bava would have appreciated, all of AIP's editorial meddling was for naught. When Black Sabbath was finally released in 1964—making its New York bow on the bottom half of a double bill with, of all things, McHale's Navy!—the Catholic National Legion of Decency all but condemned the film, giving it their "B" rating, indicating the presence of elements which could cause "serious harm in the areas of Christian morality and traditionally accepted moral behavior patterns." Their principal objection: "The second episode of this three-part horror film dangerously concentrates on the erotic and violent details of sadism."

Ironically, the Legion cited no objections to the film's other episodes and their portrayals of incest, infanticide, or triumphant evil—they were wringing their hands over the episode AIP had worked so hard to clean up for popular consumption.

La goccia d'acqua

One stormy night, Miss Chester is summoned by telephone to the home of the village medium, who has reportedly died of a stroke while still entranced.[7] Arriving at the forbidding house, she is led by a nervous housekeeper through corridors overrun with dolls and mewing cats, toward the bed of the lifeless, staring medium. While left alone to dress the corpse for burial, Miss Chester notices a jewelled ring on the medium's finger and—after closing the staring eyes of the dead woman—pries it off and secretes it in her bosom. A buzzing fly, drawn to the smell of death, alights on the corpse's ring finger—frightening the nurse, who knocks over a bedside glass of water. The sound of dripping water fills the room.

Returning home later that night, Miss Chester dons the ring to admire it—and a fly alights on her finger! Her apartment proceeds to come alive with the sounds of dripping water, flies, and mewing cats, until an apparition of the medium herself rises from Miss Chester's bed and compels the nurse to strangle herself. Was it a true visitation from a vengeful ghost, or was it perhaps a frenzy of illusions brought on by a fit of guilt? Miss Chester's body is found the next day, her own hands clenched about her throat, her dead eyes staring in cold accusation. The police look around the apartment and see nothing out of the ordinary—there's a white nightgown laid out on the bed, suggesting that she meant to go to sleep as usual—until a scar on her finger reveals that a ring has been torn off. Her concierge claims she doesn't know anything about it . . .

The second episode to be filmed was similar to "Il telefono" in that it depicts a single character trapped in a web of escalating fear, haunted by persistent sounds. Set in the late 19th century, "La goccia d'acqua" is Mario Bava at his very best: a masterpiece of macabre short-form storytelling that is told almost entirely through sight and sound, with the eponymous sound effect evolving into an unsettling, supernatural presence.

As Lamberto Bava reveals elsewhere in this book, his father was simultaneously drawn to the ocean and terrified of it, which offers some explanation of how he was able to invest so much terror in a single drop of water. By an odd coincidence, AIP's radio

MISS CHESTER receives no assistance from the dead medium's superstitious housekeeper (Milly Monti).

7 For unknown reasons, Miss Chester is identified in AIP's Black Sabbath pressbook as "Helen Corey," which also assigns the name of "Madame Perkins" to the episode's nameless medium. Perkins is actually the name given to the concierge played by Harriet White Medin.

MISS CHESTER cannot resist rewarding her efforts with a ring stolen from the corpse's finger.

spot advertisements for Black Sunday were marked by a persistent dripping sound, which announcer Paul Frees (using his Orson Welles voice) explained thusly: "This is the sound of dripping blood! This is the sound of Black Sunday!"

According to actress Harriet White Medin, the episode was scripted with the working title of "Le mosca" ("The Fly"), drawing attention to another disturbing presence (and sound effect) in the scenario, but it was likely changed at the suggestion of American International, wishing to avoid unnecessary confusion with Kurt Neumann's 1958 science fiction classic of the same name. (The Fly had been released in Italy as L'esperimento del Dottor K, so Bava could be forgiven for thinking he was coining an original title.) It is one of the episode's great achievements to evoke such piercing menace from something as tiny and commonplace as an ordinary housefly, but ultimately, it is the sound of dripping taps—like the ringing telephone in its companion episode—that rattles the viewer.

Among the many people who have been permanently frightened by this episode is Mario's own grandson. "Of all his movies, [it's] the one that scares me the most," Roy Bava admits. "Even today, if there's something leaking, a drop falling from far away, I have to wake up—even if I'm sleeping, I have to wake up and look for it and switch it off, because otherwise I cannot sleep. It's like it's really dropping on my brain!" [8]

"La goccia d'acqua" is also the most adventurous of the film's three episodes in its uses of color, lighting, and sound. Bava allowed himself an uncommon measure of pride where this episode was concerned, particularly in terms of its technical details: "That's one film that still looks good to me, 'La goccia d'acqua.' There is a sequence where I made the camera slowly move toward an object after showing the face of the person watching it. It's technically perfect." [9]

Giorgio Giovannini's art direction is exceptional throughout I tre volti della paura, but it is particularly striking in this episode, which opens with Miss Chester indoors, gazing through an oval window at a flashing light outside, so that her cluttered, darkened apartment appears to throb with pulsations of saturated green light. [10] From this captivating opening shot, "La goccia d'acqua" invests its environments and inanimate objects with a life of their own. The woman seeks to amuse herself by cranking up her Victrola and playing a disc of an Oscar Straus waltz (I'm told it is the one he composed for Max Ophuls' 1950 film La Ronde, which would make it an anachronistic touch), which is promptly interrupted—by the ringing of her telephone. She accepts the job and leaves her apartment with the Victrola playing, whereupon we linger behind to listen as it runs down in the strobing dark—its joyous music stretching into the monstrous, elongated, guttural language of the dead.

Our introduction to the medium's house is a lowering shot of a round table strewn with Tarot cards, which proceeds to encompass a view of a large, spacious room with vaulted ceilings, furnished with broken, neglected dolls and wandering cats; the juxtaposition of the dolls and the cats suggest bodies left inert as their wandering spirits roam free, aimless, and lost. The set, incidentally, was freezing cold—you can see the actresses' breath as they converse in the kitchen, where the housekeeper has laid out a burial dress on the table for ironing, before a ceiling lamp on a retractable cord memorably descends of its own mysterious volition to kiss it. The mise-en-scène amounts to an almost complete restatement of the scene of Aunt Edith's death in La ragazza che sapeva troppo: the storm, the watchful cats (a black one is shown entering the room just before Miss Chester steals the ring), the dead woman's staring eyes, the blonde by the bedside, even the spilled glass of water are restaged here, investing each of these elements with talismanic significance, as if Bava was obsessively working through a traumatic episode from his personal life, or trying to exorcise the remnants of a bad dream.

When I asked Lamberto Bava if the shared images of these sequences may have had some personal significance for his father, he sensibly replied, "You would have to ask Mario." However, when asked if the prevalence of cats in her grandfather's movies was an indication of his fondness for felines, Georgia Bava responds, "No! He didn't like cats. Always in my family, our best friends have been dogs." So the scene works, in part, because Bava furnished his mise-en-scène with elements that made him personally fearful.

As we stand in contemplation of the medium's deathbed, it should be pointed out that I tre volti della paura—and it is not the only Bava film to do so—posits many of its most horrific scenes in and around beds. In "Il telefono," Rosy receives her first call while undressing for bed, Mary wants very much to get into Rosy's bed, and it is in Rosy's bed where Frank is ultimately stabbed to death. In "La goccia d'acqua," nearly all of the scenes of the medium's corpse involve a bed, and in "I wurdalak," a sleeping Vladimir is startled into wakefulness by sensing Gorka standing over his bed (a shot that appears to consciously restage Graf Orlok's night visitation of Hutter in F. W. Murnau's silent classic Nosferatu, 1922), Gorka steals his young grandson out of bed, the child's mother rises from her own bed at the sound of her undead child's cries and slays her husband in the bedroom, and later, Vladimir succumbs to Sdenka's bite in her own bedchamber, as other undead family members look on from an adjacent window. Each segment likewise portrays the bedroom in a different light: as a place where love is made and betrayals are bred, where one is most vulnerable, and where we die. One of the film's most frightening shots is a long-shot of the medium's deathbed, which initiates a slow dolly toward the unsettling, unblinking gaze of its lifeless occupant; there is something about the inexorable camera movement here—in the shot that Bava admitted was "technically perfect"—that suggests the very inevitability and inescapability of death.

Like cats, beds were another source of subjective fear for Bava. Asked to describe his father in an interview, Lamberto Bava replied, "A scaredy cat! When he found himself alone in the house, he would look under the bed. There's nothing strange about this; if you have fears, you can succeed in making others feel them, too. You know exactly what needs to be said." [11] Throughout his life, Bava was never the type of person who would retire early for the pleasure or need of rest; he preferred to put off sleep, reading in solitude through the early hours of morning, until he could no longer avoid going to bed. As it happens, his apprehensions concerning bedtime were well-founded: he would eventually die in bed.

At the end of "La goccia d'acqua," the cold, stiff, waxen hands of the dead medium reach out to grip Miss Chester by the throat, but as we cut to an objective angle, it is her own hands that we see wrap around her throat to squeeze the life out of her. (The change is perfectly choreographed, so that Pierreux's hand appears to be reaching into frame as the medium's hand would do at the beginning of this objective shot.) Bava leaves the viewer free to interpret the story as an account of a genuine haunting, or as the story of a thief whose superstitions combine with guilt to produce a lethal karmic cocktail. The ambiguity of Miss Chester's death can be viewed as a dry run for the finale of Bava's next feature, La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body, which ends with its heroine Nevenka (Daliah Lavi) subjectively slaying the ghost of her lover—and in the same movement, as her action is viewed objectively by witnesses, slaying herself.

Jacqueline Pierreux, the star of this episode, was born in Rouen, France, on January 15, 1924, and is perhaps best-known as the mother of actor Jean-Pierre Léaud (discovered by François Truffaut in Les Quatre Cent Coups/The 400 Blows, 1959). Pierreux—who, for some reason, is credited as "Jacqueline Soussard" in the AIP version—made her screen debut in 1942 (Robert Péguy's Les Ailes Blanches) and appeared in many kinds of movies, spread out over many different countries, during her unexceptional acting career. (In 1955, already midway through her filmography, she was still making uncredited appearances in supporting roles.) Perhaps her most notable earlier films were the French thriller Série noire (1955) with Erich von Stroheim, and Wolfgang Staudte's 1962 remake of Die Dreigroschenoper/The Threepenny Opera. In the 1970s, Pierreux retired from acting to focus on a new and more successful career as a film producer. Among her productions—many of which are Belgian or Dutch in origin—are Home Sweet Home (1973, starring her son's onscreen wife in Truffaut's "Antoine Doinel" series, Claude Jade), Harry Kumel's Het Verloren Paradijs/Paradise Lost (1978), Gérard Corbiau's Le Maitre de Musique (1988), and Chantal Akerman's Un Divan à New York (1996). In 1978, she made a brief return to acting for director Claude Chabrol, in his thriller Violette Nozière/Violette. Well-cast, Pierreux invests the role of Miss Chester with appropriate shadings of aging, overripe glamor and covetousness; it's doubtful that the part was so well-delineated on the page, but it's clear from her performance that her character is a spinster, isolated from life and love by her unpleasant work with the dying and the dead (one remembers the superstitious neighbor in Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill! who refuses to admit Erika Blanc, begging for shelter, because she touched a dead girl during the performance of an autopsy) who seeks some material gratification to complement her daydreams of a different life. She is referred to as "Nurse Chester" in some references, but there is some doubt as to whether or not she was intended to be an actual nurse; in the French version, she is known only as Mlle. Chester, and there is a still photo from the production that shows her parading coquettishly around a policeman seated on a bed, implying that she may have been scripted as a representative of a more illicit trade.

Appearing briefly as the medium's housekeeper is Milly Monti (1905–80), who had enjoyed a popular singing career in the pre-war years as "Milly." It was with this singular name that she made her screen debut in 1932 in two films for Mario Bonnard—Cinque a zero and Tre uomini in frack—in which she was the lead ingenue. Such was her international celebrity as a singer in the 1930s that she appeared in the American detective drama The Girl

ONE of the great hair-raising moments from I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA.

8 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, unused, 2000.

9 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

10 Bava may have been inspired to employ this pulsing light effect by Milton R. Krasner's photography in Fritz Lang's classic film noir Scarlet Street (1945), in which Edward G. Robinson is driven to suicide by the ghostly voices of Joan Bennett and Dan Duryea in a fleabag hotel whose flashing neon sign posits his haunting between light and shadow.

11 "Intervista con Lamberto Bava," La Lettura, (Cattolica 1st Festival internazionale del giallo e del mistero), September 1980, 107.

from Scotland Yard (1937, directed by Robert G. Vignola) cast as herself. She vanished from the cinema during the war years, which she spent in Rome, and did not return until the mid-1950s, when she began to essay (with now-careworn features) "mother" and "nun" roles as Mirella Monti. By 1960, her career floundering, she resumed her original identity for Alberto Lattuada's I dolce inganni and was given formal, yet affectionate billing as Milly Monti in I tre volti della paura, where she makes a strong impression in a role that, again, must have barely existed on the page. The moment in which she turns her back to Miss Chester to take a clandestine, fortifying slug of brandy speaks volumes about a woman we scarcely meet. Her last screen credit was a triumph: in Bernardo Bertolucci's I conformista/ The Conformist (1971), she played the sickly, incestuously fawning mother of the protagonist, Marco (Jean-Louis Trintignant). In I tre volti della paura, Monti appears to have been deliberately dressed and made-up to resemble Eleonora Duse in Cenere.

One of the most frightening apparitions ever captured on celluloid, the story's dead medium was—in most shots—a lifesize dummy sculpted in wax by the man who photographed Duse's only performance for the cinema: Eugenio Bava. Three heads were made: one with eyes open, another with eyes closed (seen after Miss Chester closes the body's eyes before redressing it for burial), and a whole-head latex mask which could be worn by an uncredited performer in shots requiring movement (sitting up in bed, rocking in a chair, etc.). The shot of the medium sitting up in Miss Chester's bed appears to have been patterned after a similar shot in the "Case of M. Valdemar" episode of Corman's Tales of Terror, and the movement of the live actor is essential to its success. However, in the subsequent shot of the ghost approaching the woman who has stolen her ring, the actor is replaced with a mechanical wax figure on a caster board, which raises its arms stiffly as it "floats" toward its intended victim. Bava had used this Cocteauvian technique with live actors before, but, in this shot, the very stiffness of the wax figure works to the effect's chilling advantage.

Appearing together in the story's postscript are two actors who had worked with Bava before: Gustavo De Nardo (Dr. Facchetti in La ragazza che sapeva troppo) as the inspector, and Harriet White Medin (a dialogue coach on films such as La donna più bella del mondo and Esther and the King), who plays Miss Chester's thieving concièrge, Miss Perkins. Born March 14, 1914, in Somerville, Massachusetts, Harriet White was the first American actress to relocate to Italy during the post-war years to work in the Italian cinema. She had no previous film experience at the time, but she had appeared in a Broadway play (Take It As It Comes, 1944); it ran only two weeks, but it helped her to get an Actor's Equity card, which enabled her to get a role in a traveling USO play called Junior Miss, which took her all over the world from November 1944 – April 1945. When she returned to New York, a friend—a casting agent for Paramount—recommended that she try out for a picture that was going to be filmed in Naples. "After what I had seen of [wartime] Europe, Naples sounded awful, but I said, 'All right,'" she told me.

MISS PERKINS (Harriet White Medin) is questioned about the death of her tenant by a police inspector (Gustavo De Nardo).

After being interviewed in New York by Sol Geiger, Harriet was cast with six other inexperienced actors who became known as "The Seven From the US"—the working title of Roberto Rossellini's Paisà/Paisan (1946). Harriet played a nurse in the "Firenza/ Florence" segment of the picture, one of the great neorealist masterpieces of world cinema. Immediately afterwards, she was cast in the lead role of Primo Zeglio's Genoveffa di Brabante, her only starring performance, the story of a Belgian queen who became a Catholic Saint. Not wishing to become typecast as a paragon of virtue, Harriet paid to have a series of sultry photos taken of herself by Italy's leading fashion photographer, Elio Luxardo—the maternal uncle of future Italian horror director Dario Argento.

"I wasn't exactly what you would call the feminine ideal of a leading lady," the actress admitted. "The more formose girls, shall we say, were more interesting to the producers, so I started doing character roles. I was the first foreign actress to work in Italian films after the war, but after 1949, they started bringing in stars from other countries." Consequently, her opportunities for good roles began to dwindle. During this period, she married Italian art director Gastone Medin and began to work primarily as a dialogue coach, working with Gina Lollobrigida and Vittorio De Sica, and later with Daniela Rocca, Rik Battaglia, and others. In 1960, her old friend Federico Fellini—whom she first met while filming Paisà—cast her as Anita Ekberg's prim secretary Edna in La dolce vita. Harriet made her entrance into horror films in 1962, when Riccardo Freda cast her in his necrophilia mystery, L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock. Harriet's character—a sinister housekeeper named Marta, whom screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi based on Judith Anderson's Mrs. Danvers in Alfred Hitchcock's Rebecca—would become an instant fixture of many of the Italian horror pictures that followed in its wake. At the time she filmed her small role in I tre volti della paura, Harriet had just reprised that influential role in Freda's semi-sequel, Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963).

"I suppose that Bava knew of me primarily as a dialogue coach, because he seemed surprised to find me a competent actress," surmised Medin. "The first thing we did together was the last scene in a story called 'The Fly' . . . It's called something else now, but that's what it was called at the time. I remember Bava coaching the expression on my face, as [Gustavo] De Nardo was questioning me. I was giving him this challenging look and playing it very cozy. They were shooting MOS [without sound] of course, and as they did the zoom into my face, Bava was telling me, 'Okay, look up . . . look down . . . look to your right.' And I remember how I felt doing it, that it would look as if someone offscreen was telling me what to do. I felt uncomfortable doing it, but the results seemed to please him. Bava came up to me afterwards and said, 'Ah, you're good!'—as if he didn't expect me to be. And I said, 'Of course I am!'"

Bava was sufficiently pleased to cast Harriet again in his next two films, La frusta e il corpo and Sei donne per l'assassino. To fans of Italian horror, Harriet White Medin is regarded as the outstanding carraterista ("character actress") of the genre's "golden age" (1956–66).

MARIO BAVA whispers direction to the uncredited performer who is being outfitted with the wax mask by its sculptor, Eugenio Bava.

"The Drop of Water" survived AIP's meddling hands fairly intact, but several of its images lost their meaning as a result of Titra's insensitive re-recording of its soundtrack. Titra failed to preserve the mewing of the medium's cats over one particular climactic moment, when Miss Chester hears them crying behind her bedroom door. Opening the door to let them out, she sees the medium sitting upright in her own bed, then sitting in her rocking chair with a cat in her lap. AIP's version of this scene offers no logical reason for the woman to look behind the door, making her seem like a superstitious fool who fully expects to see a ghost. Pursuant to this moment, the final shot of the climactic scene shows a cat walking along the apartment's outer window sill—an image which seems to subtly endorse the supernatural explanation of events, but which has no resonance whatsoever in domestic prints.

With respect to its emphasis on natural sound effects, the episode's original score was understandably sparse and non-interfering; a handful of atmospheric accents from organ, kettledrums, a cymbal scattered throughout extensive, nerve-whittling silences—and no more. The icy organ is particularly effective, lending shadings of gooseflesh to each of the medium's reanimated appearances. Baxter's rescoring of the segment is mostly effective, accentuating the mood and shocks well, but his contribution is vulgarized by overlays from the sound effects man, who goes completely over the top as Miss Chester's apartment is plunged into darkness, cranking up the sounds of mewing cats, tattooing drips, and dive-bombing flies into an unforgivable cacaphony.

Although AIP declined to edit this powerful episode, they considered it too intense to stand as the film's closing act, as Bava intended. In short, they didn't want to give their young audience nightmares or send them home in wet pants. So while "La goccia d'acqua" provides a resonant, bone-chilling climax to I tre volti della paura, "The Drop of Water" serves as the opening act of Black Sabbath, a rearrangement causing it to overpower everything that follows, making the AIP version a far less satisfying experience, as a whole.

I wurdalak

Handsome, young Vladimir d'Urfe is travelling on horseback through the countryside when he finds a headless corpse, stabbed in the heart with a distinctive dagger. He extracts the blade and rides on, finding shelter that night at a country cottage where a family tensely awaits the return of their patriarch, who swore to kill the dreaded wurdalak Olibek or die trying, warning his children not to trust him should he return home after midnight. Vladimir notices a dagger missing from the wall, where the one he found fits perfectly—therefore, the corpse he found must have been that of Olibek . . . or that of Gorka, the family's father. As midnight tolls, Gorka crosses the bridge to his home with a wound in his chest. He is pale and changed, and the family dog howls as though he is a stranger. After having the proud stories of his trip repeatedly disrupted by the dog, Gorka orders his sons to put the animal to death. After the dog is shot, Gorka produces from a sack the trophy of his travels—the severed head of Olibek!—which he demands be displayed on the property's gatepost. Is Gorka now a wurdalak or not?

That night, Gorka shows his true colors by murdering his son Pietro and abducting his tiny grandson Ivan. The boy is later found dead, but his mother refuses to allow her husband to defile the corpse by putting it to rest in the traditional manner. After his burial, the child returns home as one of the undead, crying to his mother that he's cold. Crazed by the conflict between her maternal instincts and common sense, she slays her interfering husband in order to reach her son—finding Gorka at the door instead. As the family succumbs to vampirism one by one, Vladimir escapes with Gorka's attractive daughter Sdenka, the two of them finding shelter in the ruins of a chapel. The undead family appear, luring Sdenka back with assurances of their love. Vladimir searches for Sdenka, eventually finding her in bed, back at the cottage. Her eyes have an eerie, otherworldly cast. After indulging him with a kiss, Sdenka bites Vladimir's throat and we see Gorka, his daughter-in-law, and little Ivan outside the bedroom window—witnesses to what is undoubtedly a wedding.

MARIO BAVA is teased by a fanged Jacqueline Pierreux on the set of "The Drop of Water."

The filming of "Il telefono" and "La goccia d'acqua" occupied the first three weeks of shooting. The last episode to be filmed, "I wurdalak" began shooting on either February 25 or 27 (sources differ) and occupied the remaining month of production. It is the most ambitious of the three episodes in scope and length. Unlike its more intimate companion stories, it involves a full cast of characters and encompasses many wintery exteriors and a fair amount of travelling from place to place. Given its narrative variety and a length that occupies nearly half the running time of I tre volti della paura, "I wurdalak" is very nearly a feature in its own right. It is also distinguished by Boris Karloff's last great performance in a traditional horror role, the only vampire role he would essay in his career.

Mario Bava claimed to have been raised in ignorance of vampires. "As a child, I remember the maid telling us fables about Sardinian and Sicilian bandits that frightened me, but I never heard of a vampire," he once said. "In our country, the sun drives away such things. This, I tell myself, is why my films have been successful in America and in the Northern countries, but never in Italy." [12] To arrive at his conception of a wurdalak, Bava explained that "I studied myself and, little by little, found that certain images simply came by themselves, that one has them deep inside." [13]

"A wurdalak," we are told, "is a vampire who drinks the blood of those [whom] they love the best." The word is actually a corruption of the Romanian word vrkolak, which was derived from vukodlak, the Serbian word for "werewolf." One may remember that, in the mythology invented for Universal's House of Frankenstein (1944), a werewolf can only be killed by someone who loves him enough to set him free.

Certainly, Bava's wurdalak was partly derived from the stories of the Sardinian and Sicilian bandits he remembered from childhood. Without delving too much into armchair psychology, the character of Gorka may have its roots in Mario's boyhood memories of his father, Eugenio—the unpredictable parent who went away on long journeys, who sent him affectionate drawings on postcards, but who slapped his face when he dared to sign his own name to a drawing—and in Mario's primal fears that his father might not return from one of his many wanderings, which sometimes involved elements of danger, or that he might return somehow changed or in an unpredictable mood.

Gorka's physical appearance may have been modelled on Bram Stoker's memorable description of the undead Count in his 1897 novel Dracula—never before utilized by the cinema, which had always chosen to make the character more repellent (as in Murnau's Nosferatu) or more attractive (as in the 1931 Dracula):

> ". . . a tall old man, clean-shaven save for a long white mustache, and clad in black from head to foot, without a single speck of color about him anywhere . . . His face was a strong—a very strong—aquiline, with high bridge of the thin nose and peculiarly arched nostrils; with lofty domed forehead, and hair growing scantily round the temples, but profusely elsewhere. His eyebrows were massive, almost meeting over the nose, and with bushy hair that seemed to curl in its own profusion." [14]

Only a few years earlier, in 1957, Boris Karloff had been approached by New York-based producer Richard Gordon to star in a remake of Dracula to be filmed in Technicolor and CinemaScope. A complete script for the production was written before Gordon discovered that the novel's literary rights were not in the public domain, as presumed. One wonders if Karloff's Dracula would have resembled Gorka, or indeed, if Gorka made use of makeup ideas which the actor had not been able to realize in the earlier, stillborn production.

Screenwriter Alberto Bevilacqua was present on the set during the filming of "I wurdalak" and witnessed the development of Bava's working relationship with the world's greatest horror star. "At the beginning, Boris Karloff was somewhat dubious of Bava's work," he admits. "[Karloff] was a bit of a bore. But Bava had this strange magnetism, and so Karloff was won over, to the point that he always wanted Mario close to him. Mario found his way into the actors. As he said himself, 'I find my way into the actors by attuning myself to their sadness. Everybody has sadness, but actors moreso than other people; they are more like children. So I insinuate my way into them like a sadness; they must feel me like a remorse . . . not like a person directing them, but like a person who can blackmail them psychologically.' We can also see from these words, which I am quoting to the letter, that Bava didn't have a simplistic background. Both from a cultural point of view and that of his moviemaking knowledge, he had an instinctual depth and a sixth sense that were remarkable."

THIS CLASSIC Bava image shows the undead witnesses of Vladimir and Sdenka's neckbite nuptials.

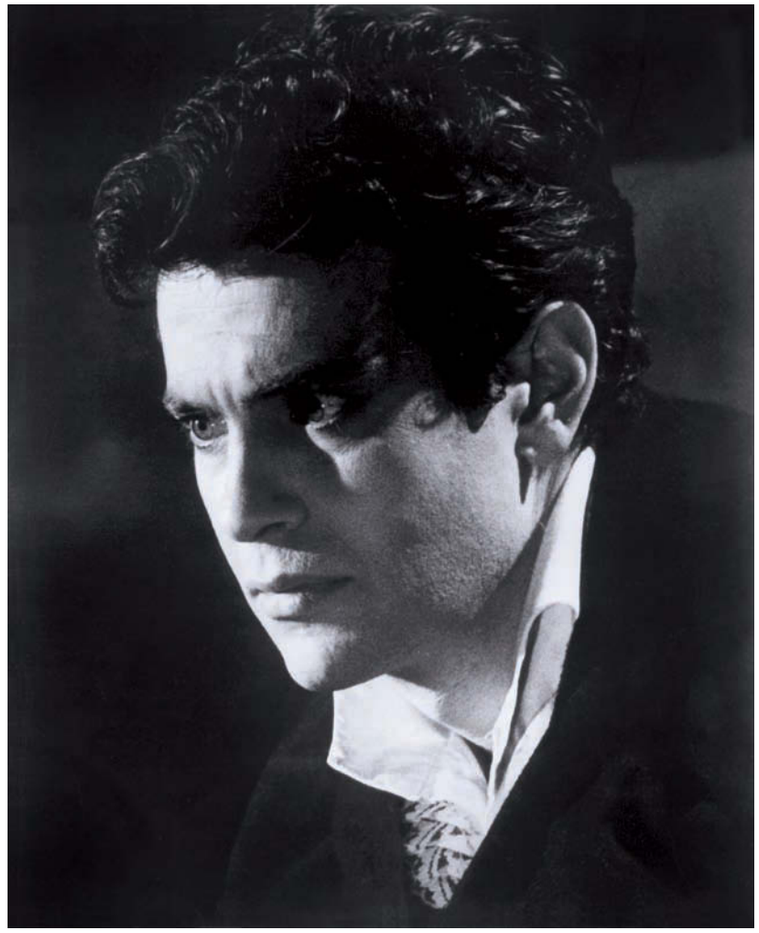
"The personable" Mark Damon (as AIP's trailer for the film pegged him) was born Alan Harris in Chicago, Illinois, on April 22, 1933. His family moved to Los Angeles in his high school years, and it was there—according to AIP publicity—while working at a summer job in a children's amusement park, that Damon was approached by a man who told him that he had the necessary good looks to have a career in films. The man left him with the card of his brother, a talent agent; when Damon read the name on the card—Gummo Marx—it dawned on him that his sponsor had been none other than Groucho Marx! Damon pursued theater during his college years at UCLA, and after graduation, he studied acting with drama coach Sanford Meisner. He won his first film role in Fred F. Sears' Inside Detroit (1955, an independent production picked up by Columbia), followed by Richard Fleischer's Between Heaven and Hell (1956) and his first lead role in William F. Claxton's juvenile delinquency "exposé" Young and Dangerous (1957). After this came several other JD roles, which brought Damon to the attention of American International Pictures, who were also making films of this kind. One of Damon's first roles for AIP was Philip Winthrop, the romantic male lead of Roger Corman's The Fall of the House of Usher (1960). Damon made his first European film in 1962: Edward Dmytryk's The Reluctant Saint, which was shot in Italy. He reunited with Corman for 1963's The Young Racers, but did not return to America to loop his performance; consequently, Damon's performance was dubbed by another promising young actor, William Shatner. Damon stayed on in Europe, to work with Mario Bava in "I wurdalak."

Europe suited Damon. He eventually relocated there, continuing to work in international co-productions—primarily Italian—throughout the early 1970s, such as Ferdinando Baldi's Il figlio di Cleopatra/The Son of Cleopatra (1964), Sergio Corbucci's Johnny Oro/Ringo and His Golden Pistol (1966), Riccardo Freda's La morte non conta i dollari/Death at Owell Rock (1967), Antonio Margheriti's Nude . . . si muore/The Young, the Evil and the Savage (1968, based on a script co-authored by Mario Bava), and Radley Metzger's Little Mother (1973). Damon became a film producer in 1973 with Joe D'Amato's The Arena, a film primarily funded and distributed in America by Roger Corman's New World Pictures. He subsequently produced or co-produced such films as Robert Aldrich's The Choirboys (1977), Wolfgang Petersen's Das Boot (1981) and Die Unendliche Geschichte/The NeverEnding Story (1984), and Stephen Sommers' live action The Jungle Book (1994), as well as the successful Zalman King cable series Red Shoe Diaries. He continues to produce films today through his company MDP Worldwide, his most recent success at the time of this writing being Monster (2003), with its Academy Award-winning performance by Charlize Theron.



Susy Andersen, who plays the female lead role of Sdenka, was born Maria Antonietta Golgi in Pola, Italy, on April 20, 1940. She began her career as a model, and broke into films with a supporting role in Antonio Leonviola's Le gladiatrice/Thor and the Amazon Queen, which was made

12 In the course of reading some of Bava's favorite authors, I discovered that he had cribbed this observation from Guy de Maupassant. In his story "Fear," one of the bases for scenes in "I wurdalak," Maupassant writes about the topical emotion: ". . . the North is its true home; the sun disperses it as though it were mist . . . The clear eastern nights foster none of those gloomy forebodings which haunt the minds of those who dwell in cold countries." [Guy de Maupassant (trans. Arnold Kellett), The Dark Side (New York NY: Carroll & Graf Publishers, 1989), 42.]

13 Abruzzese.

14 Bram Stoker, as quoted in Leonard Wolf, Leonard Wolf's The Annotated Dracula, (New York NY: Clarkson Potter, 1975), 20–21.

SUSY ANDERSEN as Sdenka, whose beauty transfixes Mark Damon's Vladimir.

shortly before I tre volti della paura. She was subsequently featured in Primo Zeglio's Western I due violenti/Two Violent Men (1964), Antonio Pietrangeli's Il magnifico cornuto/The Magnificent Cuckold (1964, opposite Claudia Cardinale and Ugo Tognazzi), Roma contro Roma/War of the Zombies (1964), Antonio Margheriti's spy picture A 077, sfida ai killers/Bob Fleming . . . Mission Casablanca (1965), and Alfonso Brescia's Nel labirinto del sesso/The Labyrinth of Sex (1969), a faux documentary in which she appeared as a nymphomaniac. Retired from acting since 1970, Andersen currently resides in Rome.

Glauco Onorato was born in Turin on December 7, 1936, the son of Italian theater actor Giovanni Onorato. He entered films in 1962, playing a role in Lo sciecco rosso/The Red Sheik, co-directed by Fernando Cerchio and Mel Welles. I tre volti della paura was Onorato's only Bava film; he spent most of the 1960s working in Italian Westerns like Giuseppe Colizzi's La collina degli stivali/Boot Hill (1969), but he worked three times in the 1970s for Dario Argento—in Le cinque giornate/The Five Days of Milan (1972), the TV movie Testimone oculare ("Eyewitness," 1973; co-directed by Roberto Pariante), and the classic giallo, Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975). Today, Onorato works predominantly on the stage and in the Italian dubbing industry.

"I wurdalak" marked Bava's first encounter with character actor Massimo Righi, who would become one of the director's "favorite faces" of his 1960s period. Born in Rome on May 10, 1933, Righi made his earliest screen appearances in Antonio Margheriti's Il pianeta degli uomini spenti/Battle of the Worlds, Antonio Leonviola's Maciste nella terra dei Ciclopi/Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops (both 1961), and in Richard Fleischer's Barabbas (1962). Blonde and blue-eyed, but possessed of a tense-browed, tightly wound demeanor that seemed in constant conflict with his good looks, Righi was perfect for Bava's uses, and had memorable bits in a few of his films—none moreso than his role as the epileptic, unrequited lover in Sei donne per l'assassino.

Above all, "I wurdalak" was a worthy star vehicle for Boris Karloff, who at the time was considered the greatest of all horror stars. He was born William Henry Pratt on November 23, 1887, in Camberwell, London, England, to a civil servant father aged 60 and a mother of 29. Their marriage lasted less than one more year, and some historians have suggested that William Henry, born with an olive complexion, was the result of his mother's extramarital affair with an Egyptian gentleman met during a holiday cruise. Drawn to acting from an early age, "Billy" became the black sheep of his family and followed his dream to Canada, where he worked his way through many jobs (and reportedly four wives) before winding up in Hollywood in 1919, where he began working as a film extra. He worked his way into the foregrounds of features in roles that suited his exotic appearance: maharajahs, princes, native Americans, spies, and criminals, and played his first truly macabre role in the 1926 silent The Bells, which cast him as a bespectacled, fright-wigged mesmerist. He was reportedly discovered in the Universal commissary by British expatriate director James Whale, who thought his face had "startling possibilities." Indeed it did. Such was Karloff's impact in his role as the Monster in Whale's Frankenstein (1931), that he was billed as "Karloff the Uncanny" less than a year later, in ads for Karl Freund's The Mummy (1932); the honor of being represented only by one's surname had been a privilege known previously only to Garbo. Unlike Universal's other horror star, Bela Lugosi, Karloff pursued his career with care and alternated his classic horror performances—Bride of Frankenstein (1935), The Black Room (1935), and The Body Snatcher (1945), for example—with high profile, mainstream fare on the stage and screen, including Charlie Chan at the Opera (1937), The Secret Life of Walter Mitty (1947), and the popular plays Arsenic and Old Lace and Peter Pan. By the 1950s, as American interest in horror pictures waned, Karloff's career began to slow down and he sought refuge in television. He played a detective in the British series Colonel March of Scotland Yard (1954–55), appeared in secondary roles in several acclaimed TV dramatic productions (including The Mudlark with Julie Harris), and then found his ideal niche as the host of Thriller—the weekly horror anthology series which suggested a template for I tre volti della paura, Karloff's first serious horror film since 1958's Grip of the Strangler/ The Haunted Strangler.

As with Steve Reeves' dramatic uprooting of a tree trunk in Le fatiche di Ercole or Barbara Steele's hound-flanked entrance in La maschera del demonio, Bava designed a remarkable introductory shot for Karloff, arguably the best the actor had since his "reverse walk-on" in Frankenstein. As Gorka's family discuss whether the late hour portends his death, we cut to a crabbed, silhouetted figure in long-shot crossing a bridge toward the family cottage as the clock tolls the late hour. [15] (Once again, the timing of Gorka's return lends it a dimension of ambiguity that is symptomatic of Bava's handling of supernatural themes.) Responding to the howls of the family dog, Gorka's adult children rush outside. The camera pans around the interloper, moving in close shot from a pair of dusty boots straggling up the road to a place behind his back; we watch breathlessly as this dark, hunched, larger-than-life silhouette ambles toward home and hearth. When Karloff turns his face to the camera at last, Bava zooms into his familiar, haggard features—like his watchful children, attentive to Gorka's behavior and the slightest detail that might define him as human or wurdalak. We watch in mounting horror as the patriarch's homecoming soliloquy deteriorates from "I'm wounded!" to "I am hungry . . ." to his demand that his howling dog be shot into silence, and then his sinister insistence on cuddling his grandson.

Though "I wurdalak" had its basis in Alexei Tolstoy's "La Famille du Wurdalak," the marvelously intimidating scene of Gorka's homecoming was inspired by an episode from Guy de Maupassant's aforementioned story, "Fear." In this tale, a man recounts the story of how he became lost in a darkening woods while hunting and found his way to a remote cottage, where he was greeted by a family petrified with terror—a man holding a rifle, two younger men holding axes at the ready, and two kneeling women with their faces pressed to the wall. "You see," the rifle-bearing man explains to the narrator, "two years ago tonight, I killed a man. Last year he appeared and called to me. I expect him to come again tonight." [16] The family unit in "I wurdalak" is exactly as Maupassant describes—right down to the dog, whose howling at the returning dead man causes it to be sent outside.

GLAUCO ONORATO and Rika Dialina as the distraught parents of a child who dies and returns to them a wurdalak.

The episode introduces a startlingly poignant tense of terror when little Ivan, abducted from his bed by grandfather Gorka, later returns to the family home, begging to be let in because he's cold. Ivan, whose cries are initially indistinguishable from the howling wind without, is the first of Bava's "spectral children," a presence that would recur more than once in later films and always with special meaning. Ivan's appearance, as he kneels at the door and appeals to his mother, strikes an emotional chord never before felt in horror cinema—one that strikes the deepest and most complex chords of adult fear with a poeticism worthy of Cocteau or Franju. The image of the crying undead child is, in some ways, an inversion of a scene in Stoker's Dracula, as related by Jonathan Harker in Chapter IV, diary entry of 24 June, as he is imprisoned in Castle Dracula. Count Dracula has been donning Harker's travelling clothes to perpetuate awful crimes in the locality, including the abduction of a child as food for three undead maidens:

> "As I sat I heard a sound in the courtyard without—the agonized cry of a woman. I rushed to the window, and throwing it up, peered out between the bars. There, indeed was a woman with dishevelled hair, holding her hands over her heart as one distressed with running. She was leaning against a corner of the gateway. When she saw my face at the window she leaned forward, and shouted in a voice laden with menace:
>
> "Monster, give me my child!"
>
> She threw herself on her knees, and raising up her hands, cried the same words in tones that wrung my heart. Then she tore her hair and beat her breast, and abandoned herself to all the violences of extravagant emotion. Finally, she threw herself forward, and though I could not see her, I could hear the beating of her naked hands against the door."

Perhaps even more chilling than the wailings of this dead child is the 15 Though Gorka's family cottage was built in the studio, the bridge leading to it was an actual location. It can also be seen in Antonio Leonviola's Maciste nel terra dei Ciclopi/Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops, released in March 1961.

16 Guy de Maupassant (trans. Arnold Kellett), The Dark Side (New York NY: Carroll & Graf Publishers, 1989), 44.

OLD GORKA (Boris Karloff) tells the story of how he defeated Olibek to his worrisome family and guest Vladimir in "The Wurdalak."

ensuing altercation between Giorgio and his wife, who would rather murder her husband than let her child's cries go unanswered. Here Bava makes a devastating commentary on the fragile bonds of marriage, as the knife Gorka used to slay Olibek is wielded against his own progeny.

The climactic image of Sdenka's eyes, when Vladimir finds her hiding in her bed, has also haunted many viewers, unable to explain precisely why this fleeting shot is so disturbing. The shot shows Susy Andersen's unblinking eyes framed in a pool of light, their pupils almost fully dilated. For the shot, makeup artist Otello Fava fitted Andersen with a special pair of contact lenses. The effect is wonderfully subtle, yet every bit as unsettling as any bloodshot lenses Christopher Lee ever wore.

Unlike its set-bound companion episodes, "I wurdalak" was partly filmed on location in Canale Monterano, a spooky "city of the dead," northwest of Rome, which was destroyed by an earthquake in the late 18th century. [17] Also, to maximize his control over his environments, various seeming exteriors were in fact constructed on a sound stage at Cinecittà. The ruined chapel landscape in which Vladimir and Sdenka seek shelter—another resonant plot twist—was part studio construction (screen left) and part glass shot (screen right), which Bava had prepared by pasting clippings of a photographed ruin on a sheet of glass. In one memorable shot, Karloff fits his head into the space between the camera and the matte, as Arturo Dominici does when returning to the campsite in Caltiki il mostro immortale, providing a live, interacting foreground to sell the matte's authenticity as scenery.

Though it has always been one of Bava's most popular works, "I wurdalak" has never quite received its due as the genre milestone it is. Michael Reeves' Witchfinder General/The Conqueror Worm and George A. Romero's Night of the Living Dead, both produced in 1968, are the films most often named by writers trying to pinpoint that pivotal moment in the horror cinema when Evil was first allowed to win the upper hand. In fact, "I wurdalak," made five years earlier, marks the first time Evil was allowed to prevail in a Gothic horror film—without humor and without irony, but also without the passing of judgment, and without the forces of Evil suffering any punishment or, indeed, any setback whatever. [18]

Prior to "I wurdalak," such pessimism was indulged onscreen only in dystopian science fiction dramas like Don Siegel's Invasion of the Body Snatchers (1956) and Joseph Losey's The Damned/These Are the Damned (1961, which also featured eerie children who were "cold"—albeit with radiation), two films which similarly explore infective simulacra of the human species. Though both Siegel and Losey saw the darkness of their respective visions ultimately compromised for commercial release, the cynicism displayed by their films was acceptable in the context of science fiction because audiences of that era generally distrusted science. It is one thing, however, to see dehumanization prevail in science fiction and quite another to present the same scenario within the context of a horror film—particularly a Gothic horror film, which touches the viewer on the vulnerable, primal level of fairy tale. In "I wurdalak," Mario Bava was not saying that Science might fail Man someday, but portraying a Manichean "Once Upon a Time" in which Good is overthrown by the forces of Evil. The message which Siegel and Losey had failed to circulate as speculation finally got out in the guise of a fait accompli, primarily because AIP was too distracted by the film's allusions to homosexuality to notice any other subversive content. [19]

"I wurdalak" was also to influence the horror genre in other ways. In La maschera del demonio, Bava briefly hinted at incestuous predation in a portentous yet unfulfilled scene between Princess Katia and the awakening corpse of her father Prince Vajda. In "I wurdalak," this promise is more than fulfilled; the unspeakable graduates into shocking, powerfully dramatized acts of incestuous predation and pedophilia. For the first time, the decimation of an entire family structure by vampirism is documented—an angle for which Peter Sasdy's Taste the Blood of Dracula received much acclaim in 1970, though its implications dealt only with adults and were far less harrowing.

One hesitates to use the word "evil" in describing Gorka's campaign against his family, because he is driven by love, not bloodlust, to reclaim his family in death. Bava observes the phenomenon with great sympathy for his characters, yet with an almost scientific detachment for the goals of their guiding virus. As Gorka's family move one by one beyond the veil to join him, we are disturbed to find our own loyalties shifting, as it becomes apparent that the family is not being destroyed—merely reinvented on the other side of life. Though not an official remake, David Cronenberg's feature debut Shivers/They Came From Within (1975) follows the structure of Bava's film fairly closely. Set in a modern highrise apartment, Shivers begins with the arrival of a new tenant, then documents the unit's gradual infestation by sexually transmitted parasites. As in "I wurdalak," families infect their own members (even their children) before branching out, social structures disintegrate and, finally, the infected are not destroyed but recreated by the disease. Like Bava's short film, Shivers reaches its conclusion with a darkly triumphant kiss. The casting of Barbara Steele in a supporting role accentuates the debt, and suggests that "I wurdalak" may represent the true genesis of what we know today as "venereal horror."

BORIS KARLOFF poses with the head of Olibek, a Eugenio Bava sculpture barely seen in the American version.

To understand that "I wurdalak" worked only too well, one must examine its presentation in the context of Black Sabbath. AIP ordered several changes for this episode, in order to dilute its unusually high shock value. For example: at the moment when Gorka removes the severed head of the undead Olibek from his traveling sack, I tre volti della paura holds the shot, until Karloff produces the head—a scarifying prop sculpted by Eugenio Bava—and displays it at such an angle that its dead eyes gaze directly at the camera.[20] The AIP version eliminates Olibek's head from the shot by enlarging (and thus cropping) the image, as is apparent from the shot's sudden increase in grain. Seconds later, when the head is shown dangling from the gatepost by its long, black hair, I tre volti della paura shows the head being buffeted about by the wind in slow motion, while Black Sabbath substitutes an abbreviated take projected at normal speed. "The Wurdalak" also forfeited a few throat wounds (particularly during the scene in which the undead family plead with Sdenka to join them), and a full-length view of the blindfolded corpse of little Ivan, laid out inside the cottage beside his murdered Uncle Pietro.

To ears raised on Les Baxter's soundtrack, hearing Roberto Nicolosi's original string orchestrations in this segment for the first time is a pleasurably unsettling experience. Whereas Baxter's music never leaves Black Sabbath for very long, Nicolosi once again understands the value of silence; his violins and violas are all the more ominous and sinister for their tasteful placement and restraint. The choice of instrumentation here is equally significant, the strings evoking a sense of country while their frenzied melody conjures images of ghostliness; Baxter's trademark use of pompous brass instruments gives "The Wurdalak" a galloping zest that is both picturesque and robustly Russian, but otherwise not nearly as enhancing to the material.

KARLOFF at Cinecittà, studying his lines.

17 When Lamberto Bava became a director in his own right, he revisited this location to shoot the "film-within-a-film" included in his hit movie Demoni/Demons (1985).

18 I expect some dissent over this statement, but I've given it every possible consideration. There were certainly downbeat endings before, as in the cases of Tod Browning's Freaks (1932) and Mark Robson's The Seventh Victim (1943), but it can't be said that Evil prevails in either film. Freaks ends horrifically, but on a note of poetic justice. The Seventh Victim ends with an act of suicide, but the woman in question (Jean Brooks) is not our assigned heroine, and she takes her life to reclaim her independence, as well as to deprive the film's villains of claiming their seventh victim. Of course, films like Psycho (1960) cannot be counted—Mother is incarcerated, not destroyed, victorious only over Norman—and The Birds (1963) ends on a draw. The AIP/Italian coproduction L'ultimo uomo della terra/The Last Man on Earth (1963) ends with the death of its protagonist and a bitter future in store for those who kill and survive him, but the victors are more mistaken than truly evil.

19 Ironically, in 1968, American International told George A. Romero that they couldn't distribute Night of the Living Dead unless a more upbeat ending was filmed. The same year, they released Reeves' Witchfinder General as The Conqueror Worm with its despairing finale intact.

20 Staring eyes are a recurring motif throughout the film. "The Telephone" begins with a voyeur's gaze tormenting Rosy, and ends with a long-shot view of the strangled Mary's death stare. Many of the most frightening moments in "The Wurdalak" involve people feeling the gazes of others, behind their sleeping backs or looking at them through windows. "The Drop of Water" features a staring corpse that won't close its eyes, and ends with a slow, inexorable zoom into the eyes of another corpse.

The Karloff Wrap-Arounds

Boris Karloff appears as a warmly menacing Master of Ceremonies in both I tre volti della paura and Black Sabbath, but the host footage is different in each, unique to each. In the Italian version, Karloff appears only twice as host—once at the beginning and again at the end. He does not introduce the stories individually; these are presented with their own main titles. In the AIP version, Karloff introduces Black Sabbath by name at the top, returns to introduce each subsequent episode individually—and then confounds audience expectations by not returning at the end to tie a bow around the whole package.

AIP was motivated to adopt individual story introductions partly by their desire to imitate Thriller and partly by their decision to resequence the stories. Arkoff and Nicholson realized the importance of giving their impatient young audiences a monster as soon as possible, so they reassigned "The Telephone" (a sleek thriller with neither monsters nor Karloff) to middle position, and moving "The Drop of Water" (with its blood-chilling dead medium) up front. Their strategy also involved withholding Karloff's "The Wurdalak" episode—the actor's showcase—till last, to keep the audiences in their seats and to send them out of the theater on a high note.

A sound plan in theory, but not in practice. Unfortunately, AIP's resequencing of the stories negated the transitions which Bava had so carefully woven into his film's tapestry. Bava had filmed the stories to dovetail into one another visually: "The Telephone" ends with a man being stabbed to death; "The Wurdalak" begins with Vladimir discovering the body of a man stabbed to death, and ends with faces gazing through a window; "The Drop of Water" ties all three together by opening with a woman gazing through a window, her reverie shattered by the ringing of her telephone. (The fact that this last episode commences with echoes of both of its preceding stories may indicate that Bava was uncertain at the time of filming as to where this episode would finally be placed in order, and was playing it safe.) AIP's reshuffling of the stories, and the further barriers erected by the Karloff introductions, effectively concealed the fact that such a strategy ever existed.

GAG PHOTO of Mario Bava frightening the King of Horror, Boris Karloff.

Most of the Karloff host footage was shot by Bava himself, who brought to each intro further proof of his visual ingenuity, though he declined to use most of the footage himself—preferring his horrors to be met head-on and full-strength, without tongue-in-cheek. Thus, Black Sabbath contains three fragments of Bava/Karloff footage not found in I tre volti della paura. While introducing "The Drop of Water," Karloff appears to be speaking directly to the camera, until—at the precise moment he mentions the title—a droplet of water ripples his image, revealing it as a reflection in a miniature pool. "The Telephone" is introduced with a tiny Karloff and an enormous telephone, an apparent forced perspective shot that reveals itself as a split-screen double exposure as Karloff's own giant hand reaches down into the foreground to lift the receiver. Prior to "The Wurdalak," Karloff steps out from behind a tree in the story's mist-laden forest, resplendent in a well-tailored suit; after introducing the tale, he snaps his fingers twice and disappears in a puff of smoke. All of this footage performs the dual function of softening the film's horrors, keeping them light, as AIP intended. It also offers conflicting information, as in the first introduction, where Karloff says, "In this tale by Chekhov—'The Drop of Water'—we prove that a ghost doesn't have to be seen to be believed." In fact, the episode's "ghost" does make a very tangible climactic appearance, so the tale says no such thing.

I tre volti della paura, on the other hand, features only two instances of host footage—the first immediately following the main titles. Here Karloff appears atop an otherworldly, magenta promontory, while behind him an illusion of wind is created by light projected onto a cycloramic backdrop through a spinning cyclodrum (a zoetrope-like device). The camera responds to Karloff's bidding that we "Come closer!" and he proceeds to set the mood for the stories to come, talking about how wurdalaks only drink the blood of those whom they love the best, as Bava floods the actor's grim countenance with saturated red lighting—which immediately diffuses as he chuckles and says (if we read his lips), "There I go, talking shop again!" One wonders what Bava was up to, introducing a trilogy of horror stories with this blatant science fiction setting. Might he have been taking the opportunity to demonstrate to AIP that he could economically provide an alien landscape for a science fiction story? For whatever reason, AIP deemed this footage an inappropriate opening for a horror film and wanted something to replace it. Unfortunately, by the time AIP's judgment was handed down, Karloff had left Rome; it was too late for Bava to do anything about it. However, Arkoff and Nicholson were able to take advantage of Karloff's casting in another of their features to film an alternative opening narration, using much the same dialogue.

BAVA, bundled up against winter weather, confers with Karloff in the makeup room.

For this new footage, Karloff was seated in front of a black backdrop, his neck and shoulders covered with a black mantle, presenting the illusion of a floating severed head—a trick employed not long before, by William Castle, for Vincent Price and Elisha Cook Jr.'s opening narration of House on Haunted Hill (1958). Shot with direct sound (unlike the rest of the movie), Karloff emanates avuncular menace as colors strobe over his face—apparently projected from the same color wheel that played over the face of Vincent Price as he was being mesmerized by Basil Rathbone in the climactic segment of Roger Corman's Tales of Terror.

Bava didn't direct this introduction, so who did?

Sam Arkoff could not answer this question, but one would imagine the likeliest candidates to be those directors who worked on Karloff projects at AIP later in 1963 and '64. Reached by telephone, Daniel Haller—who directed Die, Monster, Die! in the autumn of 1964—told me that he had nothing to do with filming the introductions. The first film Karloff made for AIP upon returning to Los Angeles from Rome was a walk-on bit at the end of William Asher's "Beach Party" sequel Bikini Beach (1964). Knowing that my friend Tom Weaver had interviewed many AIP alumni, I asked his opinion about whether or not Asher might have be the director of this introduction. Tom suggested it was more likely that someone like Anthony Carras—an editor, associate producer and second-unit director at AIP who actually directed more of the highlights from the "Beach Party" movies than is commonly known—had done the deed. Again by telephone, Carras informed me that he did not direct the Black Sabbath intro himself, but he narrowed the field of choice to one outstanding suspect: Ronald Sinclair.

THE ABDUCTION of little Ivan is depicted in this tinted British front-of-house card.

"I directed a lot of second-unit and pick-up stuff for AIP in those days, and so did Ron," Carras said. "Whenever I couldn't do something, for whatever reason, they would get Ron. Ron's dead, so we can't ask him, but I never shot anything with Karloff. So if it was shot here [in Los Angeles], as you say, it was probably Ron."

Born Richard Arthur Hould in Dunedin, New Zealand, on January 21, 1924, Ronald Sinclair relocated with his family to Hollywood at a young age and entered motion pictures as a child actor. In a delightful coincidence, he first encountered Boris Karloff in 1939, while playing the young King Edward in Universal's Tower of London—he had the honor of being murdered by Karloff's bald, clubfooted executioner, Mord. He became affiliated with American International in the mid-1950s, editing most of Roger Corman's early work for the company, and graduated to associate producer on Corman's The Haunted Palace in 1963. Sinclair's duties at AIP were not only editorial; they occasionally extended to second unit direction and pickup shooting. Sinclair also would seem to be the best candidate for directing the Black Sabbath intro because he is known to have directed Karloff on one other occasion. According to actress Susan Hart, Sinclair directed all of Karloff's scenes for The Ghost in the Invisible Bikini (1966), added after director Don Weis had turned in his final cut of the picture, which AIP found to be incoherent. Sinclair was also the man responsible for taking the enormous amount of footage Bava had shot for Le spie vengono dal semifreddo (1966) and editing it down to the disaster known as Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs. He died in 1992 of respiratory failure.

The Happy Ending

